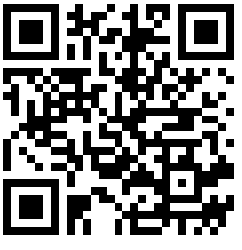
This is a reproduction of a library book that was digitized by Google as part of an ongoing effort to preserve the information in books and make it universally accessible.

Google™ books

https://books.google.com



Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

AN EASY WAY TO EARN £100. (SEE PAGE 715.)

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 366. FOR WEEK ENDING JANUARY 4TH, 1896. [ONE PENNY.

BE SURE TO KEEP IT WELL.

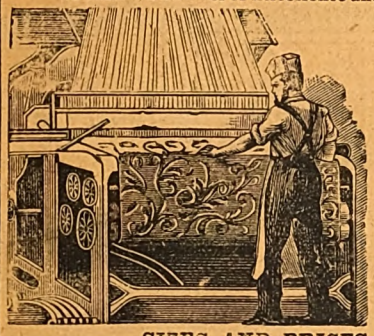
THIS ADVERTISEMENT.

WONDERFUL BARGAINS!

IMMENSE REDUCTION IN PRICES OF OUR WORLD-RENOWNED

BRUSSELETTE CARPETS.

ADMITTEDLY THE CHEAPEST IN THE WORLD. Seamless, Woven, and Reversible, Rich Turkey Patterns and Colourings, Superior Quality, with Handsome Border to match, a Marvel of Excellence and Beauty.



These Carpets are splendid imitations of Real Brussels Carpets, the designs having been carefully copied from the originals, both as regards colourings and patterns, so that when in use it is almost impossible, except by close scrutiny, to detect the difference. They have gained a world-wide reputation for magnificence, cheapness, and utility, having no equal. All designs are registered and deservedly considered works of art.

SIZES AND PRICES.

	ft.	in.		ft.	in.	Sale Price. s. d.	Former Price. s. d.
No. 1	9	0	by	6	0	5 6	9 0
,, 2	9	0	,,	7	6	7 0	11 0
,, 3	9	0	,,	9	0	8 6	13 6
,, 4	10	6	,,	7	6	8 9	13 9
,, 5	10	6	,,	9	0	10 0	15 6
,, 6	12	0	,,	9	0	11 6	18 0
,, 7	10	6	,,	10	6	12 0	18 6
,, 8	12	0	,,	10	6	13 6	20 6

	ft.	in.		ft.	in.	Sale Price. s. d.	Former Price. s. d.
No. 9	15	0	by	9	0	14 3	22 6
,, 10	13	6	,,	10	6	15 3	24 0
,, 11	12	0	,,	12	0	15 3	24 0
,, 12	13	6	,,	12	0	17 0	27 0
,, 13	15	0	,,	12	0	19 0	32 0
,, 14	18	0	,,	12	0	22 9	36 0
,, 15	21	0	,,	12	0	26 0	42 0

GIVEN AWAY.

As an advertisement for the introduction of these goods to all readers of Short Stories, we have decided to give away to every purchaser of the above goods, enclosing cutting from this advertisement, a very handsomely woven Hearthrug, 6 feet long and 3 feet wide, to match carpets in colours, &c.

Thousands of Repeat Orders and Unsolicited Orders received.

Temple Street, Sidmouth.
Mr. Jas. Hooke writes: "I have had one of your Brusselette Carpets before, and I must say they are very good value. Please send on above goods quickly as possible."

Hurst Wood, near Maidstone.
Mrs. Thatcher writes: "Sir, please to send me two Carpets and two Rugs. I had two from you three years ago, and they have given great satisfaction."

All goods despatched same day as order received. SATISFACTION GUARANTEED OR MONEY RETURNED. Cheques and Postal Orders to be made payable to J. HARGREAVES, Sec., and crossed "Union Bank." Established upwards of Twenty-five Years. Address—

THE BRITISH CARPET WEAVING CO.,
31, OLD STREET, LONDON, E.C.

PAY YOU WELL.

"STRONGEST AND BEST."—Health.

FRY'S
Pure Concentrated
COCOA

Highest Honours, Chicago, 1893. | Over 100 Prize Medals and Diplomas.

Purchasers should ask specially for FRY'S PURE CONCENTRATED COCOA to distinguish it from other varieties manufactured by the Firm.

"THE NIMBLE 9D."

Great Reduction in price to 9d. per lb. in order to reduce stock, but

QUALITY GOOD AS EVER.

NEARLY 100,000 BEDS ALREADY SOLD

TO THOROUGHLY SATISFIED PURCHASERS.

NEWHAM'S LINCOLNSHIRE FEATHER BEDS

THESE BEDS are warranted doubly purified, dusted, and perfected in our own extensive factory at Boston, Lincs., made in strong linen bordered tick. The quality, sweetness, and purity of every bed guaranteed. These beds ALWAYS GIVE SATISFACTION, and many thousands of purchasers have sent us flattering testimonials and other orders for beds. Note following prices, which are 25 per cent. less than our recently advertised prices.

No. 1—Single Bed, Bolster and Pillow, 6ft. 3in. by 3ft. 6in., weighing 40lbs. 30/-

No. 2—Double Bed, Bolster, and Two Pillows, 6ft. 6in. by 4ft 6in., weighing 50lbs. 37/6

No. 3—Double Bed, Bolster, and Two Pillows, 6ft. 6in. by 4ft. 6in., weighing 55lbs. 41/3

No. 4—Extra Size Bed, Bolster, and Two Pillows, 6ft. 6in. by 5ft., weighing 65lbs. 48/9

Any sized Bed only 9d. per lb., Carriage Paid, to any station in the United Kingdom. FEATHERS ONLY 9d. PER LB. The trade supplied. All orders must be accompanied by cheque or P.O.O. (which, as security to purchasers, may be post-dated ten days). Send for samples of Feathers and Ticks, Price Lists, etc., which will be sent Post Free and need not be returned. A great reduction on three or more Beds. Please mention this paper.

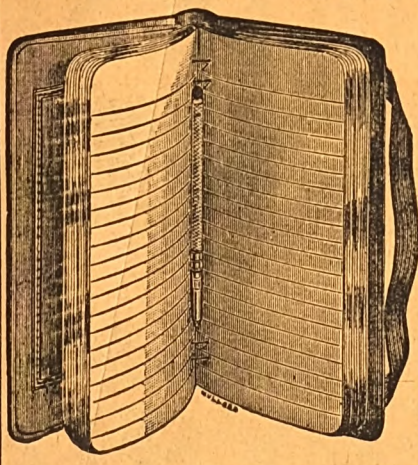
S. S. NEWHAM & CO., Boston, Lincolnshire.

Digitized by Google

COLLINS'
"AYE, READY!" NOTE-BOOK.

WITH PATENT "SELF-REGISTER."



THE HANDIEST AND THE BEST. THE SIMPLEST AND THE CHEAPEST.

As will be seen from the Illustration, this Note-Book has a hollow "rest" cut into the back, into which the Pencil falls and is securely held, while by means of an ingenious contrivance called a "Self-Register," the person using the Book can at once open it where he was last writing. A reference to any page in the front, the middle, or the end is also materially assisted by the "Self-Register."

In Leather Bindings, Round Corners, Gilt Edges, from 1s. upwards, or with Re-fills from 3s. 6d. to 10s. 6d.

WM. COLLINS, SONS & CO., LIMITED,
Bridewell Place, London, E.C.;
139, Stirling Road, Glasgow.

MRS. JACKSON

An artist's wife, residing at Norton, near Malton, states: "I am deeply grateful to you for the good received through taking your Wind Pills. I suffered severely from

INDIGESTION, SPASMS,

and LIVER COMPLAINT. The doctors gave me up as incurable, nor did I think it possible for me to recover. I scarcely dared to eat any food, fearing suffocation. Seeing an advertisement of

Page Woodcock's Wind Pills,

I resolved to try them. After taking a few small boxes I lost all the painful symptoms, and now enjoy good health. Publish my statement as you please."

All sufferers from INDIGESTION, LIVER COMPLAINTS, WIND on the STOMACH, SICK HEADACHE, BILIOUSNESS, etc., should avail themselves of this most excellent medicine.

☛ The Wind Pills being purely Vegetable, Tasteless, and Mild, and Tonic in their action, may be taken with perfect safety by the most delicate of either sex.

Of all Medicine Vendors, at 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. Post Free for P.O. or Stamps from PAGE WOODCOCK, LINCOLN.

EPPS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

COCOA

TO THE DEAF.

A Gentleman who cured himself of Deafness and Noises in the Head after fourteen years' suffering, will gladly send full particulars of the remedy post free.—Address, H. CLIFTON, Norfolk House, Norfolk Street, Strand, London, W.C.

TO TOBACCONISTS COMMENCING.

£20 See Illus. Guide and Catalogue (259 pages), 3d. "How to Open a Cigar Stores, from £20 to £2,000." TOBACCONISTS' OUTFITTING CO, 186, Euston Road, London. (Over 50 years' reputation.) Manager, H. MYERS.

S.S. S.S.
PEARSON'S
£100
COUPON.
No. 1
JAN. 4, 1896.
S.S. S.S.

HAIR DESTROYED.

A doctor's widow knows of a simple, inexpensive remedy that permanently destroys the roots, and will forward particulars free to all those afflicted sending stamped envelope. Address Mrs. B. D. WOOD, 4, DUKE STREET, VILLIERS STREET, LONDON, W.

ARE YOU LITTLE?

If so, wear the "A D" Invisible Elevators (Regd.). Will increase your height up to four inches; the only approved means; detection impossible; simple, inexpensive. Send stamped envelope for particulars to the ORIENTAL TOILET CO. (B 5 Dept.), 87, Strand, London.

JANUARY 2... £8 per cent.
Feb. 1... 6 " "
Mar. 1... 5 " "
April 1... 8 " "
May 1... 7 " "
June 2... 10 " "
July 1... 7 " "
Aug. 1... 9 " "
Sept. 2... 8 " "
Oct. 1... 8 " "
Nov. 1... 7 " "
Dec. 2... 7 " "
Total for 12 months ...£92 per cent.

An average of nearly £8 per cent. per month.

IF interested in how a LEGITIMATE investment, WITHOUT SPECULATION, can be made to yield this return, write for our Illustrated Manual, post free. We have not a dissatisfied client, no money has ever been lost, and £5 and upwards may be invested. Cheques for profits mailed promptly 1st of each month. DOUGLAS, HUNGERFORD & WILLIAMS, 5, Copthall Buildings, Copthall Avenue, E.C., London, and 11, Place de la Bourse, 11, Paris.

BLUSHING

Permanently cured. A Pamphlet giving sound practical advice and particulars of a successful treatment for a rapid, simple, and inexpensive home-cure, forwarded free to all upon receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—Prof. B. L. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

HAIR DESTROYED

permanently and absolutely by an entirely new and harmless self-treatment, total destruction guaranteed. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope. Prof. F.T. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

TOO STOUT

Dr. Grey's FAT REDUCING Pills.

A safe, rapid, and permanent reduction and improvement in health and breathing guaranteed. A special preparation kept for stubborn cases (either sex) which have resisted other treatment.

ABDOMINAL OBESITY A SPECIALTY.

2/9 and 4/6 per box, plain wrapper, post free to all parts. Dr. O. GREY, 57, Weymouth St., Portland Pl., London, W.

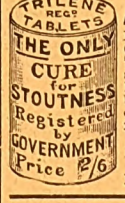
TOOTH-ACHE

CURED INSTANTLY BY

BUNTER'S NERVINE

Prevents Decay. Saves Extraction. Sleepless Nights Prevented.

Neuralgic Headache and all Nerve Pains Removed by BUNTER'S NERVINE. All Chemists, 1s. 1½d.



ALL FAT PEOPLE

Readily Reduce Weight and Cure Corpulency Permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are very agreeable, harmless, and never fail to PRESERVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of diet. Reduction begins immediately.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably." Send 2/6 to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, Pinsbury Pavement, London, E.C.

VIOLIN STRINGS.

4 Best "E's" (samples) 9d., post free.

S. S. CARY, NEWBURY.

DEAFNESS, HEAD NOISES, etc., ABSOLUTELY CURED in 24 hours, by using one bottle of "Auraline Essence," the Great Indian Discovery. Millions of sufferers cured after all else had failed. Many testimonials. Why remain deaf when a cure awaits you? Send 2/9 to the MACKAY REMEDY CO., 104, High Holborn, London.

HAIR DESTROYED.

A lady who has permanently destroyed Superfluous Hairs on herself, will be happy to forward free, to all similarly afflicted, full particulars of a simple, inexpensive and harmless self-treatment. Send stamped addressed envelope in confidence to Mrs. "T. D.," 87, Strand, London.

BODLEIAN LIBRARY 16 MAR 1981

SHORT STORIES.

EDITED BY

C. ARTHUR PEARSON.

No. 366.] [ONE PENNY.

For the Week ending January 4th, 1896.

HER MILLINER'S BILL.

IF ever a man ought to have married money it was Charlie Lorrimer. Brought up in good style, the death of his father just before he, Charlie, came of age, revealed to him the unpleasant fact that instead of being in receipt of a good income, all that he had coming to him was a few hundreds a year; quite enough, of course, for many men to enjoy life comfortably upon, but not so to one who had been accustomed to have his every whim gratified without considering the cost.

Through influence, a post under Government was in due course obtained for him, and if he had been content to remain single, as hundreds of other young men similarly situated would have done, he could have been exceedingly comfortable, seeing that he had the entrée of some of the best society in town.

He was an extremely good-looking young man, of undeniably pleasing manners; still, girls are more sensible, or more mercenary, whichever you like to call it, nowadays than they were formerly, and do not give their mothers and chaperons so much trouble in the way of forming undesirable attachments as they used to, I fancy.

Hence it came about that as Charlie Lorrimer had the good sense not to pay marked attention to any young lady individually in the particular set in which he moved, he was regarded as harmless enough. It is true there had been something between him and a certain Miss Diana Carew, a lady several years his senior, the daughter of a rich foxhunting baronet whose property adjoined the Lorrimer's.

She was a lady who, if report spoke truly, was not only one of the best horsewomen in the county (a fact which was universally admitted on all sides), but just a wee bit fast as well; preferring to make her bets in coin of the realm rather than orthodox boxes of gloves, and not disdaining to take a hand at a card party where the smallness of the stakes was not a prominent feature.

Whether there had ever been more than a flirtation between them, or whether he or she were to blame, is a matter of uncertainty.

At any rate, before Charlie Lorrimer's bad luck came upon him, a coolness had sprung up between them, and Society was startled one day by the announcement that Miss Carew was engaged to Lord Duncombe, a middle-aged peer who did not enjoy the best of reputations.

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

In course of time they were duly married: the alliance, as people had predicted, proving anything but a happy one for the lady, her spouse speedily dissipating her ample fortune, and finally, finding England too hot for him, betaking himself somewhere abroad.

Possibly it was from being unsuccessful in his first effort that made people set Mr. Lorrimer down as a confirmed bachelor, but to everybody's surprise he quietly announced one day, when he had just entered his twenty-eighth year, and ought to have known better, as his friends said, that he was going to get married; and, what was in their eyes still more discreditable, to a girl without a penny—a clergyman's daughter from a remote parish down in the west of England.

His friends could not help admiring his choice, a handsome specimen of English girlhood; but so for the matter of that was Miss Bungleigh, the rich brewer's daughter, who had unmistakably set her cap at him, and would have jumped at the chance of marrying him, and brought him a fortune into the bargain.

In due course the wedding came off, very quietly, down in Devonshire, and the happy couple, after the usual Continental honeymoon, set up housekeeping in a very pretty flat in West Kensington.

For a time all went well; he was not continually going to his club, and she, charmed with the novelty of life in London, after the dull quiet of the country, was perfectly happy and contented; but after a while the desire seized her to extend their somewhat small circle of acquaintances, and she began to rally her husband on not taking her about more, and introducing her into the set in which he had moved before they were married.

At the same time she had by degrees developed a somewhat expensive taste in the matter of dress, and her milliner's bills had more than once given her husband a severe shock, and he had hinted as much to her on one or two occasions.

Things had been going on in this way for upwards of a twelvemonth, and a certain amount of estrangement had grown up between them. The sweet girlish maiden became somewhat snappy at times, and he in consequence had recourse to the pleasures of his club more regularly than she altogether approved of.

One day things came to a climax; the dinner had not been quite what it should be. Mrs. Lorrimer did not, as a rule, keep her servants very long, and cook was under notice to leave, so that when the trim parlour-maid had brought in the coffee, the storm broke.

"I was looking for some stationery in your escritoire this morning, Charles, and I came across some letters signed Diana Carew. You never mentioned her name to me, I think."

"Didn't I, dear? Oh, she was an old flame of mine; used to live next to our place in Loamshire; a very jolly girl she was, too."

"And what became of her, may I ask?"

"Got married."

"To whom?"

"Oh, a fellow who was no good, Lord Duncombe; ran through her money in no time, and then bolted."

"I wonder you never thought it worth while to mention her name to me, Charles."

"Oh, it was all over years before I knew you. I quite forgot I had any of her letters still by me; they were all very matter-of-fact, if I remember right," he went on in as airy a tone of voice as he could command.

"I see she used to address you as 'Dear Charlie,' so you must have been pretty intimate?"

"Oh, that's nothing; we were brought up together, you know—oh, by the way, Hilda, I have an invitation for a hop at the Laces' next week."

"I am glad to see that some of your old friends are beginning to recognise my existence, and that reminds me, Charlie, I want some money. I have ordered a new dress at Madame Elysée's, and I want to pay her account. She does charge awfully."

"All right, my dear, you can have a tenner," said Charlie, thankful at the turn the conversation had taken.

"If you mean ten pounds, Charles, all I have to say is that that will be no good at all; this dress I have just ordered will be £10 10s. at least, and I fancy my account must already be nearer £60 than £50; you don't want me to go about like an old frump, I suppose?"

Her husband lit a cigarette before replying. "I am afraid £15 is the very most I can spare you—you see, my dear, we are living in a rather more expensive style than my income justifies, and £70 for dress."

"I beg your pardon, I said about £60."

"Yes, and then this new one which is going to cost £10 10s., you say?"

"Oh, she can wait for that."

"Yes, but it must be paid sometime, I suppose; I have meant to speak to you about your dress expenditure for some time. Your mother told me before we were married that if I allowed you £30 a year I should be doing——"

"Oh, mamma doesn't know what things cost in London; it is for your sake more than my own I dress well. You always say how necessary it is to study appearances."

"Well, it is no use arguing about it; all the money I have at my disposal until the end of the quarter is less than £50, and I cannot possible spare you more than £15."

"I wonder what your cigar bill comes to in the year?"

"I can easily tell you; for months past I have almost always smoked a pipe."

After a few more controversial remarks the lady retired with as much dignity as she could command.

"I wonder," thought Mr. Lorrimer to himself, "whether there was anything very compromising in those letters. Poor Di, she was a good sort. It is not quite the thing to do to dun a lady for a debt, but I know she would have paid up long ago if she had ever thought of it. It's lucky Hilda did not see it, though. Perhaps she did, and did not understand what it meant."

A minute later Mr. Lorrimer had opened the drawer from which his wife had a few hours ago unearthed the bundle of letters from Miss Carew.

"Ah! here it is," as he picked up an envelope in which was contained a half-sheet of note-paper bearing the words in a bold handwriting, "I.O.U. £100, Diana Carew, July 3rd., 1887."

"Now, what's to be done? If I drop her a line she will reply by return, but Hilda would know the writing at a glance, and that would never do. If I go and call, some good-natured friend would be sure to tell Hilda, which would be worse still. Hold on. Yes—the very thing—I'll do it, too."

The subject of finance was not again referred to between them that evening, but the following afternoon, on his return from the F.O, Mr. Lorrimer saw unmistakable signs of a storm brewing on his wife's face, and was not long in being enlightened as to the cause of her displeasure.

Digitized by Google

"I went about that new dress to-day, and the way in which people go on in London is really quite incomprehensible. Having been brought up in the country, my education in certain social matters may have been neglected, but I certainly should not expect a gentleman holding any sort of position in the country to take off his hat to a milliner, and in her own shop, too."

"And do they in London?"

"Why, the men who go to this Madame Elysée's not only take off their hats to her, but her customers chat away to her as if they were on grounds of perfect equality."

"And she isn't a particularly pretty woman either."

"Pretty, indeed—as if that ought to make any difference—why, she is as ugly as sin, and will never see forty again."

"Are you quite sure? She is a very quiet, unassuming woman."

"Oh, you know her, then?"

"And if her customers like to make themselves agreeable to her," he continued, ignoring her question, "from what you tell me of the class of people you see there, it is, you may depend upon it, the correct thing to do, and you'd better do the same. I have told you how my account stands at my bankers; you had better be civil to her until you can afford to be independent, I think."

"I shall most certainly give her a piece of my mind if she attempts any familiarities with me."

"You must please yourself, my dear."

"I mean to," was the reply.

The opportunity was not long in coming. On Mrs. Lorrimer's next visit to the Bond Street emporium she found the proprietress engaged in affable conversation with a well-known M.P. and his wife.

An assistant came forward to attend to her, and before she had concluded the mysterious operation of "fitting," Madame had taken leave of her friends, the gentleman courteously taking off his hat as he wished her good-bye, and she came forward to Mrs. Lorrimer to express a hope that everything was satisfactory.

"As satisfactory as can be expected, I suppose."

"I don't understand you, madam. I am very sorry if you have any cause for complaint."

"I had been recommended to you as a person who gave individual attention to her customers, instead of which I find myself invariably waited upon by one or other of your assistants."

"I cannot possibly be everywhere, madam, and all my helpers are thoroughly qualified to execute orders and attend to customers, even more so than I am, probably."

This was said in a quiet, ladylike tone of voice, although the speaker, a plain, middle-aged woman, looked as if she could on occasion bandy sharp words with anybody.

"When I come to a shop, I expect to be attended to by the principal."

"Very well then, madam, it will be best for us to sever our connection; I will send in my account shortly."

"Send it in at once by all means."

Mr. Lorrimer was agreeably surprised when he next saw his wife to find her in a very good temper.

"I told you I should give that milliner woman a bit of my mind."

"And you have?"

"Yes, I have; I told her to send her account in as soon as she liked."

"And if she takes you at your word?"

"You will have to pay it."

"I have told you I can't, that is, not at present; I might in one way, though," speaking as if he had suddenly remembered something.

"I don't care how you do it as long as she is paid. What do you mean to do, borrow it?"

"No; in going through some papers in that drawer in which you you found Miss Carew's letters, I came across an I.O.U. for £100, and of course I could get that by asking for it."

"A hundred pounds owing to you and you complain of being short of money? Really, Charlie, you are altogether incomprehensible."

"You see, my dear, this money is owing to me by a lady."

"I don't see that matters much. Not a lady of rank, I suppose?"

"She is, as it happens."

"Oh! isn't it rather a strange thing for ladies to incur debts to gentlemen?"

"I thought you might think so, but then this isn't exactly a debt."

"What on earth is it, then?"

"A sum I won at cards some years ago now, and I imagine the fact must have escaped the lady's memory, otherwise I am sure she would have sent me a cheque long since."

"All the more reason you should remind her. I would do anything rather than be under an obligation to that Bond Street woman."

"If I get this money to-morrow I will send you a wire, and you can meet me at Madame Elysée's."

"Do you mean to call for it? If so I think you might take me. Women are so much more tactful in these matters than men."

"On second thoughts, I will meet you in Bond Street to-morrow at four o'clock; I am quite sure to get the money, and I can settle by cheque afterwards."

* * * * *

Punctual to the appointed time saw Mr. Lorrimer in Bond Street, and after waiting something like half-an-hour he saw his wife's brougham (hired) coming along.

Mrs. Lorrimer's look of triumph gave way to one of genuine consternation when on entering the shop she saw her husband courteously take off his hat to Madame Elysée, and express himself pleased at seeing her looking so well. "My wife tells me she wants her account if you have it ready, please."

"Here it is, Mr. Lorrimer. I hope you won't think me awfully extortionate," replied Madame with a laugh.

"Just glance over it, dear, will you?" handing it to his wife, and turning to the proprietress he resumed his conversation. Presently she was called away, and Mr. Lorrimer asked his wife casually if it was correct.

"The—the items seem all right, but what does this mean, Charlie? Total £73 15s.; less due to Mr. Lorrimer on his I.O.U., £100; balance in his favour, £26 5s.

"That's the I.O.U. I spoke to you about."

"But you said your debtor was a lady of rank."

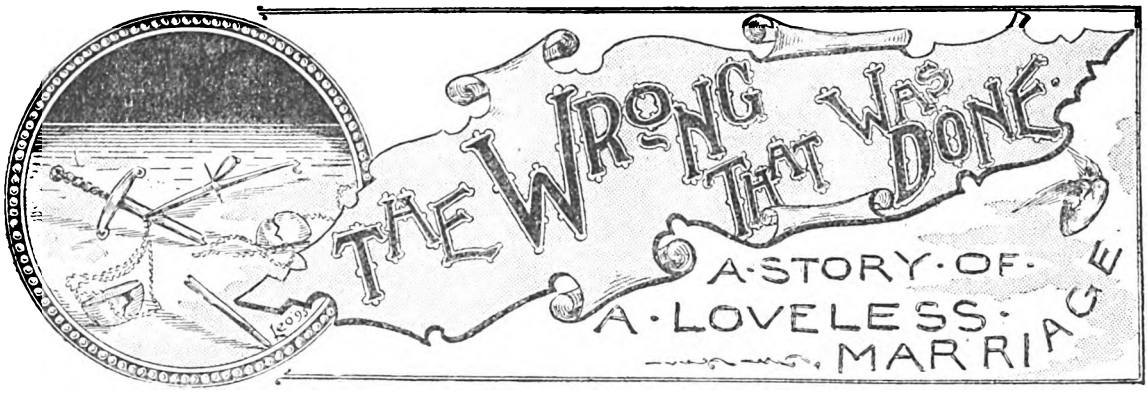
"And so she is! Madame Elysée to the world at large. Lady Duncombe to her friends. You see, when Duncombe left her she had to do something; lots of titled people are in business nowadays, and——"

"Charles, you will oblige me by calling the brougham at once!"

"Certainly, my dear, but I must just say good-bye to Lady Duncombe first."

S. J. F. NEWBERY.

Digitized by Google



By E. C. WAGGENER.

SUMMARY.

COLONEL BEVERLY and his step-daughter, Helen, between whom there is little love, are living together at Looe. After a long absence, Helen's sister, Kitty, returns home. She discovers that Helen fancies herself deeply in love with Gifford Vane, to whom she herself was engaged five years ago, but has not seen him since.

CHAPTER IV.

"I NEED a few more roses for this vase," remarked Helen in a critical tone, as she drew back to inspect the work of her busy hands. "Gifford," turning to the young man who sat watching her with an amused look in his handsome eyes, "I wish you'd run down to the garden and gather some. Kitty will go with you and help you. I must watch the jelly, or I'd go myself."

She stood by a tall, old-fashioned dresser, on which was heaped a quantity of delicious-looking cakes, and a bowl of freshly gathered strawberries occupying the centre.

"Of course we'll go," said the young man, jumping up with alacrity. "What an energetic little body you are," he added, reaching over and boldly appropriating a handful of berries.

"Kitty, do coax him away before he eats the last berry. And see how he is eyeing those cakes. I feel sure he is only waiting for a chance to steal one."

"Yes, do take me away, Miss North, or you'll have neither cakes nor strawberries for tea."

"I really feel too comfortable to move," said Kitty, from the depths of an easy-chair by the window. "And Helen makes such a charming picture with those stains on her hands, and that frown on her forehead, that I am tempted to stay and listen to the lecture I feel sure she means to give you."

"I'll defer the lecture until you come back," said Helen as she hunted about the room for an empty basket. "Now do run along, there's a dear," she added coaxingly.

"I'll go if you'll come too, presently," said Kitty sweetly, as she rose, with a pretty, reluctant air, and wound a light, fleecy scarf about her shoulders.

"I'll come directly, if I don't find something else to do."

Once out of the house an awkward silence fell between Kitty and her companion, which neither seemed disposed to break. The young man strode along, his eyes bent on the ground, except when he occasionally raised them to dart a strange, puzzled look at the graceful, erect figure at his side.

When they reached the garden gate, over which an oak tree spread its foliage, completely shutting off a view of the house, he stopped abruptly, and, seizing her hand, looked long and searchingly into her eyes.

"Kitty, what does this mean?" he demanded in a low, angry voice. "One would think we had never met before until to-day. What do you mean by treating me in this manner?"

"You forget yourself, Dr. Vane," began Kitty haughtily.

"Dr. Vane!" he interrupted, with a sneer. "Once you were not quite so formal. Is it possible that you mean to ignore the past?"

"I shall at least try to forget it—as you have done," she answered, looking straight into his handsome eyes.

"I'm sure I have no wish to forget it," he retorted flushing hotly under her steady gaze. "I don't know," he went on, with a sweeping gesture towards the house, "what prevented me from letting them know the truth, unless it was the quick, warning look you gave me, and even then I wasn't certain of your meaning. Kitty, tell me, why are you treating me in this cruel manner?"

"Have I been lacking in courtesy towards you?" she asked, a quiver of excitement in her voice.

"No; but you met me as you would have met any stranger, and I can't understand such treatment."

"It would have been very awkward to have met you in any other way. Knowing you to be Helen's accepted lover, I preferred that we should meet as strangers rather than that we should have to enter into explanations."

"Nonsense! I'm nobody's lover but yours, sweetheart, and you know it," he interrupted laughing, and yet with a puzzled look on his face.

"I am in no mood for sentimental nonsense," she said, frowning and trying to withdraw her hand from his. But he only held it the closer, while the ominous look in his eyes meant that he would have no further trifling.

"I'm not going to ask you to explain why you treated me as you did five years ago," he said. "What I want to know just now is what you meant by calling me your sister's accepted lover?"

"You expect to marry her," began Kitty hesitatingly.

"Who put that idea into your head?" he asked quickly.

"Colonel Beverly gave me the information—not as an idea, either, but as a settled fact."

"Then he lied," said Gifford with more force than elegance. "Your sister and I are good friends—nothing more. I'd like to know what object your stepfather had in telling such a falsehood," he added resentfully.

Kitty said nothing, but looked searchingly into his face, which was certainly open and honest enough to have dispelled her worst suspicions. It wore a perplexed, angry look, but had not the least appearance of guilt.

"And you believed him?" he said at last reproachfully. "Here," and he drew her to a bench near the gate, "sit down, and let me give you an account of myself. Perhaps we will be able to come to a better understanding then. When we parted that day five years ago—and what a wretched day it was to us both—I little thought when and in what manner we would meet again. You know I didn't expect to be absent longer than a fortnight, but my business detained me nearly a month. During that time I heard nothing from you, though I wrote to you every week.

Digitized by Google

And when I did return I learnt to my grief and astonishment, that you had left town the previous week, to take charge of a school somewhere.

"I questioned your aunt about you, but she refused to give me your address or any information concerning you. Your friends were equally as reticent on the subject when I appealed to them, the majority of them protesting that they were in perfect ignorance of your whereabouts. So you can easily guess how your conduct annoyed and puzzled me.

"True, we had had a slight quarrel just before I was summoned from town; but that matter had been straightened up, and we had parted with the mutual understanding that your aunt's violent opposition to our marriage should not prevent it, or even delay it. After waiting in vain for several weeks for a letter from you, I packed up my belongings and left town; for the conviction was forced upon me that you were still angry with me, and had gone away with the intention of hiding from me.

"For four years I drifted aimlessly from place to place. While in Devonshire about a year ago, I met John Eastman, an old school mate, who was living in Mallingford and practising law there. He invited me to go home with him, and I accepted the invitation. One night, soon after our arrival at Mallingford, I was introduced to Colonel Beverly, and from that time on he held out many inducements for me to settle in Looe, stating that there was a good opening for a doctor, as the only physician in the place was getting too old to practise.

"Finally I consented to come, little knowing that I was going straight to your old home. Nor did I suspect the truth when I met your sister, for the Colonel introduced her simply as 'my daughter Helen,' so I was under the impression that her name was Helen Beverly. I had never heard you speak of your stepfather, nor of your sister, and had very naturally concluded that your home had always been with your aunt. It was probably a month before I found out the truth, and then through a crowd of gossiping loafers, who gave me a full history of the family."

"What did they say of me?" demanded Kitty, her face a little pale, and a look of angry defiance in her eyes.

"They said that you quarrelled with your stepfather because of his unwillingness to vacate the house and leave you and your sister in possession; and that, finding he meant to stay, you refused to live longer in the house with him, and announced your determination to leave. Colonel Beverly had a nephew, they said—a disreputable sort of fellow—who persisted in hanging about the place, and who refused to leave at your bidding; so the quarrels between your stepfather and yourself grew more frequent and bitter, until one day you suddenly left, saying that you meant to go and live with your aunt and earn your own living."

"Was that all?" and Kitty drew a long breath of relief. "Let us gather those roses, or Helen—"

"Not until you tell me why you went away," said Gifford planting his broad shoulders against the garden gate. "Was it because of anything your aunt said?"

"Yes."

"But what could she have said to have made you act in such a manner towards me?"

"A great many things. She declared that she had positive proof that you were only trifling with me; but when I asked for the proof she evaded my question by saying that you were addicted to all sorts of bad habits and were not a fit husband for me, and that if I persisted in encouraging you she'd turn me out of her house."

"And you believed—"

"I believed nothing until you failed to write."

"But I did write, every week."

"Then aunt must have intercepted the letters. Yet I don't see how she could have done it."

"Still, that doesn't explain your sudden flight and silence."

"I acted on the impulse of the moment in going away. When I recovered from my anger sufficiently to reason calmly, I wrote to you explaining my reasons for going, and assuring you of my perfect faith in you."

"A letter which never reached my hands," said Gifford, with a sigh. "And after that?" he asked abruptly.

"Aunt must have intercepted the letters."

"There is nothing more to tell," said Kitty evasively.

"Nothing more to tell, with four long years of silence between us!" he exclaimed reproachfully. "Surely——"

"How long you two have been getting those roses!" cried Helen, who came hurrying along the path. "Why"—with a hasty glance at the empty basket—"you haven't picked a single one!"

"It was all Dr. Vane's fault. He would persist in talking, and one can't gather roses from these scattered bushes and talk at the same time."

"But he knew I was in a great hurry for them," said Helen, in a vexed tone. "I shall never," turning to Gifford, whose face wore an embarrassed look, "send you out here into the garden for roses again. The idea of forgetting——"

"I think he was afraid of the thorns," interrupted Kitty, with an odd little laugh, as they passed through the garden gate.

CHAPTER V.

HAD Kitty been less impulsive by nature she would have taken time to consider what course would be best to pursue in the perplexing difficulties that met her on every side. But though a morbid desire to keep the past a secret, and because of a vague fear that Helen was beginning to suspect the truth, she acted upon the first thought that suggested itself, and began a system of deceit against which her finer feelings and better judgment rebelled, and of which she was secretly ashamed. Yet it seemed to her that there was no other way out of the difficulty.

But when several weeks had passed (and very miserable, unsatisfactory weeks they were) she began to look about for some reasonable excuse to go away. Anything would be better than the wretched life she was leading at present. A chance word now and then had given her an insight into her sister's nature, and she knew that a perfect demon of jealousy slept in Helen's soft, tender heart, and that it would take but a trifle to arouse it. Yes, it would be best to go away, she decided—a decision that was very humiliating to her proud spirit, when she remembered her purpose in coming back, and the plans she had formed with regard to her own and Helen's future.

Digitized by Google

The previous week she had chanced upon a paper setting forth the excellencies of a certain private school in Mallingford, and requesting the services of a competent lady teacher. She decided to write to the principal and ascertain something about the required duties, the salary, etc., and if the answer proved a favourable one, to make a personal application for the place.

She had chanced upon a paper.

She said nothing to Helen about her plan, but wrote her letter early one morning and went down to the little station to post it at an hour when she knew Helen was in the kitchen giving out orders for dinner.

As she climbed the hill, coming back, she saw Gifford Vane sauntering slowly up and down the long green lane as if waiting for someone. She had been careful to avoid him all these weeks, and now her heart beat wildly and fast at the thought that she must meet him face to face and endure his angry reproaches. But instead of looking sullen or fierce, he smiled as she came up, and held out a spray of delicate blossoms for her to admire.

"Where did you find them?" she asked, a little flush of pleasure on her cheeks. "Helen and I walked almost a mile through the woods, yesterday, hunting for this very flower. We used to find them in great quantities down by the brook when we were children."

"I ran across these in that little hollow just beyond the meadow," he said, as he fastened the flowers in her belt. "And I've been waiting here to speak to you and ask you not to go up to the house just yet. You see, he's asked for an interview, and I promised to see that they were not disturbed."

"He?" repeated Kitty. "Who has asked for an interview? And with whom?"

"I mean John Eastman, of course," said Gifford, laughing at her puzzled look. "He cares a great deal for Helen. Has she never told you?"

"And he is going to ask her to marry him, you mean?"

"That was his purpose in coming over here this morning. He's been on the point of proposing several times, so he says, but always lost courage at the last moment. I trust his courage won't desert him this time, for he's obliged to return to town by the ten o'clock train, and it's past nine now."

"You might have saved them both a great deal of pain and mortification," said Kitty angrily. "You know Helen will refuse him."

"How do I know? He's paid her a great deal of attention of late, and as she has permitted him to visit her for nearly a year I presume she has given him some hope, or he would have discontinued his visits long ago."

"If his visits have been a proof of his love and devotion to Helen, what have yours meant?" asked Kitty sternly, as she turned and walked slowly up and down the path. "Take care that in trying to get out of one difficulty you don't find yourself in a greater one," she added meaningly.

"I don't understand you," said Gifford in an offended tone. "John is in every way worthy of your sister, and he's very much in love with her, so why shouldn't they marry?"

"For the excellent reason that Helen cares nothing for him except as a friend."

"Oh, John's a persistent fellow, though a little slow and awkward, and if she refuses him he won't be satisfied. He'll come back again and again until she does accept him."

"You think she has half-a-dozen hearts to distribute among her admirers, do you?" said Kitty with a little scornful laugh.

Gifford flushed and bit his lip angrily.

"Kitty," he said, after a long pause, "I have tried a dozen times during the past month to see you alone, but you have persistently avoided me. And now that I have an opportunity to say what I wish I'm going to say it. No, you shall not leave me," he added, as she tried to withdraw her hand, which he had seized and was holding fast. "I am tired of this miserable farce," he went on passionately. "I want you to be your own true self again, Kitty. I can't believe that you really mean to give me up after the promise you once gave me."

"Is this what you wanted to say?" demanded Kitty coldly, as she seated herself beside him.

"Yes, and a great deal more. When I look at you, so proud, so indifferent, and so utterly unlike yourself, I wonder if you can be the same woman who once professed to care for me above all other men, and promised to be true to me always, no matter what happened."

"Have you been true to me all these years?" she asked, a little tremor in her voice.

"In thought I have, if not in deed," he answered evasively. "Surely," he added eagerly, "you won't send me away miserable because of a trifle?"

"You call it a trifle to win a woman's love and then throw it lightly away, do you? To pretend something you don't feel. To make promises you never mean to keep. For this is the way you've treated Helen."

"Kitty, you take a false view of this matter—" he began.

"I know she loves you so well that to lose you would make her the most wretched creature on earth."

"She may fancy that she cares for me, but if I were to leave Looe to-morrow she'd forget me in a little while, and marry John or some other fellow equally as deserving of her."

"You think," said Kitty scornfully, "that because it was Wrote her letter early one morning.

easy to win her love it won't be difficult to change that love to indifference. Oh, how cruel you are!"

"You are certainly labouring under a delusion when you think your sister really loves me," returned Gifford carelessly

Digitized by Google

—too carelessly to please his listener. "If she cares for me at all, it's only a young girl's fancy that will soon pass away and be forgotten. You cannot regret more than I do the wretched state of affairs; for, Kitty, I didn't mean to trifle with your sister. I was attracted to her because of her gentle nature, and because she was unlike any woman I had ever met before; but more, I think, when I learnt she was your sister. I hoped that by visiting her, and winning her friendship and confidence, to be able to hear from you; and though I was disappointed in that hope, I continued my visits, because she seemed lonely and unhappy, and I wanted to bring a little pleasure into her life. I never meant that the little attentions I paid her should drift into anything like tenderness or love-making. And if she has been led to believe that I love her, I am sorry."

"And, as the matter stands, do you expect me to renew my promise to you?" asked Kitty, scarcely believing him to be in earnest.

"Certainly I do. I don't deny that Helen is a good, true girl, and deserves a much better man than I am; but she's not the sort of girl to make me happy. You know that as well as I. She is too ordinary looking, and—well, in fact, she isn't at all attractive.

"Kitty," his voice growing tender again, "I love you, only you, and you know it, dear. You will be my wife—you and no other woman," he said, taking her in his arms and holding her close to his heart. "Do you think I would give you up now that I have found you again?"

"You must, for it will be right and best," she said, trying to free herself from his strong clasp; but he held her close and covered her face with passionate kisses.

"Sweetheart, nothing shall part us again," he said fondly.

For a moment she forgot everything save that they were together again, that he held her in his arms, and that life held nothing half so sweet to her as his love.

"You are never to leave me again," he whispered presently. "You are to be my wife, and very soon, too. Are you listening, love?"

"But I must do right," she said, breaking suddenly away from him. "You know," she added, lifting her tear-stained face to his, "that I couldn't marry you now."

"But why—why?" he demanded impatiently.

"Because we would both be wronging Helen. She could never be made to understand the truth; we have both deceived her so."

"You don't mean it. You can't mean it!" he cried, his face growing pale with fear.

"I do mean it," she answered firmly, though her face was ashen and her eyes wore a strange look of misery.

"I can't believe that you are in earnest," he said presently. "You are only trying me, Kitty."

"No, I'm not trying you. I am simply telling you the truth. I could never be happy as your wife, knowing that Helen was miserable. Even your love would not be strong enough to shield me from her hatred and contempt. Oh! you don't know how strongly I've been tempted to tell her the truth—how at times it has been in my heart to go to her and say: 'The man you love is my own lover.' But I am glad for her sake and mine that I have been strong enough to keep silent. And in refusing you I am only doing what is right and best."

"Right and best?" he repeated with a sneer. "Suppose I go to Helen and tell her the truth—what then?" he demanded eagerly.

"I would refuse you then, as I do now," she answered, growing more composed and firm, as he grew more excited and angry. "I am going to Mallingford in a few days," she continued, "but before I go I want you to promise me that you will never hint to Helen what has passed between us to-day, or that we ever knew each other. Will you? I have told her nothing of my plans yet, because I was afraid she'd beg me to stay. And, Gifford, I don't want you to part with me in anger. I want to feel that you are helping me to do right."

"There can be no such thing as friendship between you and me," he said fiercely. "You have been offered my love and protection; you refuse both, yet ask for my friendship. One thing is certain, you will never have the opportunity of refusing me again. Your silence all these years is inexplicable, yet I have not insisted on hearing a full explanation. You have my promise with regard to Helen. She shall never know how much I have cared for you. Yet, as surely as you live, you will repent in bitterness and in tears the step you have taken to-day."

Helen was giving out orders for dinner.

"Don't talk like that, Gifford!" pleaded Kitty, shrinking back from the fury of his eyes as she would have shrunk from a blow from his hand. "Helen will make you a better wife than I. She is far more deserving of your love, and you will be happier with her than you could ever be with me. I feel that I am doing right in urging you to marry her, for you will learn to care for her in time—and forget me."

She came a step nearer and held out her hand. "Forgive me," lifting her pained face to his. "And say good-bye to me here. I couldn't bear to part with you before them all at—at—the house."

"I refuse to say good-bye," he said, throwing aside her hand in bitter anger. "I have only this to say now," he added, "and I trust you will always keep it in mind. Take care that your zeal for your sister's happiness does not end in sorrow and regret to you both." And, without another glance at her pale, frightened face, he turned abruptly and left her.

(To be continued.)

Digitized by Google

His Fatal Mistake.

Translated from the French of Georges D'Espares.

GENERAL MARTEAUX was fifty years of age, and was a brave and passionate man. He was an old leader whom the Revolution had made a captain. In those stirring times they died quickly, and the frequent thinning of the military staff led him in two years to the grade of General-in-Chief.

He limped a little, having been wounded in the thigh by a ball, which could not be extracted.

His advance guard arrived on the 14th of September, at daybreak, at Forbach; and he was saluted with the fire of artillery.

"Good!" said he; "something new."

Seeing himself discovered, he masked his troops behind the pines of an abyss. Three generals came at his order, and they consulted together.

"The position is untenable," said Marteaux.

He repeated: "It is untenable—untenable," without any fresh idea coming to him. Near him the generals fidgeted at their sabres.

"Those redoubts are well guarded."

"We must beat a retreat."

"That is my advice. The reconnaissance, too, will serve us. We will return more slowly."

A representative of the people, sent as commissioner to the army by the National Convention, came up.

"They can approach these redoubts; the men are fresh; we have some artillery."

He raised his voice towards the Grenadiers:

"A victorious force drive back the nation!"

The general shrugged his shoulders.

"They cannot approach entrenchments as easily as you mount the tribune! I know my soldiers; I love them; I know what can be obtained for them. We must retire."

"There would be some danger in forcing the attack," said one.

"We should be killed to no purpose."

"What matters it, if our death is the salvation of the people?" cried the representative. "General, I am here in the name of the Republic!"

"Our muskets defend your Republic," replied Marteaux.

Already in the saddle, he would have ordered a retreat, when all at once a voice made itself heard.

"Greeting, brothers!"

A man appeared. He had a simple voice; a head such as women love—with hair in abundance, and beautiful hair, too, and with fine, clear eyes, full of thought.

"Hallo! Du Coudercq!" cried Marteaux.

The officer with an even step came to his chief.

This assistant staff-officer, who seldom spoke, had followed the general for four months. Whoever saw Marteaux also perceived du Coudercq.

All that was needed to spur the men on to face any great danger was to say in their hearing: "Du Coudercq wishes it," or "Du Coudercq thinks we shall gain the day." This man never laughed, spoke but little, never roused himself to enthusiasm, but he had the art of conquest at his fingers' ends. The troops loved him with an unreasoning love, as the besieged love the place that shelters them, the besiegers their trenches.

"Would you have believed that the representative wished us to push the attack?" growled Marteaux.

"He was right."

Marteaux gave a jerk of the head that shook his stiff hair. Under the strain of the revolt his face appeared quite white, and his eyeballs became bloodshot.

"Then you do not know the force of the allies?"

"Yes, but we must finish it; the victory drags."

Marteaux, after a moment's silence, burst out with:

"Then, tell me quickly, what? We must not lose a minute."

Fidgeting with nervous excitement from head to foot, du Coudercq closed his fists. It was thus that he always reflected.

"Divide the troops into three columns."

"Well?"

"March with the first on Shackberg, crossing the ravine of Blumenthal."

"Well?"

"Give the command of the centre column to General Freytag, who will return along the valley to direct himself on the town."

Digitized by Google

"Well?"

"General Lequoy will turn to the left."

"Well, is that all?"

"That is all."

Marteaux, in anger, spurred his horse past his staff, and disappeared towards the soldiers.

Soon afterwards the rattle of arms was to be heard, and they were glistening among the branches.

Then the three columns entered the flames! That on the left stopped a moment under the fierce hail of the enemy's artillery, and gave way on the deep ravine of Steingrund, being obliged, in order to advance, to rejoin the centre column. The two others, at the charge, advanced on the town to enter and take it, when all at once the battalions of Kalkstein on the left, and the brigade of the Prince of Baden on the right, appeared from ambush, formed up in line diagonally, and, quick as a cannon-shot, marched against the advancing troops.

"What do you say to this, du Coudercq?"

General Marteaux had only seen the force before him, under the walls of Pirmasens; at the sight of this cross-fire a stupor riveted him to the saddle.

"We must fall back," he murmured.

But behind him, pale, du Coudercq cried:

"Force the centre!"

"We shall go to death!"

"But a retreat with the flanks harassed will mean a rout. Advance!"

Marteaux looked at his officer. His powerful head arose amid the shots that were whistling about them; it was lighted up by the terrible fire of the enemy, and he asked quietly:

"Do you see your way clearly out of this business?"

"No, general. We are in danger; the disposition of the ground and of the troops will not allow us to fall back. I have made a mistake this time, but it is too late to fly. March them on; I will wait here."

"Why?"

A sadness spread over the pale face of the officer, who replied:

"I have no longer the right to follow you."

"That is good!" said Marteaux; "this du Coudercq was always mad!"

He reined in his horse and opened his coat a little.

"Adieu, comrade!"

A musket shot carried away his head-dress.

"I have no need to salute you, then!"

Dreadful to say, he found time for a burst of laughter! Then his horse raised itself, threw its fore feet in the air, bent its legs, gave a bound amid the thunder, and made for the end of the train at a stretch gallop. There was heard afar off the finish of the burst of laughter, amid the whistling of the musket-balls; and, in disorder, the troops rushed on to follow him.

This was the last effort. Marteaux stopped his horse before the cannon. Two batteries opened fire and missed him, but the columns that discharge broke through commenced to fly.

The ravine narrowed as they converged towards Pirmasens, and it was impossible to delay the troops. Du Coudercq, with his good sense, should have seen this before. That was where his mistake lay.

Marteaux, seized with dizziness, fell with the swiftness of a bomb upon the fugitives.

"Oh! my soldiers—my children! Turn back, in the name of the Trinity! Advance for the Republic!

He turned his horse, but while he attempted to arrest their flight and resume the attack, they all broke up, and two rivers of men rushed tumultuously past him, on the right and the left, pell mell, seeming like madmen.

Then Marteaux, still facing his men, and endeavouring always to stop them, fell back, and began to call du Coudercq, shouting at the top of his voice. But all was over.

Then he remained alone on the plain, a formidable figure, in the middle of the last shells.

At that moment, at Hornback, du Coudercq, surrounded by the fugitives, had picked out four men and a sergeant. He had put his finger on their chests, and had said to them:

"Take your arms, follow me."

They were four grown men, with bearded faces, but with the hearts of children. Arrived in front of a hedge away from the troops, he made them sit on the grass and stood humbly at their feet.

"My name is Jean-François du Coudercq. I am a captain assisting the adjutants of Marteaux, General-in-Chief of the corps of the Vosges. I have done some bold actions for which the nation has rewarded me, but this morning I was guilty of a fault."

The soldiers did not reply.

"Instead of advising a retreat, I advised a continuance of the fight. I am the cause of the disaster."

The sergeant replied uneasily:

"Captain, it is not for us to listen to that. You ought to go to see the representative of the people."

"I have chosen you," said the officer, "you are my Council of War."

At one bound the four soldiers were on their feet. Two of them wept, and a third said tremblingly:

"I am going away from this."

"I am your captain!"

"Good Heavens! He wants us to kill him!"

"I do not deserve death at the enemy's hands."

Du Coudercq seized the sergeant and gave the order:

"Form in line to the right!"

This commanding voice struck the four men, who at once ranged themselves.

"Charge your muskets!"

The soldiers bent their heads, took each a cartridge to bite, then at a distance of twenty paces the officer watched them empty out the powder, prime, shut the pan, pass the musket to the left, introduce the cartridge, draw the ramrod, push it down, and ram home.

At that moment du Coudercq shouted:

"Present!"

Without reasoning, but with a film over their eyes, the soldiers took aim.

"Fire!"

A sharp report rang out, but from among the smoke, out of it, du Coudercq rushed! A burnt lock of his hair fell to the ground. Escaped from death, it seemed to him as if a hand had snatched him from an abyss. However, he still wished to die.

"It is thus that they obey me!" he cried.

He took his pistol, loaded it, and said:

"If I am not killed this time, I will kill you!"

A second time the officer gave his orders sharply, and as the soldiers reloaded, he said:

"As no representative has foreseen my crime, and there exists no law to punish me, I will invent one."

The soldiers listened. "Any commanding officer who by his fault shall bring about the destruction of the troops that the nation has committed to his charge shall be shot."

Du Coudercq said again:

"To be added to the Regulations."

Then he gave the order: "Fire!"

And he fell shot through the heart

Digitized by Google

THE ORGAN BLOWER'S STORY

No one knows all, but I reckon I can explain more than anyone else, unless Rector Frank should speak.

You see, I have blowed the organ ever since 'twas built, and taken care of the church since the time when Mr. Frank's father was the rector. It was the summer he died that Mr. Frank was ordained. I remember that Sunday as though it were yesterday. There was the old rector trembling and white, and there was the bishop so stiff and dignified, and the rest of the clergy all a-looking at Mr. Frank, and impressing upon him the responsibilities that he must shoulder, and he so pale and grave that I could hardly believe that it was Mr. Frank at all.

When his father died, a little later, he took it hard. Then he became rector, and he always seemed to be remembering the trust resting with him. I used to wish he would cut up some of his old pranks, but as the years went on he spent more and more time in his study, and grey hairs got sprinkled in round his temples long before he was thirty.

I remember the first time I saw her, too. I was blowing the organ, and right in the middle of "Lead, Kindly Light," I almost stopped; something like a sob trembled up into the pipes, and I could just feel the pain a-throbbing into the organ. I looked round to see what had come over Merrick, and it wasn't him at all; but there she sat in Merrick's place, so little and so white, and a far-off look in her eyes, while her hands were just pressing regret into the keys.

The committee did not know anything about music, but happened to decide upon her, and after that she came every morning. She'd sit down to the organ, and after her pretty hands had fondled the keys a bit they would search out such chords of music as would seem to lift you right up beside a choir of angels. I used to close my eyes and hold my breath for fear that she would stop.

One morning Rector Frank's study door was open when she was playing, and it was never tightly closed again during her hour after that. By-and-bye he would come and stand in the door through the whole hour, and then he got so he would come up the stairs and lean against the rail. It seemed to disturb her at first, but after a little she seemed to wait for him, and a kind of hope got into her music.

Once she played an old love-tune, and then she hurried out of the church and didn't come back for nearly a week. Rector Frank came though every day and sat on the organ steps and waited, and once I saw him put his hand, tender-like, down on her little pile of music.

The morning she came back he was waiting, and he looked at her reproachfully; when I looked again he was kissing the palms of her pretty hands and she was sobbing, but her face was happy, and for weeks her playing told of love and happiness and all that, and the rector came and listened every morning.

We never had such music as then. Why, I would have blowed that old bellows all day just to listen to her playing for one minute! She seemed to love the organ, too, just as I did, and when it grew dark she would stop playing and lean her face, loving-like, down on the keys and sit there so still and so long that I used to get the fancy that her soul had just trembled out of her body and was swallowed up in the big, dark pipes.

The women-folk didn't seem to take to her, and sometimes, when they whispered, I could see her eyes get full of tears. Such pretty eyes, too; only they looked so sorry.

Rector Frank's sermons were full of tenderness and his face was happy those days. She used to sit and listen as though it was God a-preaching, and then, when he had finished, and she began to play, the pipes would fill with rapture.

"In the autumn," I heard him say to her one day, and she caught her breath and asked him if he was sure, "really sure," he wanted her. Then he kissed her hair, the same as he did his robe of office when they gave it to him to wear, and just then a beam of sunlight came through one of the stained windows and covered their heads with gold that seemed like a promise for the future.

When summer came the village filled up with town folks. One Sunday morning I was blowing the organ as usual, and listening to the piece that the organ was promising, to the tune of "Come, ye Weary," when a wrong note, covered heavily by the right one, made me look round to see who was playing. But it was she in her old place at the keys, with her face upturned to the little swing glass over her head, and in her eyes a look that I once saw in a man's who was listening to his death sentence.

I looked down at the congregation, and there, in the front pew was a man, with a surprised sneer upon his face, peering straight up into the glass.

Digitized by Google

Rector Frank knew the stranger, and after the hymn, motioned me to ask him up.

She sat there gazing into the glass, through it all getting whiter and whiter.

When the service was ended Rector Frank brought him up to the organ, and introduced him to her as an old college chum, and then he left them and went back to his class. Old Shep, when I tied him up to be shot, had the same frightened look in his eyes as was in hers when that man sat down and said he had got something to say to her.

I had to go down into the vestry then, and when I came back he was standing up in front of her with his hat on, and I heard him say that she ought to have thought of the consequences before. He wasn't going to stand by and see his friend deceived. Then she said something about youth, and his face grew black and he said he had heard enough of that nonsense years ago. Then he sneered and picked up her little Bible and said: "That little act is about ended."

When he had gone she turned her face to the dark wall and sat still so long that I ventured to ask if she would need me again. She turned round in a dazed way, and when I repeated my question, pushed both of her hands up through her hair as if to lift a weight, and shook her head, and all the time she didn't seem to see anything.

"How long has it been?" she asked me.

I knew what she meant, and said: "Just three months, Miss."

"Isn't that a great many days?" she asked, and when I told her, she kept repeating "Ninety-one," and saying: "That's a very long time, isn't it, Walker?"

Then she began to cry, and after a minute asked me if it wasn't funny that people should cry just because they had been happy.

She looked wistfully towards Mr. Frank's study, and I told her he had gone home and taken the stranger with him.

It was an hour before she spoke again, and all that time she had been sitting staring out into the dark church. "Where do the lilies grow, Walker?" she asked. And then she wanted to know if the water was deep there, and if I thought Mr. Frank liked lilies.

As she passed the altar she laid her cheek down on the Bible-cushion—the stains her tears left there still mark it—then she hurried down the aisle so swiftly that her silk shawl fluttered out behind her—I have always thought it seemed to wave me good-bye.

Neither she nor Mr. Frank came to the church the next day. On Tuesday I was waiting for her when he came out of his study and up the organ stairs. His face was white and he stepped heavily. I told him she hadn't been there since Sunday, and he asked me to call and ask her to come early the next day. Then I saw him look tenderly down at her seat, and heard him repeating to himself:

"Poor little girl! Poor little girl! I will make it all up to her—all."

"She hadn't been home since Sunday," they told me when I called.

I couldn't sleep that night, and every time I closed my eyes I dreamt of pond-lilies. Before light the next morning I walked out of the village to the pond. The sun was just coming up when I reached the marsh. It was so quiet that you could feel it. One lonesome bird was calling to his mate, who didn't answer. Somehow the words of Mr. Frank's sermon: "And there shall be no more sorrowing," kept coming to my lips.

I shaded my eyes and looked out across the marsh. Something blue was glistening on the top of the lilies. There were only two feet of water, and I waded out to it. It was her shawl, and she lay there under it, with her little, dripping hands filled with lilies. She had gathered them and then just folded her arms and lain down on her face.

There ain't nothing more to tell. Rector Frank's hair grew white faster after that; and in his study, hanging under the crucifix, is the old love-song, and alongside of it a bunch of dried lilies; and he never talks to anybody now.

But the strangest part of my story is that sometimes during lily season, when the church is growing dark, and Rector Frank comes out of his study and up the stairs and waits there, the organ plays softly the old love-tune, and no hands are on the keys.

ADELAIDE LUND.

AN EASY WAY TO EARN ONE HUNDRED POUNDS.

AT the left hand bottom corner of the second page of the cover of SHORT STORIES will be found a coupon. This coupon will appear every week during the whole of 1896. It will also appear every week in PEARSON'S WEEKLY and THE STORY TELLER during the same period.

WHAT TO DO.

Procure as many of these coupons as you possibly can. Once you get them keep them. A good way would be to paste them on to slips of paper. A better way would be to paste them neatly into a book. However, the main thing is to get and to keep them.

WHY YOU SHOULD DO IT.

Because we are going to give the person who collects the most coupons during the year 1896 the sum of ONE HUNDRED POUNDS, and if you do not want this money for yourself you can nominate someone to whom it would be useful. Perhaps you have a poor relation; perhaps you know some deserving charity; perhaps you know some poor crippled child or bedridden old man or woman, to whom the money would be a Godsend.

It need not cost you anything beyond a little trouble to earn this money for them. All you need do is to induce the people who read SHORT STORIES, PEARSON'S WEEKLY and THE STORY TELLER, to give you the coupons from their papers. If amongst your friends there are not many who read these three papers, then worry them until they do read them. Explain the reason; and don't be put off with promises that may never be fulfilled. Buy the papers for them; collect the money and the coupons at the same time.

If you go the right way to work about it, it will not be difficult to induce people to read such interesting papers as SHORT STORIES, PEARSON'S WEEKLY, and THE STORY TELLER undoubtedly are.

ONE HUNDRED POUNDS is a big sum to earn for, say, an hour's work a week, fifty-two hours in the year, six working days at eight and a half hours a day.

£100 FOR A WEEK'S WORK!

No coupons are to be sent to us until January 1st, 1897. Keep them safely till then. All coupons are of equal value.

Digitized by Google

A Strange Story which Spans Eighteen Centuries.

"WOULD you like to hear a New Year's story?" he asked, rubbing his thin hands together as he stood beside me, peering through the bars of the window at the stretch of white lawn below, where here and there a young elm bent and cowed before the wind that swept round the corner of the asylum, blowing the snow before it in whirling clouds. "It isn't an orthodox story, but it has one merit—it is true." And he laughed a little as he pointed to the broad, cushioned window-seat. "Pray sit down, for it is quite long, as a story should be that goes back eighteen hundred years!"

I looked at him a moment, then sat down. He might grow violent if I refused, and, besides, there was an hour yet before my friends would come down, and we would leave to catch the 11.30 train to the city, which would end my visit to the B—— Asylum.

"Thanks; you are very kind. Don't think that I tell this story to every one. I have been here six months, and none of them know it. I should not tell it now, but I like your face, and besides, if you listen it might make my head more easy. I see you think me one of the patients." he continued with a sad smile, as he turned his sunken grey eyes on mine, "but you are mistaken. I am here solely because my friends wish to keep me from giving myself up as a murderer, as I should do were I free."

He paused for a moment, and looked out of the closely-barred window again. Not observing the rather startling effect his words produced on me, he continued in a low voice:

"He was the son of a Syrian merchant of Beirut, his mother an Italian from Palermo. We met eight years ago. I was studying medicine then in London, and my room was next to his on the top floor of an old house in Manchester Square. I have always been a lover of solitude, and at that time had an almost morbid dislike of making new acquaintances. I cared only for study, and had no intercourse with any one but the professors at the college. He also seemed unusually shy and reserved, and we would never have spoken, though lodging next each other for over a year already, had it not been for the violin.

"I had a fine old specimen of Cremona work, which my father had picked up somewhere in Italy when he was there years before. Sometimes I took it out of its case and played on it in my own poor way, so that one night its wonderful tone seemed to attract his attention, and at last proved too strong an attraction for him to resist, for he knocked timidly, asking whether he might look at it. Of course I asked him to enter, and gave him the violin. He sat down, taking it tenderly in his hands, looking at it in an awed, half-worshipping way, as if it were some holy thing.

"After drawing a few long wailing chords from it he seemed carried away by a passion of delight, and began playing. I sat against the wall, watching him. He was evidently very young, hardly more than a boy, with thick, tightly-curling hair, worn in the old Florentine aureole shape. His forehead was low, his face oval, with soft olive skin, and dark eyes that were now glowing with some mysterious, rapt light, as if he saw the angels.

"But soon I forgot my inspection of my strange caller—forgot him—myself—everything in the wonder and delight that thrilled through me as I listened. I could hear the low words of the lover to his mistress—the murmured answer dying away before half said, in sheer delight of kisses pressed on lips and drooping lids—the fast-coming breath broken by little sobs—the last close, clinging embrace as they parted.

"Then a moment's pause, and, with dilated nostrils and glittering eyes, he swept the strings again, and the sound of battle crashed through the room—the hurried tramping of the feet of on-coming columns—the sharp command—the last, swift, deadly charge—the clash and clang of steel—the sickening crush of maimed and severed limbs, of blades grating against the bone—the grinding together of the teeth, and the hoarse, hard-drawn breath of the dying—the shrieks and groans of the wounded—the shouts of the victors as they pressed the foe before them—the horrid tumult of useless rally, of close, deadly strife, of hopeless stand and stubborn retreat, till the vanquished break and fly for the last time, and, with merciless carnage of pursuit, the battle rolls away into the distance—ah, it was god-like!"

Digitized by Google

"From that night" (he continued after a moment's pause, while the faint glow faded from his sunken cheeks) "we were friends. I gave him the Cremona, seeing how precious it was to him, and that won his heart.

"With our common love for music as our only bond at first, our friendship grew until I cared more for him than I had ever before for any living creature, while he soon loved me with all the intensity of his Eastern nature. Yet he never told me anything of his past history, except what I have given of his parents' nationality, and I never learnt by what strange fortune he had drifted from Syria to London, and become the second violin in one of the West-end theatres.

"When I knew him better I urged him to give a public concert, and win the fame which I was sure would be his if he but stretched out his hand, for I believed, rightly, that no living violinist was his equal, either as a composer or in mastery of the instrument. But he refused, and when I persisted, begged me to press him no more. Perhaps he had already tried in Italy and failed, as many another has, in his first endeavour to win from the world recognition of his genius.

"A year after our first meeting my studies ended, and I gained my diploma, for which I had been doggedly starving so long, being poor and having to work my way. In five years more I had won a large practice, and saw before me every promise of greater success.

"I had bought a small house in Pardoe Street, where Luigi lived with me—that was a little more than two years ago. He had grown more silent and shy of others than ever, while his devotion to me increased each year. The world must have used him most harshly in the past. At the theatre he was only a part of the great orchestral machine that gave no opportunity for his genius to display itself, though he was favourably known for his remarkable technical skill; but at home, with me, he gave his fancy full freedom, while it ever grew more strange and weird until, when he touched the Cremona, either an angel or a demon seemed making it throb with unearthly music.

"Then I met them, the Signora and her daughter, being called to treat the mother for a dangerous attack of diphtheria. She recovered through my own efforts and Bianca's care; but her voice was so impaired that she could never sing again in public. Did I say that she was one of the Italian Opera Company then in the city?

"She was greatly distressed at this, her lost voice being her only source of income; but I advised her to establish herself permanently in the city as a teacher of vocal music. After some hesitation she followed my advice, and I found them a pleasant suite of rooms not far from my house, where the Signora soon had more pupils than she could teach. I was with them much, for my poor service in the Signora's illness had won the gratitude and regard of both her and Bianca, who always seemed so glad to see me, and made me so welcome that soon I even dared to hope—but I was mad and blind!

"Did I tell you of her? Tall and supple of shape, with red-gold hair, white skin, and agate eyes. I loved her, I loved her from the first moment I saw her beside her mother's bed, with long, slender fingers clasped before her, and her great eyes looking up at me in wordless appeal. Two months passed, and they grew to expect me every night, and every night found me with them, and all day I dreamt of what seemed now to me, being blind with love, was almost sure—that she would be my wife.

"I hardly thought now of Luigi. It was not until one morning in early December, when I was making ready to go to the Signora's, that I chanced to notice that his oval cheeks had grown thin, his eyes had sunken, his lips were dry and feverish, and I realised for the first time the effect upon him of my neglect, which was slowly breaking his heart. Filled with sudden remorse, I insisted on his coming with me, and would hear no refusal, even telling him to take his violin, for we would call on some friends of mine who were lovers of music. He unwillingly assented, and we went out together. They were expecting me, though the Signora seemed rather surprised at my having a companion, but she received Luigi with her usual graciousness, and her manner grew warmer when she found he was in part Italian.

"As Bianca and Luigi met, my eyes happened to be resting on her face. A faint colour flashed through her white skin, and her eyes dropped as they met his, in which shone something of the same awed wonder when he first saw the Cremona. It passed in both within a moment, but a sudden chill went through me, as if I were very cold.

"Bianca greeted me with her usual kind, affectionate manner, which now, for the first time, seemed to me as if she looked upon me more as a brother than a lover.

"The Signora noted that Luigi had brought his violin, and after a little asked me whether he played. The indefinable dread of some approaching danger, which had chilled me at first, had by this time been forgotten, and I answered with enthusiasm; whereat she begged him to open the case, and give them an opportunity to agree with me.

"He and Bianca had hardly uttered a word since our first coming. I turned to them; he was sitting near the Signora, with eyes fixed on her fingers, which were twisting and untwisting in her lap. Luigi was gazing at her from under half-closed lids, while the long lashes hid his eyes. He started as if awakening from a dream when the Signora spoke, and, somewhat to my surprise, at once complied with her request.

"I had thought that during the five years of our friendship that I had heard the best that lay in him, but now there was something in his music that had never been there before—a thrilling tenderness of tone, an almost throbbing life, in each note that made words uncouth and faltering. He had hardly drawn his bow across the strings a dozen times when I knew he was playing only for Bianca the most passionate love song I had ever heard.

"His eyes, fixed on her, were luminous with emotion, and slowly, as if yielding to some invisible power, she raised her own, and their eyes met. She never moved until he stopped, sitting with hands tightly clasped and lips a little parted, the colour coming and going in her face, her eyes unconsciously answering his. Suddenly, with a quick, sharp breath, the bow fell to his side, and he laid the Cremona, almost roughly, in its case, and rose to his feet.

Digitized by Google

"'It is late. I fear I have fatigued the Signorina. Shall we not go?'

"I looked at Bianca. She was very pale, and her eyes were almost black, so dilated were the retinæ.

"'Why did you bring him?' whispered the Signora, as we parted.

"'You mistake; it was his music, not he,' I answered lightly, though a heavy dread lay at my heart.

"Several times afterwards I went there, he always accompanying me, though I did not ask him; but, then, he did not seem to realise this, but went as if he knew she was expecting him. Ah, the agony of those few evenings! I and the Signora—I know not what I said to her, trying to keep my eyes away from them, as he either played his accursed violin or talked of music to Bianca, though in every note, in every word, his love for her was unconsciously told. And she?

"'I am grieved — ah, so grieved!—for you, dear friend,' said the Signora, one evening, taking my hand, as we sat together near the fire, while they were at the other end of the room by the piano, which she was playing, and he accompanying with that violin, their eyes hardly once withdrawn from each other's face.

"'Sorry for me!' I repeated. 'Why?'

"'Do you not see? I had hoped for you. But it is fate.'

"Luigi was bending forward at that moment, his dark hair nearly touching her own bronze gold coils, as he explained in low, liquid Tuscan, an intricate passage in the Passion music of Bach, which they were trying that evening. I stared stupidly at them without a word. Hope had lived till then; but now I saw clearly—she loved him! I pressed the Signora's brown hand silently in mine, and hurried away from the house, leaving them undisturbed. It was the last time I saw her—there, with their hair touching.

Then I stepped backwards and thrust the yataghan into its sheath.

"After that, when he asked me why I did not go with him to the Signora's I made some excuse, and let him go alone. He was now the one who was blind, and so went, without feeling the fire that burnt within me. Sometimes, as I looked at his face, now no longer pale or thin, but ever radiant with the thought of her, I could have sprung upon him, and beaten him against the stones until he was dead. But I was wise enough to avoid him, and plunged into the most severe work.

"At last came New Year's week, when I was forced, from complete exhaustion, to stay at home during the nights to get a little rest. He was always there with her until late, and so New Year's Eve I found myself sitting in the library before the fire—I intended to go to my room before he returned—sitting there staring at the coals, thinking of what I had lost through him.

"I was aroused from my bitter reverie by a quick step on the stairs. Had he returned so soon? I sprang to my feet—I would escape meeting him. But at that moment he entered the room. His hair was white with snow, his overcoat covered with it; but he shook it off, laughing, and came quickly towards me with outstretched hands.

"'I am so glad that you are here. I have great news, my brother. Wish me joy!' he said, and he laughed again, as he looked into my face with sparkling eyes. 'Are you not well? You are pale. I said that you were were working too hard. You must have care, for I shall want you next month; we are to be married then. Ah! I am so happy!' And he began taking off his overcoat, humming some air.

"I walked to the window and stared at it, but I could not see what lay outside, for the panes seemed shimmering with many colours, like the iridescent glass of the museums. I had known it was coming, and had been steeling my heart to meet it bravely; but now my strength was almost gone.

"'Yes, mio amigo carissimo, we are to be married in January, and I have consented to leave the orchestra. Yes, I shall write an opera, and make one more effort to win fame, for her sake. Listen, this is the opening bridal chorus.' And he hurriedly seized the violin, which lay on the table near him, and began playing the same air he was humming when he came in.

"I looked up at a yataghan which hung against the wall between the windows, and my fingers closed as if they were grasping its crooked handle. I could take it from its sheath without his seeing or hearing me, for he was playing softly, sitting in the armchair facing the fire. It would be a fitting time to kill him; while he was playing their wedding march. I took a few noiseless steps towards the wall, and reaching up, carefully drew the yataghan from its sheath; then came behind him, feeling the razor-like edge.

"His neck was slender, and, with one strong blow, I could strike off his head. How would it look rolling across the carpet? Would his eyes open and stare at me with a last look of horror, as those of the guillotined have sometimes done? Perhaps the Cremona would drop and break—a fitting end of the thing, to die with its master. Or the body might sit there, with the hands still holding the bow, and the violin pressed under—but then, if his head were gone, how could it be pressed under the chin? How long would the last note make the strings vibrate? Not long, for he was now playing in a minor key what seemed to be a funeral dirge. Yes, there was the sound of tears dropping on the coffin—whose coffin was it? Perhaps his; and the tears were Bianca's.

"This thought shot through my seething brain, jarring me into something like sanity.

"I stepped backwards and thrust the yataghan into its sheath. This was hurriedly done, for just then he turned his head and asked:

Digitized by Google

"'How do you like that? It is the funeral hymn of the Hussites as they bury the ashes of St. Jerome, which the Princess Vlatka, who has had hidden love for the martyr, has collected with her own hands, and——but in the name of the Father, how ill you look!' and he half rose from the chair.

"'Sit down, and play on. My head aches, and your music stills the pain,' I murmured, turning my face away and piling up the books on the table.

"He obeyed; but just as the dirge was rising into a strong, clear anthem of praise, as if the Hussites beheld the soul of the martyr received by a heavenly host, whose song of welcome heard far above formed the theme of the movement, a loud clanging of bells rang outside in the clear night air. He sprang to his feet, and stared out of the window with frightened eyes.

"What is that?" he asked hoarsely.

"'What is that?' he asked hoarsely.

"'It is the sound of the chimes—twelve o'clock, and the New Year is here.'

"He grew pale to the lips. 'And I had forgotten!' he murmured, and the violin bow fell from his hand to the floor.

"'You will break it if you do not look where you set your foot. What have you forgotten?' I asked coldly.

"'That it was New Year's eve—to think that our betrothal comes now!' and, heedless of my warning, he stepped backwards towards the mantel as if for support, and the bow snapped under his foot.

"He did not heed it, but stood staring before him as if he saw some horrible thing. I glanced over my shoulder at the corner where his eyes were fixed, and then at him again. His unaccountable fright had the effect of rousing me from the half stupor which had numbed me after putting back the yataghan.

"'Why not on New Year's eve? Is it not a time for happiness?' I asked bitterly.

"'You do not know! It is the curse—I feel it coming even now!' The violin which he had held in the other hand fell before his feet, while he covered his eyes. I looked down at the hated Cremona. The fall had split the back of the old instrument, and snapped two of the strings.

"'You have broken your violin!' I said, pointing to it; but he stood there motionless, while his hands trembled violently, as he pressed them over his face.

"This was indeed remarkable. At any other time such an injury to his precious Cremona would have thrown him into great grief, but now he did not seem even conscious of what he had done.

"'Luigi! What is it?—do you see anything?' I asked, shaking him by the arm. He only groaned. I drew him towards the chair, into which he sank in a nerveless heap, his hands falling by his side.

"'Don't leave me!' he implored; 'the curse has come! I thought that I might be spared, but it is here!'

"'Nothing is here, Luigi. What do you mean?' I asked, bending over him.

"'I feel a horrible fear—an unbearable remorse for some terrible deed I seem to have done! It has always been so with us; my father died a maniac from it before I was born; none of my race have lived to see the face of their first born child!' he gasped, clinging to my hand, while he brushed away the great drops of perspiration from his clammy face. 'At some time, far back in the past, one of our ancestors committed some crime—I know not what it was—which has never been forgiven by God, but will curse us for ever.'

"'Have you ever felt this before?' I asked, soothingly laying my hand on his forehead.

"'No; but all my race have died on New Year's Day, just as some great happiness came to them. She has promised to be my wife, and now the horror falls on me! Ah, why should I be cursed for a deed that was done hundreds of years ago?'

"My curiosity and wonder were now fully aroused, and I looked closely at him and felt his pulse. He was evidently labouring under intense excitement, even to the verge of hysteria or catalepsy. I hastened to a cabinet near the door, which contained my medicines. During the past year I had been greatly interested in studying the effect upon the nervous system of lyadalia arabis, a plant of the genus cannabis, found only on the western shore of the Persian Gulf, and akin to the Indian hemp, or hasheesh, and possessing similar properties, according to the usual medical opinion.

"But from certain results I had obtained by its use, I had been led to suspect that it was of greater potency as a narcotic than hasheesh, opium, or chloroform, though as yet I had used it but rarely, not satisfied that I fully understood its effects. But now, without the slightest hesitation, I took out the phial containing the tincture, and poured ten drops into half a glass of water, which I forced him to drink, believing in such a case as his it would produce a quieting effect, for his condition was distressing even to me, who had no reason to wish him well.

"But, to my chagrin, and even alarm, he grew rapidly worse, his legs and hands twitching as if with St. Vitus' dance, his eyes rolling frightfully, while a thin, white foam gathered on his purple lips, from which came sharp hisses and unintelligible words.

"Instead of acting as a narcotic, the drug had had directly the opposite effect, and had so increased his intense cerebral agitation; yes, there was great probability, I saw, of killing him, and I would be indirectly his murderer. This prospect but a short time before I would have hailed with joy, and would have watched him with silent exultation as he passed through the various stages to death. But now this result filled me with unspeakable horror, and I bent all my energies to prevent it.

"I had an unusual amount of animal magnetism and a strong will—the two requisites for a successful mesmerist. Occasionally before I had tried my powers, and knew something of their great extent. Now I exerted them to the utmost; in this horrible struggle which should conquer—life or death—I or the drug! Throwing off my coat, I bent over him, making a multitude of passes before his face and eyes, which, together with his hands, I rubbed incessantly all the time, willing him to sleep, until I was dripping with perspiration; my head whirled and my eye-balls burnt, so steadily had I kept them fixed on him.

Digitized by Google

"At last I conquered. The movement of the limbs gradually ceased, his eyes rolled back in their sockets, until only the white was visible between the half-closed lids, and his breath came in long, sighing respirations. He would sleep for an hour or so, and then awaken in his normal condition. I looked at the clock—it was after one. I had been working over him for more than an hour! After a moment's rest I put on my coat again, and taking the phial containing the tincture of lyadalia went to the cabinet. As I was replacing it I heard the words: 'Master, the camels are weary; are we almost there?' spoken in a low, distinct voice behind me.

I bent over him.

"The language was not English, but Arabic, which Luigi spoke as well as English or Italian, and during the years we had been together I had learned to understand everything he said in it, though not to speak it myself with fluency. Thus I now understood what fell upon my ears so clearly, as well as if the words had been uttered in my own tongue. I turned quickly and looked around; but the room was empty, save for the figure in the chair. Could it have been the voice of Luigi? It did not sound in the least like his. I went to him and looked closely into his face. He might be under the influence of some vision or dream produced by the drug. From his using Arabic and speaking of camels, he evidently imagined himself back in Syria, where he was born.

"Curiosity to learn how completely I controlled him mesmerically, led me to ask: 'Where are you? Tell me what you see.' After a moment's pause his lips opened a little, and in the same subdued voice came the answer, which made me start and stare at him with growing wonder:

"'The Star has stopped above us. My master and the other two urge their camels upward towards a house a little higher on the hillside, while we follow on our camels of burden. As we near the house the sound of many voices comes through the windows, whence the light streams out upon the lemon trees that grow against the wall. Beyond are shadowy low stables, whence come the trampling of hoofs and the champing of grain. Perhaps this is the place they seek, and our journey is ended, for I am weary!' and his voice sank into a whisper, then with a loud sigh died away.

"His words filled me with a great wonder—what did he see? He spoke of the Star and of the Three—was it the Star that stopped over the inn on the hillside above Bethlehem? Were the Three the wise men who had come to worship the new-born Child, and then, leaving their gifts, disappeared again into the mysterious East? Had the drug excited his imagination so powerfully that it seemed to him he was there as the servant or attendant of one of the Three? Or—was I going mad to think of such a thing?—perhaps he had been there at the inn within whose stall lay the Babe in swaddling clothes, there in far-off Judaea, nearly nineteen hundred years ago?

"A burning desire to learn this dread secret seized me, and, making hurried passes over his eyes and forehead to strengthen my control, I commanded him to tell me what next he saw. Slowly his lips opened, and I heard again the strange unnatural voice:

"'We halt before the door, and the Three alight, rejoicing and offering thanks. Taking the golden boxes of precious things, they go together to the stable, and enter its low door. The servants of the inn bring food for the camels and bread and wine for us, while we rest on the stone benches under the lemon trees by the wall, listening to the voices and laughter of the travellers within, who speak in many different tongues. Then, at last the Three come out from the stable, a great, awed light shining from their faces. Silently we turn down the hill-road again, leaving the light and laughter of the inn, riding on through the white-walled village below, on up the narrow rocky road that winds up the hill beyond, while the camels slip and stumble in the dim starlight.

"'Then the summit of the hill is gained, and the Three turn and gaze backwards at the Star, low above the inn across the valley, where a tiny point of light still gleams from the window under the lemon trees. They cover their faces with their mantles, sitting high up on the camels, with down-bent heads, their dusky shadows in the starlight motionless on the road, until at last my master murmurs a few words in a strange tongue, which the other two slowly repeat, and then, uncovering his face, he makes a gesture of farewell, he goes onward by another road over the hills, while they go on with their servants down into the great valley beyond.

"The Star has stopped above us."

"He rides on in silence before me, till the dim starlight fades and the sun appears—till the sun sinks in the west and the stars rise again—ever onward towards the East; on over hill, and valley, and plain, till the desert is reached, and we plunge into its shadowy depths, and toil onward through the night and day, seeing no other living thing but the crimson lizards that bask in the blazing sun; ever onward till the desert ends, and flowers and grass are again beneath us, and the wide branches of the palm above our heads.

Digitized by Google

"'Then at last we reached Kara, the city on the shore of the still blue sea from which the sun is rising. As we near the gate a shout goes up from the solitary watcher on the walls. Another and another take it up within the city. Now great throngs press forth to greet us. Some bear carpets, which they spread before our camels' feet, and all kneel down beside the way, while my master raises his hands and blesses them. We go on into the heat of the city, through the silent multitude that bow on either side.

"'Now we reach a mighty temple, whose roof is upheld by pillars of glistening white stone, round which twine winged serpents upholding the capitals in their mouths. Before it stand many white-robed priests, who also bow before him as their master, and lead him into a chamber where I serve him with fruit and with spring-water.

"'And now — and now——'

"I had stood before him almost in a trance, in which I saw or heard nothing but the slow, strange words that came to me. But now, as his voice died away, I saw that his face was of a livid grey, his eyes were strangely sunken, and his lips purple; yet I did not heed, but repeated impatiently:

"'And now — why do you stop?'

"'Have mercy!' he murmured. 'I cannot see what is coming—a black cloud—it hides—I cannot look!' and with a hoarse gasp he stopped.

"'Look; I command you to tell me what is coming now!' I cried sternly, renewing my passes. Then, holding his palms close against mine, forcing him on, although I knew that he was near death, and unless I made every effort to free him from his trance he would die. Slowly, with each word coming in laboured gasps, his lips parted again, but apparently some part of the vision had passed during the silence, for now he began:

"'He is kneeling in the inmost hall, before the great altar where the flame ever burns. I stand behind him with the fruits and spices, and the oil for the offering. He bends before the altar, his long, white beard touching the lowest step—ah!—I am filled with hate and envy. I put my burdens on the floor, and steal towards him——'

"'Go on—do you hear?—go on!' I cried, in a frenzy of fear lest he should die before I knew.

"'Then I draw the sacrificial knife from my girdle—then——' and with a sharp, broken cry he rose to his feet—stood staring before him a moment, with eyes of horror, though already glazed by death, and then fell forward upon the rug before the fire, crushing the violin, that still lay there, into a thousand pieces."

"I draw the sacrificial knife from my girdle."

At that moment the door of the great, bare room opened, and one of the keepers entered, and with a murmured apology to me, beckoned to my companion. He rose, bowed silently, and followed the man out of the room.

"Wilson informs me that No. 23 has been telling you his story," said Doctor S——, the head physician of the asylum, a few minutes later, as, my friends having transacted their business, we were all descending to the door, where the carriage for the train was waiting.

"Yes," I murmured, drawing a long breath as we reached the cool, outer air.

"A most peculiar case," the doctor continued reflectively. He was driven mad by the loss of a dear friend, and by the death from brain fever shortly afterwards of a lady whom he was very much interested in—the daughter of a well-known singer. He gave up his practice, left the country, and was not heard of for nearly twelve months.

"Last summer his friends here received intelligence that he had been found by some wandering Englishmen in a little Arab village called Karaji, on the western shore of the Persian Gulf, as mad as a March hare!

"They brought him down to Madras, and his friends had him conveyed here. He persists that he discovered the ruins of the lost city of Kara, and even penetrated into the secret 'holy of holies' of the great temple of the sun, where he found the 'master,' as he calls him, kneeling before the altar, with a dagger in his back, and near him, lying on the altar steps, his dead friend Luigi! Both the bodies, as he touched them, crumbled into dust. A strange mania, isn't it?" he ended with a laugh.

But, as I sat in the train, I could think of only one thing: was he mad, or had it all—— And then I, too, laughed at myself.

But it was the strangest New Year story that I had ever heard.

HENRY W. VROOMAN.
ANDREW E. WATROUS.

Digitized by Google

THE PERIL OF THE DEEP.

I.

"RIGHT AWAY," proclaimed the clear tones of the guard, and with sonorous puffs the Liverpool express drew out of Euston Station.

Occupying a solitary first-class compartment in this train was a good-looking young man, who heaved a sigh of relief as the welcome whistle announced the time of departure.

He had contravened the bye-laws of the railway company outrageously, to procure for himself the privacy of a compartment, for he was not in the mood to endure the society of fellow-travellers, and he now had the leisure to meditate on matters which had hitherto been put aside for duties of more pressing moment.

So he was fairly on his way without interruption. What a period of trouble and anxiety he had undergone since—no matter what! He consulted his "Bradshaw" and a shipping list with eager scrutiny. Could he do it? These trains, he knew, ran punctually; and indeed there were no doubt several passengers going along with him who would also accompany him across the "herring pond." Yes, there was no doubt that the last tender would not cast off from Prince's Landing Stage until the company's agents had made sure that all the London passengers were safely aboard.

Nothing could be more fortunate, as it happened.

He had been able, by the merest chance—and a reckless expenditure in cab fares—to catch the Liverpool express, and before another day broke he would be running for Queenstown on the "Atlantic Greyhound," and in six days more he would be safe and unknown under the shadow of the Stars and Stripes.

What a fool he had been! Having settled down with a comfortable conviction that his route was made out and fixed, he was able to recall the dreadful events of the day.

A vision rose before his mental gaze of a field lit up by the weird light of a blustering March morning, and a still, prone figure lying by a stile.

But how was he to know that life was so easily taken? He had not thought. Many and many a time before, at school, at college, in town and gown rows, and still later, he had struck just such blows from the shoulder—and no light blows from a thirteen-stone man—without inflicting more than temporary damage. True, he ought to have remembered that his brother Guy was slight and delicate, and that striking him thus was like hitting a torpedo-boat with a sixteen-hundred pounder. But he saw crimson at the time, and with that red glare in his eyes he could not stay his hand.

So the blow went home, and Guy, fifth Baron Steyning, fell to the ground—dead. Yes, he had no room for doubt. There had been no flutter of the heart as he bent down, in an agony of remorse that swept away all passion, by the side of that silent form.

Why had they quarrelled on that blustering March morning? He had insisted on walking across the fields to the station, instead of driving down with his traps, and Guy would walk with him. It all began in fun, simply from Guy's innate love of teasing. But then Guy should have known that there were some things that should not be joked about, especially in the chill of early morning when tempers are not of the best: above all, that he would not stand jokes about Gwen. There was the limit, and it had been overstepped. And then, when Guy had said that his title and acres would more than balance his brother's more manly pretensions, the war of words had reached a head.

Poor Guy! His joke—after all it must have been a joke—had cost him dear. He was dead. And Geoffrey, what of him? Is he to succeed to the title and to the fortune? Alas, no. He will never take the rank of Lord Steyning. He is a murderer. So far from gaining benefit from the deed he is now a miserable fugitive from justice, striving to place the broad Atlantic between himself and his crime.

II.

GEOFFREY DURANT stood leaning against the railings of Prince's Landing Stage, surrounded by the usual busy crowd of voyagers and their friends, and the loafers and sightseers who are always to be found attending on the departure of a steamer.

The tender was rapidly approaching the wooden structure to pick up its last freight of passengers and baggage.

Geoffrey scarcely noticed the scene about him. He leant with his face turned seawards, and his eyes fixed on the black hull that must be his home for a week.

Then he thought of Gwen, and what she would think of her lover turned fratricide. Poor Gwen! She had been very fond of him, and now—now it was all over and done with.

He pictured her as she would be when she received the news of his crime and flight—her tall, graceful form bowed with shame and sorrow, her queenly head lowered from its usual proud pose, and the grey eyes dimmed with grief at the sin and disgrace of her lover.

Poor Gwen! His own eyes became misty, and a something uncomfortable rose in his throat. For a moment the black hull of the Alabama was blotted out from his vision, and it was not without an effort that he regained his customary self-control.

Suddenly, to his dismay, he caught sight of a familiar face—Dicky Temple of the 25th Dragoons—and worse still, Dicky saw him, too.

"Why, Jeff, old man, what on earth, or—er—elsewhere, are you doing here? Absconding with the family plate, or doing an elopement with the family diamonds? Going across, eh?"

Geoffrey smiled somewhat nervously.

"No, Dicky; not exactly that. Fact is, I'm going as far as Queensland with another Johnny, who's doing the whole business, and I'm waiting for the Scrimmager to take me on board."

"What! Going by the Alabama, and only as far as ould Oireland? No, my boy; that won't do. Too thin. Say now, what's your little game?"

"Fact, 'pon my word it's the absolute truth, I'm going with—with Smith, you know."

Digitized by Google

"Oh, ah, yes, of course, that accounts for it. Well, old man, give my love to—to Smith, you know—by the way, which of him is it?—and say I'm sorry I can't come too. And you might ask him if he knows Ananias while you are about it, eh?"

Geoffrey cast an agonised glance at the tender which was looming up alongside. Dicky noticed this look, and with unusual tact made a move.

"Well, by-bye, Jeff."

Geoffrey wrung his friend's hand with more vehemence than is customary in society, and hurried away to join the throng going on board the Scrimmager.

Dicky waited until the last rope was let go and the little snorting machine was fairly under way. Then he turned with a shrug of his broad shoulders.

"It's beyond me entirely," he muttered, gnawing his moustache. "Well, it's none of my business, I guess, but Jeff has fairly staggered me. What's come to him? Looks very like a mess of sorts. No, it's none of my business."

But all the same he adjourned to the telegraph office and sent a wire to Steyning Towers.

III.

MUCH to his relief Geoffrey Durant found that no one he knew was a passenger on the Alabama. With his six hundred and forty fellow-travellers he mixed but little, except in the ordinary amenities of the dining-saloon and the smoking-room. He had no desire to contract the intimacies which so frequently spring up in a six days' voyage, and which not seldom form the prelude of lifelong friendships.

Some of the first poignancy of his grief and remorse wore off under the healthy and briskening influence of the sharp sea air and the sense of rapid motion.

He managed to put away, as it were, for a time, his dreadful burden sufficiently to preserve an ordinary appearance before his fellow-passengers. The only noticeable feature about their taciturn, but not discourteous, companion was his habit of sleeping during the morning and pacing the deck during the night watches. Throughout the bitter cold of the March nights he would pace to and fro along the promenade deck, muffled up in cap and overcoat, and smoking cigars in what seemed like endless succession.

So time went on, and the constantly-maintained speed of the Alabama was rapidly bringing her within soundings. It was on a dark, clear, starlight night that Geoffrey learnt that they were approaching Sandy Hook. As is usual on the crack mail-steamers, an excellent look-out was kept.

With this careful watch, what suddenly happened was inexplicable. The Alabama, taking advantage of the clear, open atmosphere, was running at full speed—some eighteen knots per hour—and not a vessel was in the range of the seaman's vision, which must have extended five or six miles at the very least.

Geoffrey paused in one of his many pacings on the deck, standing near to the look-out. He heard a muffled shout from forward, and the man at his side repeated it. Then the fourth officer, perched above the wheel-house, suddenly called out to his superior:

"Do you see that light on the port-bow?"

"Yes, I see it," replied the first officer.

Geoffrey turned quickly to the point indicated, and saw the faint glimmer of a green light; then in what seemed a matter of seconds, his eyes, preternaturally quick of sight from much night promenading, saw looming up the sharply-defined outline of a three-masted schooner, apparently, as he was seaman enough to perceive, close-hauled on the port tack.

In these seconds, however, the first officer had done his best. He had ordered the helm hard-a-port, and the rattle of the steering-gear spoke to the promptness of the alteration of the course.

But collision was inevitable. The speed of the two vessels was too great and the alarm too sudden to avoid what was to come. The ghostly schooner arising, as it were, from nowhere, and disappearing into the blackness of the night, struck the mail steamer forward of the bridge, on the port-side, rebounding from the force of impact to strike another blow further along.

Geoffrey instinctively rushed to the side in time to see a red light drift astern as the last trace of the fated schooner faded out of sight.

IV.

THE Alabama swung round under the influence of her port-helm. In the meanwhile the first officer had stopped the engines and sent down for the captain, who quickly came on deck and superintended all subsequent actions.

So slight had been the shock of the double blows that no one at first thought that any damage had been done. The engines were set in motion again, and the steamer went to the eastward to see what had become of the schooner. But the closest scrutiny on the part of the officers, who scoured the horizon with their night-glasses, failed to detect any vessel. Stranger still, it is not known to this day what vessel it was that ran into the mail steamer.

During the fruitless search no needful precautions were neglected. It was reported to the captain that the steamer was badly holed, and that water was pouring into her through two huge gaps in the side, which, unfortunately, opened into separate compartments. The passengers were accordingly aroused, the shock of the collision not having had that effect, and the water-tight doors were closed below. One, however, leading from the coal-bunker to the stoke-hold, could not be closed, and the water poured in through this passage, sweeping with it a man who was engaged in shovelling coal, and severely injuring him. The inability to close this door was of the gravest consequences, as will be seen, for it practically opened three compartments of the ten, into which the vessel was sub-divided, to the inroad of the sea.

Day broke, and two steamers were sighted, one to the south, the other to the north of the crippled and doomed vessel. Signals of distress were made, but the flare-lights were apparently not seen, for the two strangers pursued their course.

In the meantime the vessel was settling down gradually by the head, and the end seemed to be not far off. The boats were therefore lowered and manned.

Shortly before one o'clock, more than eight and a half hours after the collision, the bows being quite under water, the stern of the Alabama tilted up slightly, while the escaping air made a sound like the exhaust of steam. More and more the stern rose, until the screw was right out of water, and then the once beautiful steamship glided down into the bed of the ocean. As she slowly and majestically disappeared great volumes of water were forced up over with a roar like thunder.

Then all was calm once more. The stately vessel lay on an even keel in twenty-two fathoms of water, as level as if she were floating in dock, with her three masts—the foremost snapped in the final plunge—standing about ten feet out of the water.

Digitized by Google

V.

NOTHING could have been kinder than the action of the crew on board the Elda, which had picked up the shipwrecked passengers. Each vied with the other to show the greatest consideration for the people from the sunken vessel. Every man gave up his berth to the use of the rescued ladies, and no pains were spared to make one and all as comfortable as circumstances permitted.

For eight hours Geoffrey Durant had been working hard, calming men's fears and soothing women's distress, with a disinterested kindness of which he would have scarcely believed himself capable, and the constant strain had wearied him thoroughly.

So he sought a quiet nook as quickly as possible, where he could stretch himself at full length and snatch a little slumber, a little closing of the eyes in sleep.

How long he slept he could not say. He was roused by hearing a voice that he at once recognised, speaking in the well-known mocking tone.

"Have I found thee, O mine enemy?"

He started to his feet. It was the dusk of the evening, and he shivered with cold. He had been sleeping on deck, exposed to the sea-breeze in March, and was chilled to the bone.

His brother's voice repeated the question, and there, before him in the dim, shadowy half-darkness, stood the form that had haunted him for more than a week.

"Why do you trouble me?" he muttered querulously. "Am I to have no rest? Am I to be always haunted and shadowed—even before the daylight has faded out of the sky?"

The figure stood motionless.

"I cannot get away from you, I know," continued Geoffrey, still in the same wearied, heartbroken tone. "I know that for that horrible deed I shall always have you as a companion. What are you? Are you really poor Guy's wraith, poor Guy whom I struck down with that murderous force? God knows how it happened, and he would forgive."

"He would, indeed. He does."

Geoffrey laughed mirthlessly. It had come at last. He was mad. Ha! Ha! He knew it would come. Perhaps now he would get relief from this horrible visitor.

But the horrible visitor showed no signs of going. On the contrary, it stepped up to him, and gripped his hands in a clasp, not icy-cold as he expected, but warm and instinct with life and health.

"Jeff, old boy, you are ill. Forgive me for trying to frighten you. I didn't realise till now all that had happened and what it meant."

Geoffrey showed no surprise at this strange conduct on the part of the accusing spirit. He laughed feebly. Then something seemed to give way in his head, and he fell heavily to the deck.

* * * * *

Some weeks passed. Lord Steyning removed his brother from the Elda. He was suffering from a severe attack of brain fever.

Guy managed to get his patient into a quiet hotel in New York, and nursed him through all the illness with unremitting attention.

Skill and loving attention gained the day, and Geoffrey at last became conscious. His first lucid interval occurred when Guy was for a moment absent, and it was from the nurse that he learnt whose hand had always been ready to minister to his wants, whose presence had always seemed to bring a sense of calm and peace.

After the first excitement of the meeting Guy was able to explain how it was he had not died.

"Now, keep perfectly quiet, my dear boy, or I won't tell you a syllable. When you sent me over like a shot rabbit—you really must be more careful how you let out in future!—I lay there, I suppose, for quite an hour. You knocked me clean out of time; then, like the conceited booby you are, you concluded that the might of your ponderous fist had done for me, and you made tracks. Jones awaited you at the station with John, and you told him you shouldn't take him with you, which was strange, as he had come away with the intention of going with you up to town.

"Then John asked if I should want to drive back, and you started and said that I had been taken ill on the road and gone home. You are not half a good sort of liar, Jeff; in fact, you're a miserable failure You aroused Jones' suspicions, and he walked back across the fields, finding me en route lying full length by the stile. Luckily he had your flask in his pocket, and a dose brought me to. Then we walked slowly home to the Towers without saying a word, and there I solemnly gave Jones a fiver—he's your man, so I'll debit you with that amount. He understood. He's a perfect model of discretion, is Jones.

"Luckily the lump was hidden from prying questions by my hair. In the meantime I wondered what you would do. Then came a wire from Dicky Temple, saying you were going by the Alabama. In a moment a divine inspiration showed me you were doing a scoot, and my fertile brain guessed the reason. What did I do? Why, that night Jones bundled my traps together and lent me a hundred pounds on note of hand only—as I couldn't get enough ready together without cashing a cheque.

"I rushed up to town, had a consultation, and, like a fool, forgetting that I could wire to you on arrival, set off on a wild goose chase from Southampton by the Elda to try and catch you, and tell you my skull was thicker than you imagined. What a particular kind of fool I was you may guess from that resolve. If the Alabama hadn't providentially gone wrong, I doubt if I should ever have seen you, because, though we started nearly at the same time, within about ten hours, you had fairly the heels of me. But you lost time on the road, so I hear, while we had a good run. Fancy catching up the Alabama in an old German tub!"

Guy went rattling on in this fashion, apparently not noticing Geoffrey, who in his weakness was lying still, with big tears slowly trickling down his thin face. Geoffrey could not trust himself to speak; but presently he stretched out a hand and feebly clasped his brother's.

Guy still studiously avoided seeing the other's emotion, and after returning the hand-pressure, he jumped up and said:

"Well, I mustn't jaw any more. The doctor said I mustn't see you for more than five minutes, else you wouldn't be able to go back with me in the Umbria to-morrow week 'tew hum,' as they say here, and Gwen."

And he left the room somewhat hastily.

G. F. BIRD.

Digitized by Google

The Summer Girl.

"WILL you be my summer girl?" he asked, as she sat on the rail in front of him, her sailor hat aslant of her rippling locks and her pretty little feet swinging in front of her.

"Do you want me to be?" she asked.

"Do I want you to be! Yes, assuredly I want you to be."

"And what will you do for me if I am your summer girl?"

"Everything. I'll dance attendance; I'll be your slave. I will feed you with chocolates, and ice-cream, and——"

"I will be your summer girl," and she held out her little brown hand.

"Thank you; you're very kind, and I'm delighted!"

"But, tell me, what does being a summer girl consist of?"

"Why, the most delightful, unfettered companionship—nothing serious on either side—no promises—no false hopes—just a sort of mutual attention, don't you know."

"That suits me perfectly—yes, I'll be your summer girl."

And that was the way it began. No other girl came in for a particle of his attention. It was all reserved for the little airy sprite with the curly hair and freckled nose. And what a summer girl she made to be sure! How she tripped through green fields with him, picking wild flowers and singing her merry songs. How she pulled away at the oars of the little cedar boat, with her sleeves rolled up to the elbow, calling upon him to watch the rounded muscle as it swelled in her pretty arms!

But if these things were attractive, how infinitely more attractive was the easy way she fell into calling him "Harry," and the pleasant little familiarity with which she treated him! It was not a sisterly familiarity exactly, not a friendly one, and not the familiarity of one jolly good fellow for another, yet it smacked of all three, with a little touch of sentiment thrown in, and a gloss off-handedness to tone it down.

The young man was captivated, and as he looked about him at the other girls with their Parisian gowns and carefully studied smiles and glances, he fell to blessing Dame Fortune for pointing out this special one to him.

And then her name—Kitty! Could anything be more refreshing than a girl named Kitty? Especially when she was quite as frisky and graceful and as fun-loving and tricky, and as altogether entertaining as that same little puff-ball which the name implies.

"You are an ideal summer-girl," he said to her one evening in the moonlight—"absolutely ideal."

"Thank you," she returned demurely, "I am glad I suit your majesty."

"You're not glad. You don't care a bit!"

She laughed merrily.

"What does that make me out?" she asked.

"Oh! only a summer girl," he responded.

"When the summer's over, I suppose you will just pack me away in camphor, and put me on a shelf together with your other summer things. Won't you?" she went on.

"I suppose so," he returned, "you're a bit light and airy for winter, you know."

The summer girl tossed her head.

"Yes, I suppose I am," she admitted; "but, Harry, do you know——"

"Well, you little frisky puss, what is it? What do I know?"

"Nothing."

"Thank you," returned the young man calmly, "you're very frank."

"Oh! I beg your pardon! I didn't mean that. Of course you know something; but you don't know everything, I mean——"

"Ah! a compliment; but a modified one."

"Harry, all men are stupid; don't you think so?"

"Well, really, Kitty, that is a question I don't quite like to answer. I'm a man, you know."

"Yes. I know."

"Well, what is it? What do you wish to imply?"

"Don't you think men sometimes eat the paper bag and throw away the hot-house grapes?"

Unfortunately, summer days cannot go on for ever, and towards the end of August there comes a chilling breeze across the waves, which shrivels up summer things, and makes one begin to think of heavier flannels and felt hats.

The young man didn't want to think of such prosaic things, but he was obliged to. He didn't think of them altogether, though, for there was that same little airy sprite to engross him. The cool weather had taken some of the tan off, and he missed a freckle or two here and there, but she was as charming as ever. As charming as ever, did I say? More charming! A thousand times more charming, and the young man's sentiments had changed. He had passed through the chummy stage, the brotherly stage, even the cousinly stage, and he had now reached a point where all feeling of relationship ceases, and where the desire for relationship begins.

The little sprite was going home. The rolling waves would resound no longer to the music of her voice.

"Kitty, don't let it be good-bye! Don't say it's all over. I love you, Kitty. You're not only a summer girl, are you?"

"But, Harry, you only asked me to be a summer girl."

"I know, dear, but now I ask you to be something else."

The sprite sighed and shook her head.

"Too late, old fellow!" she murmured, "too late! Jack Hilton asked me to be his all-the-year-round girl, and I have consented. You've had what you asked for, Harry!"

V. N. LEEDS.

Digitized by Google

A DANCE WITH DEATH

THERE had gathered on the deck an oddly sociable group of strangers whom the voyage had united in seeming intimacy. Their knowledge of each other had begun on the day of sailing and would probably end on the day of arrival; but, in the meantime, chance forced upon them a superficial friendship, a brief acquaintance between port and port.

It was night on the ocean, and perhaps it was the immensity of the round, uncontested province of darkness and the monotonous sound of the heavy waves that inspired the minds of the little company with a sense of mystery, and caused their thoughts to wander forth into the obscure realm of the supernatural. Some one had just told a ghost story.

"I love to have my blood run cold, don't you?" said a very young girl confidently to her neighbour; "it is so nice and creepy to listen to such things."

"Oh, they are well enough," he replied, "but nobody believes them."

"It is a thankless task telling ghost-stories," said the raconteur laughing; "one never gets anything but scorn and suspicion for one's pains. It is the only kind of literary effort in which imagination is forbidden. Now I cannot promise that my tale is true, but I insist that it is just as good as if it were."

"I would never tell a story of that kind unless it were true," said a pale, dark-eyed girl from the depths of manifold wraps and cushions.

The conversation drifted on, and the man returned to his silent meditation, apparently unconscious that the girl's eyes were regarding him with a longing curiosity.

"I might tell you all a story," he said suddenly, waking up from his absorption; "only I have never told it before, and I am not sure that you will find it interesting. It is true, but, like most true stories, it is only a fragment, and there are gaps in it which must be filled by guess-work."

"He is an old hand," whispered one of the party.

The very young girl declared delightfully to her boy companion that she was going to make herself believe every word of it, and all settled down to silence. The man pulled his rug up and his cap down, and, looking out upon the mighty darkness that surrounded the tossing, vibrant ship, began:

"One evening, towards the end of the London season, I was dressing for dinner in my room at the Métropole. I was somewhat hurried and preoccupied, but I soon became aware that an animated conversation was going on in the adjoining room. The words did not reach me, but there was something in the voices of the speakers that gave me an uncomfortable sense of assisting at a painful crisis.

"'Some one's having a bad time of it,' I said to myself lightly, feeling however, a kind of selfish resentment at the intrusion upon my notice of this small portion of humanity's suffering. The voices of both speakers were young, but formed an odd contrast. The woman's contralto was musical and changeful, while the man's heavy bass was an inflexible, untrained instrument.

"When he spoke, it was in short abrupt sentences. He seemed to have little to answer to her eager discourse, now gently persuasive, now in a tone of stern menace. Her voice was low, never raised in vulgar emphasis, but it was singularly expressive of her emotions. The first words that came to my ear were his, in a tone of sullen, dogged resistance:

"'But I tell you it is all over.'

"She answered very calmly and so slowly that I heard even her pretty foreign accent:

"'You do not mean that. You are a boy. All is not over with a word.'

"What came next I did not hear. She went on more rapidly, from time to time eliciting from her companion a gruff, determined phrase. After a little while the dialogue again became audible to me:

"'I wonder you are not afraid of me. You do not even dream of my power. And yet I have told you a hundred times that I am not like you; I have other senses, other knowledge. I belong to a nation that lives near to the sun. I know the secret of life; I can go and I can return. You are too daring; you had best beware.'

"'Oh, drop all that,' he said, with a slightly scornful, but not ill-natured laugh. 'It won't work with me. Upon my soul, you are a nice little thing, and I would keep you if I could; but don't you see——' and his voice sank into an argumentative strain.

"She made no answer; but I heard her say, as though speaking to herself: 'How did it happen that I should fall in love with such a stupid Englishman—blunt, dull, blind, deaf. It is inconceivable. So utterly inferior, and yet—a god.'

Digitized by Google

"She paced the room with quick steps.

"The conversation when resumed was carried on in low tones; for a time I did not distinguish the words.

"At last the man said, with unmistakable affection:

"'Aren't you going to say good-bye to me?'

"'Of course, if you wish,' she replied. 'I forgot you do not expect to see me again.'

"As I stepped out into the hall, the door next mine opened and a young man came out. He was between twenty-one and twenty-five years of age—a tall, straight-featured Englishman. He gave a sigh of relief as he closed the door behind him.

"I had been invited to dinner, and when I arrived at my host's, the other men were already assembled. Only one came later than I, it was the handsome young Englishman I had seen in the hotel corridor. Dinner was served in a large room that opened out with bow-windows on a terrace. The night was warm and the windows were flung wide to admit the breeze from the garden. About two courses had been served, when——

"Across the terrace, lighted by the pure rays of the moon, there passed, with a gliding movement, the figure of a woman, dressed in a robe of gauze, confined about the body by a heavy, jewelled girdle. We who sat opposite the windows turned instinctively to our host for an explanation of the lovely vision, but the face of the man at the end of the table wore an expression of perplexed surprise. Before we had time for comment the figure reappeared.

"'It is Egyptia, the Eastern dancer!' exclaimed some one.

"Without, on the marble terrace, stood the graceful dancer, light as a butterfly just poised; within the brilliantly lit room was a startled, bewildered company. Some of the men had risen from their chairs, some were leaning forward on the table; our host had walked a few paces towards the window. We looked at each other questioningly, and suddenly the true nature of the vision flashed upon us. An indescribable sensation convinced us that the woman was not flesh and blood.

"A few muttered exclamations were heard, then there was absolute silence, and the eyes of all were fixed upon the garden with a painful intensity. The dancer stood still but for a minute. Bowing to the pale, attentive group within the room, she commenced to move her limbs and body with a peculiar, swaying motion, thoroughly Eastern in character. She held in one hand a champagne-glass of Venetian ware, and to drink some liquid from it seemed to be the motif of her dance.

"With a quick, tripping step, she whirled round and round, drinking apparently with the gayest intoxication. Her gauze skirts flew about her lithe form, the jewels at her waist and on her sandals sparkled, her arms gleamed whitely, and the quickness of her motion blew a confusion of dark hair across her face and breast. The climax of the dance was the drinking of the liquid, and, as she raised the glass to her lips, her eyes flashed at us a sudden glance, so direct and significant that several of the men caught their breath and started involuntarily.

"She threw her head back, and seemed to drain the glass of the last drop. Then, still with graceful, rhythmic movements, she went through an awful pantomime, clutching her throat and swaying to and fro as though convulsed with the death agony.

"Changing again abruptly, the dancer threw herself into a merry whirl, and, with a disdainful, mocking fling and a wave of the hand, retreated from the terrace into the shadows of the garden. A white figure was still faintly visible, and it seemed to me she beckoned. My limbs were cold and stiff, but, with a kind of clumsy plunge, I stumbled out on to the terrace and across the grass. The gleaming wraith melted away. Before my eyes all was darkness. I thought I heard the words:

'All is now over,' and through the air came swiftly a champagne-glass. It broke into a thousand pieces as it touched the ground, and the quaintly twisted stem was all that remained. I picked it up and went back to the terrace, where host and guests were all standing with the exception of one man—the young man whom I had seen in the hotel. He was still sitting by the table, leaning back in his chair, his arms hanging beside him, his terrified eyes fixed upon the window. He looked at me as I entered, and without any conscious thought or purpose, I laid in his hand the bit of glass.

"'It has gone hard with you,' said some one to him, giving him some brandy.

"We were all terribly shaken. Some lingered by the windows, some walked restlessly about the room. Gradually composure returned.

"We seated ourselves at the table, and the business of dinner recommenced, enlivened by a disjointed, nervous conversation. In about a quarter of an hour a young cousin of our host dropped in. He had just come from the Imperial Music Hall, and could think of nothing but a scene he had witnessed there.

"'Uncommonly sad,' he said, not pausing for greetings; 'by Jove, I feel all broken up. I went down to see Egyptia, you know'—at the name the eyes of all present turned quickly upon the speaker—'a pretty girl, by Jove, a dancer.'

"He poured out some wine and went on, looking at our host: 'She brought out a new dance this evening—a champagne dance—whirled around drinking the stuff with all sorts of pretty flings and turns. Set the house just wild. She danced again for the encore, and just at the end she was taken with convulsions—heart failure, the doctors said. She died. Most shocking thing. By Jove, it was sad. So sudden you know.'

"One of the guests groaned and, rising, staggered from the room. Whether the Eastern who loved him tortured him further, I do not know. He died within a few weeks. I think it was poison she drank that evening, whirling about in mock gaiety. She was dancing consciously a wild dance with Death. She had threatened that she could go and could return, and I believe she knew that after death she would be able to reappear on earth. She was conscious that she possessed the power of making the elements serve the spirit."

"And why cannot all possess that power?" murmured the dark-eyed girl, and throwing her shawls impatiently aside, she walked to the edge of the deck and gazed into the black, fathomless water.

EMILY STONE.

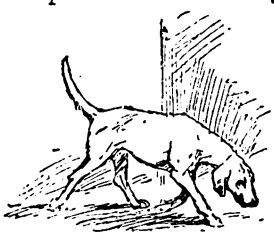
Digitized by Google

A Tale of a Dog

Translated from the French of Jean Aicard.

YES, for a long time I reposed the most blind confidence in him. We loved each other dearly. He was such a dog as you see in the illustration below. His name was Ponto.

Ponto was enamoured of a certain wooden ball about the size of a billiard ball. In a moment of weakness I had purchased this one day and brought it home. Ponto immediately siezed it, rolled it towards me, and said: "Throw that over there in the rose bushes. I will find it. You see if I don't." So said, so done. The ball was thrown, and Ponto found it. But he became rather irksome with his desire to retrieve the ball, and soon his favourite remark to me was: "Play ball."



He had a fashion of coming into my study with a brisk air, wagging his tail, with the ball in his mouth. Then, placing his forepaws upon the table, he would put the precious ball in the middle of the papers, letters, and books, and say: "There is my ball. Now toss it out of the window, and I will go and get it. That will be very much more amusing than wasting your time on all these stupid papers and books."

I would frequently feign to hurl the ball from the window, and like a flash Ponto would disappear. A few minutes would pass before Ponto would reappear with his forepaws at the window and remark: "Hi, there, you man with the papers, I don't find anything here. The ball isn't in the garden. You must have kept it."

Then he would come in at the door, go sniffing about under the furniture and in the partly opened desk drawers, and then, with the air of a man who smites his forehead and discovers something, he would look inquiringly at you and say: "I will wager that it is on the table." He was right—with his intelligent eye he had followed your glance. If you attempted then to conceal the ball, there was no end of work. He burst into extravagant gaiety, jumped after the ball, followed your least movement, and would not leave you, laughing energetically with his tail.

Ponto made me sometimes think that he was one of those men turned into dogs, of whom we read in the fairy stories. His eye was deep, tender, and human, and at times it seemed to say: "What would you? I am only a four-footed beast, but I have a human heart—a better one than that of many men. I am a beast, and I have suffered much. I suffer still, because I cannot express myself in speech and tell you, in those things that you call words, my fidelity and devotion. Yes, I am yours, and I love you like a dog. Whatever belongs to you is secure. Just let anybody touch it, and you will see."

But Ponto and I fell out one day. It was a very unfortunate affair. Only those people who, like myself, believe blindly in dogs will understand me. This is what happened. The cook had killed two chickens, and had gone into the adjoining pantry to get a basket to put the feathers in as she plucked them. When she returned to the kitchen she uttered a shriek—one of the two chickens was gone. Yet she had been absent but a few moments.

"Ah," said the cook reflectively, "evidently some beggar has passed by here and has stolen one of the chickens through the window." She looked out of the door in order to find the supposititious beggar, but there was nobody there. Then, for a moment, she thought it must be the dog, but she was at once seized with remorse. "What! Suspect Ponto? Never. He would not steal. Why, he would watch over a leg of mutton all day, without touching it, even when he was perishing with hunger. Besides, he is there in the kitchen, sitting on his haunches, with his eyes partly closed, and occasionally yawning. He is not thinking of chickens."

The cook was so profoundly puzzled that she summoned her master, and I came. The melancholy affair was laid before me. I looked at Ponto. Ponto was sitting there, with a studied air of indifference, apparently half asleep. I called "Ponto!" He looked towards me, and lifted his heavy eyelids.

"Did you call me, master? I was only asleep. I was dreaming—I was dreaming of my ball."

Of his ball, eh? I became at once suspicious. This was evidently a pretext. But I said:

"I think Katherine, that you are right. The dog could not have stolen the chicken. If he had stolen it, he would be engaged now in plucking it somewhere in the garden."

Digitized by Google

"But look at him—just look at him. He has not the air of a Christian dog."

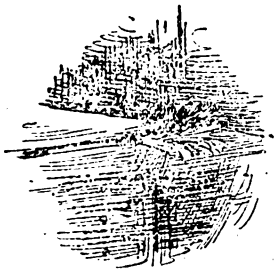
"What?"

"I say that Ponto has not an honest air."

I turned and gazed at him. "Look at me, Ponto."

Ponto looked up, but his head drooped, and he grumbled: "Do you think that I would be hanging about here if I had stolen a chicken? Why, I'd be eating it."

But this remark did not divert my suspicions. On the contrary, it confirmed them. "Katherine," said I solemnly to the cook, "it is Ponto. Alas, it is Ponto!"



What I had seen in Ponto's eyes was terrible. I vow to you, reader, that I am most serious. I had distinctly seen there an almost human lie.

It is rather difficult to explain my meaning. Ponto wished to assume an appearance of sincerity in his glance, and he did not succeed, because that is impossible, even to a man. It is said by profound philosophers that in men the power of lying is confined to speech; that the power of throwing falsehood into a glance is possessed only by women.

Ponto exhausted himself in vain efforts to lie with his eyes. But this unsuccessful falsehood was even more incriminating than an avowal.

I looked fixedly at Ponto. "Here, Ponto," said I, "take this," and I offered him the second chicken, which Katherine had just finished plucking.

Ponto looked at me reflectively. "Hum," he said, "evidently you suspect me. Why do you give me a chicken to-day? You never gave me a whole chicken before." He took the chicken in his mouth and immediately deposited it on the floor at my feet, and, looking up into my eyes, he said: "You must think I am a fool."

Instinctively I said to myself: "Thief! Scoundrel! You have betrayed me. You are a perfidious dog. Your honest canine existence of loyalty has now come to an end, and you have been as false as if you were only a man." But, patting him on the back, I added aloud: "Good Ponto, honest Ponto, nice Ponto."

This dissimulation was rather too deep for Ponto. Urged on by the savoury smell of the chicken, he took it between his jaws and started to go. But, before he reached the door, he turned several times, and looked at me carefully, in order to see if he could fathom my thoughts. As soon as he had left the kitchen, I closed the door and began spying upon him through the blinds of the window. He went a few paces as if intending to devour his prey, and then stopped, placed his chicken on the ground, and thought deeply for a long time.

Several times he looked at the kitchen door with his false and treacherous eye. Then, giving up all attempts to seek an explanation satisfactory to his mind, he contented himself with the fact that he had the chicken, picked it up, and departed. As he disappeared in the distance, I could see that his sometimes timid tail, which has hesitated throughout our entire conversation, had again become bold and firm. Ponto's tail said: "Bah! I have both chickens. Nobody saw me take the first one. Hurrah!"

I stealthily followed him from afar, and I surprised him in the act of hastily scratching a hole in the ground with his powerful forepaws. The chicken that I had given him was lying on the ground, and in the hole which he was digging lay the other chicken. I was heartbroken. My friend Ponto retained the instincts of his remote ancestors, the foxes and the wolves, and buried his provisions. But, alas! being a domesticated animal, and having become the companion of mankind, he had learned to lie.

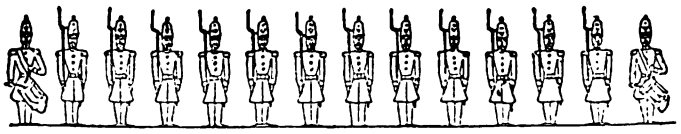
Under the eyes of the treacherous and now shame-faced Ponto, I made up a little package of the longer feathers of the two chickens, and I deposited this little feather-duster on my working-table. Whenever thereafter I was engaged at work and Ponto came to me bringing his ball, and said, with a light and easy air: "Come, come! Lay aside that rubbish and let us play at ball," I would invariably lift the little feather-duster. Then Ponto would drop his treacherous head. His tail would slink between his legs, while the ball would fall from his nerveless jaws. As he looked at me, he would say: "Is it possible that you are so ruthless, so unforgiving? Do you never pardon?"

Weeks passed, and I had not yet forgiven Ponto. But he was indefatigable in his attempts to win me over. So one morning, when he came to me again, and when I seized the little feather duster and poor Ponto was about to withdraw.

"Look, Ponto," quoth I, "look upon this for the last time. Thus perishes the only token of your fault," and I hurled the feather duster into the fire.

Ponto carefully watched the feather duster burn. Then, without any hysteric manifestations of joy, without leaps or skips, but nobly, simply, with dignity, he came and proffered his paw. The crime was forgotten. We were friends again.

Ponto was glad that he had been forgiven. But he was not nearly so glad as I was myself that I had forgiven him.



Digitized by Google

THE STORY OF A SUCCESSFUL MAN.

I MET him yesterday. He has attained name and fame and fortune. He didn't remember me, and I'm glad he didn't. He has done some remarkable work, and he has "succeeded." Yesterday I had the chance of shaking hands with the great man.

I did not shake hands with him; the fact is, I couldn't. There are some people you can't shake hands with, you know; there are some sins impossible to forgive—some crimes so base that neither time nor repentance can ever blot them out. When I saw his photograph I said to myself: "I've seen that face somewhere;" and when I saw him it all came back to me.

It was in 186— I am not going to give you the exact year—I had shipped as an able-bodied seaman on board the—let us say—Columbia. The Columbia was a man o' war, and belonged to the Federal Navy; but there were one or two blockade-runners that still bothered us.

Among them was the notorious vessel, the Harbinger, and hitherto the Harbinger had succeeded in showing the ships of the Federal fleet a clean pair of heels. She had actually shot across our bows in a thick fog, into which she disappeared, and we fired three hurried shots at her with our great Dahlgren gun, one of which carried away her funnel.

I called her a blockade-runner just now, but we looked upon her as little better than a pirate. She began as a blockade-runner, but whenever she came across an unarmed United States vessel she sank or burned her, taking the crew prisoners, and then shoving them ashore in uncomfortable places. We knew that she was lying in hiding in one of the numerous bayous of the western coast of Florida, and it had been reported that her engines had broken down.

Of course, if we met her at sea a naval duel would take place, and either the Columbia or the Harbinger would have to go to the bottom. We knew perfectly well that Admiral Sykes, as he called himself, of the Confederate Navy, would never surrender. The reason was because at least a third of the crew consisted of deserters from the Federal army or navy, and had a price upon their heads, and, as my American shipmates put it, "had just got to be hanged."

We had searched inlet after inlet; the men were worn out with reconnoitring in boats and rowing for hours in the glaring sun, in the muddy inlets and silent bayous which were badly marked in the charts, and where the sounds could not be depended on. One-third of the crew was down with fever, and deaths occurred nearly every day. But we knew that the Harbinger had to be taken. If we could only find her, and if her engines were really broken down, she would fall a comparatively easy prey. Our chief fear was that she might be able to repair damages and slip out past us under cover of a thick night and recommence her depredations.

We had had three weeks of it. The night was thickish, and I was on duty on the maintop crosstree. Not a sound broke the stillness of the night. Ever and anon the light of the moon broke forth fitfully, only to disappear again between the driving clouds. There was a sort of Scotch mist which wetted one to the bone, and made me and the companion of my watch (there were a couple of us in the crosstree) actually suffer from the cold, though it was a summer night.

"Pard," said my shipmate to me, "what's that?"

We could see an indistinct something moving slowly through the mist towards the Columbia: we knew it was a boat of some sort by the slight phosphorescent trail it left upon the calm water. We guessed it must be a canoe, for the strokes were not synchronous. I hurried down and reported to the officer of the watch. When we had first sighted the canoe it must have been some half-mile off, and I need hardly say that it was absolutely invisible from the deck. But the officer of the watch came up into the top, and it was plain enough that the advancing object was a canoe paddled by a single man; and then he raised a rifle to his shoulder, and let fly over the man's head. He didn't mean to hit him, you know—only to frighten him.

"For goodness' sake don't shoot!" shouted the man, and he lighted a pine-knot and held it high above his head. "I've come to surrender."

The officer ordered him to come aboard and report himself. We flung him a rope, and he clambered up the side.

A "mean white" evidently. He had on a pair of old tattered trousers, black with dirt and grime and grease, and a blue canvas shirt in the same condition, almost in rags. He bore the look of a hunted man, and he seemed half starved; his face was decorated with the most tremendous pair of black eyes I ever saw in my life—the lids were half closed—and the eyes themselves were bloodshot. Somebody had evidently been knocking the fellow about; as he turned slightly, I noticed that his shirt was red with blood. The man had evidently been flogged, but, though we could all tell that at a glance, none of us pitied him.

"Well, mister," said the officer, "what are you hanging about for? Are you a spy?"

"Worse than that," said the man. "I've come to surrender, and to split on my comrades yonder. I can tell you where the Harbinger is, if you'll make it worth my while. I was third stoker aboard of her."

"Put him in irons," said the officer coldly, "and set a sentry over him," and he turned on his heel.

Digitized by Google

I didn't bother myself about the deserter—was too tired and too wet; and I turned into my hammock and slept like a top. When I came on deck the next morning there was the deserter, the man who had come to us in the canoe through the fog, with a pair of handcuffs, standing on the bridge conning the ship, a quartermaster, revolver in hand, by his side. By the bright light of the morning sun the man looked, if possible, uglier than ever. Somebody had given him an old jacket, which hid the signs of the flogging; but the fellow looked thoroughly miserable and thoroughly wicked.

We were running straight for one of the innumerable bayous. Suddenly a silent order was passed round to clear for action. It was a most puzzling order; there wasn't a sail in sight; but it was carried out rapidly enough, the discipline on board the Columbia being good. Our heavy guns were loaded and depressed, and every man was at his place.

Suddenly the word was passed round among the men that the Confederate war steamer, Harbinger, was in the bayou, and that there would probably be a no-quarter fight in a few minutes.

I was a volunteer, and, though I drew Uncle Sam's pay and Uncle Sam's rations, it was not for pay I fought, but for principle, and, I suppose I must add, glory—you see, I was only two-and-twenty. I began to feel that, if there was to be a hand-to-hand fight with the Harbinger, it would become a historical affair like the Shannon and Chesapeake tussle; I should get to be a hero; and the hero profession was the particular business into which, at that period of my life, I most longed to go.

Presently we entered the bayou. There lay the Harbinger, a big pair of shears rigged over her engine-room, and a great crowd of men hauling away at something they were drawing up from it; so busy were they with the job that at first they didn't perceive our approach. That didn't last long, however; the fellows rushed to their quarters, and several of the officers hurried on to the bridge. The Harbinger was anchored, you know, and her furnace fires were out. As we ran within fifty yards of her stern, so as to rake her with gun after gun if needful, the bells in our engine-room ordered the engines to be reversed, and we almost ceased to move.

"If you don't surrender," shouted our commander to the Confederate captain, who stood upon the bridge, "I'll blow ye all into almighty blazes."

There were the three great Dahlgren guns; their shot would have passed right through the Harbinger's decks, and she certainly would have gone to the bottom five minutes afterwards.

"I guess I'll come down," said the Confederate chief. He was a brave man, but he knew that resistance was useless.

"Tell your chaps to throw down their arms and go forward," cried the old man, "or I'll sink ye at once!"

Admiral Sykes had to give the order; it wasn't a time for joking, and our boss would have carried out his threat. Slowly and sullenly the Confederate crew left their guns, and, flinging their weapons upon the deck, marched forward in a body. Then our boats were lowered, and we took the entire crew prisoners, and put a guard over them, of which I was one. I never saw such a tattered, starved, hungry-looking lot in all my life before. They were quiet enough, poor chaps, at first, till suddenly one of them espied the man who had betrayed them standing on our bridge, the quartermaster still by his side, revolver in hand; and then a great yell went up from the whole crowd of prisoners, officers and men.

They would have lynched him then and there if they could have got him. They shook their fists at him, they ground their teeth, they cursed and swore and called names; they'd have torn him into little pieces if they could only have got hold of him. And that chap had to stand by the quartermaster's side and face them. He looked dreadfully scared, and well he might. Those that cursed and swore loudest were naturally the five-and-thirty deserters that "had to be hanged."

Poor chaps! they knew who had fitted the rope round their necks. Sykes had had to surrender unconditionally, and every one of those five-and-thirty men was hanged, except a couple who jumped overboard and were comfortably drowned before we could manage to get the prisoners below and put the hatches on.

Judas had a certain amount of pluck—yes, it is impossible to deny his pluck. He just clenched his fists, and, though his fists were handcuffed, he stretched his arms out towards his old comrades, and gave them a fine long string of oaths. He'd a wonderful command of that sort of language, had Judas.

It was just this way. Judas had shipped as a stoker. He was an ambitious amateur; but he received high wages, which they didn't pay him; his rations were nominal and surprisingly irregular, being mostly pork and hominy; he got more kicks than ha'pence, and the morning of the day on which he deserted, Judas had had six dozen well laid on at the capstan-head. So he slipped off in the darkness in the canoe, and he betrayed his ship and his comrades—partly for money, partly for revenge.

Judas was an exceedingly clever fellow. He made out to the Admiralty people that he had shipped aboard the Harbinger with the intention of betraying her from the very first—from patriotic motives. Congress voted ten thousand dollars to Judas!

He took the ten thousand dollars, and he went out of the Iscariot business for good and all. He was a far-seeing man, too.

When the war came to an end (as it did soon afterwards) the patriots wanted to give him a public banquet in New York. But no, he wasn't grasping; he was contented with what he had! The authorities found out afterwards that the patriotism of Judas was all flapdoodle. He wasn't an American citizen at all, and his motives were dollars, not patriotism.

Then Judas disappeared. I met him, as I told you, the other day. We Americans are fond of hero-worship, and we generally accommodate our heroes with a pedestal of the tallest kind; but I couldn't well look upon Judas as a hero. I knew all about him before he had become famous. Things get forgotten, but I can't forget those thirty-five poor fellows, and my opinion is that Judas won't die in his bed.

J. W. WEARE.

Digitized by Google

THE TREASURES OF THE WHITE GOD.

THE STORY OF A SHAMEFUL CRIME.

SUMMARY.

ROBERT LANE, escaped convict No. 407, alias Adrian Burgoyne is tracked to the World's Fair Grounds at Chicago. He is last seen, after an exciting chase by Mr. Inspector Grey and his assistant, Detective Dean, locked in a burning boat on the lake. Detective Dean finds a cipher in the convict's bed, which he sells to Mr. Richard Sheldon for £2,000. A Col. Lytle calls on Sheldon. They recall Burgoyne's history as follows: Ralph Ringold, when dying in Mexico, left a packet containing £6,000 in the hands of Burgoyne for his friend Richard Sheldon, whom he appointed guardian of his daughter Patrice's fortune. Burgoyne overheard Lytle and Sheldon arranging to appropriate the treasure, and threatened to expose them. They caused him to be convicted of a crime, and sentenced to penal servitude for life.

They then discovered, when too late, that he had with him in cipher the secret to Ralf Ringold's hidden fortune and treasures in Mexico.

The cipher is now in their possession, but Patrice Ringold has the key.

Adrian Burgoyne escapes from the burning boat. He meets with a severe accident, which disfigures him beyond identity.

Richard Sheldon visits Patrice to obtain the key to the cipher. This, however, she had dropped the day before on the cliff, with her Bible. She hastens off to find it.

CHAPTER IX.

IN DEADLY PERIL.

"HELP!"

A cry—a woman's cry—frantic, terrified, broke the drowsy stillness of the calm afternoon.

It proceeded from a point where a rocky cliff rose up sheer fifty feet from the river's banks, and, as it was repeated in frenzied accents, the single visible auditor stepped into view just at the water's edge, and peered excitedly all about him—Adrian Burgoyne.

The clay that leaves the digger's shovel an uncouth mass, that is pressed into shape by the expert moulder, that is purified by water, solidified by fire, glazed and burnished to perfection, goes through no more rigorous and transmogrifying operation than had the man who, now stepping into view, would not have shown a single vestige of his old self to the keenest gaze of his most familiar friend.

Convict 407 had been transformed. The lines, the texture of his complexion had undergone a radical change. The singed eyebrows and lashes aided the sudden alteration in the bronzed face, and new attire had enabled the refugee to stand boldly before the world and defy the law to prove that he was the same man who had met his death penned in by flames to the hold of the old barge that lay a charred wreck in five fathoms of water.

The past was dead, and he was dead. Only the magnetic eyes, with their latent fire of courage and resolution, were a reminder of the old Adrian Burgoyne. The little mirror in the police-station had shown to him a marvellous revelation. He was past identification. He resembled an inhabitant of some far tropical clime. He was a new man, in face, in manner, in all but—memory!

The trifle of money he had about him had enabled Adrian Burgoyne to supplant his singed and tattered attire with a new garb. The certainty that he was hereafter safe from the law had spurred up his drooping energies. With the conviction came new thoughts, new impulses, new resolves. He need skulk, the hunted fugitive, no longer. Rehabilitated, he could boldly penetrate the by-ways of the great cities; he could jostle the very men who had been his gaolers for years; he dared lurk near to the lairs of those human harpies who had robbed him of his good name, who owed to him the terrible debt of injustice and oppression for the health, reputation, and happiness they had so ruthlessly wrecked.

A fair young girl, clinging to a frail bush.

Mighty thoughts had surged into his newly-awakened mind that afternoon as, passing through the quaint little village of Lynde, he paused to rest near the river.

Behind him was a blighted, broken past. He had not a friend in the world. He was homeless, penniless, an outcast.

One sentiment balanced and obscured the desolate emotion of loneliness—resentment. One firm, fierce, throbbing resolve welled up in his soul like a wave of uncontrollable energy—justice! Rioting in their unholy wealth, at the acme of power and luxury, those who had wronged him, jeered at right, juggled with the law, defied the weak efforts of their victims to unmask them, should suffer in turn.

Should such things be? Should he tamely submit to all he had endured, and allow the bold rogues to trample mercilessly on human hearts and human happiness?

His brows knit, his hands clenched; there had come into the face of the dreamer a look that told of firm, devouring resolution, of patience, courage, and grim endurance, when that wild cry cut the air like a knife.

"Help!"

He had gone through troubles enough to sour every kindly impulse, but the true, ingenuous instinct of manliness, the response of a soul keen to feel another's distress, sprang into being in a flash.

Digitized by Google

Whence came the cry? Ah! there it was again—this time a terrified, despairing wail.

"From the cliff," he murmured quickly. "Someone is in trouble or peril."

There was a beaten path leading up from the river shore, winding, and far less perpendicular than the steep incline which, strewn with great jutting boulders, marked the face of the declivity.

Up this Adrian Burgoyne sped. He reached the cliff, and gazed excitedly about him. Then, with fixed glance and startled face, he viewed a picture tragic, thrilling, yet lined with all the finer shades of the beautiful.

A fair young girl, clinging to a frail bush ten feet down the side of the declivity, hung suspended in space in a situation of infinite peril.

There was a sheer descent for nearly thirty feet, terminating at ugly, sharp-pointed rocks, and beyond them the river, at that point shoreless as to level strand, and deep.

She had evidently stumbled and fallen over the cliff, and her weak hand-clasp on the bush was evinced by the slowly slipping fingers, the half-fainting poise of her form.

A graceful figure, a bonny face. Adrian Burgoyne had dreamed of such when, in his lonely prison cell, he had reflected how the delights of home were for ever shut out from his wrecked, dreary life. And the eyes! They met his own eagerly, trustingly; they melted in pitiful pleading into the very depths of his soul. They enchained him, and with a vivid magnetism seemed to send a mysterious flash of some forgotten sentiment of the past into his agitated mind.

The practical issues of the case, moreover, brought his energetic nature into prompt play.

"Courage!" he called down over the edge of the cliff. "Hold on as long as you can. I will soon have you safe."

How? The question was a serious one. There was no time to run for a rope to near houses. As Adrian Burgoyne's eye fell upon a great gnarled oak, about which trailed and looped a thick, heavy, wild vine, he sprang to its side.

Tearing, tugging, bending, breaking the lighter filaments of the vine, with quick strokes of his keen-bladed pocket knife severing the mother-stem, he soon had a section of the vine, some twenty feet in length, ready for use.

Supple as a rope, staunch as a cable, he attached one end to a stout sapling, and lowered the other over the cliff.

It trailed across the shoulders of the imperilled girl; it hovered round her limp form.

"Catch it; it will support you," breathed Burgoyne eagerly.

"I cannot—oh! I fear!"

The girl was well-nigh fainting with terror; her nerves, weak and trembling, refused to answer to the summons of her will.

Burgoyne saw that she might at any moment relax her hold of the bush. Certain serious injury, perhaps death on the rocks below, menaced her.

"Wait!" His tones were clear and mandatory as a trumpet note.

He trusted his weight to the swaying vine. He descended slowly, cautiously. He grazed the form of the girl; he caught her in a close embrace just as her lips grew white, a spasm crossed her face, and she was about to unclench her hand and abandon hope.

His breath came hard as, for a moment, he clung with one hand, and tried to infuse courage into her timid soul.

"Cling to me, I beseech you!" he panted. "I cannot climb with one hand; the double strain may break the vine. Both arms about my neck! Hold firm—that is it! Courage! We shall soon reach the top."

Her face swept his own. He thrilled at the tender, confiding contact of her soft, white arms. Her breath crossed his flushed, eager face like a new revelation; her eyes meeting his, there flashed from the depths of his own a new life.

He caught her in a close embrace.

Pure as the touch of an angel's, her clinging embrace gave him renewed courage and hope. Dissipating the blight, the grief, the humiliation of the hideous prison, his soul, meeting her own, robbed of earthly taint, seemed to recognise an affinity, a spirituality in nature that his sorrow had obscured through the long, torturing years of penal servitude.

Slowly, with difficulty, he began the toilsome, perilous ascent. Hampered by her weight, the hard, ridged vine cutting his hands till the blood came, he gained an inch, a foot at a time in upward progress.

"Safe! Catch at that bush. Pull yourself over the edge. Ah, I knew we should reach it. Thank Heaven, you are safe!"

Her winsome eyes flooded his soul with a thrill of exquisite delight as she returned his devoted glance. She clambered to a secure place; she put forth her white, trembling hand to aid his progress over the edge.

"You have saved my life—you imperilled your own for me—my friend, my deliverer!"

"What has happened?"

A rude voice caused her to turn. At the same instant Adrian Burgoyne, peering upward, caught sight of the face of the speaker.

With a gasp full of the old horror that had haunted him so many bleak, barren years of his life, he recoiled.

Amazed, unnerved, at a sudden, an unexpected, an appalling meeting he forgot peril, surroundings, his changed personality—all, save that at the verge of a new paradise an emissary from the dominion of darkness had appeared to drive him back to the blight, the ruin, the disgrace of his broken past.

Digitized by Google

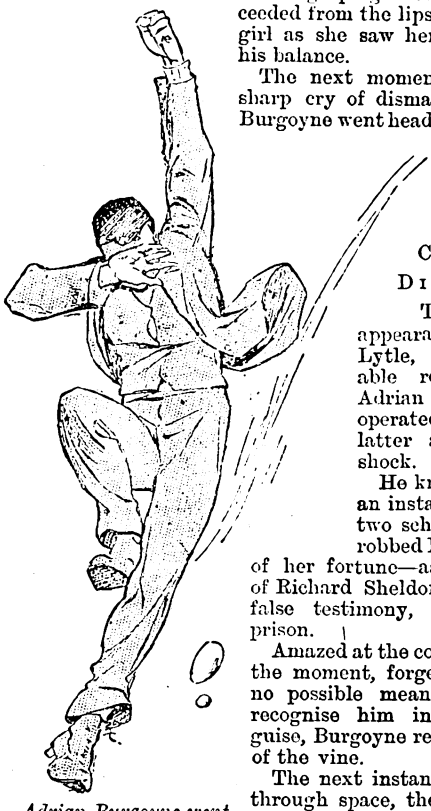
"That man Lytle! The fiend who sent me to prison—the man——"

A wild shriek drowned the gasping utterance. It proceeded from the lips of the rescued girl as she saw her deliverer lose his balance.

The next moment there was a sharp cry of dismay, and Adrian Burgoyne went headlong into space, down the side of the steep declivity.



Adrian Burgoyne went headlong into space.

CHAPTER X.

DISAPPEARED.

THE sudden appearance of Colonel Lytle, his unmistakable recognition by Adrian Burgoyne, had operated upon the latter as a decided shock.

He knew the man in an instant as one of the two schemers who had robbed Patrice Ringold of her fortune—as the emissary of Richard Sheldon, who had, by false testimony, sent him to prison.

Amazed at the confrontation for the moment, forgetting that by no possible means could Lytle recognise him in his changed guise, Burgoyne relaxed his hold of the vine.

The next instant he was flying through space, the agonised cry of the girl he had rescued ringing in his ears.

"Take care! Take care!"

Wavering over the edge of the cliff, fervidly stretching out her hands as if to save her brave deliverer, the girl bade fair to follow him in his swift descent.

The quick grasp of Lytle encircled her arm at a fortuitous moment, however. He dragged her back. Pale, gasping, her senses reeling, Patrice Ringold sank to the green sward, and pressed her trembling hands over her eyes, as if to shut out the picture of the terrible fate awaiting her rescuer on the cruel rocks below.

"Save him!" she wailed—"oh, save him! He risked his life for me!"

"Who?" demanded Lytle. "What does this mean? Speak, girl. Ah!"

Lytle ran to the edge of the bluff, as a vigorous splash sounded.

Then he peered downwards along the steep incline, past the scattered boulders and ridges, and at the very surface of the river where it swept the base of the cliff.

For three great circling eddies showed. It was easy to surmise a tragic ending to the episode of the hour.

"Lost his grip, slid, fell, rebounded! The rocks stunned, the water ended him. Yes, he must have sunk."

"Where is he?"

Panting the words, struggling to her feet, reeling to the side of Lytle, and clinging to his arm for support, Patrice viewed himself and the scene with stricken, frenzied eyes.

"There!" announced Lytle impressively, as he pointed a steady finger at the river.

"You do not mean——"

"Went down like a shot."

Patrice fell against a tree and swayed and rocked to and fro.

"So brave, so sacrificing. Oh, Colonel Lytle! he may come to the surface. Hasten, hasten below, and be ready to offer aid——"

"It is useless," returned Lytle gruffly. "Do you not see the eddies—the water in plain view? That splash announced the death of the man, whoever he was."

The girl uttered a hollow groan. He was her deliverer—that won her gratitude. His eyes had looked magnetic tenderness into her own, as no other man's had ever done—that would be a haunting memory, tangible and sorrowful as the last words of a plighted love.

"And who was he?" demanded Lytle abruptly, turning sharply upon the girl.

"I do not know," she murmured brokenly.

"A stranger?"

"Utterly so."

She sobbed forth the story of her accident, the details of the rescue.

"Why did you venture so near?" asked Lytle.

"You sent me. Do you not remember? I left my mother's little Bible containing the cipher alphabet here, just near the bushes there."

"Ah! And you found it?" cried Lytle eagerly.

He had temporarily forgotten the real mission of the girl, amid the excitement of the moment. Now all the old greed and covetousness flamed back into his sinister eyes.

"No," she murmured in a subdued tone.

"Surely——" he began.

"The wind of the storm last night must have swept it over the edge of the cliff," explained Patrice. "In trying to see I lost my balance."

Colonel Lytle's face grew white to the lips. An imprecation rent the air, fierce, disappointed, hissing.

"Confusion! If that is lost——" he muttered.

"It cannot be lost. No one would steal it. My name is in it. I tell you it must have been blown over the edge yonder."

His face an anxious void of uncertainty and dread, Lytle approached the cliff. He peered into every cranny of the rocks, he scanned the surface in every direction.

Then, almost roughly, he took Patrice by the arm.

"Come," he said peremptorily.

"Where?" She shrank at his touch, her indignant eyes resenting his mandatory bearing.

"Back to the cottage—to Mrs. Loring. That book must be found! It is vital, important. Find out where I can secure men, ropes, ladders, to scale the face of the cliff. You have not hidden it? You are sure that you never met the man who is drowned before?"

Patrice flushed scarlet.

Wavering over the edge of the cliff.

Digitized by Google

"How dare you?" she panted—and then, the words recalling the victim of the river, she wailed forth: "Oh!

He peered into every cranny.

do not waste time about the book—send someone to see if my poor brave rescuer may not have come ashore further down the stream."

"I tell you he sank like a shot, girl," interrupted Lytle harshly.

Dusk had come ere he secured the assistance he desired. Leaving Patrice, pale and sobbing, in the charge of Mrs. Loring, with two farm labourers Lytle repaired to the cliff once more.

With the aid of lanterns they made a vigorous exploration. One man was lowered by ropes; every boulder, crevice, and ridge was inspected. They even lined the shores at the base of the cliff and beyond, in a boat.

In vain! The precious book and its coveted inclosure, the cipher key, were not to be found.

They had disappeared as thoroughly and mysteriously as had the brave rescuer of pretty Patrice Ringold.

CHAPTER XI.

From the Past.

The splash at the foot of the cliff that had, to the mind of Colonel Lytle, announced the death of Patrice Ringold's deliverer, was not caused by Adrian Burgoyne.

Once relaxing his grasp of the wild vine, he had gone downward with a dangerous velocity, but, less than ten feet accomplished, a mere trifle checked his descent—a frantic clutch at the foliage growing sparsely along his course.

He had caught at a bunch of tough grass. It held for a second, then it gave way in his hand, but that momentary stoppage diverted his progress, and when he fell again it was to land against a little bunch of boulders. His head struck one of these, his body was caught at the top of a slight ridge, and there, sheltered from view from the cliffs overhead, he lay stunned and helpless.

His sudden halt had dislodged a stone. This, rolling down the declivity and striking the water, had caused the splash that Lytle had accredited to himself.

Two hours must have elapsed ere Burgoyne roused to consciousness. He sat up, confused and dismayed, as he considered his situation. The faint light of night—for dusk had long since fallen—enabled him to trace the impossibility of an upward climb; thickly strewn lay the perils menacing a downward slide.

The fall and the concussion had shocked him, that was all. As he reached forth his hand to pick up his hat where it had fallen, its clasp closed as well on a little object lying there.

"A book," he murmured curiously—"a book some one has dropped here. Ah! what is that?"

He mechanically thrust the little volume into his pocket, and his gaze centred on the cliff overhead, as voices sounded, and the glimmer of lanterns showed in its vicinity.

Rapid conversation, hurried orders, continual running to and fro, puzzled him for some moments. He was about to cry out for help, when, for the first time, a distinct intonation reached his ears:

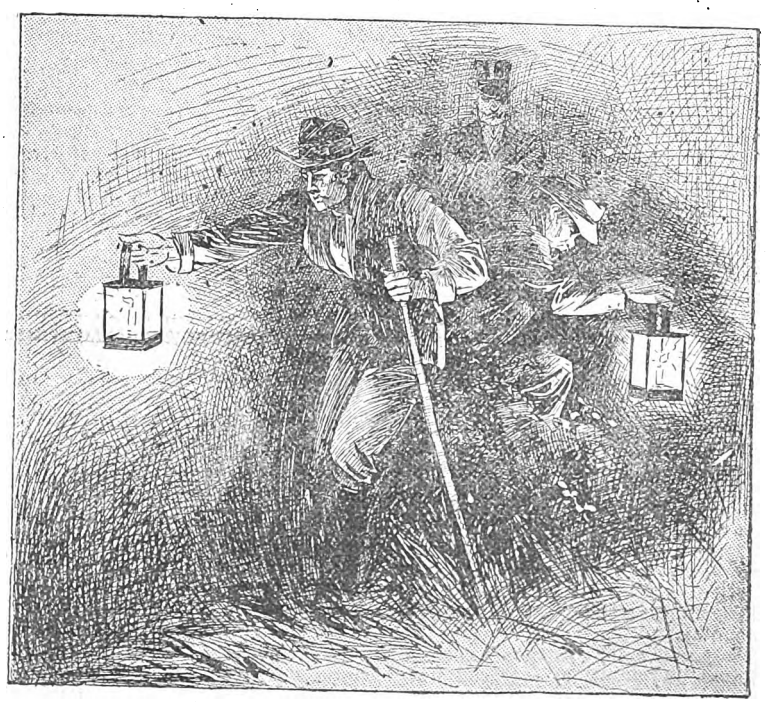
"One get below; I'll lower the rope. Draw it taut across the cliff. We'll stretch it criss-cross, and that will enable an inspection of the whole surface."

"Lytle!" ejaculated the startled Burgoyne.

Yes, the accents were indisputably those of the man whose unexpected appearance two hours previous had so nearly driven him to his death.

What did it mean? In his beleaguered situation the worst fears assailed the imperilled refugee. What could it mean, but that his enemies were once more upon his trail—that in some mysterious way Colonel Lytle had recognised, had shadowed him—that he was seeking for him now?

Every instinct of self-preservation took a keen alarm. The desperate and depressing conviction of the moment sent Burgoyne to his feet, poised in a reckless spring to the dark, gleaming waters below. Then he paused abruptly.



With the aid of lanterns they made a vigorous exploration.

Digitized by Google

For a rope grazed him. Its coiled end, flung free from the cliff, curved across the ridge where he stood.

"Got it?" demanded a voice twenty feet above him.

"Aye, aye!" rang out the answering tones, forty feet below.

"Draw it taut and secure it."

With a wild start he read it.

A quick whip of the cable pressed Burgoyne close to the face of the cliff.

"All sound!" came from below.

"Get to the other side to catch the other rope then," came from overhead.

Burgoyne saw the man below leave the spot, the lantern he carried revealing his every movement.

He had tied the end of the rope to a tree at the edge of the cliff base.

A quick resolve come into his mind. He seized the first rope.

The next moment he was descending it, traversing the cliff in an oblique direction.

He landed just where the shore began to widen. Along the edge of the river he ran. There was no pursuit.

The relief of escape dispelled the alarm he had experienced. Then the reaction to injury and excitement drove him to seek rest. After traversing a lonely path for a mile or more, at the edge of a belt of timber he came to a high fence. A great sheltering pile of brush at hand offered seclusion and solitude. In ten minutes he was slumbering profoundly.

The genial sunbeams were filtering through a lace-work of stems and branches overhead when Adrian Burgoyne again awoke.

The events of the past day flitted through his mind with vivid distinctness of interest and warning. If, as he theorised, Lytle was seeking for him, he was not safe in this part of the country.

Impelled to hasten a departure, drowsy reverie held him enchained for some moments, as a flashing memory of the fair, bright creature whose life he had saved, came into his mind.

Who was she? Did Colonel Lytle know her? Why was it that he thrilled in every nerve as again her soft, clinging arms seemed to enfold him, and her breath, sweet as lilies, fanned his cheek?

Ah! not for him the memory! Banish it, drive it away! Love, home, happiness were the portion of those who knew not the prison cot, the clang of rusted locks, the mocking menace of iron bars!

A taint was upon him. He, the man who had herded with the basest of all humanity, to even dare to dream that the pure face, the tender, innocent heart of a guileless, beautiful girl could be aught to him but a bitter memory! A blazing sword drove him back. Convict, refugee—the joys of life were not for him!

He started to leave the spot, with a bitter, resentful sigh. Then he came to a sudden halt.

His hand, groping aimlessly in his pocket, had come in contact with the sole memento of the exploit of the cliff side—the little book he had found among the rocks.

He drew it forth and surveyed it curiously. It was damp from the rain, and the covers were out of shape.

"Holy Bible." He read the name with a stern, quick flash of his eyes.

And then the memory of a grey-haired mother gone to her rest, with a face glorified with the satisfaction of years of earnest Christian duty, his glance softened, his eyes grew humid. Reverently, with awe, he opened the sacred book.

"An omen for good—I will treasure it!" he murmured half-brokenly.

"Because thou shalt forget thy misery, and remember it as waters that pass away."

They were the first words that met his eyes. A promise—a revelation. Looking into the future in a swift glance of reverie, Adrian Burgoyne allowed the book to fall from his hand.

It came open at the fly-leaf. As he reached to recover it he noticed a name written there. With a wild start he read it—once, twice, and over again.

In a flash the truth came to his mind; in a twinkling he knew the identity of the girl he had saved from death.

For the words that danced in letters of fire before his bewildered yet comprehending gaze formed the name—

PATRICE RINGOLD.

(To be continued.)

A GREAT WAR STORY

has just commenced in

PEARSON'S WEEKLY,

WHICH EVERYONE SHOULD READ.

POSTAL RATES.

SHORT STORIES will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON, at "Pearson's Weekly" Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

THE JOHN NOBLE

HALF-GUINEA COSTUMES

Three New Smart Designs, all one Price. Direct from the Largest Firm of Costume Manufacturers in the world.

Over 1,000 well-Paid Workers employed in John Noble's own Factories, under the strictest conditions of Sanitation and Cleanliness.

JOHN NOBLE Ltd. are the Originators and Actual Manufacturers of the Half-Guinea Costumes for Ladies, and Strongly caution the Public against the many unscrupulous Imitations that have been made of the present and other designs.

Each Garment is scientifically cut, beautifully finished, and absolutely without an equal in the World for Stylish Appearance, Durability, and Actual Money Value. 10/6

Two Gold Medals Awarded.

These Costumes are made from the John Noble Cheviot Serge in three designs as follows:

MODEL 374 (as illustration).—Exceedingly smart mode—wide Godet skirt with belt, also very neat bodice with saddle back, full front, and broad box-pleat down centre, trimmed bold silk cord and three large buttons, collar and cuffs finished silk cord, saddle and sleeves lined.

MODEL 375.—Improved tailor-made Norfolk mode, full wide plain Godet skirt, and skilfully cut bodice with three perfect box-pleats back and front, and detachable belt, saddle and sleeves lined.

MODEL 376.—Consisting of New Godet Skirt, trimmed round hem with bold silk cord; also smart bodice with pointed saddle back, trimmed cuffs, collar, and saddle to match skirt.

Each Costume supplied complete for 10/6, packed in box and sent carriage paid for 9d. extra. When ordering, please be careful to state Model No. of Design required. Sizes in stock fit any figure up to 38ins. round bust under arms; larger sizes 1/6 extra. The Skirt only of any of the above Costumes can be supplied for 5/6, carriage 6d. extra.

The JOHN NOBLE

KNOCKABOUT FROCKS FOR GIRLS

Are indisputably the most marvellous value ever offered for Public Sale. Every frock is thoroughly well made in the John Noble Cheviot Serge, with saddle top, long full sleeves, and pocket, and allows plenty of freedom for the limbs. Please consider these prices: From 1/6

Lengths	21	24	27	30	33	36	39	42	45 ins.
Prices	1/6	2/-	2/6	3/-	3/6	4/-	4/6	5/-	5/6 ea.

Postage 4½d. extra. Every purchaser delighted. The lengths stated are from top of neckband to bottom of skirt in front.

COLOURS: Any of the above garments can be supplied in Black, Navy, Brown, Myrtle, Bronze Green, Electric Blue, Ruby, Dark Cinnamon, Fawn, or Grey.

"THE BOOK OF THE SERGE," also PATTERNS and FASHION SHEETS of up-to-date Costumes, etc., sent Post Free on application.

Please mention "Short Stories" when ordering.

JOHN NOBLE LTD., The Warehouse, MANCHESTER.

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,

SUCH AS

Sick Headache, Constipation,

Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion,

Disordered Liver & Female Ailments.

ANNUAL SALE SIX MILLION BOXES.

In Boxes, 9½d., 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

A SIGNAL SUCCESS.

"'Tis not in mortals to command success, but we'll do more, Sempronius, we'll deserve it."

THE PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY, HANLEY,

ARE SELLING FAST THE MOST WONDERFUL PACKAGE OF - - - CROCKERY IN THE WORLD. - - -

100 PIECES

FOR £1 1s.

A beautiful Dinner Service of 50 pieces is guaranteed Worth the Guinea alone, consequently a Charming China Tea Service, and a useful Collection of Crockery, are given FOR NOTHING.

Thousands sold all over the world. Everybody not only satisfied but amazed at the quantity and quality given.

The Secret of the Success.—The PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY are manufacturers, not middlemen, like many other advertisers. The PEARSON POTTERIES have nearly 2,000 feet frontage to the town of Hanley.

Hundreds of these packages are applied for as Wedding or Birthday Presents. And what more useful present can be given? Every item is useful.

THE THIRTY SHILLING BAZAAR PARCEL IS SELLING WELL. APPLY AT ONCE.

Send a Post Card for Particulars. You will never regret it. Freedom from breakage guaranteed. All letters to the

PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY, HANLEY.

Digitized by Google

HIS LORDSHIP'S REHEARSAL.

Everybody has read about Lord Chesterfield's keen wit and polished manners. On returning from a drive, a few days before his death, he met a friend.

"Out taking the air, my lord?" said the friend.

"No, I am merely rehearsing my part in the funeral procession," was the response.

Rather a ghastly jest. We may do him the justice to believe it was forced and insincere. It is one thing to face death courageously, and quite another to speak of it flippantly.

Alluding to a recent illness, a lady living in Liverpool, and, I am happy to add, now well and hearty, says: "My relatives and friends thought I should never recover."

This gentle and womanly reference to the most serious of all earthly situations is conceived in a very different spirit from the silly remark attributed to Chesterfield. To these good people the events connected with the passage of a human being from the world were not like a play, which must be ostentatiously rehearsed in advance. No, it was a mysterious calamity, to be mentioned with lowered voices and bated breath.

The circumstances which led to this alarming crisis are best set forth in the lady's letter.

"In June, 1891," she says, "I had a severe attack of Influenza, which left me in a low, weak state. I had a poor appetite, and after eating had an awful pain at my chest, and a gnawing, sinking feeling, as if I was too weak to do anything. I had frequent attacks of giddiness and trembling of the limbs. I had great trouble in going up and down stairs, my breathing being so difficult, at times it almost stopped. I lost a deal of sleep at night, and became so weak that I could scarcely get about. One day whilst out in Wavertree Road I fell down and had much difficulty in reaching my home. I consulted a doctor, who said that I was suffering from debility, and should never be any better. My relatives and friends who saw my feeble state did not think I should ever be well again. I went into Staffordshire, and also to Morecambe, to see if change of air would help me, but nothing did any good. In this helpless state I lingered on until February of this year (1894). I determined to try a medicine that was recommended to me called Mother Seigel's Curative Syrup. I got a bottle from Mr. Warhurst, Chemist, Wavertree Road, and when I had taken half a bottle I found relief. My appetite improved, and the food agreed with me, and I could sleep better. I continued with the medicine, and gradually got stronger and stronger. I now feel well as ever, and can eat any kind of food, and go about as usual, for which I bless Mother Seigel's Syrup, but for it I should not be alive. You can make any use you like of this statement. (Signed) Lucy Wilson, 16, Thorburn Street, Wavertree Road, Liverpool, July 21st, 1894."

Thus in a few plain words she tells the substance of her story. But all she went through, and suffered, during the three years of her illness—that she does not tell. Why not? Because it is impossible. How could all her thoughts and feelings be so expressed in language that they should seem to you as they were experienced by her? No, my good friend, it may not be. We shall have to excuse her, as under the same conditions we should have to excuse you.

The leading facts, however, we can understand, and make profitable note of. There was the weakness, the pain at the chest, the sinking sensation, the giddiness, the trembling at the limbs, the difficult breathing, the loss of sleep, etc.—we can easily imagine what they mean. The doctor called all this debility, and in a crude sense he was right; but debility is not a disease; it is merely one of the results of a disease, just as darkness is a result of the withdrawal of light. Such talk is nought but surface talk, without depth or meaning.

Her disease was of the stomach—indigestion culminating in chronic dyspepsia. The attack of influenza in 1891 did not cause it, but was rather caused by it. The body, through lack of nourishment, failed and weakened more and more; and the end would soon have followed had not Mother Seigel's Syrup expelled the impurities from the blood and restored the digestion to its proper tone and power.

Thus, happily, the Dread Visitor was prevented from crossing the door-sill, and Mrs. Wilson lives, as she says, to "bless Mother Seigel and her wonderful medicine."

Digitized by Google

AN EASY WAY TO EARN £100. (SEE PAGE 743.)

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 367. FOR WEEK ENDING JANUARY 11TH, 1896. [ONE PENNY.

100 YEARS' WORLD-WIDE RECORD OF SUCCESS.

NORTON'S

CAMOMILE

PILLS

INDIGESTION BILIOUSNESS HEADACHE
STOMACH & LIVER COMPLAINTS DEBILITY

THE BEST OF ALL TONICS and a GENTLE APERIENT. Mild in Operation, Perfectly Safe, and Free from Injurious Drugs. Sold Everywhere in Bottles at 1/1½, 2/9, and 11/- each.

Ask for "NORTON'S CAMOMILE PILLS," and do not be persuaded to purchase an imitation.

Prepared by NORTON'S, Limited.

Trade Mark—One Little Bottle.

21, Spital Square, London, E.

A SIGNAL SUCCESS.

"'Tis not in mortals to command success, but we'll do more, Sempronius, we'll deserve it."

The PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY, Hanley

Are Selling Fast the most Wonderful Package of Crockery in the World.

100 PIECES

FOR £1 1s.

A beautiful Dinner Service of 50 pieces is guaranteed Worth the Guinea alone, consequently a Charming China Tea Service, and a useful Collection of Crockery, are given FOR NOTHING. Thousands sold all over the world. Everybody not only satisfied but amazed at the quantity and quality given. The Secret of the Success.—THE PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY are manufacturers, not middlemen, like many other advertisers. The PEARSON POTTERIES have nearly 2,000 feet frontage to the town of Hanley. Hundreds of these packages are applied for as Wedding or Birthday Presents. And what more useful present can be given? Every item is useful. The Thirty Shilling Bazaar Parcel is selling well. Apply at once. Send a Post Card for Particulars. You will never regret it. Freedom from breakage guaranteed. All letters to the

PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY, HANLEY.

MASON'S

EXTRACT OF HERBS

For the Immediate Production of

BOTANIC BEER.

A Nine-gallon Cask of Alcoholic Beer from a Brewery will cost you 10/6, but Eight Gallons of Beer made from

Mason's EXTRACT of HERBS

Can be obtained for 6d., plus a pound or two of Sugar and a little Yeast.

THE FINEST BEVERAGE IN THE WORLD.

Inventors and Manufacturers:

Newball & Mason,

HYSON GREEN WORKS,

Nottingham.

If unable to obtain it in your neighbourhood, send 9 stamps for sample bottle; or samples of both Wine Essence and Extract of Herbs, post free for 15 stamps.

DEVONSHIRE CREAM.

(REALLY GENUINE.)

In Patent Air-tight Tins, ½lb., 1s. 2d.; 1lb., 2s.; 2lbs., 3s. 9d., including Tin and Postage.

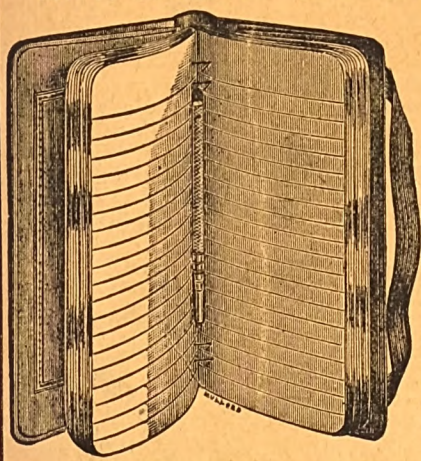
MRS. CONYERS, KILKHAMPTON, STRATTON, N. DEVON.

Digitized by Google

COLLINS' "AYE, READY!" NOTE-BOOK.

WITH PATENT "SELF-REGISTER."



THE HANDIEST AND THE BEST. THE SIMPLEST AND THE CHEAPEST.

As will be seen from the Illustration, this Note-Book has a hollow "rest" cut into the back, into which the Pencil falls and is securely held, while by means of an ingenious contrivance called a "Self-Register," the person using the Book can at once open it where he was last writing. A reference to any page in the front, the middle, or the end is also materially assisted by the "Self-Register."

In Leather Bindings, Round Corners, Gilt Edges, from 1s. upwards, or with Re-fills from 3s. 6d. to 10s. 6d.

WM. COLLINS, SONS & CO., LIMITED,
Bridewell Place, London, E.C.;
139, Stirling Road, Glasgow.

MRS. JACKSON

An artist's wife, residing at Norton, near Malton, states: "I am deeply grateful to you for the good received through taking your Wind Pills. I suffered severely from

INDIGESTION, SPASMS,

and LIVER COMPLAINT. The doctors gave me up as incurable, nor did I think it possible for me to recover. I scarcely dared to eat any food, fearing suffocation. Seeing an advertisement of

Page Woodcock's Wind Pills,

I resolved to try them. After taking a few small boxes I lost all the painful symptoms, and now enjoy good health. Publish my statement as you please."

All sufferers from INDIGESTION, LIVER COMPLAINTS, WIND on the STOMACH, SICK HEADACHE, BILIOUSNESS, etc., should avail themselves of this most excellent medicine.

☛ The Wind Pills being purely Vegetable, Tasteless, and Mild, and Tonic in their action, may be taken with perfect safety by the most delicate of either sex.

Of all Medicine Vendors, at 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. Post Free for P.O. or Stamps from PAGE WOODCOCK, LINCOLN.

EPPS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

COCOA

TO THE DEAF.

A Gentleman who cured himself of Deafness and Noises in the Head after fourteen years' suffering, will gladly send full particulars of the remedy post free.—Address, H. CLIFTON, Norfolk House, Norfolk Street, Strand, London, W.C.

TO TOBACCONISTS COMMENCING.

£20 See Illus. Guide and Catalogue (259 pages), 3d. "How to Open a Cigar Stores, from £20 to £2,000." TOBACCONISTS' OUTFITTING CO., 186, Euston Road, London. (Over 50 years' reputation.) Manager, H. MYERS.

S.S. S.S.
PEARSON'S
£100
COUPON.
No. 2
Jan. 11, 1896.
S.S. S.S.

HAIR DESTROYED.

A doctor's widow knows of a simple, inexpensive remedy that permanently destroys the roots, and will forward particulars free to all those afflicted sending stamped envelope. Address Mrs. B. D. WOOD, 4, DUKE STREET, VILLIERS STREET, LONDON, W.

ARE YOU LITTLE?

If so, wear the "A D" Invisible Elevators (Regd.). Will increase your height up to four inches; the only approved means; detection impossible; simple, inexpensive. Send stamped envelope for particulars to the ORIENTAL TOILET CO. (B 5 Dept.), 87, Strand, London.

JANUARY 2...	...	... £8 per cent.
Feb. 1...	...	... 6 ,, ,,
Mar. 1...	...	... 5 ,, ,,
April 1...	...	... 8 ,, ,,
May 1...	...	... 7 ,, ,,
June 2...	...	... 10 ,, ,,
July 1...	...	... 9 ,, ,,
Aug. 1...	...	... 9 ,, ,,
Sept. 2...	...	... 8 ,, ,,
Oct. 1...	...	... 8 ,, ,,
Nov. 1...	...	... 7 ,, ,,
Dec. 2...	...	... 7 ,, ,,
Total for 12 months ...		£92 per cent.

An average of nearly £8 per cent. per month.

IF interested in how a LEGITIMATE investment, WITHOUT SPECULATION, can be made to yield this return, write for our Illustrated Manual, post free. We have not a dissatisfied client, no money has ever been lost, and £5 and upwards may be invested. Cheques for profits mailed promptly 1st of each month. DOUGLAS, HUNGERFORD & WILLIAMS, 5, Copthall Buildings, Copthall Avenue, E.C., London, and 11, Place de la Bourse, 11, Paris.

SULPHOLINE LOTION

For clearing the skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness, giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance.

SHILLING BOTTLES.

HAIR DESTROYED

permanently and absolutely by an entirely new and harmless self-treatment, total destruction guaranteed. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope. Prof. F. T. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

BLUSHING

Permanently cured. A Pamphlet giving sound practical advice and particulars of a successful treatment for a rapid, simple, and inexpensive home-cure, forwarded free to all upon receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—Prof. B. L. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

TOO STOUT

Dr. Grey's FAT REDUCING Pills.

A safe, rapid, and permanent reduction and improvement in health and breathing guaranteed. A special preparation kept for stubborn cases (either sex) which have resisted other treatment.

ABDOMINAL OBESITY A SPECIALTY.

2/9 and 4/6 per box, plain wrapper, post free to all parts. Dr. O. GREY, 57, Weymouth St., Portland Pl., London, W.

VIOLIN STRINGS.

4 Best "E's" (samples) 9d., post free.

S. S. CARY, NEWBURY.

TOOTH-ACHE

CURED INSTANTLY BY

BUNTER'S NERVINE

Prevents Decay. Saves Extraction. Sleepless Nights Prevented. Neuralgic Headache and all Nerve Pains Removed by BUNTER'S NERVINE. All Chemists, 1s. 1½d.

DEAFNESS,

HEAD NOISES, etc., ABSOLUTELY CURED in 24 hours, by using one bottle of "Auraline Essence," the Great Indian Discovery. Millions of sufferers cured after all else had failed. Many testimonials. Why remain deaf when a cure awaits you? Send 2/9 to the MACKAY REMEDY CO., 104, High Holborn, London.

HAIR DESTROYED.

A lady who has permanently destroyed Superfluous Hairs on herself, will be happy to forward free, to all similarly afflicted, full particulars of a simple, inexpensive and harmless self-treatment. Send stamped addressed envelope in confidence to Mrs. "T. D.," 87, Strand, London.

Digitized by Google

No. 367.] [One Penny.

For the Week Ending January 11th, 1896.

THE SPY'S FATE.

THE bed was comfortable enough to invite repose, but although the solitary occupant of the chamber—a travel-stained, weary looking man—had thrown himself down upon it shortly after the door had been closed upon him, and locked on the outside, he had not remained above a few minutes when he got up again and commenced pacing up and down the room.

Wearing the dress of a farm labourer, there was, nevertheless, a something about him which seemed to imply that he had not long since been through a course of military training, his figure being well-set up. There was, too, a general erectness about him which was out of keeping with the clothes he wore.

He was, as a matter of fact, one of the smartest troopers in the Confederate Army, and the disguise he had temporarily assumed had been suggested by him to his commanding officer as the best means by which he might, if lucky, obtain some important information as to the enemy's movements, which could only be gained by passing through the Federal lines.

A universal favourite with officers and men alike, the former had pointed out to him the risk he would incur, and it was only when his captain found that nothing would turn him from his resolve, that he reluctantly gave him permission to make the attempt.

"Is there any letter you would like me to forward to your people, in case you should be—get taken prisoner?"

"In case I should be shot sir, you mean. The bitter feud between North and South does not admit of much ceremony being shown towards spies, I fancy, on either side."

"You are a brave man, Jamieson, and have proved yourself a good soldier more than once; I earnestly hope you may get through the job all right."

"Thank you, sir, I'll do my best, and the boys shan't have cause to be ashamed of me, I promise you."

That same night, Trooper Jamieson set out on his dangerous mission, and succeeded in making his way through the Federal Lines, thanks to his intimate knowledge of the country; and was within measurable distance of safety again, when he was unlucky enough to fall in with a small cavalry patrol on outpost duty, the non-com. officer in charge of which being struck with the soldier-like bearing of the wandering farm labourer, ordered his men to search him, with a result that more than justified his suspicions, and brought to light papers of such importance that the captor felt his speedy promotion was assured.

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

With hands closely bound, he had been placed on horseback, a trooper riding on either side of him, each carrying a loaded Colt's revolver ready to fire should the prisoner show any intention of attempting to escape.

In less than half an hour the escort and prisoner had arrived at the temporary headquarters of the detachment to which the former belonged, a substantial Virginian farm-house which had been temporarily transformed into a barracks, the owner having gone to fight in Lee's Army.

The subsequent proceedings were extremely brief; the prisoner had been taken before the officer in command, the sergeant had made his report, and "To be shot at daybreak" was the order given.

This was several hours ago, and the prisoner had for some time been walking up and down the spacious bedroom referred to at the commencement of this story.

On the table in the middle of the room a lamp was burning brightly, and a supply of writing paper and materials had been set out on it, being the room next adjoining the officer's bedroom, and which in ordinary times he used for writing dispatches and reports, etc.

"Geof promised me she should get it, and he will keep his word, I know. I wouldn't like her to have it from anybody else—poor old mother!

"Now, what shall I tell her? Shall I say I was out on patrol duty? or shall I tell her the truth? Better tell her all about it; she shall never say I died with a lie on my lips—and, after all, why shouldn't I tell her? I have done nothing to be ashamed of. All's fair in love and war. Poor Louie, I wonder if she will fret much—I wonder—bah! time is getting on, and they said six o'clock—only three hours more. Now for it:

"My DEAREST MOTHER,—At the moment I write this I have exactly three hours to live. I am to be shot at daybreak, and my brother Geoffrey, who is in the next room, will give the order to fire. 'Geoffrey!' you say, as you read this—it's true; I am his prisoner, and when I tell you all, your heart will go out to him as it never did before.

"I know you felt hardly against him when he went away, five years ago, and never sent a line to say whether he was dead or alive. He tells me he did write, though, and often wondered why you never replied, but he knows now that the letters never reached you. He will tell you all about it when the war is over, for he means to come home, and stay on the farm for good.

"But how came I to be Geoffrey's prisoner? I can hear you say. Well, when I last wrote I told you I had taken service in Stewart's Cavalry, and the General of our division having been very anxious for some time to obtain certain information, which could only be gained by some one who was thoroughly well acquainted with the country making his way through the Federal lines, I felt there was not a man in the corps so well fitted for the task as I was. So I volunteered for the duty, and having disguised myself as a farm labourer, got through all right, found out what I wanted to, and was making my way back to our camp, congratulating myself on my good fortune, when just as I was within measurable distance of Southern territory, I came across a small patrol of Northern cavalry, was arrested on suspicion—searched. The papers I had risked my life for being found upon me, left no doubt as to my identity, and in less than half an hour I found myself in the presence of Geoffrey—Captain Geoffrey Jamieson of the Federal Army. I didn't know, of course, any more than you did that he had taken service in the Northern Army, but I knew him in a minute; he did not recognise me I saw, but when I spoke he started, seemed to be thinking, and then suddenly I realised he knew it was me. I don't think his men noticed anything out of the way in his manner, and I was glad of that. He asked me if I had anything to say, why I should not be treated as a spy, and shot; and I said I had not, and he never winced, mother, although I could see he could hardly control himself.

"'I will give you one chance,' he continued, in as calm a tone as if he had never seen me in his life, 'and I would remind you that for the sake of your parents (if they are living),' he said, as if he would divine my thoughts, 'you should consider them before yourself. Your first duty is to them. If you can give me any information as to the disposition of the Southern Forces, your life will be spared, and my men shall see you safely across our lines. What do you say?'

"'I have a mother living,' I replied, 'but she would rather a son of hers died doing his duty as I have done than save his life at the expense of his honour. I can give you no information. I have done my duty to the best of my ability. It only remains for you to do yours, Captain.'

"'You refuse my offer, then?'

"'I do, sir.'

"'Very well, then. Sergeant, take your men outside; I will summon you presently.'

"The sergeant saluted, and retired.

"As soon as the door was closed, Geoffrey came across to where I was standing and gripped my hand silently.

"'Arthur!'

"'Geof!'

"'I didn't know you at first, but your voice is the same as it used to be.'

"'I saw you recognised me; I hoped you would not.'

"And then we talked, Geof and I, of you, mother, and the old place, and never a word of what was in both our minds. At last he said: 'You won't split, Arthur, I know that; and'—with the old pride in his voice—'I won't ask you to.'

"'Thank you for that, Geof.'

"'I would let you go, Arthur, this very minute if I dared; but I dare not, they would shoot me for mutiny.'

"'I reckon that's so.'

"'I am not afraid to die, Arthur, but it is the disgrace of it. Look here—you take my revolver—make a bit of a fuss—take it and shoot me—do you hear? Shoot me—here—here'—pointing to his heart—'that door isn't locked—there is only the sergeant and two men outside. My revolver is loaded in all six chambers, you will have five shots left. My mare is waiting for me down in the courtyard. She is faster than any horse my men have. You can get away. Do you see? Quick, man—here it is!' He paused, expecting me to reply.

"'Geof,' I said, 'you have got to see this thing through, and the sooner the better. If you had been in my place I should have done my duty just as you must do yours. I have played for a big stake and lost it. Supposing I was coward enough to do as you suggest, what good would it be, do you think? I could never look the dear old mother in the face again, feeling I had killed you to save myself. No—a thousand times no!

"'Shake hands, Geof. God bless you! Tell her I did my duty, or maybe you'd let me write her a bit of a letter, she would take it kind-like coming from me. You will see she gets it, won't you?'

"Geof said nothing, but he just gripped my hand like a vice. He's good grit, Geof is, and worth a dozen of me, mother. Then he went to the door and called the sergeant in.

Digitized by Google

"'I have endeavoured to get the prisoner to divulge the information I require, but he has refused. You will therefore arrange for him to be shot at daybreak. Say six o'clock a.m. Put him in the room next my bedroom, and let him be supplied with a light and writing materials.'"

Here the letter broke off suddenly; when it recommenced the handwriting was not so firm as it had been.

"When I began this letter I told you my room, the one I am writing this in, is next to Geof's bedroom. Soon after they had placed me here I heard him come into his, but he did not lie down, he walked up and down like I did at first, and then all was quiet. He had gone to sleep after all, then—fancy going to sleep!—and yet I dare say he was tired out, and he gave me a chance, you see. Presently I heard a door open quietly, and Geof came in here. He had taken his boots off, that was why I had not heard him moving. He held his finger up for me to be silent, and then said in a whisper: 'Take your boots off, and follow me.'

"Something in his manner made me do as he said. He always had a masterful way with him, you remember.

"When I got into his own room, he said: 'If you go down that passage at the end of your room, what looks like a cupboard by the side of the bed is, I found out the other day, a second doorway—none of my men know it—you will find a suit of uniform of mine, and my big cloak; I want you to put them on and pass yourself off as me. I always go and visit the sentries at about four o'clock or half-past. You and I are just about the same build and size, our voices are sufficiently alike, and as it is a cool night, you can button the cloak close up round your neck, and by pulling your cap well down, your face will be concealed. The password is Andromeda. Once you get clear of the last sentry, you know your way better than I can tell you. Now go, Arthur, and God bless you! Tell the dear old mother she had no reason to be ashamed of either of us. Give me your hand, Arthur—there, that's off my mind, and now I can go to sleep.' I wanted to stop, but Geof said no, and as gently as a woman pushed me back into this room.

"I have been in the passage and seen the uniform, and, God help me, mother, I took it up, touched it, and I felt like a murderer. I can't do it—I can't do it, and yet it is hard to die; and Geof meant it, I know he did—if only he could get away too—if only he could; he can—he shall.

* * * * *

"I have been to see him, mother, to tell him of a wild, mad scheme that had suggested itself to me, but he was asleep, fast asleep, and such a happy peaceful look upon his face, as if he were dreaming of you, and how you would bless him when you knew all. I could not find it in my heart to wake him, for, after all, the plan that suggested itself to me doesn't seem really feasible. One of us must die."

* * * * *

The old clock in the stable yard chimed out half-past four—the sentries had been on the alert for half an hour past, expecting the customary visit, but no officer came. The lamp in the prisoner's room was growing dimmer. He must make haste if he was going to finish his letter. He sat thinking deeply, pen in hand, and then a sudden resolve seemed to come upon him—what right had he to do this thing—the temptation was great, greater he felt than he could well overcome, but with firm and unhesitating footsteps he walked to the door leading to the passage.

Geof had told him to lock it on the far side he remembered. Yes, there was the key, right enough. His hand did not tremble as he withdrew it from the lock and having re-entered the bedroom and closed the door quietly he locked it, not as Geoffrey had told him, on the outside, but on the inside. The window was open a few inches, sufficiently to allow him to put his hand out, and as he heard the key drop on the turf beneath, he gave a sigh of relief.

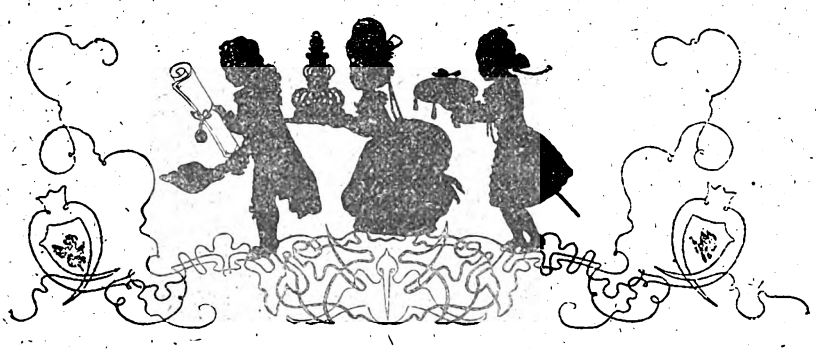
"Thank God for that," he ejaculated. "God bless you, Geof."

The lamp was growing gradually dimmer, but enough flame remained for his purpose; holding the letter he had been at so much trouble to write, towards it, in a few seconds nothing remained but a little heap of charred paper. And then, overwrought by the strain of what he had gone through, he threw himself down on the bed, and slept.

* * * * *

At the close of the war one son was restored to his mother, but the fate of the other has mercifully never been revealed to her.

Peter Parr.



Digitized by Google

By E. C. WAGGENER.

SUMMARY.

Colonel Beverly and his step-daughter, Helen, between whom there is little love, are living together at Looe. After a long absence, Helen's sister, Kitty, returns home. She discovers that Helen fancies herself deeply in love with Gifford Vane, to whom she herself was engaged five years ago, but has not seen him since. After several weeks Kitty determines to leave Looe. Gifford Vane again proposes to her, but, for the sake of Helen, she refuses him.

CHAPTER VI.

They had not long been married. Helen came out of the little white cottage and walked quickly down to the gate, where she stood for a few minutes, looking up and down the long dusty street. Then, with a faint sigh, she went back to the house, her step a trifle slow, a little frown of vexation, or anxiety, it was impossible to tell which, on her face.

She had just time to put away her broom and straighten the folds of the snowy table-cloth, which had gone awry, when the sharp click of the gate was heard, and the next moment Gifford came in, looking flushed and tired. She ran for a chair, which she drew close to the window, and into whose comfortable depths he sank with a sigh of relief.

"Are you very tired this evening, Gifford?" she asked, leaning tenderly over his chair. "And what made you so late? Were you too busy to come home earlier?"

"I wish you wouldn't ask me so many questions all in one breath," he said impatiently. "Is supper ready?"—with a hasty glance at the table.

"Yes; I was only waiting for you to come," she answered brightly, as she hastened to pour out the tea.

"Why don't you open some of your windows?" he asked, as he drew his chair up to the table and helped himself to a piece of cold chicken. "It's so confounded hot in here I wonder you can stand it."

"The wind was blowing the dust in from the street," she said; yet she ran and opened both windows. "Maybe you are warm from walking so fast," she added as she came back to the table.

"I don't think I walked any faster than usual," he retorted a little crossly. "Helen"—looking up at her with a frown—"I do wish you'd leave off wearing your hair in that ridiculous fashion. You look like an old woman of sixty."

"I thought you admired it this way," she said timidly, a look of pain and surprise in her gentle eyes. "Which way do you like it best?"

"Any way that suits you," he answered with sudden indifference that hurt her far more than his fault-finding had done. Then, as if he already regretted his hasty words, he left his chair and came over to where she sat.

"Don't mind it if I'm out of sorts," he said, kissing her with unusual tenderness. "I ought to be more lover-like in my ways to suit an affectionate little woman like you," he added as her arms stole round his neck, "but when a man marries he doesn't expect to spend his whole time in love-making."

"I don't expect it," said Helen smiling, and yet with tears shining in her eyes. "But sometimes you are not a bit like you used to be—I mean before we were married."

"I must have changed quite suddenly," he said laughing at her solemn face, "for we haven't been married quite three months yet, have we?"

"No. And yet"—with a heavy sigh—"you have found fault with me more than a dozen times."

"Have I? Well, if I did it was for your own good. Why do you parade your ignorance so often, and before my best friends too? Now, the other day, when Hunt ran in on us so unexpectedly, I was sure you would do your best to appear at your ease. But instead I think you tried to show off your ignorance as much as possible. And Bob has such a horror of a common-place woman."

"Indeed, I did try my best to entertain him," said Helen excitedly, "but what could I say when he talked about people I had never seen?"

"I know you made a dozen ridiculous blunders when you did talk. And there was no need of your telling him that you had never been outside of Looe in your life."

"I was sorry the moment I told him that, for I saw from your face that you were angry. But, Gifford, why should you be so sensitive about it? It's not my fault that I know so little. Father never would send me off to school ——"

"I know," interrupted Gifford roughly, "but a man doesn't expect to have to educate his wife. It's asking a little too much, I think. And the woman who expects it expects too much."

Gifford certainly meant to make Helen happy when he asked her to marry him. Whether he was actuated by pity, or petty spite towards Kitty, or whether his nobler, better nature prompted him to fulfil his half-spoken promises to Helen—whatever his reasons, he certainly meant to be kind and gentle towards her always. And they were both very happy and contented the first few weeks, he realising more and more every day what a treasure he had won, she content to worship him in a fierce, idolatrous way, without seeming to notice the absence of any great tenderness on his part. Her nature was so sweet and affectionate, so free from jealousy and selfishness, that he told himself in those first quiet days that he had done what was right and best, after all.

But a month or two of close companionship revealed her ignorance and simplicity so plainly as to arouse a spirit of antagonism within him which he tried in vain to repress. Before their marriage her little blunders had made her charming in his eyes; because in her innocence and simplicity she was unlike any other woman he had ever seen. But then he had not the opportunities to notice her ignorance that he had afterwards; and when it became more apparent every day, he was at first annoyed, then ashamed, and at last angry with her for the little tricks of speech and ludicrous blunders that any other man less proud and sensitive would have scarcely noticed, or would at least have quietly corrected or ignored.

Digitized by Google

Helen felt the bitterness of the old vague doubts and fears again; felt, in an undefined way, that her marriage was very different from marriages contracted by men and women who were deeply in love with each other. Not that she believed her husband had ceased to care for her—he had given her no cause to think that; he had simply grown a little careless and indifferent. But it was his indifference, his lack of tenderness, that hurt her.

Poor, deluded Helen! It was well for her peace of mind that she could not read in her husband's face—the face that was fast losing its hopeful, boyish look—the secret regret that was making life hateful to him. It was well for her that she did not know of the bitter rebellion in his heart, or that remorse was poisoning every moment of his existence.

He wanted to do right, he wanted to make Helen happy, and he tried very earnestly to forget the past; but there were times when a great longing for the sight of Kitty's face, the sound of her voice, and the touch of her hand, rose up in his heart and half maddened him. Yet he seldom spoke of her, and gave Helen very little encouragement to speak of her, though he avoided the subject in such an innocent, natural way that she had not the least idea he avoided it purposely.

* * * * *

There was a knock at the front door. Helen herself went to answer it. She was surprised and delighted to find it was their old friend, John Eastman, who had run in to pay them a surprise visit.

It was a merry little party of three that gathered about the table a few minutes later.

"Why, I shall begin to think seriously of getting married myself," John remarked, when she had helped him to a third slice of cake.

She blushed a little, and looked across the table at Gifford, who had suddenly become absorbed in studying the pattern on a plate before him.

"I suppose every man thinks of getting married at some time in his life," she said, breaking a somewhat awkward silence. "Or at least they ought to think about it, if they don't," she added quite soberly.

"Oh, yes; most fellows contemplate matrimony before they are out of their teens," said John lightly. "And"—with a quick glance at her serene face—"the majority of them have a half-dozen love affairs before they settle down to the right one at last. Why, I have imagined myself desperately in love several times since I left Mallingford, but somehow I always got over my fancy without any serious injury to my heart. It was always a blow to my pride, though, to get 'no' for an answer. Love's a queer thing. Here's Gifford, who pretended that he was deeply in love with—"

"Let Helen help you to some more strawberries," interrupted Gifford, looking across the table at his friend with a flush on his face. "They grew in her garden, and are unusually fine for the season."

"I don't think I've slighted them, for I've been helped twice," said John, laughing a little uneasily, for he realised in a dim way that he was on dangerous ground.

When they left the table a few minutes later Gifford led the way to the verandah, leaving Helen to follow at her leisure. Lighting cigars, the two seated themselves on comfortable chairs under the window.

To-night Gifford felt a sense of comfort and rest which he had not experienced for many months, and the conversation drifted from common-place remarks about the village and its people to the old college days, when the two were such steadfast friends and comrades.

"We were both very ambitious in those days, weren't we?" said John in a musing tone. "Yet neither of us has managed to make a great stir in the world."

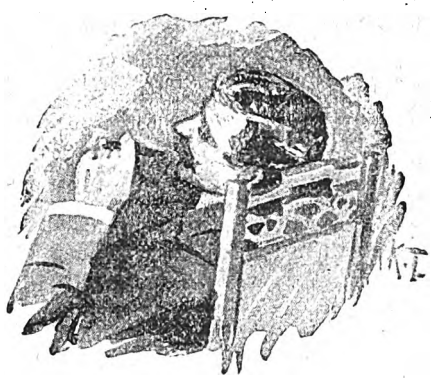
"No," returned Gifford a little absently; and then a long silence fell between them.

"I'm afraid," remarked John suddenly, "that I touched on a forbidden subject a little while ago, but the fact is you owe me an explanation. You assured me over and over again that you and Helen were simply good friends, and led me to make a fool of myself when you might have been honest enough to have told me the truth, and saved me the mortification of a refusal. I was sure, too, that you cared for Kitty."

"I did," said Gifford, his voice husky with some sudden emotion. "I loved her better than my life, and I believed, and believe yet, that she cared for me."

"Then, by Jove! what made you act as you did? Why didn't you marry her? If you were so sure of her love, what prevented you from proposing to her?"

"I don't care to further discuss the subject," said Gifford with sudden reserve, half angry with himself for being betrayed into speaking of something he had mentally resolved should never be recalled.



Lighting cigars.

"I think I understand," and John smiled a little bitterly as he threw away his half-smoked cigar. "Kitty refused you, so you consoled yourself with Helen. And now you want to keep close about it. Well, I don't think you could have done better, though it was hardly fair to Helen. And I did care for her very much. You are, I feel, free to speak about it now. It is all over, you know, and we are good friends again. And you might tell me more, seeing I have quite got over my folly. Of course, Helen doesn't know that you cared for her sister, does she?"

"No," said Gifford hastily. "A man is a fool who would speak of such things to his wife, for the best of women are not free from jealousy, and Helen has her share, though I have never given her much cause to show it—at least, not since we were married. It would be very foolish to rake up the past, and I don't intend that Helen shall ever know anything about it. Of course, you think it rather strange that I married her, after protesting that we were only good friends, and all that sort of thing, but there is a little story connected with it that I am bound to honour to keep secret, even at the risk of your thinking ill of me. I'll say this much, however, that while I will never love another woman as I loved Kitty North, I know I am not half good enough for Helen. I realise it more and more every day of my life."

"You need somebody to scold and lecture you every now and then, and Helen is too soft hearted for that," said John, as he lighted a fresh cigar. "And too fond of you perhaps," he added gravely.

"Yes, there's the trouble. She's too fond of me. And she's too intense. John," he added, in a sudden burst of confidence, "whatever you do, don't marry a woman you can't love. Don't cheat yourself into the belief that love will come in time, for it won't."

"There is no prospect of my marrying anyone just at present, and sometimes I'm afraid I'm doomed to remain an old bachelor all the days of my life. I've never yet found the woman who was willing to become Mrs. Eastman."

Just then footsteps sounded in the hall, and presently Helen came out and joined them. She appeared not to notice the chair John hastened to offer her, but stood leaning against a pillar of the porch, looking a little ghostly in the darkness, in her white dress and the fleecy scarf she had wound about her dark hair.

Digitized by Google

"Couldn't we have a little music?" suggested Eastman. "Gifford, you haven't forgotten how to sing, I know; so get your guitar and favour us with something for the sake of old times."

"I've forgotten everything I used to know, and my voice has grown cracked and weak," protested Gifford. "You really will have to excuse me."

He had lighted the lamp.

"Then Helen must give us——"

"You forget that I have no accomplishments," put in Helen, a little stiffly. "So I, too, must beg to be excused."

"By the way, what is the time?" asked John, striking a match and trying to look at his watch. "My train is due at nine o'clock. It's almost that now," he added, as he closed his watch and rose from his chair. "How the hours have flown! Why, I haven't had a chance to say half I wanted to say. But I mean to run up here often—that is, if you'll let me. Gifford, can't you throw off your lazy fit and walk over to the station with me?"

Gifford rose with alacrity, and went into the hall for his hat. "I won't keep him any longer than I can help," said Eastman, as he bade Helen good-bye. "Will you be afraid to stay here alone?"

"Certainly not. I have grown very brave of late," she answered, with a laugh that sounded a little forced and unnatural.

CHAPTER VII.

WHEN Gifford came back, an hour later, he found Helen still standing on the verandah, and it struck him that there was something a little singular in her attitude.

"Why didn't you go in and light the lamp?" he asked, pausing for a second on the steps. "Were you afraid of the dark? Or were you enjoying the starlight?"

"I wasn't at all afraid, and I don't think I noticed the stars," she answered shortly, as she followed him in and stopped to bolt and lock the hall-door.

He had lighted the lamp when she came into the sitting-room, and he turned and looked at her keenly, a sudden, unaccountable fear in his mind.

"What is the matter?" he asked quickly. "Why, you are as pale as death, child!"

Then all the pent-up agony of the past two hours burst forth in a torrent of passionate words.

"I heard what you said out yonder," she cried in a choked voice—"you and John. I didn't intend to listen. I went to the window and sat down because I was tired, and wanted to rest a little. I did not mean to listen to what you were talking about, I want you to understand that. But I heard every word you said.—Are you listening to me?—Every single word you said!"

"Well," and his face betrayed nothing.

His apparent coolness and indifference staggered her for a moment, then her fury burst forth again.

"It was mean and cruel of you to deceive me so—mean and cowardly and cruel! Oh, how blind I have been not to see that you never cared for me! But now that my eyes are opened to the truth, I can understand a great many things that have puzzled me at times. Yet I want to say that I never once thought you cared for Kitty, or she for you. You treated her coldly; you gave me very little reason to believe that you even liked her, and she kept the truth from me. It was a cowardly thing to do, and I hate you both! And I will never forgive either of you, never, as long as I live."

"Listen a moment, Helen," he said, all his seeming indifference vanishing before the look of misery in her face. "Suppose I did love Kitty; you and I are married now, so don't you think it would be the wisest and best plan to forget the past?"

"Don't ask me such a question, after what I have heard to-night!" she exclaimed passionately. "I tell you I hate you—hate you just as much as I loved you two hours ago! And I'll never forgive you as long as I live; you can't expect it, you needn't expect it. Oh, what a wretched, wretched mistake it has been! Why didn't you tell me the truth in the beginning? Why, why did you marry me when you loved someone else?"

"Because you made such a fool of yourself about me," he answered, in sudden, bitter anger. "Heaven knows I married you against my will and better judgment, for I knew in the beginning that no happiness would ever come of such a marriage."

He was reckless of the effects of his words, for he felt in his heart that nothing he could do or say now would have power to alter her opinion of him or restore her confidence in him. "I have been living a lie long enough," he added, "and am rather glad, after all, that you know the truth at last."

He was scarcely conscious of his cruel, brutal words. He only felt a sense of freedom and relief in the thought that he was throwing prudence to the winds, and putting himself in a position to shake off for ever the hateful chains that fettered him.

Her face was turned persistently towards the window.

"Then you needn't live a lie any longer," she said, her voice firm, and clear, and sweet. "You can go away anywhere—anywhere, just so I may never look upon your face again. God may forgive you for the wrong you have done me—I never will!"

"Helen, you don't mean all you have said," he pleaded, his better nature struggling for mastery. "I am not wholly to blame in this matter, and if you will let me explain——"

Digitized by Google

"I don't want you to explain anything," she interrupted, her anger flaming forth again. "I have heard quite enough. I can't forget your cruel words, and I want you to go away—to get out of my sight for ever. If you don't go, I will, for I will never live with you again."

"Are you in earnest?" he asked, his voice betraying none of the passion and pain and self-reproach he was feeling. "Do you really wish for a separation?"

"I do. Nothing could induce me to live with you another day, after what has been said to-night," she answered, her voice faltering a little. Then, as if she feared to trust herself to say more, she hastily crossed the room, and, opening the window-shutters, leant her hot, throbbing face in the cool night wind. He stood motionless in the middle of the room, looking with unconscious admiration at her silent figure.

"You say you hate me," he said at last; "but if you knew all, I think you would pity me a little, Helen. Not that I haven't done wrong, for I wronged you when I married you, loving your sister. But it is useless to waste words," he added bitterly. "I feel that you will never forgive me, so perhaps it will be best for me to go away. We certainly could never be happy together after this."

Helen was silent.

"I don't suppose you'll miss me much," he went on, with a short laugh. "You have plenty of friends here to pity you and help you to forget me. Then, I am not leaving you utterly destitute. This house is yours, besides the interest in your old home; so, on the whole, no doubt you'll get along better without me. Consult some of your friends as to your plans for the future. They are better able to advise you than I am. I shall take nothing with me except my books and a few articles of clothing. Everything else I leave in your hands to dispose of as you see proper. And, Helen"—coming a step nearer the motionless figure—"try to forget me and be happy, for I shall never trouble you again—be sure of that."

She turned and looked at him slowly, and he quailed before the scornful anger of her soft eyes.

"I have told you that I hate you," she said slowly. "What more can I say? Now go, and remember this, that, living or dead, I shall always despise you."

She turned to the window again and buried her face in her hands. Gifford went into the bedroom and packed some of his books and a few articles of clothing into a bag, performing these necessary preparations with feverish haste and with an utter disregard to neatness. When he had finished he came back into the sitting-room and stopped before her.

"I am going now," he said, his voice husky with some emotion, whether sorrow, or remorse, or gladness it was impossible to tell. "I have just time to catch the train. I don't suppose it makes any difference to you where I am going, and, in fact, I don't know myself. Are you afraid to stay here alone until morning?" he asked, as if the question were an afterthought.

"No, I'm not afraid," she answered, without turning her head. "The darkness and loneliness won't be half so terrible to me as your presence would be."

"Then you won't say good-bye?" he asked half bitterly, half intreatingly, as he paused in the door.

No answer. Her face was turned persistently towards the window. Had she been made of stone she could not have appeared more rigid and lifeless. Was this the woman who only a little while ago was all tenderness and love and passion? he asked himself wonderingly. Then he glanced at his watch, and while he made no motion towards going to the quiet figure, still he lingered in the doorway.

One, two, five minutes passed, and still no stir of the motionless form by the window.

With a little sigh he took up the heavy bag, put on his hat, and went out, closing the door softly behind him. Helen heard his quick footsteps on the gravelled path, saw him open the little gate, and watched him in the dim light of the dying moon until his figure was lost in the distance.

"I shall never see him again," she said to herself with a little sob. "Am I glad, or sorry, I wonder? Oh, how strange that last night I was so happy, and to-night we are parted for ever! Yet it is better so than to have kept on living together after what passed between us a little while ago—better this than to be compelled to live with a man who cares nothing for me. Ah! if I could only die! if I could only die!"

Yet her eyes were tearless, and she gave way to no noisy grief over this, the bitterest hour of her life.

After a little while she rose, closed the windows, saw that the doors were securely locked, and determined to go to bed. But not to sleep; that was impossible, when every nerve was tingling with pain and her heart beating almost to suffocation. What was this terrible loss that had come to her? she asked herself over and over again, as she lay there through the long hours of the lonesome night. What had she ever done to deserve this? Nothing, nothing, she told herself. And yet she had lost all that was worth living for.

(To be continued.)

AN EASY WAY TO EARN ONE HUNDRED POUNDS.

AT the left hand bottom corner of the second page of the cover of SHORT STORIES will be found a coupon. This coupon will appear every week during the whole of 1896. It will also appear every week in PEARSON'S WEEKLY and THE STORY TELLER during the same period.

WHAT TO DO.

Procure as many of these coupons as you possibly can. Once you get them keep them. A good way would be to paste them on to slips of paper. A better way would be to paste them neatly into a book. However, the main thing is to get and to keep them.

WHY YOU SHOULD DO IT.

Because we are going to give the person who collects the most coupons during the year 1896 the sum of ONE HUNDRED POUNDS, and if you do not want this money for yourself you can nominate someone to whom it would be useful. Perhaps you have a poor relation; perhaps you know some deserving charity; perhaps you know some poor crippled child or bedridden old man or woman, to whom the money would be a Godsend.

It need not cost you anything beyond a little trouble to earn this money for them. All you need do is to induce the people who read SHORT STORIES, THE STORY TELLER, and PEARSON'S WEEKLY, to give you the coupons from their papers. If amongst your friends there are not many who read these three papers, then worry them until they do read them. Explain the reason; and don't be put off with promises that may never be fulfilled. Buy the papers for them; collect the money and the coupons at the same time.

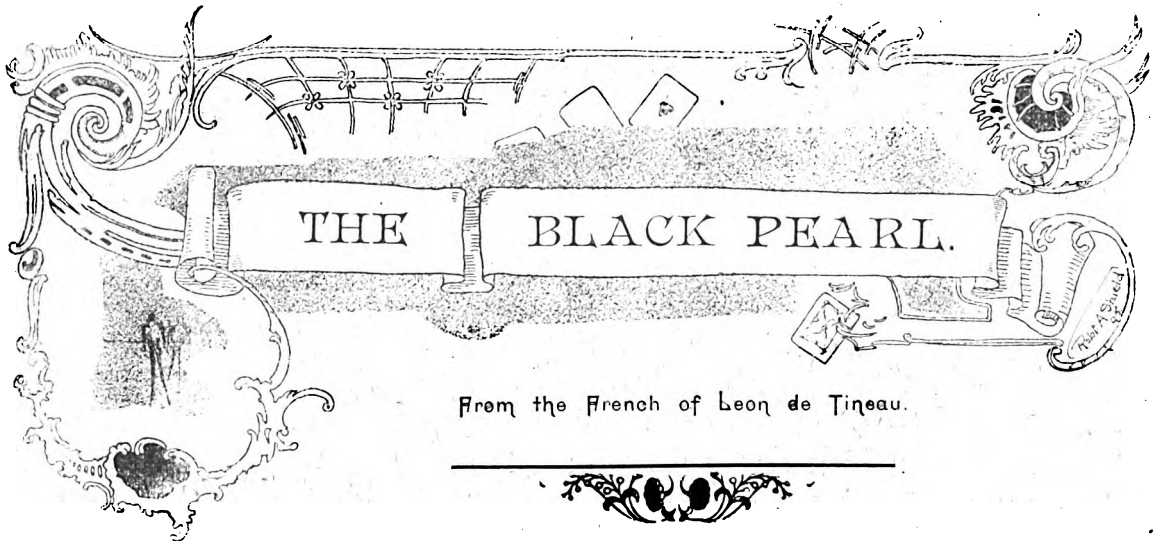
If you go the right way to work about it, it will not be difficult to induce people to read such interesting papers as SHORT STORIES, THE STORY TELLER, and PEARSON'S WEEKLY undoubtedly are.

ONE HUNDRED POUNDS is a big sum to earn for, say, an hour's work a week, fifty-two hours in the year, six working days at eight and a half hours a day.

£100 FOR A WEEK'S WORK!

No coupons are to be sent to us until January 1st, 1897. Keep them safely till then. All coupons are of equal value.

Digitized by Google



THE BLACK PEARL.

From the French of Leon de Tinseau.

WHEN Parisians about the end of August talk of the "insufficiency of water in the capital," they amuse me. At Aden, on the Red Sea, a city of sixty thousand inhabitants, built on a promontory of lava, you could not, for all the gold of the Indies, find a blade of grass, a salad leaf, or a drop of water.

"But what becomes of the water which falls when it rains?" I asked my friend Pujol, the French Consul, who did the honours one day when I passed through Aden, on my way from China.

"When it rains the public cisterns fill themselves. But it is five years already since the natives have seen even a cloud in the sky."

"Then where did the water at our breakfast table this morning come from?"

"Oh, that came from the factory! The English distil the sea and sell to us an absolutely pure article imitated from Nature. The only objection to the artificial article is its ruinous cost. My water bill amounts to over a hundred francs a month; this, of course, includes my wife's baths, for she abhors salt water."

"Gracious! How then do the poor Arabs get along? They don't seem to have sixty louis a year to spend on their drink."

"They are satisfied with the water that the camels bring every day from the hills yonder, twenty-eight kilometres from here."

I jotted these facts down in my note-book, and we returned to the Consulate, where we were awaited by Madame Pujol, a pretty Marseillaise, whom I had met for the first time that morning. My friend had only lately married, and his wife was not in love with Aden. We talked of the country and its social resources. Madame Pujol told me with a sigh that her visiting list contained but two names—an old English woman, who could not speak two words of French, and the proprietress of the Hotel de l'Univers, a strapping French woman, more accustomed to haggle with Arabian merchants than to talk to a refined compatriot.

As I was pitying her dreary existence, Pujol exclaimed: "Now, my dear, don't dissimulate. Why do you hide the fact that you have an admirer in the Arabian quarter?"

The lady looked annoyed, and shrugged her shoulders.

"An admirer as black as your hat!" she exclaimed.

"Very black, but very handsome," insisted Pujol. "That makes a difference! And immensely rich—the wealthiest coffee merchant in Aden! That means the principal merchant of Mocha coffee. I will take you to see him to-morrow. You will be astonished at his luxurious way of living. He revels in costly carpets and ornaments. His house is a veritable bazaar. My wife spends hours there, and, if I didn't object, this excellent Mouloud would offer her all the treasures of his home, under pretext that its ornaments please the 'lady'."

"How you exaggerate!" said Madame Pujol, more and more vexed. "Don't believe that I make an intimate companion of this negro. Certainly I haven't been there for a fortnight."

"My wife is a little out of sorts," apologetically said the Consul, "because this morning she lost a valuable jewel."

"Indeed, I am inconsolable," she added. "I have vainly sought all day for a black pearl out of my ear-ring that my husband bought for me at Ceylon. By examining its mate you can judge of their beauty and value."

Closely looking at the ear-ring, I noticed Madame Pujol's well-shaped ear and the delicate perfume that emanated from her person. Soon after I went for a siesta on the roof of the house, according to the custom of the country.

The next day my friend and I went to the native quarters to visit "Madame Pujol's admirer." We were accompanied on our visit by a co-passenger and compatriot who was just finishing his tour round the world. He was what you call a savant, always taking notes, copying inscriptions, and addressing articles to the "Academy," whose correspondent he claimed to be. Mouloud ben Said, who speaks English like a city merchant, and who is a superb specimen of the Arab race, received us splendidly. Not only did he do the honours of his shop, but, what was still more interesting to us, of his home as well.

Towards the end of our visit we were served with coffee—that is to say, an odorous beverage resembling our product about as much as champagne does ginger ale, and which was accompanied by the inevitable chibouk and the pitcher of fresh water.

Digitized by Google

Water which has come seven leagues on a camel's back in leather bottles is not tempting, but I was parched with thirst, and, besides, I had tasted worse things in the rice plantations of lower China. Strange! This water had no taste of leather. Far from it. It was not perfectly limpid, but its taste was decidedly agreeable. It smelt—yes, it did smell of violets. Violets in the heart of Abyssinia! How strange!

The savant had made the same discovery as I had, for after having smelled, tasted, and swallowed, he asked me in academic tone: "Do you not notice a peculiar flavour about this water?"

"Yes," I answered, "that of violets."

"Exactly. Well, my dear sir, let me tell you that amid some of the coal strata in the earth there are certain products whose odour is analogous to that of the flower in question. Perfumers even used it to adulterate their extracts. I conclude that this water has come in contact with just such strata. A coal mine at Aden, sir. Think of it! Can you imagine such a stroke of luck? The smallest bit of coal burnt here comes from England."

Hereupon the savant deluged our host with questions as to the exact location of the spring whence the camels brought their daily load. He would have gone there immediately, notwithstanding the distance, but his steamer was to sail that night. He wanted at least to bottle a sample of this fragrant water to have it analysed at the Mining School. What astonished me most was to see the visible embarrassment that our discovery caused Mouloud ben Said.

Just before leaving I poured myself another tumbler of water, when I heard in my glass the click of a hard substance, and to my surprise found this to be a black pearl, the mate of the one which Madame Pujol had shown me the day before, and, now that I came to think of it, I recognised the perfume. How ridiculous this savant with his coal theory appeared to me, and my poor friend Pujol! What could I do? The superb Mouloud was watching me in a way I did not fancy, and the presence of the husband, the principally interested party, hampered me considerably in my investigation. I sadly thought that consular inviolability, though written in the laws of men, was evidently unknown to Arabs at Aden.

Whilst the savant was corking his bottle, I, under the pretext of pouring some water on my hands, succeeded without detection in obtaining possession of the pearl. I was determined to save something for Pujol. As we left the Arab's house, the mineralogist went immediately to the dock. I necessarily had to go to the Consulate to restore the pearl to madame. Luckily, Pujol let me return alone, as business with the captain called him on board the steamer.

"Before making my adieu, madame," I said in rather severe, yet calm tones, "permit me to restore to you this pearl."

She gave a cry of joy. "My pearl! How lucky! Where did you find it?"

"At Mouloud ben Said's," I answered, emphasising each syllable. "I found it there a short time ago. Thank goodness Pujol is ignorant of my discovery."

And as she looked at me with wide-open, astonished eyes. "I know nothing more," I continued with dignity, "and I want to know nothing. Useless to add, I shall act like a gentleman, and will speak to no one of this sad affair. Good-bye, madame!" I left the room almost without touching her hand, but showing all my indignation in a last look. I wanted her to know that at least she had not deceived me. I found my friend on board, and embraced him with an effusiveness that astonished him. Poor Pujol! An hour later I carried my secret far from Aden.

The other day I met Pujol and his wife on the boulevard. They seemed more tenderly attached than ever; the two black pearls again adorned the young woman's ears. We all dined together, and naturally talked about Aden.

"By-the-way," said the Consul, "you taxed our imaginations for a week by your lucky find at Mouloud's. Weren't you rather puzzled yourself?"

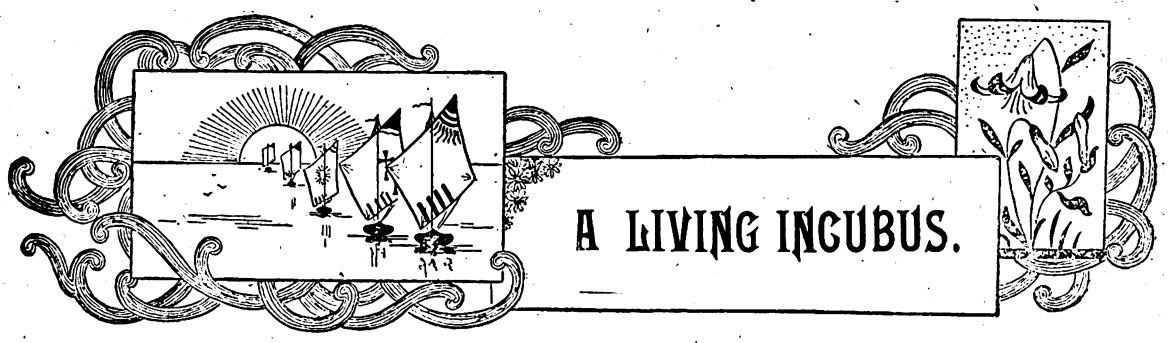
Just then I was more embarrassed than puzzled, and I muttered an answer that had neither rhyme nor reason.

"We found out, a week after your departure," explained Pujol, "that my servant had invented a singular plan to increase his perquisites. He resold to the Arabs the water which my wife used for her baths. We think the pearl must have fallen into the bath-tub and thus was taken to Mouloud ben Said's. How did you find it?"

"Parbleu! I came near swallowing it!" I exclaimed, glancing at the blushing Madame Pujol.

That did not prevent our savant's full account of the undiscovered coal pits of Aden from being read at the Academy of Sciences.

Digitized by Google



A LIVING INCUBUS.

WE were sitting smoking our cigars; my old friend the Doctor and I, in a bay window facing the sea, which was only divided from the house by the intervening roadway and a stout wall. My host had been telling me (and it was not difficult to believe him) that when the wind was on the land, and there was a big sea running, it was often practically impossible to proceed along the roadway in front of his house, or if anyone attempted to do so, they would be half drowned.

On this particular evening, however, the sea was in one of its quiescent moods and the suggestion that we should change and go for a row for an hour was unanimously agreed upon.

In a few minutes we were in a nice light rowing boat not so light and cockleshell-like in construction as those I had been used to on the Thames. but not sufficiently heavy to make rowing at all laborious, and roomy enough to accommodate a party of four or five persons. The tide was running out, which at this particular part of the coast means parallel with the land, and the strength of the current was sufficient to carry us along with a stroke of the oars now and then.

Gradually we drifted into a little cove to the westward of the town, which in days gone by had been a noted place for smuggling, and I asked the Doctor if he had ever seen anything of it.

I gave him a cigar, and he subsided into my special arm-chair.

"No," he replied, "there was, I believe, 'a run' in this very cove a few years after I came here, but it has been discontinued for a great many years past. Do you see that wooden fencing at the top of the cliff to our right?"

"Yes; what of it?"

"Only this, that soon after I came here I very nearly lost my life at that spot, and after a good deal of trouble I induced the local authorities to erect a fence there."

"It looks a dangerous spot, certainly. How did it happen? Did you become dizzy or miss your footing?"

"Missed my footing, and if it had not been for the assistance of a man whose very presence had become a nightmare to my existence, I should most certainly have been dashed to pieces. If you like to take the oars and paddle back slowly—the tide has just turned, I see—I will tell you all about it."

We changed our positions in the boat and the Doctor began:

"It was just such another evening as this, I remember, and I was sitting at the open window of my house—not the present one, but one farther away from the centre of the town, and opposite what was then a small wooden jetty—when I saw a stranger walking aimlessly up and down. Something in the man's movements gave me the impression—I cannot say why—that he contemplated committing suicide, and I made up my mind to watch him.

"I had not long to wait, for after making two or three journeys from one end of the jetty to the other, on reaching the extreme end he either intentionally, or from a sudden feeling of faintness, lurched heavily from side to side, and in so doing overbalanced himself and fell into the water.

"I am, as you know, a good swimmer, and throwing my coat off as I went along, I was soon at the spot where he had disappeared, and plunged in. I could see nothing of him, but by diving where I judged he had gone down, was lucky enough to find him at the first attempt. I brought him to the surface, and had no difficulty in keeping him afloat until we were both picked up by a boatman who had seen me jump into the sea and lost no time in rowing out to discover what was wrong.

"The man, who had the appearance of a broken-down gentleman, apparently about thirty-five years of age, was quite unconscious, and my house being the nearer, the boatman and I between us carried him in, quickly removed his clothes, and by prompt measures soon succeeded in bringing him round.

"After a while I endeavoured to elicit who he was and where he came from, but his mind seemed to be a perfect blank, and so far as I could make out, he was totally unaware of the danger he had recently passed through. To my various questions he returned monosyllabic replies, and thinking he might be better after a good meal, I asked him to join me at dinner, an invitation which he accepted as if it were quite a matter of course, and not only did excellent justice to the good things my housekeeper had provided, but after dinner asked me (it was the first request he had made) if I had any cigars.

Digitized by Google

"I gave him one, and having subsided into my special arm-chair and made himself as much at home as if he had known me all his life—for the first time since we had been brought into such strange contact—a look of satisfied contentment was apparent on his face, as if he had at last found what he had been longing for.

"I am, as you know, fond of a good cigar, and those in question were particularly fine.

"The evening wore on, one cigar was followed by another, without a word being spoken between us, and I not unnaturally began to wonder as to how I was to induce him to take his departure.

"'I don't know whether you are staying in the town,' I remarked at last, 'or——'

"'I only arrived to-day, but I suppose I must stay on now; at least, you have decided that I must.'

"'I, my good fellow; what do you mean?'

"He looked at me in a dreamy way.

"'Why, I belong to you, don't I? You saved my life; you would not have done that if you had not wanted it; I had no further use for it, and intended, as I dare say you realised, to throw it away. You, for some reason best known to yourself, took possession of it. It must have been a close thing though, I fancy; I don't remember anything after the water went over me.'

"'My good man, I only did what any man would have done under the circumstances. You were in danger of being drowned; I am an expert swimmer—there was no danger to me in fishing you out—and——'

"'I don't think you quite realise the position,' he interposed. 'I did not ask you to fish me out; all I wanted was to rid myself of what is no earthly use to me—my life. Practically speaking, I threw it away—at least, I intended to. You picked it up; it is yours; you have the advantage; henceforth you have two lives—mine and your own. I relinquish all claim to it. I transfer my identity and the attendant responsibilities in the way of providing the necessary supply of food and clothing to you.'

"'You must be mad, surely!' I replied.

"'I think not; but, as a doctor, you should know best.'

"'Well, supposing I had not pulled you out, what then?'

"'Ah, but you did,' he said, with a chuckle. 'and you must have wanted my life to save it as you did.'

"'Good Heavens, man, don't you understand? I saved you from yourself; saved your life in order that I might give it back to you to make a better use of it in the future, I hope.' I said this in what I meant to be an impressive manner, but he was not by any means awed, unfortunately.

"'I didn't want my life given back; it is no good to me, and as you have taken it you must do what you like with it.'

"'Ha!' I said, 'you admit that?'

"'I do.'

"'Then if your life belongs to me absolutely, I can do what I like with it, without consulting you at all?'

"'That is my contention.'

"'Then'—in an exultant tone—'you can't swim; what is to stop me from pushing you into the sea and letting you drown as you want to?'

"'People would call that murder, wouldn't they?' he said quietly.

"'What about suicide, then?'

"'There is, I think you will admit, a distinction between the two.'

"'Confound you, what do you want?'

"'Nothing!'

"'Nothing?'

"'Not so far as I am concerned; for, as I have endeavoured to explain to you, I as an individual have ceased to exist, my individuality having become merged in yourself. Is it not nearly time we went to bed?'

"'You don't mean to say——'

"'Oh, no; any sort of a shakedown will do for me. I should like a glass of whiskey before I go, if you don't mind.'

"I complied with his request, and then rang the bell for my servant to show him his room.

"'At what time do you take breakfast, sir?' He was annoyingly humble all the time, I may remark.

"'Nine o'clock,' I replied, 'but it may be earlier to-morrow, as I have to go to London for the day.'

"'Will you require my attendance, sir?'

"The request was made in such a tone of quiet assurance that I felt myself powerless to make a suitable reply. After pausing awhile, he quietly withdrew.

"After he had gone, I sat down to think the thing out, but do what I would, I could not arrive at any satisfactory conclusion. Nobody would believe me if I told them the facts of the case.

"The next morning my self-imposed guest was down to breakfast before me, and greeted me quite cordially as I entered the room.

"During the meal neither of us spoke, but at its conclusion I announced that I was going to London for the day, and if on my return I found he had not gone, I should call in the police to remove him.

"'You are, of course, at liberty to do as you think fit; but you yourself brought me here, and as I have already explained. here I am compelled to remain. I am helpless in the matter. Should the officers of the law remove me, I shall consider it my duty to resume my proper position at the earliest possible opportunity.

"'And what do you consider your proper position, may I ask?'

"'To place myself unreservedly at your disposal; I, or what was I, belong to you as I have already said. It seems useless to repeat the fact.'

"'My train is nearly due,' I replied, 'as I hastily prepared to go; but, mind you, if I find you here on my return I shall give you into custody.'

"To this threat he made no audible reply, but I fancied I could detect a grim chuckle of satisfaction. To give him a chance, I prolonged my stay in London for upwards of a week, but to my surprise on my return he was still in possession of the place, and he had, so my housekeeper informed me, been making himself very much at home indeed.

"'He don't do nothing, sir, but eat and drink and sleep. He had his dinner just now, and directly after lay down on the sofa and went to sleep, and you will find him there now, I expect.'

"I looked into the dining-room, and there sure enough he was, snoring placidly.

"'This must be put a stop to, somehow,' I said to myself, and started off for a walk along the cliffs we saw just now to think things out.

"I halted when I got to the summit of the cliff where the fence is now; there was no fence there then, and taking off my hat I let the wind blow on my heated face.

Digitized by Google

"'I would not stand so near the edge if I were you,' said a voice behind me. I looked round; there he was.

"'Am I never to be free of your hated presence?' I exclaimed furiously.

"'That is for you to decide,' he said calmly.

"'Then jump over the cliff and have done with it,' I shouted, without thinking what I was saying.

"Without a moment's hesitation he advanced to the edge, and in another instant would have done my bidding. Frantically I clutched him by the arm and drew him back. I could not be a murderer. He made no more resistance than he had done when I pulled him out of the sea.

"I put down twenty sovereigns on the table."

"In attempting to save him my foot slipped, and I felt that I, and not he, was in imminent danger of being dashed to pieces on the shingle below; as it was I fell over the edge of the cliff in its most precipitous part, and only the fact of my right hand coming in contact with a small shrub to which I clung with the tenacity of a drowning man clutching at a straw, saved me from a horrible death.

"The man whose life but a week before I had saved at risk of my own, stood above me looking on unmoved.

"'Give me your hand, for Heaven's sake!'

"In an instant he rose to the occasion, and with a presence of mind for which I should never have given him credit, lay down flat on the grass, and having obtained a good foothold by placing his feet behind the stem of a bush, stretched out his right hand, which I just managed to reach with my left, and then with a strenuous and almost superhuman effort rescued me from my perilous position.

"I must have fainted away I suppose, for the next thing I remember was finding myself a good way from the edge of the cliff, with my companion standing close by.

"'That was a near thing,' he said, in his habitual quiet tone of voice.

"'It was indeed; and I shall ever be grateful to you for having saved my life.'

"'Yes, I saved your life that time, I think.'

"'You did, indeed, and by Jove, that makes us quits, you know.'

"'Well, not exactly. You see you didn't want to throw your life away, and I did; still, I suppose as I saved yours it belongs to me, as mine does to you.'

"'Well, I don't want yours, and you don't want mine; let's exchange.'

"'But consider the difference in value yours is—'

"'Don't let that stand in your way. What do you say? Will a tenner equalise the matter?'

"'Make it twenty pounds and it's a bargain.'

"'Come back with me, and you shall have it at once,' I said, feverishly anxious to get the thing settled so easily."

"And did you?" I asked, as my host paused.

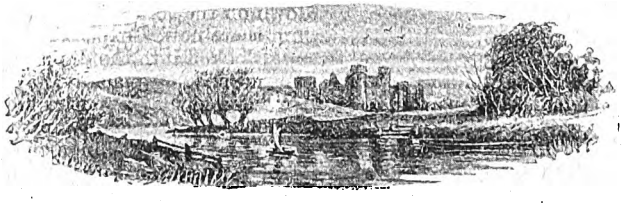
"I am pleased to say I did. On the way back neither of us spoke a word, but when I put down twenty sovereigns on the table—he liked gold better than a cheque, he said—he heaved a sigh of regret, and remarked in his quiet way, as he picked up the money: 'You have restored me my identity, sir, but believe me, I would willingly have allowed things to remain as they were, the quiet and repose of your hospitable establishment have been very pleasing to one whose lines have not been cast in altogether pleasant places of late. Let us hope there is a brighter future in store.'"

* * * * *

"And did you ever see him again?"

"No; and I hope I never may. A week was quite long enough."

S. J. F. Newbery.



Digitized by Google

IN THE DAYS OF SHAKESPEARE.

THE Thames three centuries ago had characteristics essentially differing from those that distinguish it in the present day. Gone are the palaces and gardens which from Whitefriars to Westminster adorned its banks; the six-oared canopied barge has given place to the smoky steamboat; in fact, everything has succumbed to the march of triumphant utility.

Things were not always so. As still, on the waters that wash the marble palaces of sea-born Venice, music nightly sounds, and love breathes his sigh, so, in the good old times that shall never come again, did the gallant, gliding over the unpolluted stream, woo his mistress.

The particular gallant whom we are about to describe, though on terms of familiar greeting with Essex, Raleigh, and the choice wits of the day, did not belong to the aristocratic class; yet on his person and bearing Nature's nobility was stamped. A conical hat with a single feather adorned his head, his doublet was slashed and of the finest broadcloth, his ruffles were of rich Flanders lace, and the hilt of his straight sword, a present from the Queen, was set with rubies. And this was the deerstalker of Stratford-on-Avon—Shakespeare.

The great dramatist was in the summer of his days. Love for an object, warm, breathing, living, had kindled its fires in his heart; to this lovely incarnation of all his poetic dreaming did Shakespeare, on the night in question, urge his wherry down the Thames.

Jessy was a daughter of the despised people who regard Abraham as their great progenitor. Her father was an usurer, and hung out his sign on the Old London Bridge. It was just above the third arch from the City side.

There were but two things in the world dear unto him—his money and his daughter. From her extreme loveliness Jessy had obtained the sobriquet of the "Beauty of London Bridge." Many of the illustrious of her tribe had sought her hand in marriage, but Jessy was deaf to each splendid overture.

Shakespeare's wherry glided on, and in a few minutes, having entered the deep shadow of the arch, he landed on the wide projecting starling. Jessy's sleeping apartment was far above; but the girl, unknown to her father, had the key of a lower chamber which opened on a small balcony; and thence, by means of a short ladder, she let herself down into the arms of her enamoured poet.

Shakespeare resigned his sculls to his attendant. The beautiful Jewess was wrapped in a velvet mantle trimmed with minever. Her large, dark, passionate eyes were now raised to the heavens, spangled with stars, and now fixed in melting tenderness on him who sat by her side. And thus they glided on.

"If thou dost love me," said Shakespeare, pressing the maiden's hand, "thou wilt never again enter the habitation of one who, harsh, bigoted, and cruel, is unworthy to call thee daughter. Flee with me this night! I will protect thee against a thousand fathers. This bosom shall be thy honour; thy love shall be my paradise."

"Not yet," said the girl timidly.

The moon had nearly set and a deep gloom was falling over the river. Jessy was anxious to return, and the wherry shot back to the bridge. As they approached, Shakespeare perceived the figure of a man standing on the broad starling beneath the Jew's residence.

"It is only a waterman, love; there, he is gone."

Jessy trembled, but the man had indeed disappeared round the buttress, giving them reason to believe that he was no other than the individual named. The beautiful Jewess was lifted by Shakespeare out of the wherry.

"Farewell, love! Forget me not," whispered the poet of Avon. At that instant Shakespeare started, for he felt his arm seized and compressed as in a vice by a sinewy hand, while words were hissed in his ear.

"Christian! dog! hound! Have I found thee?"

By a violent effort he flung the human viper from him, and as the setting moon shed a glimmering ray through the granite arch he recognised the father of his Jessy. The Jew waved his hand.

"Begone! thou disgrace to thy tribe! Thou reproach to thy father! Or I shall slay thee!"

The girl, shuddering and overawed, crept up to the little balcony, and in a few moments disappeared. The Jew seemed suddenly to have formed a resolution, and dashed forward, exclaiming:

"Unbeliever! contemner of the law of Moses! oppressor of our race! it will be no crime to send thee whither thou wouldst but go at last!"

"Old man, I woo thy daughter honourably."

"Son of Belial! Even thine honourable love would be infamy!"

With the quickness of thought he mounted to the balcony that projected over the starling and drew the ladder, by which he had ascended, after him. Shakespeare, although he divined not what the Hebrew's motive might be, waited the result of his action with anxiety. Presently he heard a faint cry like a supplication for mercy; then a shriek broke out on the stillness of the night. The father and daughter appeared at the topmost window which overlooked the Thames.

"Curses on thee and thy paramour!" exclaimed the Hebrew, dragging forward his struggling child. "Thou shalt not live to bring this disgrace on my name."

She fell. The Jew's flashing eyes marked his child sinking to the rushing waters far beneath; a fiendish exultation lit up his countenance, and he smoothed his beard and laughed. Shakespeare was filled with horror at what he had witnessed; he plunged into the stream to the rescue, but the tide which was flowing so rapidly had carried her throughthe arch. She floated now at a distance—sank again—the agonised swimmer reached her at length, and succeeded in placing her in his boat.

In desperation he conveyed her to the house of a medical man on the bankside; but every effort to effect resuscitation proved abortive: the light of life was quenched.

The bard knelt at the tomb of the once lovely Jewess. His poetic fancy heard her gentle voice in every passing wind, and the flowers that decked the turf seemed to breathe the perfume of her sign. In after time, when grief for her whom he had loved softened into a hallowed worship, he embalmed her memory in imperishable verse. The Jessy of Old London Bridge is the sweet Jessica in the Merchant of Venice and her diabolical father, unrelenting Shylock.

LE VIER.

Digitized by Google

By PAUL ROPER.

AN INSOLUBLE MYSTERY

ABOUT seventy years ago a young man of strong physique and prepossessing appearance arrived at New Orleans. He had come from New York, of which city he was a native, and had brought with him a considerable sum of money, supplemented by a letter of introduction to Judge Favart de Caumartin, who was then at the flood-tide of his fame.

Hepworth Coleman was rich, and what was perhaps a greater misfortune, he had no living kinsfolk for whom he cared or who cared for him. Practically speaking, he was alone in the world; moreover, he had an imagination. Scott's novels, Byron's poetry, the French romances, and I know not what else of the sort, had been his chief reading. For physical recreation he had turned to fencing and pistol practice. When I add that he was but twenty-two and unmarried, the rest may be guessed. Healthy, vigorous, full of spirit, he nevertheless had sentimental longings, as indefinite as they were persistent.

If it seems strange that he should have been attracted to New Orleans rather than to the Old World, we must remember what New Orleans was in 1820. No other city, not even Paris, could at that time compare with it as a centre of genuine romance. Nor was this romance unmixed with lawlessness of the most picturesque kind. Money poured into it from a hundred sources more or less illegitimate, beside the streams of wealth produced by cotton, sugar, and rice industries.

Hepworth Coleman had heard much of the gay city, of its warm, odorous atmosphere, its hospitality, its social charm, the smack of restless romance in all its ways. Somehow the desire to go there took hold of his imagination, and he went.

The letter to Judge Favart de Caumartin was given to Coleman by his banker, who, in handing it to him said:

"I don't know the judge personally, never saw him; but he has done a lot of business through us. He is very rich, evidently very influential, and certainly will be of use to you. I feel that I can take the liberty of sending you to him, because—well, he is under many obligations to the bank, and is likely to want many more large favours. I fancy that you'll find him a trifle eccentric, but enthusiastically hospitable. A creole of the creoles, I judge him to be, and a representative of the nabobs."

Young Coleman considered himself lucky to carry with him a document that would give him introduction to a person so renowned as Judge Favart de Caumartin, of whom he had been recently reading a good deal, owing to a duel fought between the judge and one Colonel Sam Smith, of the United States army, in which the latter had been killed. The duel had brought out history, from which it appeared that Judge Favart de Caumartin had fought before, not once only, but many times, and always to the death of his antagonist.

Along with these facts were disclosed numerous picturesque details of the judge's past life, with more than hints that in his young days he had been a pirate or something of the sort. The account also made the most of his wealth, his almost reckless liberality, his eccentricity, and, most of all, the air of mystery which still hung over his business operations.

All this was rich food for an imagination already thoroughly saturated with the spirit of romantic adventure, and during the voyage from New York to New Orleans, Hepworth Coleman found deep satisfaction in anticipating what he felt was in store for him. In every fibre of his frame he felt the assurance that he was on his way to new and strange experiences.

His banker had sent a letter to precede his arrival by a few days, asking a friend to secure suitable apartments for "Mr. Hepworth Coleman, gentleman," the consequence being that a dark young man, small, but well built and handsome, met him at the landing stage to conduct him to his suite of elegant rooms in Royal Street.

"Is you Meestu Coleman, sah?" inquired this young stranger in a musical tone of voice. "I look fo' zat ma' at Prayson."

"Yes, sir, that is my name," said Coleman briskly, at the same time showing by his look that he would like to know whom he was meeting.

"Varee glad you come, Meestu Coleman; varee glad, sah, indeed. Got your rooms all prepare fo' you, sah. Yes, sah, zey is beautiful and sharming rooms."

"Thank you; I am much indebted. Are you the gentleman to whom Mr. Cartwright, the banker, wrote in my behalf?"

"Nah, sah; not any banker write to me. I been tole to meet you at zis place at Prayson. Happy to see you, Meestu Coleman; varee happy."

There was a carriage at hand waiting for our friend. A negro driver in livery, and a small black footman stood by.

Digitized by Google

Coleman entered the vehicle, followed closely by the young creole who had met him on the landing. He saw his baggage hoisted into a little waggon to come after the carriage.

For some reason not exactly explainable, this whole proceeding affected Coleman peculiarly. He felt a sort of vague uneasiness, as if he were passing into an air of mystery, if not of danger.

As he was whirled through the narrow streets he caught glimpses of queer tile-covered houses, with curious hanging galleries: high walls and gloomy courts flanked these, and here and there a dusky palm or a bright orange tree flung up its foliage. Blooming magnolia clumps filled the air with a heavy, languid odour.

But what most attracted the attention of Coleman was a company of four or five young men, dressed like dandies, swaggering along on one of the pavements, and singing a drinking song at the top of their voices. One of these hilarious fellows made a lasting impression on our young friend's imagination. He was a tall, olive-skinned, handsome man, apparently about twenty-five, strikingly dressed in a plaid coat, a vest of red and black velvet, grey trousers, and a profusely ruffled shirt.

Evidently he was the leading spirit of the party. At all events he was somewhat in front, with his black cap set well back on his shapely head, while his jet-black hair fell in shining curls over his strong shoulders. He was shouting forth the French drinking-carol in a voice as sweet as it was loud, and at the same time waving in the air a small cane. The entire group looked the worse for wine, their faces flushed and their eyes brilliant.

"Varee glad you come, Meestu Coleman."

"Who is that strange looking man in front?" inquired Coleman of his creole companion, as they passed them by.

"Zat ge'man ees ze Juge Favart de Caumartin," was the answer that fairly startled the interrogator.

Coleman actually grew red in the face and exclaimed: "That Judge Favart de Caumartin! Surely, sir, you are mistaken?"

"Beg pahdon, sah, zat ees Monsieur Juge Favart de Caumartin. I him know varee well myself at Prayson."

Coleman turned and stared back through the window at the strutting youthful figure leading the noisy rout.

How could that be the celebrated duellist, the mysterious pirate?

"It cannot be he," he muttered aloud. It is impossible."

"Varee well, Meestu Coleman," said the young creole drily; "but I mus' inqui' yo' pahdon, sah. Monsieur le Juge Favart de Caumartin ees to me well acquainted. I weemark to you, sar, zat zare ees not any mistake."

The leading spirit of the party.

"Oh, certainly, sir, I beg a thousand pardons!" exclaimed Coleman pulling himself together and seeing his breach of etiquette. "Of course you are right, but I was so surprised to see the judge looking so young. I had supposed that he was an aged man. I am astonished."

"Oh, Monsieur le Juge ees not so varee young—not so varee—hees hair not much grey."

While they were still discussing this matter the carriage stopped in front of a square, heavy-looking house, which, painted a dull red and projecting its upper gallery over the pavement, flung out on either side a heavy brick wall, on whose top was a jagged dressing of broken bottles and jugs. It looked more like a convent than a lodging-house.

Hepworth Coleman found his suite of rooms admirable in every respect; large, airy, luxuriously furnished. His creole conductor parted with him at the door without any explanation whatever of his connection with the matter of these elegant apartments or with making his arrival easy and pleasant.

Some silent and obsequious negro servants were at hand to do his bidding; but he soon dismissed them, while he flung himself upon a sofa and lit his pipe. Altogether incomprehensible to him were the suggestions of secrecy and mystery connected with his reception; scarcely less so was the youthful—nay, boyish—appearance of Judge Favart de Caumartin.

As if the mysterious atmosphere meant to continue growing denser, it was while he lay on the luxurious scarlet sofa, smoking, resting, and meditating, that a beautiful girl came and stood for a moment in the doorway of his chamber. She blushed sweetly at the sight of him, recoiled violently, and then slipped swiftly away, leaving behind her a rustle of fine stuff, a sparkle of rare jewels, and a lingering bouquet of violets and roses.

Coleman felt the delicious shock of her magnetic beauty thrill through him. A sort of shimmering outline of her form wavered, or appeared to waver, in the door after she had gone, so dazzling had been the effect of her fresh, pure, flower-like, yet intensely human beauty. He heard her feet tap swiftly and lightly along the hall. Involuntarily and with unpardonable curiosity, he sprang up, and hurrying to the door looked out; but she was not in sight. For the first time in his life he felt his heart beating unnaturally.

Digitized by Google

Evening was drawing on, sending a soft twilight into the room, when Coleman's dinner was brought in by a shy and silent old coloured woman.

The moon was shining brightly when Coleman went forth for a short walk in the street. Not many people were abroad, it being the dinner hour; but certain cafés were crowded with men and women who were drinking champagne and discussing the dishes on well-spread tables.

At the door of one of these gorgeous rooms Coleman met the young man whom a few hours before he had seen leading the rout of singers in the street. It occurred to him that now was as good as any time to present his letter to the judge, so he forthwith stepped near him, and said, lifting his hat:

"I believe I have the honour of meeting Judge Favart de Caumartin."

The gentleman stared at him a moment very deliberately, then just a suspicion of a smile, and with a courteous dignity wholly inimitable and indescribable, doffed his queer little black cap as he spoke:

"And who does me the honour of addressing me?"

"I am Hepworth Coleman, of New York."

"Ah!"

"I hold a letter to you from Mr Phineas Cartwright, of the firm of Cartwright and Vanderveer, bankers."

"Indeed! I feel honoured."

Coleman produced the letter and tendered it, but not without a vague feeling of insecurity of some sort. He had not expected this peculiar reserve and caution on the part of the judge. Could it be that he was to be treated as an infliction to be borne for mere policy's sake? His distrust and doubt, however, were of short duration, for the judge had no sooner read the epistle, which was much longer than any mere letter of introduction, than his whole manner changed. He held out his hand.

"I am charmed, delighted, sir," he said with a slight creole accent that made his voice very pleasing. "I am proud to see you. I hope you find your rooms agreeable."

Coleman clasped his hand and felt that measure of relief which comes when one is suddenly lifted out of a very awkward situation.

The judge read the banker's letter over again with great deliberation, and apparently with much concentration of mind, while Coleman, who could not remove his eyes from his fascinating dark face, stood waiting for the opportunity to say:

"You do me infinite honour, judge, in quartering me in your own house. I had not expected, and could not expect, such hospitality."

The judge hesitated; then with a calm smile remarked that whatever he could do for so distinguished a visitor would be but a small expression of the greater hospitality that he would like to bestow were he able.

"And now," he presently continued, "come with me to my own private apartments, where we can have some quiet conversation and a smoke."

Coleman could not fail to see that the judge was still somewhat touched with wine, though the mood of wild hilarity had passed off.

They passed along the street until they reached a narrow blind alley, into which the moonlight fell but dimly between dusky walls.

To Coleman's surprise, the judge led the way into this, then up winding and rather rickety stairs to a dark hall, along which they passed for what seemed a great distance. At the end the judge fumbled for some time, and by some means opened a low, heavy door leading into a room that reeked with the odour of tobacco and the fumes of wine.

Passing across this by the light of a dim dormer window they reached a close passage-way which led them to another prison-like door which the judge managed to open after a great deal of trouble.

The room that they now entered was exceedingly small a mere cell in extent, as Coleman felt rather than saw, the walls, dam and grimy, being almost within reach on either hand.

A beautiful girl came and stood for a moment in the door.

"Stand here for a moment, please," said the judge, touching Coleman's arm, "until I call a servant."

Then he stepped briskly back through the doorway and drew the solid shutter to with a clang. Some strange echoes went wandering away as if from distance to distance, above, below, around, followed by absolute silence.

Coleman stood amazed for a few moments before going to the door, which he found immovable. He groped round the wall only to discover that there was no other outlet.

Judge Favart de Caumartin's residence was a large, rambling structure, more like a hotel than like a private house. Considering that his wife was dead, and that he had but one living child, a daughter of seventeen, it was strange that he kept up such an extensive establishment, in which perhaps twenty rooms stood richly furnished but unoccupied. It was his pleasure, however, and his pleasure was law.

That evening in the library the judge told his daughter that he had given a suite of rooms in the farthest corner of the mansion to a wealthy young gentleman from New York.

"I have had letters from my friend Mr. Cartwright, my banker there, asking me to take care of him, and this seemed the best I could do under the circumstances. I did not see my way to bringing him any nearer to us. We don't care to have another member added to the family, eh, Olympe, dear?"

Mdlle. de Caumartin blushed; she may have felt a touch of guilt because she could not muster courage to tell her father that she had already seen Mr. Coleman.

Mdlle. Olympe sat for a moment on his knee and stroked his long black hair.

"You will stay with me to-night, father dear," she presently murmured coaxingly; "you will not go out to-night."

"I must be gone a little while," he said, rising at once, "but just a little while."

Digitized by Google

She clung close to him.

"Not this night, please," she urged, with a touching tremor in her voice. "Oh, you remember this night a year ago you had that dreadful adventure in the dark room. You must not go out; please, for my sake, do not."

An expert observer would have seen while this was going on a strange, half worried, almost fiercely-concentrated expression in the judge's eyes. It was as if he really wished to remain with his child, but could not by any effort resist some powerful temptation tugging at him and drawing him away.

He kissed her tenderly, pushed her gently from him, and went out.

The girl cast herself upon a sofa and buried her face in her hands, as a vision of that night one year before came up before her eyes.

Some strange masked men had brought her father home far in the night, white as a ghost, helpless, speechless, apparently dead. They put him down there in the room and vanished.

He had no wound, no bruise, no mark of any violence, but he recovered very slowly, and he never told what had befallen him.

A year had passed, and she might not have recalled the exact anniversary but for the prattle of an old servant, to the effect that she had seen her master, the judge, marching at the head of a company of masked men, himself wearing an "invisible" mask and a queer black velvet cap.

Mdlle. Olympe observed that her father was flushed, as if he had taken too freely of wine, and his bearing was indicative of some subtle and indescribable excitement within him. When he went away she felt that something startling was going to happen soon.

The girl cast herself upon a sofa.

* * * * *

When Hepworth Coleman suddenly found himself a prisoner in that close, dark room, he did not at first suspect any treachery on the part of Judge Favart de Caumartin. He expected that gentleman to return in the course of a few minutes: but this favourable impression was soon removed by certain startling events that crowded one upon another.

First, a low, rumbling, clanking sound, like the beating of metallic gongs in the distance, came through the walls and filled the cell; then as this died away to utter silence, he heard tumultuous whispering all round, above, below. The thousand voices all seemed to be saying the same thing, which presently he made out to be the words: "The Krewe is coming; make ready for the Krewe!" When the whispering ended little purple lights began to flash here and there, but so mysteriously did they twinkle that he could not locate them, and these were followed by phantom faces, wan, waxen, faintly luminous, appearing and fading instantly, succeeded by intense darkness.

Now, Hepworth Coleman was a man of iron nerve, an athlete in body and spirit, who, although full of romantic and poetic impulses, was in the depth of his heart as brave and steadfast as a lion; still, even the best courage has its moment of faltering, and just at the point when one whole wall of his cell was withdrawn, so that he stood in the full glare of twenty brilliant chandeliers that lighted a large, gorgeously-decorated hall, he felt the blood grow stiflingly heavy on his heart.

Before him stood a file of fantastic figures, men oddly clad and strangely armed, who clashed their brazen shields together and pointed their swords at his breast.

Coleman stood gazing while the file of armed men—perhaps platoon would be more correct—went through some silent but intricate evolutions, after beating their shields together and threatening him with their swords. When the movements were ended one of the maskers came up to him and struck him lightly with the flat of his weapon across the cheek, saying in a loud whisper:

"Beware! you are in imminent danger!"

Coleman took him at his word and instantly let go a blow from the shoulder. His close-set fist met the masker's jaw with a sound of crashing pasteboard, and down went the man outstretched at full length on the floor, his shield and sword giving forth a muffled clang as they crossed upon the soft carpet.

Quick as a cat Coleman leapt forward and picked up the sword, a beautiful rapier, and, assuming a defensive attitude, cried out boldly:

"Come one at a time and I will fight you all!"

The fantastic figures looked at one another with evident questioning, though not a word was said.

Meanwhile the fallen one scrambled to his feet and uttered two or three bitter French execrations. The leader rebuked him with gestures.

"Come one at a time you cowardly villains," repeated Coleman, "and I'll soon finish you all. Come on, the first one, if you dare meet a man!"

He was terribly angry, but his voice was steady and even.

There was a space of silence, then the leader said something to one of the men, who immediately cast aside his shield, and advanced with his rapier.

It was a short conflict. Coleman disarmed his antagonist with ease in less than a minute.

Another man came on and shared the same fate, with the addition of a prick through the wrist of the sword-arm.

This was exhilarating to Coleman in his exasperation at being made the butt of some mysterious trick.

Digitized by Google

"Come next," he cried, "I want the best of you—and the best is a coward. Come on!"

Evidently the mystic band now felt the gravity that the occasion was assuming. The maskers looked to their leader.

"Don't stand there afraid," sneered Coleman; "come and get your turn. Who's next?"

One after another responded, only to fare badly. As yet, however, all had escaped without deadly hurt, when the leader himself made ready to fight. Those who had come to grief were quietly cared for by others, and all seemed to treat the proceedings as by no means startling or even unusual.

When the leader threw aside his shield and took off his tall plume-covered hat, Coleman was able to recognise Judge Favart de Caumartin more by his form and bearing than by any disclosure of his features.

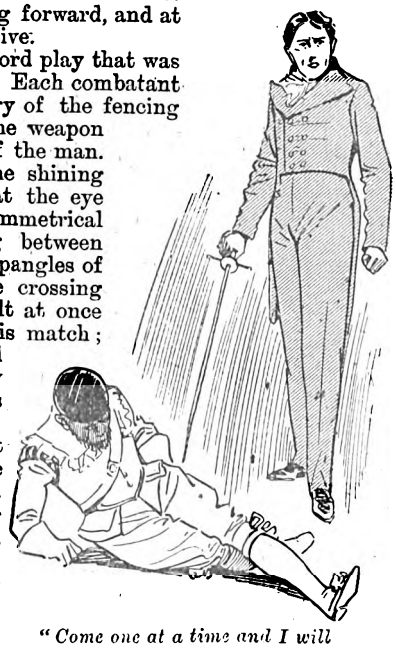
As the judge handled his rapier all the company of maskers, even the sorely wounded ones, came forward to look on with eager expectation. His was steel that never yet had failed to find the vitals of his opponent; but, on the other hand, there stood Coleman, steadfast and alert, the very picture of strength and will, the embodiness of quickness and certainty, his sword bearing at its point a tiny red clot of blood.

They looked with straining eyes, and did not feel sure of the result even with their captain as their champion.

"Come on, sir, and take your punishment, you cowardly leader of cowards!" exclaimed Coleman, in a most exasperating tone. "Don't stand their dreading it; pluck up a little nerve and come on!"

It is useless to say that Judge Favart de Caumartin needed no bullying of this sort to urge him into combat. With beautiful swiftness and grace he sprang forward, and at once took the offensive.

Then followed sword play that was amazing to look at. Each combatant showed that mastery of the fencing art which makes the weapon appear to be part of the man. So swiftly leapt the shining shafts of steel that the eye saw only fine symmetrical figures shimmering between the fighters, while spangles of fire leapt from the crossing edges. Coleman felt at once that he had met his match; the judge tingled with the discovery that here at last was a master.



"Come one at a time and I will fight you all."

From the first it was a fight to the death, if possible. Neither could hope to disarm the other, nor was there probability of any mere disablement ending the contest. The watchers, looking on in breathless suspense, heard with intensely straining ears the almost magically rapid clinking of the blades.

Coleman fought as if with the energy of all the accumulated romance of his recent experiences, half-recognising, as he parried, and thrust, and feinted, and recovered guard, the vivid picturesqueness, the melodramatic unreality, and yet the deadly intensity of the situation.

A fine glow of enthusiasm flashed, indeed, into his blood, and with it an excess of cunning, grace, and swift certainty of hand and eye.

All round him the vague spirit of dreamland seemed to hover, though the hideous pictures of skeletons and cadavers gleamed real enough in the glare of the chandeliers. What inspired him most, however, was the knowledge that he was trying his force with that of the greatest duellist in the world, and one that had always killed his man.

There was something more that gave spirit and courage to Coleman; he was, in some indirect way, remembering the beautiful girl who had appeared at the door of his room, and he half imagined that he was doing battle for the right to know more of her. Youth is a mystery in itself, and love knows no law of origin or of progress.

By some cerebral sleight, some trick of thinking under a thought, so to speak, Coleman was making a love dream keep time to the ringing strokes of his sword. A girl, whose name he did not know, whose voice he had never heard, was inspiring him as he strained every nerve.

As the combat proceeded the lookers-on saw that Coleman's play was new to the judge, who found great difficulty in meeting and parrying certain eccentric movements that invariably ended in a thrust of lightning quickness. Presently the judge tore off his mask with his left hand; he had to do this at the risk of his life, for he could not breathe freely with it on, but his great skill saved him even then; nay, more, it came near to giving him the victory. As Coleman lunged, the agile creole leapt aside and returned quickly with a wicked thrust that barely reached his adversary's breast, piercing it to the depth of half an inch.

Now the fight took on more of passion and less of grace, as if the men felt that it was to be a test of strength at last. Round and round, back and forth, this way and that, they leapt and recoiled and advanced, their faces—one dark and beautiful as a Southern night, the other fair and magnetic as a New England June day—fixed and staring, the white froth gathering on their lips.

When the end came it was like nothing ever before witnessed in a New Orleans duel. How it happened not one of the observers could tell, but the two men appeared to rush into each other's arms, and then it was seen that each had run the other through.

That broke the charm. The masked men sprang forward and separated the combatants and all began to talk at once.

Judge Favart de Caumartin and Hepworth Coleman were, by order of the judge himself, taken to the judge's mansion, where their wounds were examined by physicians and surgeons who were quickly summoned.

Mdlle. Olympe de Caumartin found herself nursing two almost dying patients at the same time. Although she suspected that this was the result of a duel between her father and the young stranger, she was not told the secret of the affair until long afterwards.

Strange to say, although the judge was much the older man, and was wounded much nearer the heart, he recovered and was walking about in his house before Coleman had even taken a turn for the better. The first thing he did was to order his daughter to cease her nursing of the young man.

Digitized by Google

"It is not proper," he said, "for a young girl to be the nurse of a man who is a stranger."

Mdlle. Olympe blushed scarlet, and was so confused that she could not find a word to say. It had been a great pleasure to her to wait upon Coleman, who, though for the greater part of the time quite insensible of her presence, seemed to respond better to her care than to the treatment of the doctors. She had been having her sweet dream, was in love with him, indeed, and the command of her father struck her like a blow.

Judge Favart de Caumartin suspected the truth about his daughter, and was not slow in making up his mind in the matter. He gave strict orders that the hall between Coleman's rooms and the rest of the mansion should be kept at all times locked and barred.

Love laughs at such precautions. Hepworth Coleman during his convalescence lay on his back and thought of nobody but Mdlle. Olympe, and when at last he was able to get up he sent for her. It so chanced that the judge, having got well in a measure, was gone up to Natchez on business.

Mdlle. Olympe did not go to see the young man, but she wrote him a very pretty note explaining her father's wishes.

Mdlle. Olympe blushed scarlet.

"But he has never forbidden you to come and see me when you are able to walk so far as the library," she added very frankly, "and I see no reason why you should stay away."

When the judge returned it was too late to interfere, as he soon discovered, and he had to bow to the inevitable.

The mystery of the adventure with the masked men in that secret hall has never been further explained. Judge Favart de Caumartin would not consent to his daughter's marriage until he had exacted a promise from Coleman that he would never divulge what he knew.

The truth was that Coleman knew very little. He tried to discover the blind alley into which the judge had led him on that eventful evening, but although he made many inquiries there was no such alley to discover.

The whereabouts of the mysterious hall cannot be pointed out to-day, although from that memorable Tuesday in the spring of 1820 up to the Mardi Gras of 1861, every anniversary of the Mystic Krewe has been duly celebrated by a fantastic band that at a certain hour of the night parades the streets of New Orleans. I do not refer to the regular carnival societies; these are but playful imitations of mystery and nothing further.

The genuine Krewe, as weirdly strange and mysterious as ever, may be seen only in Royal Street, a small band headed by a tall, slender, dark man, who wears an invisible mask and a quaint black velvet cap.

From what quarter they come nobody has ever been able to discover; who they are is not known even to the great Rex, the King of the Carnival. Their whole being seems to be enveloped in mystery.

Hepworth Coleman and Mdlle. Olympe de Caumartin were married in due time, and lived in Royal Street all their lives. Every year, on the evening of Mardi Gras, they were called upon to give a dinner to the Mystic Krewe, thirteen in number, who ate in silence with their masks on. The last of these dinners was in 1860. That year saw the twain, who, for forty years had been happy together, laid in their tomb side by side.

Strangely enough, there is no record whatever of Judge Favart de Caumartin's death; indeed, there is a tradition to the effect that it is he who still leads the Mystic Krewe.

Digitized by Google

THE LAMB AND THE LION.

I.

WHOEVER first bestowed the sobriquet of "The Lamb" on Peter Grey had a happy thought. It fitted him like a glove. Peter looked lamb-like, and his disposition did not contradict his face.

Indeed, but for Rosie Stallard, he might have carried his reputation for humility to the grave. She, however, lit the flame of love in his inoffensive breast, where it burnt so fiercely that his gentle nature was turned to steel, like iron in the Bessemer furnace.

Rosie was the belle of Allerton, a beauty, tall and graceful, but a desperate flirt. Peter admired her greatly, as a beggar might a princess; but he would never have got further than a casual greeting—they had long been slightly acquainted—had she not encouraged him.

One Sunday evening he found himself sitting next to her in church. She was without a hymn-book, so shared his. After the service she waited at the door to thank him. They walked home together, and thus it began. Several pairs of jealous eyes saw the couple, the news spread, and next day, at the workshop, banter, some of it barbed, descended upon Peter's head in showers.

"Take care, Peter," said Dick Pettifer, whom Rosie had jilted. "She'll be as sweet as best golden syrup for a week or two. Sugar-candy won't be in it till she takes up with somebody else, and then you'll find she's vinegar, and no mistake."

The warning made no impression.

"What's your number, Peter?" asked Dave Harden, who, perhaps by reason of his ugliness, had escaped Rosie's toils.

"What do you mean?" rejoined Peter, off his guard.

"Well, I've lost count. I can't recollect whether you're Rosie's ninety-ninth or hundredth victim."

But Peter could not be induced to open his mouth again.

At about the same time the subject was being discussed in Mrs. Stallard's front garden. Rosie was absent, of course.

"Peter's a steady lad," said the widow, who was inclined to be proud of her daughter's numerous conquests. "If she was to want to marry him, I shouldn't have no objection, as his sort always makes the best husbands; but I misdoubt she's only having a bit of fun, and she'll soon find him too quiet for her."

"And what then?" asked Mrs. Pettifer, who resented Dick's rejection as only a mother can.

"She'll get another. Gals like her need never be short of a sweetheart. And a broken heart or two against her won't spoil her appetite."

Mrs. Pettifer flared up on the instant.

"She didn't break my lad's heart. Anyhow, he hasn't took to his bed yet. The next time I see Peter Grey, I'll tell him what you've said. See if I don't!" And she bounced out of the garden.

She kept her word. But Peter only laughed. All the warnings, which were many, had no effect. He continued to walk out with Rosie. The girl's motive can only be guessed at. Perhaps Peter's humility amused her; possibly she was entertained by the metamorphosis in his appearance. Until he took up with Rosie, Peter had always patronised the unambitious village tailor, but very soon after that first Sunday walk he blossomed out into a very gay flower indeed. It might have been that she was unable to quarrel with him. When a youth is slow to take offence, no matter how grievous the slight, it is difficult for a girl to dismiss him.

They had been courting, or at least walking out together, about three months when "Craddock's World-famed Hippodrome and Wild Beast Show" chanced to visit Allerton. Very soon afterwards Rosie expressed a wish to go.

"I want to see Signor Kellini perform with the lions," she said. "I saw him on the top of one of the cars the day they came. He's just splendid!"

Peter was delighted. He wanted to ask a momentous question, and he thought if Rosie were pleased, that would be a very favourable opportunity. She had been rather cool for some days, in fact, ever since the arrival of the "World-famed Hippodrome."

Later on that evening, which happened to be Saturday, Peter dressed himself in his best and called at Widow Stallard's cottage. Rosie was ready. Soon both stood on the green, admiring the extraordinary pictures which adorned the front of the great booth. While they gazed a gigantic, jolly-looking man in red tights and spangles appeared on the platform in front of the tent, gave the big drum a tremendous whack, and commenced to address the spectators in a beautiful Irish brogue.

"Walk up, ladies and gintlemen! Su—r—re, an' it's the best show on ear—r—th ye'll see this noight for six-pence! Walk up!"

"That's him!" whispered Rosie. "That's Signor Kellini, the great lion tamer! Isn't he handsome?"

He certainly was a remarkably good-looking fellow. His black hair curled all over his head, and the ends of his waxed moustache almost reached his ears. But Peter did not share Rosie's admiration. Perhaps he felt the contrast between the giant's magnificent frame and his own rather puny figure.

"He has got a big voice," he said.

"Stupid!" muttered Rosie, "he's a splendid man."

At this juncture the Signor, whose wife addressed him as "Pat," and whose friends called him "Kelly," caught sight of his admirer and her sweetheart.

Digitized by Google

"Arrah, Miss!" he cried. "If the bastes only see your bonny face, su—r—re they'll be pleasant and good-timpered for a week o' Saturdays. Don't be afther disappointing the crathurs, sorr. Walk up, an' bring the colleen. It'll be a mercy to 'em, bedad!"

"Yes, come on," said Rosie imperiously. And they ascended the steps.

When the booth was pretty full Mr. Craddock commenced the circus performance, which soon came to an end. Then a cage containing a lion and two lionesses was drawn into the centre of the ring. Signor Kellini entered at once and drove the animals over a bar and through a hoop in the approved style with shouts and pistol shots, finally bringing the show to a close by opening the lion's jaw and placing his curly head in the animal's mouth.

During this performance Rosie never once took her eyes from the lion-tamer. Her cheeks glowed with excitement. She stood almost breathless. And when the daring Irishman emerged from the cage amid a storm of applause, she turned to Peter and whispered:

"If ever I marry that's the sort of man I'll have for a husband."

Peter coloured and looked away. He certainly was not that sort of man. Being unable to think of anything pertinent to say, he held his tongue. But on the way home he asked her if she meant it.

"Of course I did," she answered.

A long silence followed.

"I've been thinking," said Peter, at length, "that it's about time I asked you if you'd have me. I suppose it wouldn't be any use?"

She laughed scornfully.

"Have you? Have a duffer"—that was the word she used—"like you? I should think not, indeed!" and she tossed her head. "You're all very well to walk out with, Peter, but when I marry, I'll marry a man like Signor Kellini."

What so many had prophesied had come to pass. Peter halted then and there.

"Good night, Rosie," he said without the least anger, and he left her, with her mocking laughter ringing in his ears.

II.

ON Monday morning Signor Kellini was perched on the topmost step of his caravan, smoking a dudheen almost as black as his curly hair, when Rosie's rejected lover drew near.

"Good morning, sir," said the youth, in his respectful, humble way. "I should be very much obliged if you would tell me what would happen if a stranger was to go in among your lions?"

"H'what'd happen?" laughed the jovial giant. "Bedad! they'd ate him and look round for another soft tit-bit av the same sor-r-t."

Peter looked blank. "Are you quite sure?" he asked.

Signor Kellini glanced at him keenly.

"H'what are yez afther? H'what's yer game?" he demanded.

Peter hesitated. "I want to put the lions through their performance," he faltered at length.

Signor Kellini's roar of laughter might have been heard a quarter of a mile away.

"You! This bates Banagher! A little chap loike you? H'why—h'why—sure thin, if Marco looked at yez, ye'd fall in a faint an' die that minute!"

"Try me," said Peter resolutely; and there was an expression in his pale grey eyes quite new to them. The lion-tamer noticed it and ceased his chuckling.

"H'what is it ye're afther, anyhow?" he demanded again. "H'where have I seen yez before?"

"In the show, or outside, on Saturday night," said Peter.

"Sure, an' so I did—wid the purtiest colleen a man 'd wish to set eyes on. Bedad, now, if there isn't a petticoat at the bottom av this it's a raal Hitalian I am, an' not Pat Kelly at all, at all. Out wid it! Tell me h'why ye're wanting to do it."

Peter Grey told his story in few words, but not without hesitation. Its immediate result was a fit of laughter that surely put the lion-tamer's life in danger, for his neck was very short and thick.

"Marry a man loike me!" he roared. "Me! wid a wife an five childher! Och, wirras thru! If Kathleen heard her she'd tear her eyes out. Och, murther! Marry me—Pat Kelly! A colleen wid eyes like sloes, an' a figure as supple as an antelopes. Su-r-r-e, ye're dhraming!" And he roared again.

Peter waited until his laughter died away in a series of diminuendo chuckles.

"I thought if I showed her that I wasn't afraid of lions, either," he said, "she wouldn't be so scornful next time I asked her to have me."

"An' aren't ye afraid of lions?" demanded Signor Kellini.

"Well, she as good as said I wasn't a man, and I'd risk a lot to show her different."

"You've got the grit in ye, anyhow. Ye don't look it, but it's there. Put yer hand in this."

Signor Kellini extended his huge fist. Peter obeyed, though the giant's grip made him wince.

"Now," the lion-tamer went on, "I'll tell yez h'what 'd happen an' ye went into the cage alone. Marco would go for yez shtraight, an' if we got yez out aloive it'd be a miracle. If I went in wid ye it would be risky. Lions are loike ladies, an' strangers must be properly introduced. If I tell Craddock h'what ye're wanting, he'll jump at it. It would be good business for him, bedad. He'd send a handbill round, sure, an' half the folks in Allerton 'd come on the chance av seein' yez torn in pieces. But that wouldn't do for me. It's not Mr. Craddock, but meself would have to see yez through. H'what'll ye pay if I do it?"

"Five pounds," said Peter promptly.

"Done!" cried the lion-tamer. And they shook hands on the bargain.

"An' h'when 'll ye do it?"

"To-night, if you like," said Peter.

But Signor Kellini shook his head.

"That'd be certain death," he said. "Say next Saturday, an' come an' show yerself to the lions as often as ye can."

With that understanding they separated.

Mr. Craddock raised no difficulty. On the contrary, he lost no time in giving a printer an order for a thousand bold handbills. The printer, who knew Peter well, suggested the wording, with the result that all whom it might concern were informed that "on Saturday next, at 8.30 p.m., Mr. Peter Grey, a young gentleman well known in Allerton as 'The Lamb,' would enter a cage containing 'three full-grown Lions of the Desert' and assist Signor Kellini in putting them through their performance."

Great was the sensation. Great the amazement. A good many people were wholly incredulous.

"It can't be our 'Lamb'—our Peter Grey," they said.

Digitized by Google

"He hasn't pluck enough to go into a cage o' rats, let alone lions."

A bill was delivered into Widow Stallard's hands. In great perturbation she showed it to Rosie.

"Look here, lass, Peter Grey's going into the lion's den at the menagerie. There isn't another Peter Grey in Allerton, as I knows on; besides, this one's 'The Lamb.' He must ha' gone mad."

The colour left the girl's cheeks, but she said not a word. As soon as she could, she went out and waited for Peter returning home from his work.

"You shan't do it!" she cried, pointing to the bill which she carried in her hand.

"I shall," said Peter.

"Then I'll never speak to you again."

"That won't be half so bad as what you spoke the other night," rejoined Peter desperately. "And if you speak about me you won't be able to say I'm no man."

"Don't do it," she pleaded. "Don't, Peter, for"—she hesitated—"my sake."

"I've made up my mind," said Peter doggedly, but in a softened tone. "Because I've quarrelled with nobody, and never wanted to fight, and have taken all sorts of foolish jokes in good part, everybody in Allerton seems to think I've no pluck. I'm going to show them different."

"But if the lions kill you everybody 'll say it was my fault," she urged.

"No, they won't," he answered; "for I haven't told a soul except Signor Kellini, and him I had to."

Rosie looked at her supposed poor-spirited lover in admiration. There was anxiety also in her expression, but admiration predominated. It was the first time he had seen such a look in her eyes, and it thrilled him. But his purpose remained unchanged.

"If I were to say I'd have you, Peter," she began, and paused. "If I were to say that," she went on, "and say as well that I'm very sorry for what I spoke on Saturday night, would you give it up?"

"No," he answered; "not now the bills are out." And he went his way.

Rosie returned home. For the first time in her life she had been repulsed. With a girl of her character years of devotion might have been less effective. The tables were turned completely. She, the scorner, now admired.

III.

THAT eventful Saturday night arrived. Half the population of Allerton had gathered on the Green, and one topic of conversation prevailed—the coming performance of "The Lamb" with the lions. It was not exactly the thing itself which caused the sensation; there was nothing particularly wonderful in it, and nothing new. But the man was Peter Grey. There lay the marvel.

By half-past seven the great tent was thronged. Rosie Stallard had come with her mother and a crowd of neighbours. She looked pale, but proud. All Allerton was talking about the man she had treated so badly, and she was quite prepared to consider his notoriety as homage paid to herself—at second hand.

Not that all were unanimous in approval. Some, the minority, said Peter Grey was a foolish young man, and the police ought to interfere; but by far the greater number were ready to pat him on the back and laud him as a hero. Human nature ran very strong in Allerton.

At 8.30 to the minute there was a great shout as Peter appeared in the ring, bearing a whip and a pistol, and followed by Signor Kellini, who carried an iron bar. The lion-tamer acknowledged the applause in the customary manner, but Peter looked neither to right nor left. With head thrown back, shoulders squared, lips tightly compressed, he led the way to the cage and waited.

Springing up the steps Signor Kellini entered the cage and admitted Peter. As the iron door clanged to, the lions leapt to their feet, and fixing their burning eyes on the stranger, lashed their tails angrily. A lioness tried to steal past the tamer, pressing her tawny body against the bars. It was a critical moment, but Signor Kellini sprang before her shouting, and she slunk back. Then the tamer fixed his bar in position, and Peter stepped forward amid dead silence to drive the lions over it. He cracked his whip. They refused to budge, but faced about, growling furiously.

"Shtrike—shtrike!" whispered the Irishman hoarsely, "or be jabers you'll be kilt dead!"

Realising that his life was in deadly peril, Peter laid about him in earnest. The lion, cowed, turned and leapt the bar, followed by the lionesses.

The shout of applause which greeted the termination of the first act was almost loud enough to rend the canvas roof.

An attendant passed up a hoop. Without removing his gaze from the furious animals Signor Kellini took it and gave it to Peter, whom he relieved of the whip and pistol. Standing in the middle of the cage Peter held the hoop level with his shoulders. The lion-tamer strode forward, brandishing his whip. One lioness leapt through the hoop, then the other. It was Marco's turn. He hung back, growling, for a moment, then sprang wildly, missed the hoop, apparently by accident, and fell on Peter, who went down as if he had been shot and lay still.

There was a loud, horrified "Oh!"—a woman's scream—then dead silence again.

Signor Kellini caught up the iron bar, and strode across to the insensible form of his too venturesome assistant. The lions fell back and stood glaring. But Mr. Craddock had entered the cage. He drew Peter out. The tamer followed, still fronting the lions. The show was over.

A doctor who chanced to be present examined Peter amid such a scene of excitement as had never been witnessed in Allerton, and declared him to be suffering from a broken arm and dislocated shoulder. Luckily, Marco had not drawn blood. For the first time in his life Peter was taken home in a cab.

It is no exaggeration to say that more people visited the Grey's cottage during the next week than had done so in all the years since it was built. Rosie was almost the first to call.

"I'm a bad, silly girl," she said, as she bent over Peter's bed, "but you'll forgive me, won't you?"

"Am I a man?" he asked.

"There's not a man like you in all Allerton," she answered, "nor a lover."

That was very satisfactory, of course.

They were married soon after Peter was able to get about.

For a long time, however, scarcely a day passed without some one asking Peter why he risked his life. Almost invariably his reply was: "You'd better ask Rosie."

But young Mrs. Grey kept her own counsel. She, however, had to bear a great deal of chaffing whenever Pat Kelly chanced to visit Allerton.

ASHMORE RUSSAN.

Digitized by Google

THE MASTER OF THE STEAM.

A ROUGH board shanty served as a railway station at Barranca, New Mexico. Within, the station-master was taking a siesta upon a couch draped with bright coloured Navajo blankets.

The station-master raised himself on his elbow. The face of an old Indian, seamed and wrinkled, was peering in the open doorway.

In good Spanish he asked to see the "head man" of the "iron-way." Then he told the object of his visit.

He was a chief of the Jicarilla Apaches, whose reservation was forty miles distant. He had heard his tribesmen tell wonderful stories of the great iron-way that the white man had made through the land, and of the fiery monster that flew along its trail. He did not believe all the tales they told. He had come to learn if these tales could be true.

It was almost time for the arrival of the express train on its way to Espanola. While awaiting its coming the station-master tried to explain to the Apache how the engine drew the carriages along the rails, but the old man either did not understand or did not believe him, for he shook his head and smiled incredulously.

"Por Dios!" ejaculated the savage, with a sudden start, as the shrill whistle of an approaching locomotive broke the silence, and in a moment more the "demon of the iron-way" came tearing round a curve with its four passenger carriages sweeping gracefully behind.

The old Apache took a position a safe distance from the line. Whatever his fears, he made a brave effort to master them. He was more than astonished—he was awe-stricken. He gazed with a bewildered expression at the great monster, now come to a stop at the station.

Down from the engine came the driver, a dumpy little fellow with a long-necked oil-can in his hand.

"Santa Maria!" gasped the savage nervously, clasping his hands, "the Master of the Steam!"

His eyes followed every movement of the driver; they shone with the light of adoration. So far as he knew, this was the only engine in the world, and this man the only master of it.

With two shrill whistles, which startled the Indian, the engine and its carriages glided out of the station and sped downward to the entrance to Embudo Cañon.

The Apache tarried with the station-master. He watched the train until a curve lost it to sight, and listened until its last echo died away.

Two weeks had passed, and the Apache had come again to see the "Master of the Steam." The station-master explained to him that the driver would not pass that day, but that he would go by in the night; that unless there were people to go in the carriages, "the steam" would not stop there at night. The savage without a word departed, slowly and sadly.

The moon shone full and clear on the New Mexico mesa, and the parallel bands of steel that marked the course of civilisation's roadway gleamed in the bright light. Above Barranca Station—almost within sight of it—was a small clump of trees, towards which two men were riding at a swift gallop. When they had arrived and dismounted one of them said:

"Climb that telegraph pole quickly, and cut the wire. there is no time to lose."

"We should have been here half an hour ago," said the first speaker. "I never got lost before cutting through the divide. Now take this crowbar and pry a rail loose; I'll swing the lantern, and if they don't stop we'll ditch 'em; if they do, why, they can fix the rail in a minute and go on."

"How much money do you think they've aboard?"

"I don't know exactly; there's $50,000 (£10,000) for the First National Bank of Sante Fé—that I know they've got, and that's enough for us if we get it."

The man who had received the order took the crowbar and approached the lines. He raised the bar and brought it down with force beside the rail. Just then there was a hissing, singing sound, as if some huge insect had suddenly flown towards them, and the man with the bar fell to the ground, full length across the lines. An arrow was buried deep in his breast.

It was a rash thing for his companion to do, but he was a desperate and an impulsive man. His six-shooter flashed in the moonlight, and he fired into the brush, in the direction from which the arrow had come. He listened intently. He heard a groan and started across the line. The shrill scream of a locomotive's whistle startled him. He stopped for an instant, and then started towards his horse. He grabbed the big pommel of his Mexican saddle to swing himself into the seat.

As he cleared the ground, the hissing, singing sound was repeated. An arrow grazed his leg and struck his horse in the stomach. With a snort the animal jumped aside, and the man fell heavily to the ground. The pained beast with the arrow in his side began to kick, and one blow from his heels fell upon the leg of the man. He uttered an imprecation and tried to gain his feet, but the effort was too great. His leg was broken. When he fell from his horse he dropped his six-shooter. He tried to crawl to where it lay, but the slightest effort made him cry out in agony.

The headlight of the engine added but little to the brightness of the scene as the great iron mogul came into view. The dumpy little driver was leaning out of the window. Suddenly he withdrew his head, reversed his engine, and applied the brakes.

"What's the matter?" asked the stoker.

"Man on the lines," was the laconic answer.

The injured man, with his revolver a dozen feet away, the dead man on the lines with an arrow in his breast, and a crowbar beside him, the lantern in the bushes, the picketed horse, instantly made clear the fact that a proposed train robbery had met with fatal interference. As the officials stood beside the injured robber, who refused to speak, a deep groan came from the bush on the opposite side of the line. They cautiously advanced in that direction. Lying behind a little clump of brush was an Indian. The breast of his cotton shirt was red with blood. In his left hand he clutched a stout bow and in his right hand was an arrow.

The driver bent over him and recognised him. It was the old Jicarilla Apache.

The light of recognition shone in the dying man's eyes. As the driver raised the Indian's head from the ground, a smile passed over the brown face of the savage. His lips moved:

"The Master of the Steam" he said, and died.

RICHARD LINTHICUM.

Digitized by Google

ANACOANA

THE residence of some forty renegades among the simple natives of the fertile plain of Xaragua, to the west of Hispaniola, produced a marked effect on the mode of life of the untutored aborigines. Their chieftainess, Anacoana, actuated in part by a strong partiality for the manners and customs of the white strangers, and in part by the quick recognition of the advantages to be derived from adopting what was best in those manners, encouraged the building of houses like the Spanish domiciles, and a more orderly system of tillage than her indolent subjects had hitherto practised.

For herself she had constructed a residence modelled after the Governor's "palace" at San Domingo, with a fort attached, but unfortunately lacking in the same means of defence as the stronghold of the strangers. She dressed in the fashion of the Spanish women, too, and gave rich strings of pearls and gold utensils in exchange for gaudy garments, which she further ornamented with her favourite dyed feathers.

Anacoana was but a girl when Roldan and his disaffected followers revolted against Don Bartholomew, the brother of Columbus, whom the explorer had left as adelantado of the island, and who came among her father's people outraging the inoffensive and devastating their peaceful valley. Her heart was filled with hate for them, whether they might be gods or demons, and one or other men who could call down thunderbolts to strike their opponents dead must surely be.

But when Columbus returned to the island and restored tranquillity to the colony and relieved the unfortunate natives of most of their oppression, she accompanied her father on a visit to the "Great Chief." The sight of his gentle face or the kind words he spoke to her father softened her towards Columbus, and when he took her on his knee and told her of all the wonders of that other land so far away, whence he came, she was completely captivated, and for ever after during her life she cherished the memory of that one interview as sacred.

But about forty of the mutineers, gaol-birds, and adventurers, who left their country for their country's good, refused the amnesty offered by Columbus, and preferred to remain, leading the life of indolence which was made possible by the chief's having assigned them lands and natives to till it. Anacoana saw how her people were compelled to work by the Spaniards, and when she succeeded her father she exerted her authority to make the rest of the tribe labour for themselves.

Anacoana had been cacique for four years when she determined to pay a visit to the Spanish governor, Nicholas de Ovando, in the hope of inducing him to interfere and discipline the renegades, who were becoming more and more troublesome. When she entered the audience chamber, where the Knight of Alcantara sat in state to receive her, a murmur of admiration passed among the assembled officers, and even the eyes of the governor lighted up for a moment. Quickly remembering the dignity of his office, Ovando resumed the stern look he was accustomed to wear. Anacoana was then about twenty-four years old, tall and stately, her lithe figure moving with a native grace.

She entered the audience chamber.

Momentary as Ovando's glance of admiration had been it did not pass unnoticed by one interested spectator. This was Christina de la Rosa, Ovando's beautiful cousin, who occupied the seat of honour among the group of ladies in the audience chamber. A warm flush overspread her face, and if hate could kill, the swift glance she gave Anacoana would have struck her dead. Christina soon recovered her composure, and only the supercilious curling of her lip and a slight quivering of her nostrils betrayed her jealousy.

Digitized by Google

Ovando, beneath his expression of stern, unbending dignity, hid sensations which fully justified that jealousy. In turn his state and authority impressed Anacoana. Although he had not the kindly aspect of Columbus, he was immeasurably superior in her eyes to any of the men of her own race. As she advanced to the foot of the daïs, Ovando arose, and held out his hand for her to kiss. She bowed low and gracefully touched her lips to the great sapphire in the ring he wore as token of his authority.

When she raised her head again the colour in her face was deeper, her large, dark brown eyes glistened with a wild, passionate light, and a proud smile hovered about her mouth. In clear musical tones she stated the object of her visit, and cited instances in proof of her grievance. Ovando listened attentively, and when she had finished, stepped from the daïs, and taking her by the hand escorted her to a vacant seat on his right, while the head men who accompanied her presented further proofs of the rapacity and outrage of the renegades.

What pride was hers as she sat there in simple dignity! What jealousy raged in the heart of Dona Christina as she was forced to look upon this mark of honour to the beautiful barbarian!

Ovando promised to investigate fully the complaints. A strict disciplinarian, with a talent for holding in check the unruly adventurers who formed the rank and file of the Spanish colony, he desired only an opportunity to punish and bring to subjection the renegades in Anacoana's province.

II.

WHEN Anacoana and her suite had departed Ovando retired to the large apartment which served as parlour, library, and study. He had been there only a few minutes when Christina entered. So absorbed was he in thought as he sat at a table covered with books and papers, and so softly did she tread, that he did not notice her approach until her mocking laugh, as she peeped over his shoulder and discovered him tracing abstractedly a rude outline sketch of Anacoana's profile, recalled him from his reverie. With an involuntary movement he turned over the sheet of paper on which he had been drawing.

"You need not turn the page, my lord," she laughed, "since I already know the path your truant thoughts have taken."

Ovando frowned.

"What do you mean, Christina?" he demanded.

"What do I mean? The keen and penetrating Don Nicholas de Ovando, accustomed as he is to read men's minds himself, forgets that his own thoughts may also be read in his face—or in spite of it. I suppose the poor untutored savage queen, as she goes on her way homeward rejoicing, has before her mind the image of the great and grand Governor of Hispaniola and Knight of Alcantara just as he has her image before his eyes and tries to transfer it to paper. Yes, she has fine eyes, and is unusually pretty for a savage, but I never suspected that such charms could influence you in a matter of duty."

Ovando was furious, and his eyes flashed with rage.

"How dare you," he cried, rising. "impute an improper motive to me in your jealousy?"

Christina looked him straight in the face and did not flinch. She was somewhat pale, but her nostrils quivered with scorn.

"How dare I?" she asked. "How dare you in my presence play the gallant to this barbaric belle? How dare you add another indignity to the many you have heaped on me? Years ago you tempted me to fly my father's house to wed with you only to find no priest in waiting. To tempt me to this wilderness you vowed that once here, away from the world's scrutiny, you would make me your wife, and yet I am compelled to pose as your cousin. On every face I can see the scorn which the people dare not express, and I can almost hear the echo of their mocking laughter. And now a tawny savage has ensnared your fickle, treacherous heart, and you ask me how I dare to notice it.

Ovando raised his clenched hand threateningly, but Christina stood calmly and scornfully with curled lips still gazing in his bronzed and grizzled countenance.

"Ovando," she said in a suppressed tone. "You are not the passionate poltroon to strike a woman."

The Knight of Alcantara bit his lip, and his arm dropped listlessly by his side.

"You are right," he said, "it would be cowardice to strike you, however great the temptation. But do not attempt to dictate to me. If I look with lover's eyes on Anacoana, it is only a wife that has the right to object, and you have not that right."

"So you admit your infatuation and mock me! You forget how dangerous a woman can be. How long do you suppose the King would retain you in the Governorship of Hispaniola if I told my story?"

"Peace, peace," said Ovando. "Your jealousy needs curbing. I have only promised Anacoana that justice shall be done and that the renegades who are committing outrages against her people shall be punished."

"But you have not heard yet what they have to say. You cannot forget the cunning of these savage people, who are not notable for truth telling."

"No; I will do nothing till I have made a full investigation," said Ovando, "and then, pretty eyes, neither yours nor Anacoana's will influence me in seeing that justice is done."

"Strict justice is all I want, my lord; above all justice to myself."

With a low courtesy, Christina left the room.

Ovando lost no time in beginning his inquiry. One of his lieutenants was dispatched to the Spanish settlement in Xaragua, to report on the complaints of the natives. The reply of the renegades was a complete denial of the accusations, coupled with a counter-charge to the effect that Anacoana contemplated a treacherous descent on San Domingo and a massacre of the colony, and having failed to enlist the services of Roldan's former followers against their countrymen, desired to have them removed from that part of the island, so that her plans for the massacre could be completed without espionage.

This was pleasing information for Christina, as it was galling for Ovando. The idea of possible treachery on the part of Anacoana had never presented itself. On mature consideration of the state of affairs he was disposed to reject the report as malicious, and made in a spirit of revenge.

Christina soon learnt the result of the investigation, and was quick to appreciate how she could use it to her own advantage. She waited for several days to see whether Ovando would take any action, or speak to her concerning his lieutenant's report; but when he made no movement she shrewdly suspected that he either disbelieved what the renegades had said, or, from a motive which she understood, intended to await the course of events. Therefore, she perceived that it was necessary for her to speak, and that no time was to be lost.

Digitized by Google

It was in one of Ovando's moments of unbending. He lay stretched on a couch of Moorish workmanship, covered with heavy fur rugs, reading one of the popular Spanish romances dealing with knightly chivalry. Christina reclined on an ottoman at the other side of the apartment, her arms hanging loosely over the edge of the cushion, and the piece of lace which she had been engaged in working had fallen to the floor.

"Hernandez is returned," she said suddenly, "but my lord has not informed me what he reports."

Ovando looked up, somewhat disconcerted.

"It is unusual for you to take an interest in official matters," he said sharply.

"Oh, but you must remember that my interest in this particular affair was already excited," laughed Christina imperturbably.

"Your jealousy was also excited, I remember," said Ovando.

Christina started as if stung, and her olive skin flushed.

"And good reason there was for my jealousy," she cried, "when the harsh, unbending Nicholas de Ovando's thoughts were so completely captivated by the charms of a savage beauty."

Ovando ground his teeth.

"Hecate! Fury!" he hissed. "What do you want me to do?"

"Nothing but what you have sworn to your King and Queen to do—your duty."

"And my duty is——?"

"March to Xaragua and punish Anacoana and her people."

"But they have given no overt evidence of any intention to act treacherously."

"Are you going to wait for them to begin the massacre?" sneered Christina.

They were interrupted by the arrival of a messenger in such haste that his business could not wait. He was allowed to enter, and presented a dispatch to the governor. When Ovando read it, the expression on his face denoted that the contents were unpleasant.

"Say that I will give the matter instant attention," he said, dismissing the attendant. "And you," he said, turning to Christina, "leave me alone, I have important business to consider."

Christina retired silently. She knew what the important business was that required attention, for she herself had concocted the dispatch, which purported to give further details of the preparations being made by the Xaraguans to massacre the colony of San Domingo.

Ovando, though somewhat perturbed by the receipt of this information, determined to send spies to Anacoana's town and await more trustworthy news of the doings of the natives before marching against them. He foresaw that in pursuing this course he would experience a good deal of difficulty in dealing with Christina, but he was resolved to resist her threats.

III.

THE next day a messenger arrived from Anacoana bearing presents of gold and curiously wrought feather work, accompanied by an invitation to attend the annual native festival, which was about to take place. Christina smiled triumphantly when she heard of this.

"And what does my lord now think of these guileless children of nature?" she asked, entering his study.

"That the renegades are lying," he answered promptly.

Christina laughed aloud.

"Ovando was not always so unsuspecting," she said. "This is the first time that he was ever on the point of walking with open eyes straight into a trap."

"That the renegades are lying," he answered promptly.

But the Knight of Alcantara had no intention of allowing himself to become the victim of treachery, and made his preparations accordingly. When he set forth for Xaragua next day, seventy horsemen followed him. Christina rode on a palfrey by Ovando's side, and chatted merrily. All her ill-humour seemed to have departed, and she told the knight that the presence of the soldiers banished all her fears of treachery. The journey occupied six days, and as, towards sundown, the cavalcade sighted the orderly village, Anacoana came out to greet Ovando. She was attended by a score of maidens, each decked with flowers, and carrying great quantities of flowers to strew in the path of the Spaniards.

The chieftainess had the place of honour a short distance in front of her attendants, and danced not ungracefully a native dance of welcome, which consisted less in the movement of the feet than in the rhythmical swaying of the arms above her head, and a sinuous movement of her lithe body in unison therewith. At the same time Anacoana and the maidens sang in rude measure the praises of the Spaniards, their valour, and their mighty power.

The soldiers pitched their tents outside the village, but Ovando, Christina, and their personal guard of five were conducted to Anacoana's residence, and the chieftainess herself waited upon them until Ovando directed her to desist. She knelt as though she would have kissed his feet, but the Knight of Alcantara gently raised her up and kissed her on either cheek. Christina smiled, and gave the delighted chieftainess a similar salute.

Christina could not help noticing with what chivalrous tenderness Ovando treated Anacoana, and how plainly the chieftainess betrayed a passion, which she strenuously endeavoured to conceal. Still, the Spanish woman gave no sign of displeasure. On the morning of the third day Ovando was awakened by her from a heavy sleep, and told that a messenger had come to see him. The new-comer proved to be one of Bovadilla's men. When shown into Ovando's presence he knelt on one knee and said:

Digitized by Google

"Save yourselves, Excellency, while there is time. To-day the Spaniards are to be massacred, and last night Anacoana sent to ask us to assist her warriors to annihilate you."

"What nonsense to talk of treachery!" he cried. "Why, we could annihilate the village in half an hour, even if taken by surprise. I fear no treachery, and in the two days that we have been here nothing has occurred to cause any misgivings. This is to be the last day of our stay. If any danger threatened a signal is already arranged, and once it is given not a soul will be left of all the tribe. But no danger is likely to arise, and so the Spanish ensign will remain in its present position over the canopy."

The last words filled Christina's soul with joy. There was a signal, then, of terrible import.

That day was to wind up the native games, following which the Spaniards were to exhibit their agility, prowess, and military training. Simple indeed—foot-racing, wrestling and spear-throwing of Anacoana's people, but she was happy because Ovando took such interest in the games. A tender light filled her eyes, a light far different from that in Christina's, when she would discover the young chieftainess glancing with stealthy coyness at the Spanish Governor, and when so discovered the hot blood would suffuse her swarthy countenance and her bright eyes be veiled beneath the long silky lashes. And sometimes Ovando would glance at her, making no concealment of his admiration now.

The Xaraguan games were soon finished. Then came the turn of the Spaniards. They began with a military drill and went through the evolutions of the period with the skill of trained campaigners. The whole body formed into a double line, and at the word advance, running with such regular step that it seemed to be the movement of one man. Suddenly they broke ranks, and as sabres flashed and the nearest of the natives were cut down there was a wild cry from the panic-stricken Xaraguans.

Ovando himself was horrified. A glance round slowly showed him Christina standing with her hand on the rope which had hoisted the ensign and given the signal for massacre, her lips parted in a diabolical smile, and a look of murderous triumph in her eyes. Anacoana stood up, too, trembling in every limb, unable to articulate from terror and indignation. Ovando shouted a command for the massacre to cease, but his words were lost in that appalling din where the cries of murdered men, women, and children ascended to heaven for vengeance.

Christina released her hold on the rope as Ovando's eye fell on her. Worse than the tigress, because capable of a thousand times more mischief, her thirst for blood, so far from being satiated or assuaged, was only excited. Her hand sought her girdle, and the jewelled dagger which was drawn forth, was buried next moment in the heart of Anacoana. The body of the chieftainess sank at Ovando's feet, and not a murmur escaped her. Ovando seized Christina in his powerful grasp, while the massacre went on about him.

None was spared, the babe at its mother's breast, or those whom the grave already claimed as its prey. Nearly every Xaraguan wore one or more gold ornaments, and soon as the fatal blow was struck, the greedy murderers pillaged the dead of their glittering trinkets. It was the instinct of the Spaniard to do so. It was the greed of gold that first led them there. Ovando was unable to stay the murder and pillage now that it had begun, and he did not heed it longer. It was with Christina he had to deal.

As he held her blood-stained wrist he cried with a dreadful oath:

"Fiend incarnate, why have you done this?"

Her lip curled as she cast a look of hate on the corpse of Anacoana at their feet.

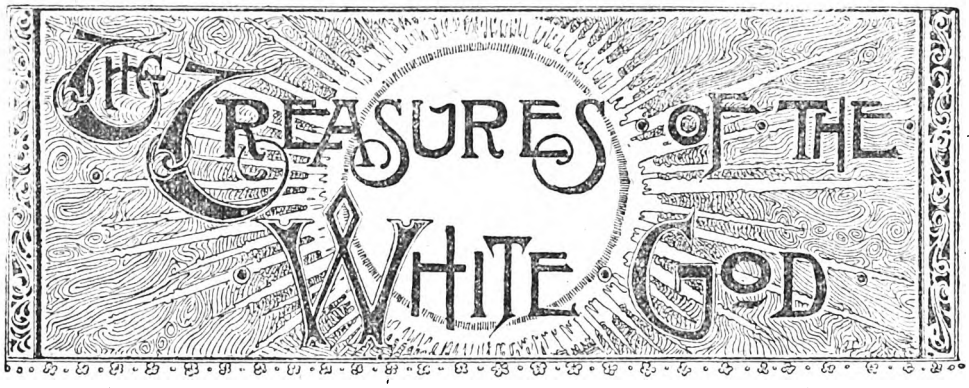
"Because she loved you—and you loved her," she replied.

With all his maddened strength he drove the dagger in her own clenched hand through her breast, and then flung the quivering body into the field. Then he glanced down on Anacoana where she lay lifeless. The fiendish look on his bronzed face relaxed and slowly melted into one of love and pity. The lip of him who had never blanched amidst the horrors of a dozen campaigns now trembled, and a slight sigh escaped him.

Then he knelt down and began to strip the body of its gold ornaments and jewels.

JAMES DUFFY.

Digitized by Google



SUMMARY.

ROBERT LANE, escaped convict No. 407, alias Adrian Burgoyne is tracked to the World's Fair Grounds at Chicago. He is last seen, after an exciting chase by Mr. Inspector Grey and his assistant, Detective Dean, locked in a burning boat on the lake. Detective Dean finds a cipher in the convict's bed, which he sells to Mr. Richard Sheldon for £2,000. A Col. Lytle calls on Sheldon. They recall Burgoyne's history as follows: Ralph Ringold, when dying in Mexico, left a packet containing £6,000 in the hands of Burgoyne for his friend Richard Sheldon, whom he appointed guardian of his daughter Patrice's fortune. Burgoyne overheard Lytle and Sheldon arranging to appropriate the treasure, and threatened to expose them. They caused him to be convicted of a crime, and sentenced to penal servitude for life.

They then discovered, when too late, that he had with him in cipher the secret to Ralf Ringold's hidden fortune and treasures in Mexico.

The cipher is now in their possession, but Patrice Ringold has the key.

Adrian Burgoyne escapes from the burning boat. He meets with a severe accident, which disfigures him beyond identity.

Richard Sheldon visits Patrice to obtain the key to the cipher. This, however, she had dropped the day before on the cliff, with her Bible. She hastens off to find it.

She falls over the cliff, but is rescued by Adrian Burgoyne. Startled by the sudden sight of Col. Lytle, he himself loses his balance and falls. He checks himself, however, and discovers the lost Bible of Patrice.

CHAPTER XII.

PATRICE.

PATRICE RINGOLD! What did it mean? Could he believe his eyes? Fate, an omen, delusion? As the worn, hunted refugee traced the letters forming that name, he forgot who he was, what he had been.

Like a signal to a ship passing in the arms of the storm, a blaze of sudden light down a dark abyss, that name, a key to all he had guessed, marvelled over, surmised, seemed to illumine his heart—unlocked all the portentous mysteries of the past, bade him hope that light, solution, the truth, was to dawn at last.

He was transformed in the radiance it shed, in the strong reliance it offered. He rose to his feet, palpitating, revived. He was no longer the crushed convict, the beaten victim. There awoke in his thoughts the most extravagant soul of hope, and he murmured five gasping words, with a thrill of conviction, faith, and triumph.

"The hand of Providence—fate!"

Patrice Ringold! There was her name, this was her book. There could be no doubt of that. "From her loving mother." And its owner? With a memory of the thrill that had possessed his being as, hanging over the dizzy abyss at the cliff, her eyes met his own, he seemed to grope for some lost, long-past recognition. He knew the woman he had saved now!

"His daughter—the orphan child of my dead friend, Ralph Ringold," breathed Burgoyne fervently. "And I saved her life. Oh, fate sent me hither. The girl I have sought, dreamed of, longed to see—the child I was sworn to protect and cherish—I meet her here. In the hour of my resurrection from the dead, on the threshold of a new existence—what does it mean—a gleam of hope, a harbinger of success!"

He sat staring at the name. The rain had blurred it, the damp had already curved and injured the covers to the little Bible. As it began to dry out now, the pasted back cracked loose from the body of the book. The inside leaves alone were intact. Reverently and thoughtfully the dreamer placed them in his pocket, and toyed with and stared at the cover in his hand, as if the name written there had magic to fix his bewildered thoughts, and inspire them to mighty, decisive action.

An hour ago he had seen the shadow of the past loom over him again, a drawn sword of menace—had supposed that, in view of the proximity of Lytle, flight to the uttermost parts of the earth was his portion, his choice, his doom.

Now——

The instincts of courage, rectitude, resolve, strong in his earnest nature to heroism, awoke anew. To carry out the dying wishes of Ralph Ringold he had undergone peril, persecution; to preserve his secret he had become a martyr. All through his years of penal servitude one thought, one grim, bitter resolve, had buoyed him up with hope—a determination to escape, to avenge the wrongs of the dead, of the orphan against the human harpies who had robbed the one of his fortune, the other of her happiness and the comfort and wealth rightfully her own.

But when he had escaped; when he had realised how subtle were the groping hands of justice; how implacable and steadfast and secure in their strong, self-reliant position were his enemies; how futile seemed his efforts to prove aught hostile to them, to reach them, to dislodge, to unmask them; he had been almost content to abandon the unequal contest, to court recapture no longer, to redeem the wasted years for his own benefit, and forget the solemn trust he had tried to execute, and in so doing had met peril, persecution, and imprisonment.

But now! ah! the lost was found, the long quest was ended. She whom he had sought, she whom he had sworn to protect, was known. He had found Patrice Ringold—at last!

What did that mean? As he recalled the pathetic scene where Ralph Ringold had died in his arms, murmuring the name of his beloved child; as he remembered how he had promised to see every injunction regarding her faithfully carried out; as he thought of the plots of the unfaithful steward, Richard Sheldon, the man who had suffered for his convictions turned his face once more resolutely, dauntlessly, back towards the Calvary upon which his proudest hopes had been crucified.

Patrice!—she was everything. She had lost her rightful fortune; but what was wealth to peace, security, happiness? Better that she should go forth, as he was going, beggared, homeless, an outcast, than that she should remain in the power, under the shadow, of the cunning, the intrigue of the wolf, Sheldon, and his hyæna-like accomplice, Lytle.

Digitized by Google

Yes, his duty was plain. His pledge to the dead, and the influence of the bonny wild-rose face that had perforce nestled against his own the evening previous, spurred him on to vivid resolve. She should be found again—told all. She should be removed, as a brand from the burning, to a safe retreat. The blighting, hateful influence of those two heartless plotters should never shadow her purity of soul as it had blighted her prospects. That first—the girl safe, for she was menaced. Of that there can be no doubt; for was not the man who had addressed her as a friend her worst secret enemy—Colonel Lytle?

What were the present plots of the schemers. Why was Lytle here? Why were they not content with robbing the orphan, and condemning her to a life of poverty and obscurity?

These questions Adrian Burgoyne could not answer, but the points involved he determined to speedily learn.

"They appropriated her fortune," he mused; "they provided her with a humble home somewhere near here, as I have now learned for the first time; but why is that man Lytle here? Is some new plot against this trustful, innocent creature on foot? It must be so, or—ah! can it be that they have learned of my supposed death—that, failing to secure from me the secret concerning the hiding-place of the greater bulk of Ralph Ringold's fortune, they are hopeful of gaining some information from her? What matters it? They never will learn. I, and I alone, hold the secret. No matter what they design, no matter what complications exist, I must see Patrice; I must reveal the true villainy of these men to her. I must induce her to fly to a place of safety. Then——"

His pale face flushed, his eyes glowed like two scintillating sparks of light. Then?—aye! the debt he owed these ruffians should be paid to the very last farthing! The hidden fortune!—his should be the hand to unearth it—the stolen fortune! Wily as a serpent, cunning as a fox, implacable, tireless, he would yet run these scoundrels to earth and strip them of their pilfered trappings, and for golden chains of luxury exchange the grim, rusted iron bars of the baleful prison.

Justice! His soul cried aloud for it, but first, protection for the unprotected, safety for the innocent, a clear field, right pitted against might, a battle to the death, and, in the end, who knew? The Book promised it; light might break at eventide, and he might forget his money, as waters that pass away!

The man was inspired as he rose to his feet. Freedom, blessed boon! was his. Experience had taught him caution. Aimlessly, mechanically, crushing the distorted book cover in his hand, he rose to his feet, and prepared to leave the spot.

"To evade Lytle, if he really is on my track," he formulated rapidly; "to find the girl I rescued, Patrice Ringold; to reveal the truth to her, to induce her to leave the remotest proximity to her enemies——"

He paused, and drew back into his covert, as voices fell upon his hearing.

Crouching, he listened. Two men were passing along the fence outside.

"And had only trouble for our pains," one of them was saying.

"Eh? hardly; we was paid, weren't we?" demanded the other.

"Yes, but the fellow who hired us didn't make much out of the operation."

"You mean the Colonel, as he calls himself?"

"Aye. Seems to me he must think a deal of a simple book to have us searching up and down the cliff half the night—searching for a lost Bible."

"Well, I guess he's interested in the pretty young lady up at Mrs. Loring's cottage."

"Oh! Miss Ringold?"

"Exactly. It were her Bible that she lost he was so anxious to find. Mebbe he's spooney on her, and wanted to show her his devotion, and all that, by finding the book."

The two men passed out of hearing. With a poorly-suppressed cry of mingled relief and enlightenment, Adrian Burgoyne sprang from his covert.

"Oh, the good fortune of it!" he exclaimed jubilantly. "Lytle was not seeking for me at all. Those are the men he had with the ropes at the cliff. They were not looking for me, but for a book, and the girl was Patrice, and she is living at the home of a Mrs. Loring. I can find her readily. I am safe to appear publicly. But why should Lytle go to all the trouble he did for a little book—this very Bible, I am sure?"

Perplexed and thoughtful, Burgoyne stepped through the break in the fence, and walked down the path leading by it.

The two men had disappeared, and a short distance away he saw the spires and chimneys of the little town of Lynde.

Inspecting the coverless Bible, he turned its pages over and over, wondering if the little volume could have any particular value for Patrice or Lytle, save as a cherished memento by the former.

He placed it in his pocket, reflecting that its return to Patrice would pave the way for the interview he meditated. Then, just as he crossed the playground of a district school, he carelessly flung away the crumpled and wet cover of the Bible.

"My course is simple," he cogitated. "I must evade Lytle as much as possible. I do not think he would recognise me, but I must be very cautious. As to Patrice—ah! if it should be as the villager hinted, that Lytle is in love with her, that he has so imbued her mind with his respectability and friendly interest that she would not credit my story? No! no! I will not lose heart. Circumstances shall guide me. First, to find the home of this Mrs. Loring; then to see Patrice privately. From her I may be able to learn the status of the plot of Lytle."

Burgoyne entered the village, secured a meal at a restaurant, and arranged his disordered attire at a mirror.

He smiled confidently as he realised what fire and flood had done for him in the way of disguise, yet a slight twinge of regret afflicted his mind as he reflected, too, that his personal appearance was not of a grade likely to attract a young lady. He looked "peculiar"—that word just expressed it—and yet a thrill of satisfaction gave him new courage as he remembered that Patrice Ringold had not shrunk from him in that terrible clamber for life or death up the steep sides of the river cliff.

He was walking down the one business street of the town, when he turned his attention to a window filled with books, illustrated papers, and toys.

Just next door was a livery stable, and, engaged in conversation with its presumable proprietor, was the cause of Burgoyne's perturbation—Colonel Lytle.

The former had come almost face to face with him. In fact, as he halted, slightly dismayed, Lytle's keen eyes had swept face and form completely.

Under that dread cynosure the startled Burgoyne had trembled, but, with a powerful effort, he had turned to the show window, as if no deeper emotion than idle curiosity swayed his mind.

Had he been recognised—had the shrewd eyes of his enemy penetrated the mask of disguise?

No. The reflection of Lytle's face in the burnished window pane showed not a trace of surprise or intelligence. He was safe. Colonel Lytle adjudged him dead, and the change wrought by his recent adventures had given him an appearance entirely foreign to his original identity.

"You will have the carriage ready at ten, without fail?" Burgoyne heard Lytle say.

"Promptly."

Digitized by Google

"Do not fail me. It is a matter of the greatest importance."

"At ten to-night, as you say, and a capable driver, equipped for a long drive."

"And a discreet one, who will appreciate double pay for keeping his ears shut and his eyes open," returned Lytle with a sinister smile, as he walked away.

At a safe distance Adrian Burgoyne shadowed him. His words had startled him. A carriage at midnight! What new plot was he contemplating?

Lytle proceeded to a cottage at the limits of the village, and near the river. Into it he vanished.

A few inquiries satisfied Burgoyne that it was the home of the girl he sought. More than that, he managed to engage a passer-by in general conversation, and deftly left the talk upon the subject of the inmates of the Loring cottage.

He learnt all he wished to know. Patrice had resided there for four years. A Mr. Sheldon, a reputed wealthy man, was a distant relative of Miss Ringold. He had never come to see her since sending her there. Out of sheer kindness of heart, he had provided for her. The Colonel was the man who had acted as his agent. This was his first appearance for four years in Lynde.

"Something is up," murmured Burgoyne convincedly, as he left the man and strolled on slowly. "What brings Lytle here just after my supposed death? What is the significance of the midnight carriage? How can I see Patrice? I dare not venture to the house; I must not arouse Lytle's remotest suspicions."

All through that day Burgoyne haunted the vicinity of the Loring cottage. Lytle came and went. Twice Burgoyne caught a fleeting glimpse of a fairy-like form flitting through the shrubbery, but ere he could get near enough to the grounds to make sure it was Patrice, the graceful presence had disappeared.

At dusk, however, he formulated a decisive plan. He felt sanguine that Lytle meditated some definite move that very night. Perhaps he intended removing Patrice to the city, to some more secluded and remote retreat. He must, he would, act within a few hours! Burgoyne was determined on that.

Dusk favoured a nearer approach to the cottage. He climbed the rear fence, and skirted the shrubbery in the garden, approaching the house cautiously and slowly.

It had a little wing comprising a single room. This apartment was used as a sitting-room, and here a light showed.

In its radiance he plainly made out the form of a man sprawling in an easy-chair, smoking a cigar and looking over some papers. It was Lytle.

In the kitchen Burgoyne discerned the mistress of the house, Mrs. Loring, putting away the supper dishes.

Where was Patrice? Anxiously the lurker scanned every window of the house; then he came round to its further side.

"Ah! it is she."

In a fervent gasp Burgoyne uttered the words, and, spell-bound, fixed his eyes on a window not twenty feet distant.

It was open, and partially covered with a delicate trailing vine. A lamp set on a stand revealed the interior of an apartment typically suggestive of the calm, peaceful, pastoral life led by its inexperienced occupant.

The snowy bed, the bright, cheery wall paper, the countless ornaments formed of flowers, leaves and shells, the neat dimity curtains tied back with a bit of blue ribbon, formed a glowing framework for the radiant creature who stood at that moment braiding her beautiful tresses as the finishing touch to a toilet neat and becoming as her surroundings.

The heart of the watcher thrilled at the loveliness that spoke eloquently in lip, cheek, and eye. Purity, innocence, simplicity won his loftiest tribute. For her sake, though all unknown to her, he had suffered five years of awful torture. But she was worthy of it; he did not regret it, if only those sweet, sympathetic lips could tell him: "I thank you. I revere you for your fidelity to the father I mourn and love."

Patrice tucked away a stray lock under the silver band that held her tresses as in a crown. Then, extinguishing the lamp, she came to the window, sat down there, and gazed calmly out at the star-spangled heavens, as if waiting, in tranquil reverie, some expected summons from her guest in the best room of the humble little house.

Adrian Burgoyne took a step nearer to the open window. How could he speak without startling her? Would he be allowed an uninterrupted interview of sufficient length to tell her all?

Earth, air, and sky were in harmony with placid reverie, rather than dark, stormy disclosures. It seemed almost a crime to disturb the even, unbroken course of that peaceful and innocent life.

He drew nearer and nearer. He could make out her sweet, earnest face plainly in the half light of the holy, tranquil stars. He could catch her breathing faintly. From her filmy hair-ribbons and the lace garniture at her snowy throat an odour of solemn sanctity seemed to float and permeate that night of sweet sounds, swaying his senses in loving tribute to so much innocence and beauty.

Adrian Burgoyne was at the window now. He reached forth his hand gently. He allowed it to fall upon the white, snowy one of the fair dreamer, whose eyes, uplifted, seemed communing with the angels at the gates of Heaven.

"Patrice," he said softly—"Patrice!"

CHAPTER XIII.

THE DAWN OF LOVE.

THE young girl uttered a quick, frightened cry, and shrank back timidly. Then something gentle though mandatory, persuasive though sudden, in the earnest clasp of the hand that rested across her own, checked the wild utterance of alarm arising involuntarily to her lips.

"Who is it?" she faltered. "I——"

"Do not cry out, I beg of you!" spoke Burgoyne agitatedly, in a low tone of voice, and gazing with apprehension towards the front of the house. "I have been waiting all day to see you, and——"

"Oh, I know you now."

The words burst unrestrainedly from the lips of Patrice. Interrupted, amazed, Burgoyne saw the beautiful face break into one radiant glow of ingenuous delight.

"You know me?" he repeated vaguely.

"Yes, oh, yes!" breathed his companion, with sparkling eyes, forgetting all her timid alarm, her true, womanly, sympathetic soul revealed. "Oh! my friend, my deliverer! Do you think I could ever forget? Do you think——"

She broke down there. More precious than the richest jewels to the longing, famished soul of the poor outcast, he saw the pearly teardrops, and his heart choked him with joy ineffable.

"I thought you were dead," she sobbed, but smiling. "Your sad end haunted me all day. I was praying for you here, just now. I was thinking of your noble sacrifice for me, an unknown girl, my brave deliverer—my friend, my dear, dear friend."

Patrice had sought his hand with both her own. She caressed it as might a sister. The flood gates of emotion were open, and she had not the art to dissimulate her true emotions.

"And you must come in now, at once. Mrs. Loring will want to see you, to thank you, and I—can I ever cease blessing you for what you have done for me?"

"Wait!" gasped Burgoyne, too overwhelmed until now to check the vivacious flow of gratitude. "Do not call anyone—do not speak so loud. My visit must be a secret one. Miss Ringold—Patrice—pardon me, but I must explain."

Digitized by Google

She drew slightly away from him at his strange, impetuous words.

"Your visit a secret?" she faltered.

"Yes. Listen a moment. If I must be surreptitious, stealthy in my movements, there is a motive for it. I must speak to you here, now, at once, ere it is too late. No one must see me. Pardon the necessity of a clandestine meeting, but——"

"Do you think I mistrust you, blame you?" interrupted Patrice quickly. "No; only your strange words! What do they mean?"

He regarded her, his soul in his eyes. His voice quivered as he again addressed her.

"Patrice," he said, "you say I saved your life. If I place mine within your keeping—if I tell the woeful, shameful story for the first time to you of my broken, blighted life—if I disturb the calm, placid current of your happy young existence, will you forgive me and keep sealed lips?"

"I do not understand—I cannot comprehend!" stammered the girl, vaguely affrighted.

"Then, in a word I will explain. I dare not appear openly, because I am—an escaped convict!"

"You!"

Incredulity, shuddering distrust, lingered in the accents.

"Yes, more than that—a miserable, hunted fugitive; still more—the enemy, the victim, of the man who is your guest, your friend—nearer and dearer still, for all I know—Colonel Lytle."

His voice was almost a sob. The sad, direful necessity of the brutal revelation seared his soul.

With a shock the girl recoiled. The disclosure overwhelmed her.

"But—but innocent!" she gasped faintly. "Oh! I know you could not be a—a—that! You have suffered; your face tells me that. You are true, noble, manly. You are the man who saved my life!"

"And something more, Patrice," spoke Burgoyne impressively. "I am your dead father's friend; he died in my arms. He died imploring me to perform a sacred mission looking to your welfare. Listen."

She was silent now. So little of the sensational and startling had come into her life through the years of secluded girlhood that the overwhelming declaration of her strange visitor, gaining in force and intensity each moment, electrified, paralysed her.

In the eloquence of innocence vindicating itself, in the wild, pitiful accents of a martyr, a victim, Burgoyne spoke, and she listened. From first to last he told his tragic story. He saw her wonder-filled eyes glow, first with incredulity, and then slow-dawning confidence and trustfulness were succeeded by the luminous glow of filial affection and grief, as he depicted her father's sad demise. She shuddered at the sure revelation of the daring duplicity of Richard Sheldon and his ally; her face grew white as death over the recital of the cruel wrongs Burgoyne had suffered; she melted into womanly tears and true womanly pity as he told of the years of prison blight and torture.

"I believe you. For my sake, for my unworthy sake, you did all this? Oh! my friend, my deliverer!"

Her fair tresses swept his face as she clasped his hands in frantic emotion. Almost unmanned, he faltered. Then he implored her to calmness. The long but rapidly-told narrative was ended, her peril depicted, his plans of flight outlined.

The minutes had flown apace; a little clock inside had struck another hour. Still at the window he lingered, pouring into her ear the vivid story that seemed to awaken her like a shock from a peaceful, sunny dream.

Once, as the enormity of the crime of Richard Sheldon appalled her untutored senses, she seemed on the verge of fainting.

Once, too, at the thought of leaving her peaceful home and becoming a fugitive, an outcast, she shuddered.

A single realisation, however, of some sinister plot meditated by Lytle, a single glance at the earnest, resolute face of her champion, told Patrice Ringold that into his safe keeping she could trust her future, as to the watch and ward of her own brother.

It was strange, it was sudden, but so, evidently, too, would prove the next move of the plotters.

She listened with a wildly-beating heart to the revelation of Lytle's trickery. She must leave Lynde at once. She must not even bid her motherly friend, Mrs. Loring, goodbye. Burgoyne had sufficient money to convey her to a safe retreat. Then to formulate a plan for unmasking her enemies—for a search for the fortune hidden away in Mexico.

"I will come," she said, placing her hand confidingly in his own. "I am too stunned at all you have told me to act coherently. You must act for me. My father's friend, my rescuer, I place my life in your hands, and can only pray for you and bless you!"

Her eyes were swimming with pity for her wronged, forlorn champion.

"I think," she went on, more composedly at length, "that I can explain the object of this man Lytle's visit."

"You can?" murmured Burgoyne eagerly.

"Yes; in some way he or his employer has become possessed of a knowledge of the contents of the secret piece of parchment my father gave you—the cipher description of the hiding-place of his wealth."

"Impossible!" ejaculated Burgoyne.

"Then why did he come here to find the key?"

"The key?" repeated Burgoyne vaguely.

"Yes. He pretended when he came yesterday that he had discovered some old and useless documents among my dead father's papers. They wished to translate one of these. He asked me a number of mystifying questions, then he showed me a small piece of paper. Mr. Burgoyne, I am not mistaken. It bore the very same characters which you describe as being contained in the bit of parchment which you secreted through your long imprisonment—which Richard Sheldon so desired to secure."

Adrian Burgoyne looked worried, but he said with emphasis:

"It could not be; no one ever saw the parchment message, no one ever possessed it but myself—unless they have by accident stumbled over a copy of it, or—no! no! that secret is ours—ours alone; that secret is safe."

"And you still possess the parchment?" asked Patrice.

Adrian Burgoyne's face fell. He looked grave.

"No," he answered in a low tone. "I am sorry to say that I do not."

"Then——"

"I carried it for years. I had it safe in a bandage worn across my breast the night I was so nearly captured. That night I lost it. Falling off, sunk in the lake, destroyed by fire, given to the winds, of one thing I am certain—those knaves could by no possible circumstances have gained possession of it."

"But if you have lost it—the treasured, important clue to my father's hidden fortune," spoke Patrice earnestly—"how can you hope to ever find that wealth?"

"Do not fear," answered Burgoyne, with a mysterious smile. "I have provided against its loss."

"Ah, you have memorised the parchment message, then?" ventured Patrice, even amid the excitement and urgency of the moment betraying a woman's natural curiosity.

"No, I have—— But we must not waste time speaking of that now," said Burgoyne hurriedly. "There are more important themes to discuss. You were saying that Lytle asked you about a key to the cipher characters. You had one?"

"Yes." And Patrice explained that her father had been wont to correspond with her about the same.

"And the key you possessed?" queried Burgoyne eagerly.

"Was an alphabet that I had preserved. It was contained in my mother's little Bible. I kept it there—both mementoes of my dead parents."

Digitized by Google

"In the Bible?" exclaimed Burgoyne excitedly.

"Yes; I lost it, and this man Lytle was seeking to recover it all last night."

Burgoyne comprehended. In a flash his hand went to his breast pocket.

"I found that Bible when I fell over the cliff," he explained.

"You found it?" murmured the startled Patrice.

"Yes."

"Then you have it?"

"Here!"

Burgoyne produced the book in question.

"Yes," murmured Patrice, examining the Bible in the starlight. "It is the same book."

"And the cipher alphabet is somewhere in it?" queried Burgoyne excitedly. "I did not look through it, only casually. Oh! how fortunate. Find it, Patrice, quick! Then I can translate the message, and——"

"Why, Mr. Burgoyne!" faltered Patrice, "the cipher alphabet was written on a sheet of paper."

"Yes?"

"Folded up and secreted in a compartment in the back cover of the Bible."

Despite his caution, Burgoyne uttered a startled cry.

"In the cover?" he ejaculated in dismay.

"Yes. You found that, too."

"Yes, but the rain had soaked it and disfigured it. I threw the cover away."

"Threw—it—away!" gasped Patrice in a despairing tone of voice.

"Yes, never dreaming the truth. No! no! the loss is not serious, irredeemable. I remember distinctly where I cast it. I can certainly find it again."

"You think so?" murmured Patrice anxiously.

"I am positive of it, Patrice," spoke Burgoyne seriously. "We must waste no more time in talking now. I will hasten to the spot where I threw the Bible cover; will seek for it, find it, and return as speedily as possible. You will be ready then to accompany me?"

"Without fail," she replied staunchly.

"Where will I meet you?"

"At the little gate leading into the meadow."

"In one hour?"

"As you say. Wait one moment."

She extended a detaining hand as he was about to speed away on his mission.

Burgoyne came back to the window.

"What is it, Patrice?" he asked.

"If you find the alphabet——"

Still she hesitated, embarrassed.

"Yes?"

"And if it is really the key to the parchment message, you can translate it?"

"Most certainly."

"But you have lost the parchment?"

"That is true," admitted Burgoyne.

"Do you trust to your memory to recall the message?"

"No. You are curious, Patrice," smiled Burgoyne. "Well, I will tell you all. Fearing I might lose the parchment or be forced to destroy it, in order that it might not fall into the hands of Richard Sheldon I made a copy of it."

"A copy!" repeated Patrice, still curiously.

"Yes, an imperishable record," answered Adrian Burgoyne, a certain set, stern expression coming over his classic features.

"And you have that copy with you?"

"Always! It is here!"

As he spoke, Adrian Burgoyne described a singular movement. It was to extend one arm; with the other he bared it until the firm, sinewy member showed clear up to the elbow, white as snow, in contrast to the acid-stained hand and wrist.

Across the forearm was a legend in blue, indelible ink—an array of symbolic characters exactly similar to those contained in the famous parchment message.

"Tattooed there," exclaimed Burgoyne. "It was painful; it was a laborious task, but——"

Repaid? Oh, tenfold!—a hundred-fold repaid—for, the tears of pity and appreciation welling in her beautiful eyes. Patrice Ringold leant suddenly forward.

Her eyes gazed on the chronicle of pain and fidelity, as if her heart went utterly forth to meet his own, at this final evidence of his sterling courage and resolution.

"For my poor sake—all for me!" she sobbed. "Oh, my friend, my champion, my hero, I adore you!"

(To be continued.)

A GREAT WAR STORY

which everyone should read at the present time has just commenced in

PEARSON'S WEEKLY.

One Penny. Every Saturday.

NO. III. OF THE SECOND SERIES

OF

PEARSON'S PHOTOGRAPHIC PORTFOLIO

OF

FOOTLIGHT FAVOURITES

IS

6d. NOW ON SALE. 6d.

It contains magnificent full-page portraits of the following leading actors and actresses:

MR. JOHN LE HAY, MISS FRANCES EARLE, MISS ETHEL SIDNEY, MISS MAY SOMERVILLE, MISS MARIE LLOYD, MISS MAY FLEMING, MISS ESTHER PALLISER, MISS MIMI ST. CYR, MADAME MARIE ROZE, MISS CLARA WIELAND, MISS VIOLET EVELYN, MONS. MAURICE FARKOA, MR. STUART ROBSON, MISS ANNIE MYERS, MISS MAY EDOUIN, and MISS KATIE SEYMOUR.

POSTAL RATES.

SHORT STORIES will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON, at "Pearson's Weekly" Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

"DELIGHTFUL" TREATMENT

FOR CURING

CORPULENCE.

The process of curing any physical disorder is so generally the reverse of "delightful" that the use of this and similar terms in reference to Mr. F. C. Russell's now popular treatment for corpulency naturally attracts special attention. These terms are to be found in a large number of the letters included in the just issued 18th edition of Mr. Russell's little volume of 256 pages. "Corpulency, and the Cure" (Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C.). These communications are from persons of both sexes, and it is apparent that their number is represented by thousands annually, who have found in this system of treatment a safe, rapid, and permanent cure for excessive fatness. This testimony forms in the aggregate, indeed, a wonderful record of the rapid reduction of excessive adipose tissue, and those who have personal reasons for being interested in the subject should send to the above address six penny stamps for a copy (post free) of Mr. Russell's notably suggestive little book. "I think the treatment most delightful," writes one out of a large number of equally enthusiastic correspondents. And the expressions "Admirable tonic," "Splendid stuff," "A delicious beverage, mixed with mineral waters," are of constant recurrence in this singularly interesting correspondence. The details given by many of the writers of these letters as to the results of the treatment fully justify the use of such eulogistic phrases. It must certainly be delightful to experience the sensation of losing unnecessary and dangerous fat by pounds per week, and frequently by stones per month, and that by the aid of treatment which simultaneously increases the appetite and renders its reasonable indulgence innocuous. The experience, too, must be rendered still more delightful by the knowledge, which may be gained from a perusal of Mr. Russell's book, that his preparation is a pure vegetable product, without any admixture of the mineral poisons which are too frequently administered. With a candour which also is delightful, Mr. Russell prints in his book the recipe for the preparation.

A POSITIVE REMEDY

FOR

CORPULENCE

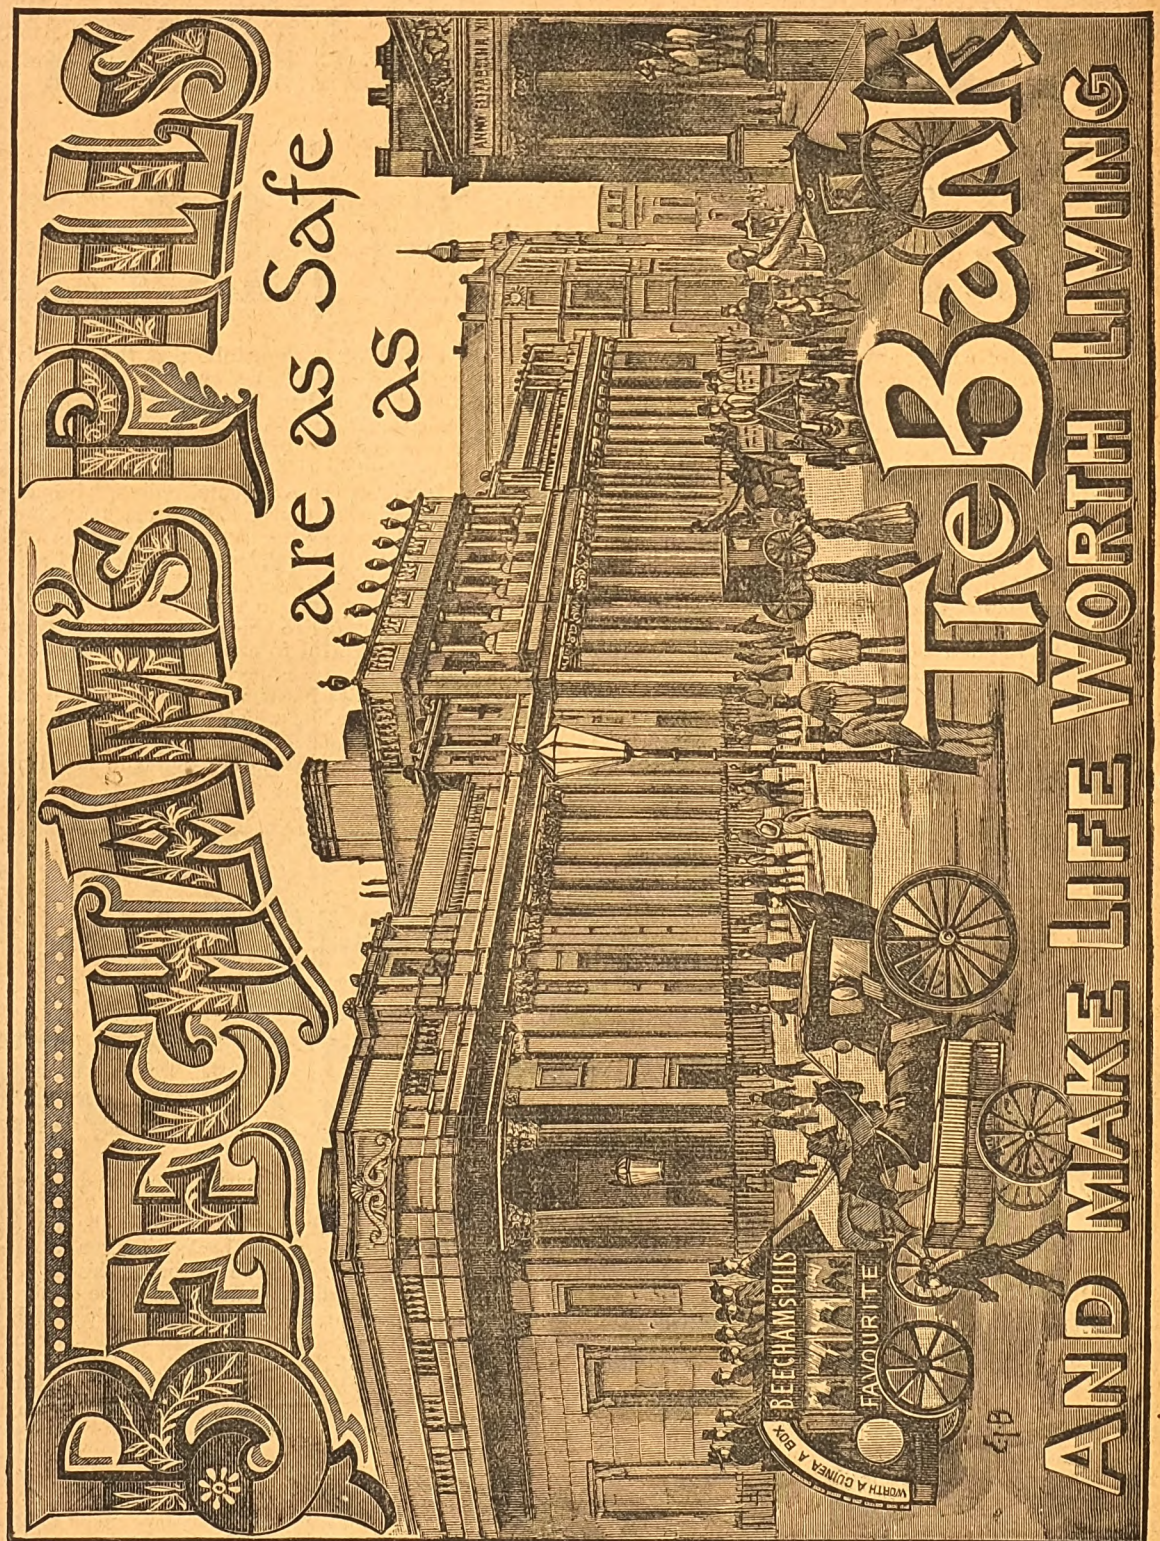
"Any remedy that can be suggested as a cure or alleviation for stoutness will be heartily welcomed. We have recently received a well-written book, the author of which seems to know what he is talking about. It is entitled, 'Corpulency, and the Cure' (256 pages), and is a cheap issue (only 6d), published by Mr. F. C. Russell, of Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C. Our space will not do justice to this book; send for it yourself. It appears that Mr. Russell has submitted all kinds of proofs to the English Press. The editor of the Tablet, the Catholic organ, writes: "Mr. Russell does not give us the slightest loophole for a doubt as to the value of his cure, for in the most straightforward and matter-of-fact manner he submitted some hundreds of original and unsolicited testimonial letters for our perusal, and offered us plenty more if required. To assist him to make this remedy known, we think we cannot do better than publish quotations from some of the letters submitted. The first one, a marchioness, writes from Madrid: 'My son, Count——, has reduced his weight in twenty-two days 16 kilos—i.e., 34lbs.' Another writes: 'So far (six weeks from the commencement of following your system) I have lost fully two stone in weight.' The next (a lady) writes: 'I am just half the size.' A fourth: 'I find it is successful in my case. I have lost 8lbs. in weight since I commenced (two weeks).' Another writes: 'A reduction of 18lbs. in a month is a great success.' A lady from Bournemouth writes: 'I feel much better, have less difficulty in breathing, and can walk about.' Again, a lady says: 'It reduced me considerably, not only in the body, but all over.' The author is very positive. He says: 'Step on a weighing-machine on Monday morning and again on Tuesday, and I guarantee that you have lost 2lbs. in weight without the slightest harm, and vast improvement in health through ridding the system of unhealthy accumulations.'"—Cork Herald.

Digitized by Google

BEECHAM'S PILLS

are as Safe as the Bank

AND MAKE LIFE WORTH LIVING



Digitized by Google

THIRTY-TWO PAGES. ONE PENNY.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 368. FOR WEEK ENDING JANUARY 18TH, 1896. [ONE PENNY.

THE FIRST GRAND

"PIONEER" REDUCTION SALE

By Messrs. F. HODGSON & SON,
The Well-known Carpet Manufacturers of the City of Leeds.

OUR NEW VENTURE! Yes, Two Different Pattern Hearthrugs or Carpets for the Price of One! (Copyright).

Whereas, in launching forth our New Production, THE "PRUDENTIAL" CARPETS AND HEARTHRUGS, we beg to state they will have a Rich Turkish and Persian Design on one side, and on the reverse the elegant and costly designs of Wilton make. The advantage thus gained is great, as they can be utilised in various rooms at one cost. This is a valuable step in economy.

PRODIGIOUS SALE OF THE

"PRUDENTIAL" Reversible CARPETS

(Registered.)

Reversible, with a different pattern on both sides, woven throughout with handsome border to correspond; richly blended in several colours to suit any furniture. Made in 10 sizes only. These carpets are the production of much care, labour, and forethought, and are made in handsome and elaborate patterns (which are protected by registration). They combine the rich blended colours of the Turkish and Persian with the elegant designs of the Wilton. These goods cannot be distinguished from real Brussels when laid down, and cannot be excelled in durability.

	Each.		Each.
6ft. by 9ft., Reduced Sale Price	5/6	10½ft. by 12ft. Reduced Sale Price	13/6
7½ft. by 9ft. " " "	7/6	12ft. by 12ft., " " "	15/6
9ft. by 9ft. " " "	8/6	12ft. by 13½ft., " " "	17/6
9ft. by 10½ft., " " "	9/6	12ft. by 15ft., " " "	19/6
9ft. by 12ft., " " "	11/6	12ft. by 18ft., " " "	24/0

When ordering please mention if for Bed, Dining, Drawing, or Sitting Room, and any particular colour preferred.

Blairquhan, Maybole, N.B., August 3rd, 1894.

Lady Hunter Blair writes: "Will Messrs. F. Hodgson & Son send her another 'Prudential' Carpet, same as before, crimson and gold, dimensions, 9ft. by 10½ft. Cheque inclosed."

A Reversible "Prudential" Hearthrug (Reg)., to match above Carpets, sent for 1s. 6d. extra, size 2 yards long, and 1 yard wide.

SPECIAL OFFER.—3 Hearthrugs for 4s. 3d.; or 6 for 8s.; or 12 for 15s. 6d.

EXTRAORDINARY REDUCTIONS.

100,000 "ECLIPSE" CARPETS

(Registered). GUARANTEED GENUINE BARGAINS.

Sale Price 3/6 EACH.

This Gigantic Offer is a Special Contract, made with readers of Short Stories only. We will forward direct from the looms to any address on receipt of amount, A GENUINE WOVEN, SEAMLESS, REVERSIBLE CARPET, the largest ever sold at the Price.

Suitable for Sitting-room or Bedroom, Bordered and Woven in Art Colours, large enough to cover any ordinary-sized room, as an advertisement for our goods, thus saving any Middle Profits. Remember these are Woven, not printed, and are made of a material almost equal to Wool. Thousands of these Carpets and Rugs have already been sold at almost double above prices. A Rug sent with Carpet, 1s. extra.

SPECIAL OFFER. { 2 Carpets and 2 Rugs ... ... 8s. 0d.
{ 4 Carpets and 4 Rugs ... ... 15s. 6d.

Value unequalled in the Annals of Advertising. As a favour, kindly Examine and Compare these Carpets.

"SHORT STORIES" CARPET COUPON, 18/1/96.

On receipt of this Coupon and P.O.O. or Stamps for amount, we guarantee to send goods as above to your address in any part of the United Kingdom. Cash returned in full if not satisfied.

(Signed) F. HODGSON & SON.

All orders dispatched same day in rotation as they arrive by post. Cheques and P.O.'s payable to

F. HODGSON AND SON, Manufacturers, Importers, and Merchants, WOODSLEY ROAD, LEEDS.

MASON'S

EXTRACT OF HERBS

For the Immediate Production of

BOTANIC BEER.

A Nine-gallon Cask of Alcoholic Beer from a Brewery will cost you 10/6, but Eight Gallons of Beer made from

Mason's EXTRACT of HERBS

Can be obtained for 6d., plus a pound or two of Sugar and a little Yeast.

THE FINEST BEVERAGE
IN THE WORLD.

Inventors and Manufacturers:

Newball & Mason,
HYSON GREEN WORKS,
Nottingham.

If unable to obtain it in your neighbourhood, send 9 stamps for sample bottle; or samples of both Wine Essence and Extract of Herbs, post free for 15 stamps.

PALATABLE SUBSTITUTE FOR COD LIVER OIL.

DEVONSHIRE CREAM.

(REALLY GENUINE.)

In Patent Air-tight Tins, ½lb., 1s. 4d.; 1lb., 2s. 4d.; 2lbs., 4s., including Tin and Postage.

MRS. CONYERS, KILKHAMPTON, STRATTON, N. DEVON.

"THE NIMBLE 9D."

Great Reduction in price to 9d. per lb. in order to reduce stock, but

QUALITY GOOD AS EVER.

NEARLY 100,000 BEDS ALREADY SOLD

TO THOROUGHLY SATISFIED PURCHASERS.

NEWHAM'S LINCOLNSHIRE FEATHER BEDS

THESE BEDS are warranted doubly purified, dusted, and perfected in our own extensive factory at Boston, Lincs., made in strong linen bordered tick. The quality, sweetness, and purity of every bed guaranteed. These beds ALWAYS GIVE SATISFACTION, and many thousands of purchasers have sent us flattering testimonials and other orders for beds. Note following prices, which are 25 per cent. less than our recently advertised prices.

No. 1—Single Bed, Bolster and Pillow, 6ft. 3in. by 3ft. 6in., weighing 40lbs. 30/-

No. 2—Double Bed, Bolster, and Two Pillows, 6ft. 6in. by 4ft 6in., weighing 50lbs.... ... ... 37/6

No. 3—Double Bed, Bolster, and Two Pillows, 6ft. 6in. by 4ft. 6in., weighing 55lbs. 41/3

No. 4—Extra Size Bed, Bolster, and Two Pillows, 6ft. 6in. by 5ft., weighing 65lbs. 48/9

Any sized Bed only 9d. per lb., Carriage Paid, to any station in the United Kingdom. FEATHERS ONLY 9d. PER LB. The trade supplied. All orders must be accompanied by cheque or P.O.O. (which, as security to purchasers, may be post-dated ten days). Send for samples of Feathers and Ticks, Price Lists, etc., which will be sent Post Free and need not be returned. A great reduction on three or more Beds. Please mention this paper.

S. S. NEWHAM & CO., Boston, Lincolnshire.

MRS. JACKSON

An artist's wife, residing at Norton, near Malton, states: "I am deeply grateful to you for the good received through taking your Wind Pills. I suffered severely from

INDIGESTION, SPASMS,

and LIVER COMPLAINT. The doctors gave me up as incurable, nor did I think it possible for me to recover. I scarcely dared to eat any food, fearing suffocation. Seeing an advertisement of

Page Woodcock's Wind Pills,

I resolved to try them. After taking a few small boxes I lost all the painful symptoms, and now enjoy good health. Publish my statement as you please."

All sufferers from INDIGESTION, LIVER COMPLAINTS, WIND on the STOMACH, SICK HEADACHE, BILIOUSNESS, etc., should avail themselves of this most excellent medicine.

☛ The Wind Pills being purely Vegetable, Tasteless, and Mild, and Tonic in their action, may be taken with perfect safety by the most delicate of either sex.

Of all Medicine Vendors, at 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. Post Free for P.O. or Stamps from PAGE WOODCOCK, LINCOLN.

EPPS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

COCOA

TO THE DEAF.

A Gentleman who cured himself of Deafness and Noises in the Head after fourteen years' suffering, will gladly send full particulars of the remedy post free.—Address, H. CLIFTON, Norfolk House, Norfolk Street, Strand, London, W.C.

TO TOBACCONISTS COMMENCING.

£20 See Illus. Guide and Catalogue (250 pages), 2d. "How to Open a Cigar Stores, from £20 to £2,000." TOBACCONISTS' OUTFITTING Co., 188, Euston Road, London. (Over 50 years' reputation.) Manager H. MYERS.

S.S. S.S.
PEARSON'S
£100
COUPON.
No. 3
Jan. 18, 1896.
S.S. S.S.

HAIR DESTROYED.

A doctor's widow knows of a simple, inexpensive remedy that permanently destroys the roots, and will forward particulars free to all those afflicted sending stamped envelope. Address Mrs. B. D. WOOD, 4, DUKE STREET, VILLIERS STREET, LONDON, W.

ARE YOU LITTLE?

If so, wear the "A D" Invisible Elevators (Regd.). Will increase your height up to four inches; the only approved means; detection impossible; simple, inexpensive. Send stamped envelope for particulars to the ORIENTAL TOILET Co. (B 5 Dept.), 87, Strand, London.

DOUGLAS, HUNGERFORD, AND WILLIAMS.

PROFITS PAID DURING 1895.

Jan. 2, £8 per cent., Feb. 1, £6, Mar. 1, £5, April 1, £8, May 1, £7, June 2, £10, July 1, £9, Aug. 1, £9, Sept. 2, £8, Oct. 1, £8, Nov. 1, £7, Dec. 2, £7.

Total for 12 months £92 per cent., an average of nearly £8 PER CENT. PER MONTH.

PROFITS PAID DURING 1896.

Jan. 2 ... ... £6 per cent.

OUR NEW ILLUSTRATED MANUAL mailed free upon request, showing how these profits may be made WITHOUT SPECULATION. Cheques for profits mailed promptly 1st of each month, and for withdrawals of capital on 2nd and 16th of each month. Trial investments of £5 and upwards may be made.

We have not a dissatisfied Client.

DOUGLAS, HUNGERFORD, & WILLIAMS, 5, Copthall Avenue, London, E.C., and 11, Place de la Bourse, Paris.

BLUSHING

Permanently cured. A Pamphlet giving sound practical advice and particulars of a successful treatment for a rapid, simple, and inexpensive home-cure, forwarded free to all upon receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—Prof. B. L. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

HAIR DESTROYED

permanently and absolutely by an entirely new and harmless self-treatment, total destruction guaranteed. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope. Prof. F. T. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

TOO STOUT

Dr. Grey's FAT REDUCING Pills.

A safe, rapid, and permanent reduction and improvement in health and breathing guaranteed. A special preparation kept for stubborn cases (either sex) which have resisted other treatment.

ABDOMINAL OBESITY A SPECIALTY.

2/9 and 4/6 per box, plain wrapper, post free to all parts. Dr. O. GREY, 57, Weymouth St., Portland Pl., London, W.

TOOTH-ACHE

CURED INSTANTLY BY

BUNTER'S NERVINE

Prevents Decay. Saves Extraction. Sleepless Nights Prevented. Neuralgic Headache and all Nerve Pains Removed by BUNTER'S NERVINE. All Chemists, 1s. 1½d.

TRILENE FAT TABLETS
THE ONLY CURE for STOUTNESS
Registered by GOVERNMENT
Price 2/6

ALL FAT PEOPLE

Readily Reduce Weight and Cure Corpulency Permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are very agreeable, harmless, and never fail to PRESERVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of diet. Reduction begins immediately.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably." Send 2/6 to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C.

RUBBER STAMPS

FREE BY POST.

AGENTS WANTED.

Liberal commissions.

Your MONOGRAM, 2 letters, 1/2; 3 letters or Name in full, 1/8, including Box, Pad, and Ink, for Paper or Indelible Marking Ink for linen. All kinds of stamps. Illustrated Lists free.

S. S. IRETON & CO., Ltd., 92, Gracechurch St., London, E.C.

VIOLIN STRINGS.

4 Best "E's" (samples) 9d., post free.

S. S. CARY, NEWBURY.

HAIR DESTROYED.

A lady who has permanently destroyed Superfluous Hairs on herself, will be happy to forward free, to all similarly afflicted, full particulars of a simple, inexpensive and harmless self-treatment. Send stamped addressed envelope in confidence to Mrs. "T. D.," 87, Strand, London.

Digitized by Google

No 368.—One Penny. January 18, 1896.

SHORT STORIES

ONE BLIND EYE.

DAWN was gradually spreading over the city—a cheerless midwinter dawn, begriming everything it touched.

In his studio Dockery coughed, and tucked his blanket closer round him on the lounge. The air was heavy with the damp chill of a room long untenanted, and its few bare furnishings, most of which were hardly unpacked, proved that their owner had but lately taken possession.

A torn shade dangled from the skylight. A sheet of dark crayon paper, left by some previous occupant, was pasted over a stove-pipe hole above the mantelpiece, and, like the rest of the fittings, it had gathered a coating of dust. A sooty, unused fireplace was below, with an empty grate, a dusty hearth, and a new bundle of firewood. Dockery had bought the firewood a week before, and being unable to afford more, was keeping this until luck should change or until he should positively need a fire.

All the unpacked canvases in the room were ranged face against the wall, whilst others lay in unpicturesque rolls about the floor. Dockery had picked a framed picture up the evening before, intending to hang it somewhere, and then, remembering it as one which had been refused by the "Society," and feeling a fresh sense of discouragement at the recollection, had left the thing where he found it.

Decidedly it was too cold to sleep. He raised himself on his elbow and looked at the fireplace, then rose slowly and stiffly from the lounge and dressed.

A forlorn-toned city clock struck six.

Dockery stumbled about the studio awhile under a vague impression that such an exercise would warm him. Finally he gave it up; the dull confusion of his quarters was too depressing. Buttoning his frayed overcoat, and pulling his hat firmly over his forehead, he left the studio and stole softly down the uncarpeted staircase. There was no one to hear him save the porter's family in the basement, but the fear of disturbing the least soul had become a habit with Dockery. Perhaps it accounted for his own poor place in the race.

Clear, bracing sunlight brightened the world when Dockery returned, but, instead of going up to his studio as usual, the artist made his way down a dark little staircase which led to the basement, and stopped at the porter's door. He stood a moment fumbling in the breast-pocket of his coat, and then knocked.

The porter's wife came to the door. She was a sinewy little German woman, with tight curling, tumbled black hair, piercing black eyes, and the warmest heart in the world.

"I—a—," began Dockery, for his mission was a little awkward to explain, "I—ah——"

All rights reserved.]

"Vy, goot morning! Goot morning!" she interrupted heartily. "You vater ees froze? My Villiam 'as been at de pump dose fifteen minutes. He vill 'ave it all fix soon, you see."

"Oh, no," cried poor Dockery, "that's not it, but you see," and he wore the funniest shame-faced expression, as, stepping into the kitchen where a window or two gave light from the court, he held something out to her which he had been keeping against his coat.

"Vy, de leetle cat!" she exclaimed. "Mister Dockery, vere he come from?"

"Why, I found him in the street," explained Dockery, with symptoms of genuine pride in his tone. "Poor little chap was nearly frozen, but he seems better already. I haven't anything fit for kittens to eat upstairs, so I just stopped to see if I could get a little milk from you, and after this get you to take extra milk and sell me some. Do—do you think a pint would do?"

"Pint?" cried the little woman merrily. "Pint? Wat leeetle cat can do wid a pint of milk? I will ged him some. Dere ees blenty here. Come, pussie—come. Ze leetle pussie!"

Such a mite of a kitten, like an overgrown black caterpillar, cuddled in the hollow of her hand. She took it over to the window.

"Are his eyes open?" asked Dockery, following her eagerly. "Why, what's the matter?"

The woman had given a little scream. She was holding the kitten away from her by the nape of the neck.

"What is it?" repeated Dockery.

Still holding the kitten at arm's length, she simply pointed at its head, saying:

"Black—an' de blind eye!"

"Blind, is he?" said Dockery, coming closer to the curled-up mite which hung from between her forefinger and thumb. "Poor little chap. Let me see. Sure enough, his right eye is gone, but I warrant you this one will be sharp enough for two. Poor little chap! Now, if you'll just get me something to feed him out of, I'll take him along."

To himself Dockery acknowledged that he did not like the way she was holding it. But now the little woman stared at him in astonishment.

"You not goin' to keep him!" she cried at last. "You vill not bring de bad luck in de house? Eet ees not goot de black cat wid blind eye to keep. No, no. Ve put him vere he vas."

"Oh, no," said Dockery. "Give him to me. He will be all right. I couldn't let him stay out in this weather, you know. When it grows warmer, perhaps——"

She let him take the kitten, and spreading her palms

Digitized by Google

outwards, signified that she washed her hands of the whole affair. A moment later she shook her head distrustfully, murmuring:

"I no got use for de blind eye in a cat dat ees black. He bring trouble in your house. Eet ees de sure sign."

But her interest in this solitary lodger moved her to comply with his desire for something to feed his kitten from, and although she protested to the last moment, Dockery went up to his studio bearing with him a tin cup, an old teaspoon, and a forlorn little emaciated black kitten with one blind eye.

"So you bring bad luck to the house, hey, puss?"

Dockery stopped painting a moment, and glanced over his shoulder as he spoke. Since the kitten had joined its fortunes to his, he had been in the habit of keeping an eye on it, as he explained to the German woman downstairs, but such an interpretation hardly accounted for the long confidential talks in which Dockery revealed all his theories, his ambitions, and the reasons of his continued defeats, frequently ending with the gloomiest expressions of hopeless discouragement. The truth was that to the lonely artist in his unfrequented studio, the kitten had become as good as people.

"Are you bad luck?" Dockery repeated playfully, over his shoulder.

The kitten emerged from a shadowy corner, where, with precocious instinct, it had been scenting out the probabilities of mice. Fluffy, undressed black, it seemed to be, with an impertinent little look due to the necessity it felt of cocking its head on one side, the better to make use of its single eye. It came slowly across the floor on wavering legs, and when it reached the easel sat down beside it on its insignificant tail.

Dockery put the brush he was using between his teeth a moment, and, bending over, took the little fellow up. The brightness of the sunlit outer world came in at the skylight, and, with the sketches Dockery had tacked up, and the litter of wrappings and cordings which the porter's wife had taken out, the studio looked almost homelike. But warmth was wanting.

Beside the grate lay the bundle of firewood. Near by, against the wall, leant the "Society" picture without its frame. Dockery had disposed of the frame for a song, which paid the milkman's bill and a few inevitables, so that very little remained. But Dockery's manual labours had been lightened in the last few days, owing to the kitten's no longer requiring to be fed with a spoon. In evidence of this, the spoon lay shelved on the mantelpiece. The kitten's tin cup was—anywhere handy, and wonder was that Dockery never stumbled over it.

"I tell you," Dockery began, following out some train of thought aloud to his companion, "tell you, kittie, the world hasn't any use for you and me. It doesn't want us; it doesn't want us."

He paused awhile, and the kitten rubbed itself a little against his coat.

"They want to starve us out," he continued bitterly; "but I tell you what it is, if we have just a little turn of luck we will pack up our traps and go home!"

The weather grew bitterly cold. Dockery lived in his overcoat, and now and then marvelled at the paint-spots that increased upon it in spite of his precautions. Finally a great splash of oil appeared on his sleeves, and he felt constrained to forego his constitutionals, at least until it could be cleaned.

"Very handy garment, isn't it?" he asked, one bleak morning, as he helped the kitten into a side pocket. Then he began sorting out what brushes he was likely to need, and occasionally he thrust his hands into his pockets again.

"It's cold," he would explain apologetically, as his icy fingers buried themselves in the kitten's warm fur. "I think after a while we'll go down and ask the little woman, just as an excuse, you know, if we've any letters, and toast our toes at the kitchen stove. And I tell you what, the minute we get that letter, if there is one, we soak every paint rag with turpentine and set that wood in a blaze that will burn the chimney out."

The porter's wife knocked at the door as he spoke. After she came in her sharp black eyes were straying round the studio. Many little things which she had helped Dockery to arrange were missing.

"Oh, you been havin' some hard time," she exclaimed impulsively.

Dockery winced. It is painful to feel our misery: it is worse to have others see it.

"De leetle cat," she went on hastily. "Ah, Mister Docker, he bring de troub' ven he came in at de door. Vere ees he, dose days?"

"Well," said Dockery, returning to his easel, "for my part I'm not going to blame him for what has been happening months before he came." Somehow he did not feel inclined to tell her that the little cat was curled up in his pocket. There are times when the best of us like to temporise.

Dockery closed the door of his studio and dropped into a chair. The kitten blinked drowsily and shrank from the cold air. There was something uncanny about the little black upturned face which Dockery had never noticed before. It looked weazened, and there was a strange cunning in the small, darting eye. Dockery studied it intently for a long time and then, almost without knowing, he framed the old question:

"Are you bad luck?"

But nothing came of it. A sphinx would not have been less responsive, and finally Dockery went back to his easel feeling that he had lost his last friend. A freezing studio, a heavy heart, and an empty pocket were the sum of Dockery's equipment after that.

"Might as well be in the street," he grumbled drearily one morning when no sunlit air melted the thick frost on the skylight and he could not see to work. "Might just as well, and that's what we're coming to when the month is up. Hey, pussie, would you like to go back where you came from?"

The kitten rubbed itself against his feet. He had not petted it much of late, and his conscience reproached him when he saw how thin the little thing was beneath its fur. He picked it up tenderly, and the kitten licked his hand.

"It's a burning shame," cried Dockery, all unconscious of the hollows in his own cheeks, and ignoring, from necessity, the warnings of hunger. "It's a burning shame that a little thing like this, that never did anybody any harm, should be left to die of starvation in the street. No, sir, we may starve, but we'll have one square meal first." This last to the kitten, who purred contentedly until Dockery calmed down again and paced the room only to keep warm until it should grow light enough to paint.

But it did not grow light enough that day nor the next, and the day after dawned bleak and colder still. Dockery remembered that day all his life.

"I'm going off, Pussie, going to leave you to take care of the traps." Dockery spoke with difficulty from the numbness of his face. "Going to find some breakfast, puss. Look out for yourself," and, letting himself out of the studio door with care, that the kitten should not accompany him, he closed it and went down the narrow, echoing staircase.

Digitized by Google

The streets were almost deserted; here and there people hurried past with hands or muffs to their faces, and heads bent low. It was the first walk Dockery had taken for two weeks, and he felt stiff and numb. His eyes fell on his shoes as he came into the avenue where smart carriages were rattling along sharply on the frozen road, and a few gay pedestrians in furs passed with skates over their shoulders. They did not notice Dockery at all.

"Well, Tom Dockery! This is what I call a piece of luck. Well, well, well."

Dockery lifted his bewildered eyes to the face of the portly man whose hand was on his shoulder, and whose other hand was cordially outstretched. "Mr. Harris!" he cried.

"Exactly," laughed his friend, "and I hadn't the slightest idea you were in these parts. How long have you been here? Why didn't you look me up the moment you arrived, or send word so that I could drop in on you, and talk over the jolly times I spent at your place. Do you know, Dockery, I look back to those years as the best times of my life. How did you leave your mother and the young ladies?"

"My sisters are now married," answered Dockery, trying to conquer the burning consciousness of his shabby garments. "Mother spends half a year with each, and I have come here to see how the art public compares with the other 'lovers.' Oh, we've all scattered to the four winds."

They were walking up the street arm-in-arm, for Dockery's new-found friend had turned back in the direction he was himself taking, and Dockery's sensitive soul was suffering agonies at the attention they attracted, for "Mr. Harris" seemed to be a personal acquaintance of every other passer-by.

"I want to see some of your work. You know I've taken the collecting fever, and I've really picked up some treasures. I want you to see them and tell me what you think." Mr. Harris chatted briskly as they walked.

"I'd like to inspect the shop," he said, "if you are not too busy to see people. What is the address?"

"Well," replied Dockery laughing, "the fact is I've moved so many times in the last few months, I hardly know myself, but it is along here, and if you really care to run in, I would only be too glad to have you."

"Let's go, then," said Harris in his unaffected way, and Dockery took him to the studio, inwardly wishing that he had happened on Harris when "the studio" was situated in a more fashionable locality.

Mr. Harris, collector and philanthropist, followed Dockery up the half-dark little staircase, wondering what sort of a gem he might find in this odd corner, and how much Dockery would need to set him on his feet again.

"Rural things!" he exclaimed a few minutes later, his eyes glancing eagerly about the walls and then settling in a business-like way on the picture Dockery had been touching up for lack of other work. "Well, well, well!"—in genuine delight—"I hadn't thought of that; but it's a great thing. That's nice, that sketch of live-oaks; they look like real trees. I tell you it does me good to see something like that straight from Nature, without any fads."

"I painted a good-sized picture from that sketch," said Dockery. "It's lying about here somewhere."

"Good!" cried Mr. Harris. "Let me see it. Show me lots of things."

And Dockery, nothing loth, turned over his portfolios and unearthed canvases until Mr. Harris bethought himself of the time, and looked at his watch with a cry of dismay.

"Oh, there's a man waiting to see me at the club this minute," he explained. "He lives out of town, or it wouldn't matter so much. Now, I was coming to this in the course of time, but we'll have to settle things out of hand. I like those live oaks, and if you'll choose me a good frame that will set them off well, I'll be only too happy to foot the difference, and make it a place in my little gallery. Put your own price on it," he said, sitting down to the little table where Dockery kept his writing materials, and drawing out his cheque-book in a matter-of-fact way.

Dockery's head reeled. He remembered that he had modestly asked £60 for the picture in palmier days, but for the life of him he could not set a price now. Sixty pounds! His eyes strayed round the room as he tried to collect his thoughts; they fell on the empty grate.

Then he kicked the middle out of the bundle of firewood, and set the whole ablaze.

"Say a hundred, and call it square," suggested Mr. Harris, using the blotting-paper; "of course, I will settle for the frame. Now I must rush off, or I'll miss my man! I'm coming up again, though—you've got some good things here. I may come in with a friend of mine."

"But look here," cried Dockery, "Mr. Harris, this won't do."

"What's the matter?" asked the picture-collector quickly. "Of course, I'll put more if you——"

"It's already more than I originally asked," said Dockery, with a smile, "and I'm not going to take any such sum."

"Oh, well, we'll make that all right, if that's all the trouble. I'll come and choose a sketch or two. I'm glad I ran across you."

"I'm more than glad I ran across you," answered Dockery fervently. "By George, I—I had forgotten there were such people as you," he added, fingering the cheque.

Mr. Harris laughed uneasily as he moved towards the door. He hated to be thanked in the face, and, besides, he knew that he had found a rare good thing in Dockery.

"Bless me!" he cried, with sudden relief. "What have you here?"

Dockery followed the direction of his patron's eyes. "Oh, that?" said he. "That's a kitten."

"Looks like it," agreed Mr. Harris, his mouth twitching, for at sound of its name the kitten was coming over to its master, legs sprawling, tail dragging, and head cocked. Dockery picked it up.

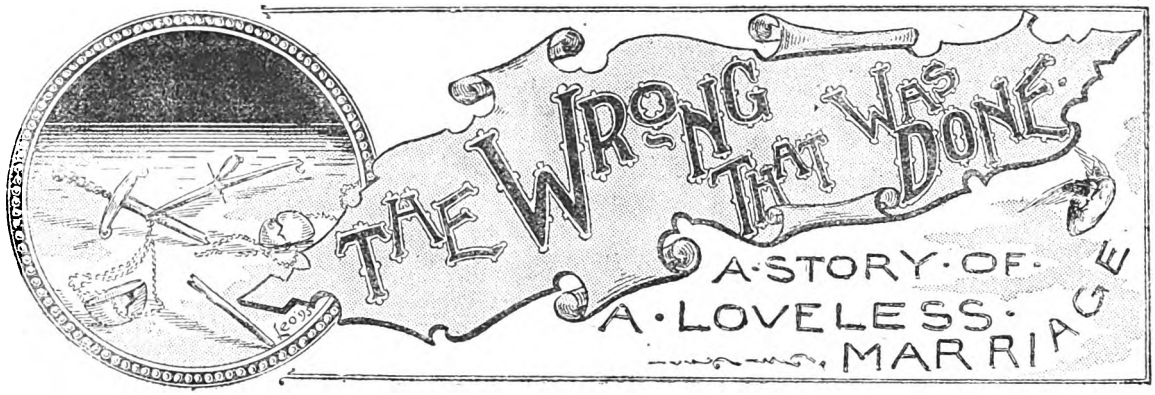
"You see," he explained, "we've been roughing it together here."

"Well, he's a queer one," and Mr. Harris bent closer a moment to examine the mite. "Dockery," he exclaimed, "he has but one eye. I'd beware of him if I were in your place. No telling what malediction he may bring down upon your head," and laughing, the art collector made his escape.

"It's a poor rule that doesn't work both ways," Dockery called after him, at the same time tossing the kitten into the air, "and regarding this great and glorious city," he added, catching it, and nestling his face in its fur, "I think we've experienced a change of heart."

ETHEL.

Digitized by Google



By E. C. WAGGENER.

CHAPTER VIII.

GRIEF that grows more hopeless with the long hours of night often loses some of its bitterness with the dawn of a new day. So it was with Helen. Viewed in the clear light of day, there was a great deal in her conduct of the previous night for self-condemnation and regret. The storm of her anger, if not spent, was at least sufficiently lulled to allow her to reason calmly.

She felt that she had done wrong in condemning Gifford without allowing him to make an explanation; she should, at least, have given him a chance to defend himself. After spending the night in fierce, unreasoning anger, she began to feel a faint twinge of remorse for the harsh words she had spoken. And now they were past recall; she had driven him away from her for ever. What would she have given now to feel once again his strong arms round her?

And with her sudden regret came a strange longing for the woman who had either wilfully or innocently helped to ruin her happiness and wreck her life. Never, not even in the early days of their first separation, had she longed for Kitty as she longed for her now. And perhaps it was the memory of those childish days that caused her to do what very few women under the circumstances would have done. She hastily penned a few lines to Kitty, begging her to come at once. She made no allusion to her trouble, however, except in the pathetic line she added at the close: "If you ever cared for me, Kitty, you'll come to me now."

"She'll come just as soon as she gets my letter," was Helen's mental comment, as she hurried to the post-office. This done, she felt a degree of relief in the thought that perhaps Kitty would be able to explain many things that seemed very dark and mysterious now.

"I know she'll come; she can't refuse," she repeated over and over again during the whole of that miserable day—a day spent in restless wanderings through the little rooms, or pitiful attempts at housework, or, perhaps, an effort at reading, all of which were abandoned almost in the beginning.

By some lucky chance, no visitor dropped in, and Helen wondered vaguely if anyone knew of her trouble. But, of course, they didn't. Gifford, she was sure, had not been so foolish as to speak of it to anybody down at the station. Well, she would keep it a secret just as long as possible, for she knew well how scandalised her friends and neighbours would be, and what they would say, and she didn't want their pity or their sympathy. As to what she was to do and how she was to live she had no thought nor care. She would have laughed to scorn the idea that a long life lay before her. She had lived the whole of her life in the year and a half just ended, and there was nothing left her now but to die.

The long, desolate day ended at last, and, with the twilight, a cool, refreshing breeze sprang up. For a long time Helen stood in the little sitting-room, gazing into the fire. Presently exhausted in body and mind, she crept to her favourite seat on the verandah, and looked absently out at the green, undulating meadows, the little brook that went winding past the village, and the woods rising dark and solemn and still beyond. Then, when the moon dropped behind the hills, and one by one the lights went out in the village, she staggered in as one blind, groping her way to the bed, lay down, and in a few minutes had sunk into a broken, haunted sleep.

Strange dreams came to her in that sleep—dreams of

To feel once again his strong arms round her.

Digitized by Google

shadowy forms and faces flitting ever mockingly before her—visions of grotesque figures with hideous, grinning lips, and glimmering lights that danced before her eyes, then faded away, only to appear as suddenly again. Was it a horrible nightmare? she wondered. For, through it all she was dimly conscious of familiar sounds; the noise of a closing door; the clear, sweet tinkle of sheep-bells; the fragment of an old, half-forgotten song, borne on the summer wind, and the confused murmur of voices that sounded indistinct and far away.

Yet the shadowy faces never left her. Sometimes they were the faces of friends, long since dead; sometimes it was Kitty who bent over her pillow, but oftener it was Gifford, who looked at her with such stern, reproachful eyes that she longed to cry out and beg him to go away.

And when at last she woke she saw the sun shining in at the open window, heard the song of birds and the drowsy chirp of insects in the grass—saw and heard without the power to lift her head from the pillow. What strange weakness was this which had come upon her? she asked herself wonderingly—this inability to throw off the spell of those terrible dreams?

Surely that was Kitty sitting yonder by the window. Yet, if Kitty, how changed she was, and how pale and haggard her face looked with the sunshine streaming full upon it.

Presently, as if in answer to the mute questioning of her eyes, the figure rose and came over to the bed. Yes, it was Kitty, sadly changed, it is true, but with the old tender light shining in her soft brown eyes.

"You are better, dear?" she said, kneeling by the bed and passing her hand fondly over Helen's hair.

"Better?" and there was a vague wonder in Helen's great hollow eyes. "Why, have I been ill?"

"Yes, but you are much better now."

"How long have I been lying here?"

"A week."

"A week!" whispered Helen, trying to raise her head from the pillow. "And it seems that I have been asleep for years. But it was only a dream—a horrible dream! What are you doing here? and where is Gifford?"—a strange, wild light came into her eyes.

"I came to nurse you, dear," said Kitty soothingly.

"I remember now"—and there was such pain and reproach in the weak voice that Kitty's face blanched to an ashen hue, and the hand she had laid on Helen's head was suddenly withdrawn.

"You must tell me everything—everything, I say!" cried Helen, raising herself by a strong effort and catching hold of her sister's hand. "That is why I wanted you, that is why I sent for you. You deceived me, too! You said——"

She broke off suddenly, and lifted her hands to her head. "Don't leave me, Kitty, don't leave me!" she whispered brokenly.

Lifted her hands to her head.

"You know I will never leave you, Helen, never again," said Kitty, her eyes misty with tears. "And I will sit here and hold your hand, if you will be quiet and try to sleep."

"Sleep! I feel that I will never sleep again!"

"But you must, or you will be getting worse again. There, take this, and presently, when you are quiet, I will answer all your questions."

Helen took the medicine passively, and in a few moments Kitty had the satisfaction of seeing her fall into a quiet sleep.

Something more potent than Helen's letter had brought Kitty back to Looe. A telegram from Gifford had come to her, bidding her come to Helen at once, as she was in deep trouble and needed her. That was all, but it was sufficient to cause her to make a few hasty preparations and take the train for Looe in two hours after receiving the message. She had reached the cottage to find her sister alone, and raving in the delirium of fever.

Either fortunately or unfortunately for the sick girl, nobody had chanced in, so it was not difficult for Kitty to assume the responsibility of answering the questions which poured in from every quarter when it became necessary to summon a physician from Mallingford. She gathered some idea of the nature of Helen's trouble from the poor girl's incoherent words, and to those who called for the purpose of offering their services she simply explained that Gifford had been unexpectedly summoned from home on a matter of important business.

CHAPTER IX.

"Now you must begin at the beginning, and tell me everything. I won't wait a minute longer. You've put me off from day to day, as if I were a child to be coaxed or frightened into keeping silent, just as it pleased you."

Helen was seated in an easy-chair by the window, her head supported by a pillow, her grey eyes looking larger and more wistful than usual because of the hollow cheeks and bloodless lips.

"If I have not told you, it was because you were not strong enough to bear excitement of any kind," said Kitty gently, "and because I was afraid what I would have to tell you would make you hate me. Oh, Helen, I deceived you from the very first, and now when your life is ruined, and it is too late for me to make any reparation, you ask me for the truth. How can I tell it? How can I say things that will cause you to turn against me?"

"Nothing you can tell me now will make me hate you," said Helen wearily. "I think I am past all hating, or loving."

"There is so little to tell that I could say it in very few words, but it would make it none the less hard," said Kitty, coming over to her sister's chair and kneeling beside it. "I met Gifford for the first time at a fancy dress ball at Aunt Dorothy's—"

"Then you knew him before you came home this last time?" interrupted Helen in great surprise. "Oh, Kitty, how could you deceive me so?"

"Don't look at me in that reproachful way, Helen, or I will never be able to tell you anything."

"I won't interrupt you again," said Helen a little impatiently. "Go on, and tell me the rest."

"I think I cared for him from the very first," continued Kitty in a low voice, and hurrying over her words as if eager to get through with her story, "and when, two months afterwards, he told me that he loved me and asked me to marry him, I consented without any coquetry or hesitation. And I would have been the happiest girl in the world but for one thing. Aunt Dorothy was bitterly opposed to my marrying any one, and especially Gifford Vane. I never knew why she conceived such a strong dislike to him, but I know she made me very miserable at times by her cold, almost insulting, attitude towards him, and by her strange behaviour to me.

"I was too much in love, however, and too self-willed to allow her to interfere with any of my plans, and boldly declared my intention of marrying when and whom I pleased. Gifford seemed to fear her influence, though, and made me promise not to listen to any charges she or any one else might prefer against him.

Digitized by Google

"Then, one day, when he was absent from the city, his uncle, an eccentric old man of whom I had never seen or heard before, paid me a visit, during which he informed me that he had other plans for his nephew than marrying me, a poor dependent girl, and that if I persisted in keeping my promise to Gifford I would bitterly regret it. He refused to explain anything, saying that Aunt Dorothy could tell me why it would be best for me to break my engagement with Gifford. Then he went away as suddenly and mysteriously as he had come."

"And what did Aunt Dorothy say?"

"She declared that Gifford was an adventurer, that he was addicted to all sorts of excesses, and that if I didn't promise at once to break off with him she would turn me out of the house. But I can't tell you all she said. I only know she said enough to cause me to declare that I would leave her house and never willingly look upon his face again. And I kept my word. I went away the very next day, telling no one of my destination, and caring very little what became of me. I never saw Gifford again until I met him here in Looe."

"You acted very foolishly," said Helen with a sad little smile. "If you cared for him you shouldn't have allowed Aunt Dorothy or any one else to have come between you."

"I did write to him afterwards, but no answer ever came to my letter. And something happened soon after I left to further strengthen my determination to give him up. I received, almost by accident, a long letter from Valentine Beverly, in which he reproached me bitterly for treating him as I did, and for ruining his life. That letter, coming to me just when it did, gave me such a shock that for many days afterwards I was too miserable to think of anything else."

"But I don't understand," said Helen vaguely. "What did Val Beverly have to do with your caring for Gifford and marrying him? And how had you ruined his life?"

"You will understand presently. When I came home after uncle's death, and found Beverly there, and knew that our stepfather was planning to get me to marry him, I was very angry, and made no effort to conceal the state of my feelings. But when I saw that my contemptuous treatment of them both had no effect, the idea suddenly entered my mind to change my demeanour—to pretend that I was not averse to their plan, and to lead Val on until I was sure he cared for me, then to refuse him at the last moment, and so put an end to our stepfather's scheming.

"I was young, and foolish, and headstrong, and knowing Colonel Beverly's great fondness for Val, I thought it an easy way to have revenge for the slights and ill-treatment I had been forced to endure ever since our mother's death. I knew his sole object in wishing me to marry Val was to prevent me from forcing him to leave the house. Once married, he imagined we would all live peaceably together, and that I would give him no further trouble about the property. Besides, we had been at dagger-points so long that I think he was getting tired of it, and wanted to be left in peace.

"Val was very handsome, and just vain enough to fancy it the easiest matter in the world to win me. Perhaps he really did love me. In every bad man's life there is some attachment, I think, that in its beginning was pure, and honest, and true, and it may have been that his love for me was of that sort. I know I led him on from day to day until I believe he would have committed almost any foolish deed if he thought by so doing he could please me.

"I met Gifford for the first time at a fancy dress ball."

"We were engaged, and I even went so far as to fix the wedding-day, feeling a sort of savage delight in the thought that my revenge was so near at hand. Colonel Beverly was delighted over his apparent success, and treated me so kindly and with so much consideration, that occasionally I felt a little compunction of conscience for what I was doing, especially when I saw his heart was bound up in Val—he who was so callous to everyone else. But I stifled all such twinges of remorse, and one night, just a week before the day set for the wedding, in the presence of Colonel Beverly, I quietly handed Val his ring, and coolly informed him that the matter had gone quite far enough, that I had never had any intention of marrying him, and that he should leave the place at once.

"Of course there was a scene. Val pleaded and threatened by turns, and looked so wretched and desperate that I was a little frightened, while Colonel Beverly stormed, and raved, and swore that I, not Val, should leave the house, and at once. Feeling that I had gained nothing by my foolish act, the maid hurriedly packed my trunk, and I went back to Aunt Dorothy, with the firm resolution never to return home again, or, at least, while Colonel Beverly lived.

Digitized by Google

"For a few weeks I thought of Val only occasionally, yet always with a feeling of regret for what I had done. Still, I don't think I quite realised the wickedness and cruelty of my conduct until his letter came full of such bitter reproaches. I didn't stop to think that a worthless man like Val Beverly could hardly be ruined by the ill-treatment of any woman. I felt that in having to give up Gifford I was being punished for treating Val as I did, and the conviction came to me that I was not worthy of the love of any true, honest man. And when I came home two years ago and found that Gifford was living here in Looe, that he was in the habit of visiting you, and that you had learned to care for him, what else could I have done, Helen, but keep silent as to the past? And when I remembered what a lonely, unhappy life you had led until he came, I felt that I could not wrong you more than by coming between you and his love."

"The maid hurriedly packed my trunk."

"I went back to Aunt Dorothy."

"But he didn't care for me, and you knew it, so there is where you did wrong," said Helen bitterly. "I think I understand your motive, but you didn't do right when you deceived me."

"I know it now, when it is too late," said Kitty sadly. "Yet Gifford and I could never have been happy if we had married," she added quickly. "Do you suppose I could have had one moment of happiness knowing that you were miserable?"

"But am I not miserable now?" asked Helen passionately. "Even as his wife, am I not the most wretched creature living? And perhaps if I had known the truth at first I would have learned to forget him."

"You said once that it would kill you to lose him."

"Did I? Well, I have lost him and am still living, so you see how foolish it was of me to say such a thing. Oh, Kitty!"—with a sudden uplifting of the thin, nerveless hands—"go away and leave me to myself a while. My mind is too weak and my heart too heavy to bear any more."

(To be concluded.)

A GRAND NEW STORY

will commence the week after next, entitled

"WHEN THE BIRDS BEGIN TO SING."

It is written by MISS WINIFRED GRAHAM, an authoress already well and favourably known to the readers of SHORT STORIES, and will, we venture to say, be considered the finest thing that has yet appeared in its pages.

DON'T MISS THE OPENING CHAPTERS.

The name of the winner of the £10 prize offered for the solution of the Puzzle Picture published in the Double Xmas Number of Short Stories, will be published as soon as possible. Next week a similar competition will be announced.

A Beautiful Photograph, entitled

ASHES OF THE PAST,

will be presented with every copy of HOME NOTES for January 18th.

BE SURE AND GET IT.

IF YOU WOULD LIKE TO EARN

£100,

Collect as many Coupons as you can from

SHORT STORIES,

STORY TELLER,

AND PEARSON'S WEEKLY,

and keep them for the present. Full particulars of what to do with them appeared in the last issue of S.S. The S.S. Coupon is at the bottom left-hand corner of the second page of cover.

OUR NEW PAPER,

ISOBEL'S HOME COOKERY.

SOME OF THE CONTENTS:

SIMPLE DINNERS FOR A WEEK.
ENTREES.
CAKE MAKING.
COLD MEAT COOKERY.
THE ART OF FRYING FISH.
A DAINTY DINNER.
CHEMISTRY OF THE KITCHEN.
ETC., ETC.

PUBLISHED 7TH OF EACH MONTH.

Price One Penny.

Digitized by Google

THE STORY OF AN Academy Picture.

CUTHBERT RYVEER and his cousin Reginald had lunched sumptuously in the little sitting-room opening into Cuthbert's studio, and were reviling men, women, and Royal Academicians to an accompaniment of coffee and curaçao. Reginald did most of the reviling: he had had four pictures returned on his hands by the hanging committee, had been abroad ever since, and had been finally rejected in Paris by a lovely American to whom he had offered his hand and heart intermittently as he followed her and her parents from Florence to France.

"Though why you want to marry, and why you want to paint pictures, I cannot understand," said Cuthbert, in concluding what he considered a neatly expressed speech of cousinly condolence.

"Why not?"

"Give me half your income and I'll show you why not."

Perhaps Reginald Ryveer thought the price too high too pay even for the edifying example of his cousin's methods of enjoying idleness and celibacy; for he only sighed and said: "I shall have to marry Emily."

"I'll be shot if you do!" said Cuthbert. Emily was a cousin of both, who had been selected as an appropriate match for Reginald by their parents, owing to the fact thas she was as rich as he was, and Cuthbert had other views on the subject. "Dash it! I hope he's not thinking of Emily seriously," he murmured to himself. There was a look of profoundly meditative melancholy on Reginald's face at that moment; as a matter of fact, he was trying a new brand of cigars, but his cousin did not know that.

"I must divert his thoughts," reflected Cuthbert, picking up a letter. "What do you make of that?" Reginald Ryveer read it.

DEAR SIR,—I propose calling upon you to-day, and hope I shall find you at home. You have severed two hearts, and I shall ask you to reunite them.

Yours truly,
ROSALIE WEST.

"Good handwriting and paper," he said as a comment. "What does it mean?"

"Dashed if I know! Good address, too. Big place in Berkshire, near where I painted last year; but I never spoke to a soul there, though I know some Norths in the county. There are the Easts, too, in town, but I know no one called West. Would you mind seeing her for me, old chap? It might be awkward."

"You're very kind," said Reginald. "In fact, you always were. I think this time you shall handle your own chestnuts." And the subject dropped.

"You have three of your daubs in the Academy," said Reginald after a pause—"two figures and a landscape. You can't paint landscapes."

"There are two figures in the landscape," said Cuthbert modestly. "People like sentiment and sunshine. In combination they are irresistible; besides, one of the figures is you."

Reginald groaned. "Not the thing for which you made me sit for two hours on the back of a chair, with my arms round a pillow? They never took that?"

"They did," said Cuthbert. But at that moment his housekeeper came in to clear away lunch. When she had half finished, she said suddenly: "There's a young person, sir, in the studio, named West." Mrs. Simpkins regarded all models with an eye of disapproval, and was inclined to include Cuthbert Ryveer's lady-sitters in the same category.

"Good gracious, Mrs. Simpkins!" said Cuthbert. "Has she been there long?"

"Half-an-hour," said the good lady composedly. Cuthbert whistled, and looked appealingly at Reginald; but he only shook is head and winked derisively. "I suppose I must go," said Cuthbert; and, fortified by another liqueur, he entered his studio.

She was walking up and down impatiently. She was very tall and very pretty. So much he saw before she saw him, and began:

"I am sorry if I have called when you were busy," she said (he bowed); "but my business would not wait." (He nodded.) "I have called about a picture of yours in the Royal Academy, called 'Rushcroft Lane'—Rushcroft Lane," she repeated. "It would not have mattered half so much if you had not put the name."

"If you want to buy it," said Cuthbert, "you should apply to the proper person at Burlington House. I never sell my own pictures." Cuthbert Ryveer was rising, and inclined to give himself airs.

Digitized by Google

"I don't want to buy it," she said, "I want to burn it."

"Anything else in a small way?" he asked. "Will you kindly explain?" ("Beautiful, but quite mad!" was his mental ejaculation.)

"Certainly I will explain," she said in a tone of more or less calm indignation. "You have painted Rushcroft Lane, with me in it in my red skirt and my big straw hat with a red handkerchief round it, so that every one can recognise it; it was most ungentlemanlike!"

Cuthbert Ryveer did not like the last word. Some men run from an angry woman, some give in, some fight. "My dear young lady," said Cuthbert, "I understand you now. After I had painted Rushcroft Lane for three days you settled yourselves in the middle distance while I ate my lunch. You spoiled my view of the church tower through the gap, so I put you in instead; you both appeared so—contented—I did not like to disturb you," he added drily.

"Both of us!" she exclaimed, getting crimson. "Both! You call that Edwin?"

"I don't call it Edwin or anything else," said Cuthbert calmly. "Does 'Edwin' consider himself libelled?"

"No; but I do."

"You!"

"Yes, I," she said; "I asked a barrister cousin of mine, and he says I could sue you for libel—I've written it down to remember it—'sue you for libel, and, perhaps, make you a third party to an action for breach of promise of marriage, if I sue Edwin for that'—there." She had glanced at some pencil-notes on an envelope, which she returned to her pocket. Cuthbert looked puzzled. "Don't you see," she went on, "the man in your picture is leaning over me, and Edwin only comes up to my elbow. He is wearing a brown coat, and Edwin always wears grey; he has square shoulders, and Edwin—well, poor Edwin's figure is his weak point," she said, relaxing into a smile.

"He ought to be flattered," said Cuthbert.

"He isn't, though," said Miss West. "He's furiously jealous. It's no use telling him I never did such a thing; I've told him again and again I never sat on a stile with anyone but him, and I never have—on that stile. But it's no use my saying anything; he's broken it all off and sent back all my presents—and—and, unless you can make it right, I must send back his."

She looked quite tearful now, and it became her better than anger. Cuthbert was touched.

"My dear Miss West," he said, "I will do anything I can. By Jove!" he added to himself, "she's as pretty as Emily—or nearly so."

"Of course, it all rests with you," she said; "how could you do such a thing?"

"I have told you how I put you in," he answered. "I apologise for the skirt, but it was the one bit of colour the picture really wanted. I am very sorry. And the big hat was charming."

She had on a big hat then—a big broad-brimmed hat with tulips nodding in a bunch of bold colour on top of it. She glanced at it in his long pier-glass as he spoke, and she looked mollified.

"But Edwin?" she said. "You can't say it's like him."

"Edwin," he answered, hesitating—"I beg his pardon, I know him by no other name—Edwin, no doubt, has great qualities of—heart—and that sort of thing: but——"

"Well," she said sharply, "what of that?"

"Well," he continued, "it struck me that Edwin's figure was not quite what was wanted as a complement to yours in the picture."

"Poor Edwin!" she said, not apparently offended: "we did not think of that. He is a little—fat, certainly; but the other man must have a lovely figure, or was he out of your head?"

"No, he's a real man, and he has a good figure—I've flattered him, of course—he's my cousin. He's in the next room now, and he's never been in Berkshire."

"I believe," she said, "Edwin has been inquiring everywhere whether anyone has seen a very tall man in our neighbourhood; he knows I like tall men. Poor Edwin!" she added absently. "I wish he had broad shoulders and was a nice height to dance with. Did you say he was here?" she was blushing a little as she looked up, and the tulips were nodding on top of her hat.

"She's really quite as pretty as Emily," said Cuthbert to himself. "I wonder if Reggy is thinking of Emily all this time?" He forgot to answer her question; he was thinking so much about other things. And she spoke next.

"Did I really sit just as you painted me?" she asked.

"Well, of course," said Cuthbert, "Edwin could not look down into your eyes quite like that. I should think Edwin's arm comes about right for your waist when you are walking."

"Pardon me," she said rather stiffly, "we are forgetting what I came about; will you write an explanation and send it to Edwin, or to me; and perhaps your cousin will write one also? 'Edwin Delaine, Esquire, Beachgrove House.'"

"I remember the place; it's a very pretty one. Is it his?"

"Yes," she said, "when his old uncle dies."

"It reminds me of one my cousin has in Hampshire," said Cuthbert irrelevantly. "I'll make it all right, then, and Edwin—I beg his pardon—Mr. Delaine shall have his explanation."

"Did you say your cousin was here?" she said; "perhaps I had better see him, then I shall know it's all right. Of course, I believe you, but if Edwin saw him afterwards, and he was not like the picture, it might be awkward. Poor Edwin is very, very jealous, I am afraid."

"Poor Edwin!" said Cuthbert to himself, as he went to fetch his cousin. "She's a deuced pretty girl, and would make no end of a picture in that big hat she has on."

"Poor Edwin!" said Cuthbert again an hour later, as he ordered tea. "I think she might talk to me a little more." And he added, in a louder voice: "Don't you think that if you are still in doubt as to whether the likeness is correct, Reggy, you might take Miss West to the Academy and look at the picture again? I have a sitter due now. This west window is capital in the afternoon."

A week later he had a note, which ran thus:

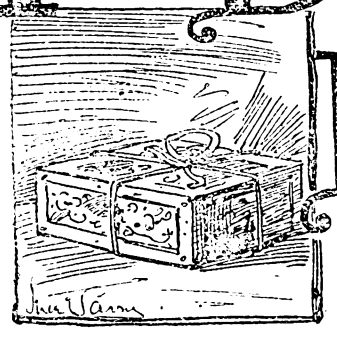
DEAR BERTIE,—Miss West says you need not bother to write to that Delaine fellow.—Yours, in haste, R. R.

He looked at the post-mark. "Poor Edwin!" said Cuthbert Ryveer.

PETER PARR.

Digitized by Google

The Bottom of the Bon-Bon Box



IT was two o'clock. The month, April—between two showers—April, smiling with sun, under an azure sky, with fleecy cloud-drifts like bits of thistle-down; the carriages rolled noisily, the idle strollers joyously dawdled through the crowded streets so recently washed by a tepid rain.

Whirling with the rest, the dark green brougham of the Baronne de Rozier turned the corner of the Place de la Trinité, passed swiftly the stormy cross streets of the Boulevard Haussman, rolled briskly down the Chaussée d'Antin, to suddenly pull up with a jerk that bounced the Baronne like a ball upon the mellow, myrtle-green, gold-buttoned cushions of her luxuriously appointed equipage.

With the shock came a cry, yells, hoots, badinage. She hastily pulled down the glass, to find herself the centre figure of a jostling crowd—talking, ordering, gestulating with that furious sympathy and exasperation peculiar to excited mobs. A ragged gamin, with hands in his pocket, leapt to the carriage step to thrust out his tongue at her; a street fakir spied her and reviled her with a volley of slang; the coachman's whip plied right and left like an angry black snake; and the Baronne, mad with terror, was out of the carriage and pushing her way to the pavement with the energy of despair.

Once there, she threw herself into the first open door—a cake and cream establishment, passed like a bomb into the crême salle behind it, to fall upon a chair, pale, breathless, swooning.

She came to herself slowly. Happily the luncheon hour was over, the pastry-room empty, the shop girls with nothing to occupy them were free to crowd about her pityingly, with all the zeal of their tender hearts and the remedies learnt from romantic novels. They loosened her veil, removed her hat, unbuttoned her coat and bodice, and even contemplated an attack upon her corsets.

And the Baronne, hearing everything, the stir and commotion, but unable to move or speak, remained inert and strengthless upon her chair.

"Come, come, be quiet, girls; she's all right now, I think," said a sonorous, deep-toned voice—a man's voice, rising authoritatively above the shriller chattering of the excited damsels.

The Baronne, opening her eyes, saw a tall form bending over her; also, that it was snugly buttoned into a well-fitting overcoat; that the red ribbon of the Legion of Honour peeped from under the left lapel, and that the figure was crowned, as her gaze languidly travelled higher and higher, with a face that made her sit bolt upright with a little cry:

"You, Richard!"

It was his turn now to start, gaze at her blankly, drop her wrist as if it burnt him, and repeat the cry:

"You, Armande!"

Suddenly resuscitated, the Baronne sprang to her feet, rehooked her corsage, smoothed down her skirts and her hair with a sweep of the hand, readjusted her loosened jacket, and once more turned upon the astonished gentleman the dazzling beauty of her five-and-thirty years. Then, content with herself, sweet as honey, serenely calm, she advanced upon him with outstretched hand.

"Monsieur, need you stand there as if planted?" she said.

He bowed profoundly.

"And to think, too, Richard"—she paused on the name doubtfully and a little reproachfully—"that you did not know me; that you still refuse to speak to me."

This was too much; the gentleman called "Richard" unbent in spite of himself.

"I really did not," said he. "As for speaking, you gave me no time. Moreover, ma bonne amie, one does not seek, as a rule, to crush old acquaintances precisely in this way. Divorce does not even warrant it."

"What is it you say—crush old acquaintances?" raising her hand with an appealing gesture.

Meanwhile the little waitresses, seeing the lady herself again, had scattered to their usual stations; one only returned with the Baronne's chapeau—apparently a tuft of primroses in a lace rosette—assisted her to pin it on her heavy braids, and then she also discreetly departed. The girl out of hearing the Baronne repeated her question:

"What do you mean?" said she. "What old acquaintance did I crush, and how?"

"Me, Richard Plantier, surgeon of the Paris hospitals, your own ex-husband and most obedient servant, madame."

"You?"

From head to foot she scanned this gentleman of these masterful manners—tall, stately, robust; so much at ease in his plain medical garb, and seeming always to hide a smile in the depths of the dark beard, rayed here and there with a thread of grey, that covered the firm chin. One by one, with the tip of her slender finger, she pointed to the silvery hairs.

"Chagrin!" said he calmly.

Digitized by Google

She raised her shoulders, smiling lightly.

"But, seriously, Richard, explain; why, I repeat, do you say that I 'crushed' you?"

He pushed the chair in which she sat towards one of the little tables.

"You will take something, of course; a bad habit, yes; but a plate of cream pistache? You were always so fond of pistache, I remember."

"Always. Still—take one with me, and have sandwiches instead, brought for two."

Brief as the time had been, the salle had begun to fill again. They were no longer alone. Curious glances were beginning to turn towards the corner where this handsome couple sat so unconcernedly.

"Well, the fact is, Armande," said the doctor, at last responding to her question, "I said it because it is true. You did crush me, upset me, stamped and trampled on me—your horses did, at least!" And he gingerly passed his hand up and down his left elbow.

"You are hurt—you are suffering, then?" with anxious contrition.

"Nothing serious. Contused, abraded, as I say, by your horses' hoofs. Luckily for me, your coachman was more adroit than he looked—your footman, too. To restore me to life, he conscientiously sought to drown me. I gave him one hundred sous; enough I suppose?"

She regarded him with amusement.

"The same mania always, I see," said she; "thrusting absurd questions into a serious conversation."

Assisted her to pin it on.

"A habit of trade. I pass my life questioning, catechising, drawing people out——"

"I know," she said seriously; "and, apropos of trade, doctor, what a success you have made of it! I never pick up a paper nowadays, but it's Plantier, Plantier here, there, and yonder; hospitals, clinics, memorials, treatises. Your doors besieged by all the world—grandes dames and charwomen! Richard Plantier, celebrated surgeon, doctor à la mode!"

"At your service, madame. You were the same—a woman à la mode; for no sooner did I pick up a paper than I saw your name here, there, and yonder—'the beautiful Baronne le Rozier!' some mention, some compliment, some racy bon mot! But lately—for how many months?—two years at least—Paris has neither heard the charm of your voice, nor been refreshed by the beauty of your face. You have been away?"

"Yes."

And as the Baronne said it she demurely glanced at her somewhat sombre dress. Then, with a mischievous lift of eyebrow which the man of medicine remembered, but did not interpret, she laughed and kept quiet. The doctor spoke again:

"Ah, by-the-way, all the world, as you say, does come to consult me; then, why do not you, Armande?"

"I, Richard? I do not need a consultation. I am in perfect health."

"Precisely; too perfect! Pretty soon, ma belle, you are going to be fat. I warn you; and it won't improve you either."

"You think so?" demanded she uneasily. "What must I do?"

"You would have me tell you here? A public consultation?"

He rose as he spoke to salute a lady who entered—a slender, willowy, blonde. She stopped at the counter to nibble an éclair, and more comfortably scan the Baronne.

"Who is she?"

"A case of mine—anæmia. My duty is to make her fat."

"And to me, to make me thin. You will come to my house to treat me then, Richard?"

"Your—house?" repeated he indecisively. "But he—how would he receive me there?"

"Hum—m!" she smiled, raised her brows, sighed a little.

"He was jealous from the start," she said.

"Ah, I see," said the doctor, "and comprehend it, too," he added gallantly.

Mdme. de Rozier regarded him uneasily. His handsome face remained impassable. Seized with the desire for confidence, however, the Baronne resumed:

"Very jealous, you know, but—with discretion."

"It was for this—discretion—you took him, then?"

"For that and—something else. He was—not like you."

"But I—it was the fault you found with me, you said—I, also, was jealous."

"In your way, my poor Richard. You raged like a tiger, and—let things go. He was born wiser than you."

"He follows you?"

"Perhaps."

"But you are not the woman to be trailed thus, Armande. Formerly, you were adroit enough."

"My faith, yes, and should be still—for something that I truly desired."

"Well, then, there's no help for it; you must come to me. I guarantee to reduce your weight fully a dozen pounds."

Digitized by Google

She hesitated.

"All the world is there in your office," said she.

"But why my office? With the key of the little side-gate—you remember it?"

"To the garden? yes, go on."

"You would be able to find your way directly to your own little boudoir—at present, my study. But what could I do? The patients filled all the salons and left me nothing. You shall see for yourself, though, Armande, when you come, if it interests you."

"Certainly it interests me," she smiled brilliantly. "But your fee, doctor, for a consultation?"

"A simple thanks from your beautiful lips."

"How generous! Then you are no longer a miser, Richard?"

"How providential! And you—no longer a spendthrift, Armande?"

They broke into laughter, light-hearted, merry; truly the thing was very droll, ex-husband and wife face to face for the first time in four long years, and recalling, as if it were yesterday, the bickering of other days.

Suddenly the doctor struck his hand to his brow.

"What am I thinking of? Your plate is empty. Some cake, wine, some more cream, Armande?"

"Thanks, no more; my appetite is gone."

"Some bonbons, then. You doted upon them once, I know. Wait one moment. I'll have them done up in a package for you."

And guiding the waitress, box in hand, he went along from case to case, and then, while the girl delayed at the counter to tie up the heap with a silver cord, he returned triumphantly to the Baronne's side.

"The key, Armande," said he, very paternally, "is down in the bottom of the box."

Five minutes later the Baronne de Rozier, with more polite bows and courteous phrases, passed towards her carriage for a "spin" in the Bois.

On the threshold of the shop the Baronne stopped, turned, and held out her hand.

"Ah, doctor! my bonbons, please."

And again came that mysterious lift of the eyebrow, and again he failed to interpret it.

"The Baron," she replied, "has been dead two years."

The Baronne, at home, ate all her bonbons before she rescued the tiny key from the bottom of the box. Then she held it up, and with a smile of a woman of the world discovering some new divertissement, exclaimed softly:

"Ah, little key, you are wholly unnecessary; but—you are very amusing."

And after she had mused a moment she went on to herself, still very, very softly:

"And to think he never heard about the—the poor, dear Baron. It is really very amusing." Another smiling pause. "I wonder if the Baron will be jealous? But really I must not try to solve that puzzle; I never was competent to explore the supernatural."

That night, when she went to sleep, the little key was hidden beneath the lace on her bosom. Before she forgot it all, she murmured:

"And to think—he never heard about the—the poor Baron. It is really very amusing." And she added, more slowly, before her eyes closed: "Richard is handsomer than ever, and I always did care for him, even on the day of the decree."

The next evening the Baronne's coupé stopped near the little side gate. She turned the key that had been hidden in the box and went in. It was really quite exciting. Richard met her in the garden and gravely walked with her to the decorated room that had once been her own special boudoir.

"I—I am almost sorry after all," he said. "It would never do were it not that a consultation in any other form might—might make him jealous."

"Precisely," she said gravely.

Later, when in the midst of his scientific talk, she reached her arms about his neck and kissed him, he drew back with as near discomposure as he was capable of, and exclaimed:

"But—but the Baron!"

"The Baron," she replied, "has been dead two years."

Then she kissed him again.

Extract from La Mode:

"A SURPRISE.

"The Baronne De Rozier, widow, marries her ex-husband."

JEAN DU MAURE.

Digitized by Google

AFRA

A Tale of Ancient Rome.

I.

THE slaves of Lucius Menenius were enjoying their leisure with greater freedom than usual. They had the mansion to themselves: Lucius and his son were dining with the quæstor, Camillius; his wife and daughter were still away on their holiday; and even the steward, the only freeman among the servants, was away for the day on business. Not only the two chief slaves—Heliodorus, the head slave of the atrium, and Ninus, the house doctor, but also the slaves of lower rank, were giving themselves up to harmless amusements.

In the household of Lucius Menenius, as in many others of Ancient Rome, there were among the slaves some who were of better birth and higher culture than the rest: men and women who could have taken their places among the citizens with credit to themselves and their surroundings. Heliodorus and Ninus were of this category, as well as two other slaves with whom the reader is about to become acquainted.

Ninus and Heliodorus were reclining on couches in that space known as the peristyle, quietly conversing. They were interrupted by a young man of about twenty years, who came out of the library and passed between them. He said a few words to Heliodorus as he passed, but altogether ignored the presence of Ninus.

The latter smiled sadly. He knew that Geticus, who acted as assistant librarian, had taken a violent dislike to him and was jealous of the esteem in which he was held by master and slaves alike; but his face soon assumed its usual calm appearance and he continued the broken conversation.

Geticus walked through the peristyle and into the garden, evidently in search of someone. He was a handsome, well-formed youth, with animated face and dark, flashing eyes. He walked along the paths with well-kept box-hedges until he espied the object of his search, behind the bushes.

"Afra!" he called softly.

"What is it?" asked a voice.

The branches parted and there appeared the charming figure of a young woman about his own age. The sound of her sweet voice, the pretty smile upon her lips, and the enchanting expression in her eyes, made the young man's heart beat more rapidly than its wont.

"I have sought thee everywhere, like a lost piece of gold," said Geticus in his most winning manner. "Then I bethought me that I should find thee among the flowers. And for whom are those roses?"

"For the master, Lucius Menenius."

"Oh! for the master!" murmured Geticus, with a trace of disappointment in his voice.

"Yes! He will be pleased to see these on his table when he comes home."

"Lucius Menenius is to be envied!" returned the young man. "And, wondrous to say, it is Afra the cold, the icy-hearted, who is so zealous, so anxious to please! Were it not that Lucius is over fifty, one would say that thou wert in love with him!"

"Nay," said Afra. "But is he not always kind and fatherly towards us?"

"Yes," replied Geticus drily; "particularly towards the young and pretty!"

"Fie on thee!" exclaimed Afra, her face flushing with indignation; "that is a sorry jest. Thou art so accustomed to his kindness that thou hast lost all sense of gratitude. How many masters like him wilt thou find in Rome? Not one, I tell thee."

"He is not so pleasant to me as he appears to be to thee, since thou speakest so hotly in his favour," said Geticus with a bow of mock humility. "I know not why I should go about singing his praises at such times as he is too busy to order me to be whipped."

"It is thine own fault. Even a father punishes his child when that child abuses his kindness as thou dost that of Lucius Menenius."

"Who says that?"

"The master himself. Only the other day I heard him tell Ninus——"

A fierce exclamation broke from the lips of Geticus, and a look of intense hatred distorted his handsome countenance.

"Thou art getting angry!" said Afra, shrinking away. "I am sorry that I have wounded thee. I must go."

"Stay!" said Geticus abruptly. "There is time enough for thy roses."

"I will stay if thou wilt calm thyself. How thou rollest thine eyes! Menenius did well to keep thee under lock and key for three days! Had not Ninus said a good word for thee, thou hadst still been in thy room! And thou mayest thank the gods that thou didst not kill the gardener; the stone chipped the bark off the tree—that is a witness to thy rage!"

"He angered me—would that I had killed him!" exclaimed Geticus, his anger rising again.

"I will hear no more!" said the indignant girl. "A fine reason, truly, for killing a man! Dost thou not believe in Jupiter and his vengeance?"

"Bah! I believe, but I know that forgiveness can be bought! The Egyptian priest, Seleucius, hath told me that the killing of an enemy is one of the sins for which pardon can be purchased. There is but one sin for which there is no forgiveness—the breaking of an oath! He who breaks his vow suffers the full penalty at the hands of Jupiter!"

Digitized by Google

"And thou believest that?" asked the maiden scornfully.

"Seleucius says so—ought not he to know what is right?"

"How camest thou to visit the Egyptian priest?"

"I will tell thee—in secret," replied Geticus. "I went to him with the young master, Caius."

"Methinks thou art more fond of accompanying Caius in his frivolous pleasure-seeking than of serving thy master honourably. Yet thou knowest how strict is Lucius Menenius!"

"Caius is my master as well as Lucius. Moreover, he hath promised that if I serve him well he will give me my freedom in two years! And then—oh, Afra! Why dost thou make my task so hard? Why dost thou treat me so coldly? Many months have flown since thou didst set my heart on fire with love for thee! Dost thou remember the happy day when together we plucked the figs on the Albanian estate? Thou wert so bewitching that my heart went out to thee, and I vowed that thou shouldst be my bride. And in two years I will claim thee, and thou also shalt be free! Come, give me a kiss in token of betrothal!"

His eyes burning with a fierce, passionate light, Geticus stepped towards her. But she shrank from him.

"I cannot," she murmured, growing pale.

"Thou canst not? What means this?"

"Geticus, it cannot be! Ask me no more, I pray thee!"

He seized her by the arm; his face twitched with passion.

"Thou lovest another!" he cried hoarsely.

"Thou hurtest me, Geticus! Unhand me! Art thou mad?"

"Yes! Mad with love of thee! Tell me all! By Jupiter, I swear that if thou dost not tell me his name now, thou wilt rue this day! I will kill him if I first hear his name from other lips than thine!"

Afra hesitated; the little colour left in her face died away, and she trembled with fear.

"If thou wilt swear not to harm him—swear it by the god Jupiter—I will tell thee," she said, after a pause.

Geticus was consumed with jealousy, and forgot the full significance of what he was doing. He took the oath and waited for her reply.

Afra buried her face in the roses.

"Ninus!" she said in a low voice.

A shrill laugh broke from the lips of the young man.

"Ninus!" he repeated contemptuously. "The Greek from Asia Minor! Half a barbarian! Lucius Menenius bought him only three months ago, and thou hast already thrown thyself at his feet! With his pretended learning he hath contrived to wheedle himself into favour with Lucius, and he hath turned thy head! Ho, ho! a man fifteen years thy senior, with a heavy face that can show no sign of love! Ninus——"

"Cease, cease!" commanded the girl, stung to the quick. "What care I if he be old or young; if his face show love or not? I know him to be noble, good, and kind. His 'pretended learning,' as thou callest it, hath enabled him to restore to health the wife of Lucius Menenius when other physicians had failed, and he hath thus saved Menenius himself from life-long despair. For this, Ninus will soon receive his freedom, and in addition, the rights of citizenship. What sayest thou to that? Go! Thou shalt never speak to me again until thou cravest his pardon."

And with a haughty look the girl walked away.

Geticus watched her until she had disappeared. Then he shook his clenched fist in the direction she had taken.

"Curse him!" he hissed. "She shall never wed him while I have breath—no, not if I have to kill him to prevent it!"

II.

AFTER his talk with Afra, when he had given expression to the feelings he had held in restraint for so long, and had been so bitterly disappointed, Geticus was animated by one all-absorbing thought. How could he thwart Afra's plans—how could he prevent this marriage? He was determined that Ninus should not have her; the bare idea filled him with ungovernable rage, and his hatred of the house doctor became so intense that it appeared a mere trifle to kill him. It would be no more sin to kill such a hypocrite than it would be to throw poisoned bread or meat to the rats in the cellar. All day long, all the next day, he revolved in his mind various plans for getting rid of his hated rival, and finally decided upon poisoning him.

Full of his deadly intention, he was thinking of the best way to administer the poison, when there flashed across his mind for the first time the remembrance of the oath he had taken! He had sworn not to injure Ninus—sworn it by Jupiter—and there would be no peace for him either in time or eternity if he broke that oath! Oh! fool that he had been to act so hastily. Ninus would marry Afra, and he could not prevent it. He fancied he saw it all, how they would both receive their freedom, and be loaded with presents by Lucius Menenius and his wife, in gratitude for what Ninus had done; how they would have the wedding feast in the xystus, Menenius and all the family, as well as the servants, partaking of it; how Ninus would afterwards carry off his beautiful bride. No! Never, never!

Only one other solution of the difficulty could he think of, but that he dismissed at once. It was to kill Afra and commit suicide.

So he tossed about all night in mental agony. The following morning the librarian gave him orders to carefully roll up the recent numbers of the Acta Diurna, and put them away in order of date. The Acta Diurna was the official newspaper of the city and the state; it was copied chiefly by slaves, and contained official news and notices, besides notes of news from all parts of the empire. As Geticus rolled each one up on the stick, he glanced at some of the items of interest, and, finding that it afforded relief to his aching head and throbbing brain, he continued to read here and there until he almost forgot his trouble.

Suddenly his eye lighted on an item which sent a thrill through him. He read it with flushed cheek and bated breath. The very thing! An expression of wild triumph appeared on his face, and he nearly cried out in his joy. The problem was solved; he could spoil their happiness and yet not break his oath!

He hastened to finish his task; all the numbers were stored away except one, and that one he hid under his tunic. Then he made his way to the dining-room where the chief slaves were partaking of the midday meal. Ninus and Afra were among the number.

Geticus threw a furtive glance at the doctor—a vengeful, triumphant glance which meant: "Wait a while and thy happiness will be destroyed!" But even at that moment he could not help noticing how well the lovers hid their feelings from the other slaves.

Digitized by Google

When the meal was finished he found an opportunity of speaking to Afra unnoticed by any of the others.

"I want a word with thee, Afra. Quite alone. Do not fail me, for thy life is at stake, I swear it by Jupiter! When and where wilt thou meet me?"

Afra looked at him. She saw by the wild look in his eyes that he meant what he said. She hesitated, but finally replied: "In one hour, at the spot where thou sawest me gathering roses."

"Good! Be punctual."

As Geticus passed out of the room he saw Ninus, who, noticing that the young man looked worried, asked in his usual kindly tone what ailed him. But the youth shut his mouth with a defiant air and walked away without a word.

The hour was nearly up when Geticus walked through the xystus on his way to the garden. Only one slave was in the xystus, a young woman with whom he had flirted occasionally. She did not hear him coming, and when he touched her on the shoulder she screamed and dropped her brush.

"Thou mightest have killed me with fright!" she exclaimed, turning red. "Why comest thou here?"

"Dost thou think that I come to make a declaration of love?" he asked with the least trace of a sneer. He scarcely knew why he made the remark, but he soon repented it.

"No, indeed!" replied the girl bitterly. "We all know that thou art consumed with love for Afra!" And she hurried away to hide her tears.

"Curse them all!" hissed Geticus. "They all know of my love for Afra. But I will have her yet! She must yield when she knows what I have planned to do, and I care not whether her heart is mine or not, so that I win her!"

They reached the appointed spot almost at the same time.

"Thou must hasten with thy communication," said Afra quietly. "I have but little time."

"A few minutes will suffice," returned Geticus. "Afra, thou shalt not marry Ninus! If thou dost not break off this match of thine own free will——"

"It is to tell me this thing that thou hast brought me here?"

"Yes! Listen to what I am about to read out of the Acta Diurna, and thou wilt understand why I said that thy life was at stake! Listen:

> 'It is generally known that Tullius Corvinus was murdered by one of his slaves at his country seat at Alsium a few days ago. Yesterday, in accordance with the old law, which has only been put into operation twice during the present century, all the slaves who were in the place at the time of the murder—seven—were put to death. Attacks of this kind are becoming more frequent, so the ancient law will be acted upon in every instance in future.'"

"What is the meaning of all that?" asked Afra indifferently.

"Think it out for thyself."

"I am unaccustomed to such mental exercises," said the girl impatiently

"Then I will make it clear to thee! Thou shalt never wed Ninus. I have sworn by Jupiter not to lay a hand upon him, so I cannot prevent it in the way I desire! I have not the courage to kill thee, as thou deservest. This, then, is what I will do if thou dost not at once—at once, dost thou hear?—if thou dost not give up Ninus and promise to be mine!"

He had seized her by the wrist, and she turned pale and shrank back as he drew a long dagger from under his tunic.

"Fear not!" he exclaimed. "I have not the courage to hurt thee. Afra, oh! Afra, why dost thou torture me thus? Give me but a word—one little word—of hope!"

"Geticus," she said softly, gaining courage, "can I answer for my heart? If thou didst but know Ninus as I know him——"

He stopped her with a gesture of impatience.

"Listen! Thou seest this blade? It is good Syrian steel.—I verily believe it would cut through iron! If thou wilt not give up Ninus and promise to be mine, I will plunge this blade up to the hilt in the heart of Lucius Menenius! Dost thou understand what that means for thee and thy barbarian lover? Ha! ha! A fine end truly—the headsman's axe!"

"Thou monster!" gasped Afra. "It is thus that thou thinkest to rob me of my happiness! Dost thou think that I would wed one so vile as thou? Dost thou imagine that thou canst frighten me thus into doing what thou desirest? Never!"

"Think of the headsman's axe! Think of the innocent who will suffer by thy obstinacy."

"I do think of them, and I curse thee for thy wickedness!" cried Afra in despair. "But thou shalt not do it; I will scream for help!"

She sprang upon him and seized the hand that held the knife.

"Help, help!" she screamed at the top of her voice as with almost superhuman strength she grappled with him, and tried to force him to drop the dagger.

"Fool!" hissed Geticus, as he struggled vainly to free himself. "So that is thine answer! Then the consequences be upon thy head!"

"Help, help!" screamed Afra again, as they struggled fiercely about the path, the one trying to free his hand, the other endeavouring to gain possession of the weapon.

"What means this?" said an earnest voice near them. And Lucius Menenius, a look of amazement on his face, hurried towards them.

"Take care, my lord," cried Afra warningly, as she felt her strength giving way. "Geticus threatens thee with death! My lord, take care!"

Ere Lucius Menenius had time to comprehend the meaning of the struggle and Afra's warning, Geticus had freed himself from the girl's grasp and had thrown her to the ground.

"It is thy doing!" he raved, with a last look at Afra, and the next instant he had thrown himself with all his strength upon Lucius Menenius, and had plunged the dagger deep into his breast, himself receiving at the same moment a severe wound in the head from the iron stylus, which his master had raised in self-defence.

Menenius staggered a few steps, and then fell heavily upon the path, while Geticus, forgetting his original plan, rushed off, leaving the Syrian dagger in the breast of the murdered man.

III.

WHEN Afra roused herself and scrambled to her feet, she saw that Menenius was still breathing and was moving his arm as though to lift himself up. She flew past him towards the house, and shrieked aloud for help.

The old steward was the first to appear in answer to her cries; he was quickly followed by Ninus, whose skill at such a time was most necessary. Afra could not speak coherently; she beckoned to them to follow her, and led them to where their master lay.

Digitized by Google

"Geticus—attacked him. Oh! the monster!" was all she could say. She knelt by the side of Menenius, and cried to him to say one word.

"Good child!" murmured the dying man.

Ninus knelt by the side of Menenius and gently drew the knife from the wounded man's breast. He saw that there was no hope of saving Menenius; the wound was fatal.

Gently pushing aside Afra and the other slaves who had hurried to the spot, full of horror and grief, Ninus and Heliodorus, with the assistance of two of the male slaves, carried Menenius into the house and placed him upon the bed in his own room.

The old steward had gone off in search of Caius, so he said. But he had another object in leaving the house; he intended to fetch the guard. As a freeman, he had nothing to fear from the law, and was naturally more inclined to look at things from the master's point of view. Who knew that Geticus had attacked his master? Might not Afra's grief be mere pretence? He was not well disposed towards her, because she had perceived that he had a sneaking regard for her, and had laughed at him. He bore Ninus no goodwill, either; he was Latin to the backbone, and Ninus was Greek, and he was jealous of the favour with which Menenius looked upon the doctor. So he went for the soldiers.

In the meantime Ninus, quite unconscious of the consequences of Menenius's death for himself and his fellow-slaves, was doing his best to staunch the wound, and was rewarded by a whispered word of thanks.

"I am dying!" gasped Menenius after a pause. "I feel it! Oh, how did I wrong Geticus that he should——? My poor wife and daughter! Caius! Where is he?"

"He will be here soon, my lord. Keep quite still," said Ninus.

"Why hath Geticus done this?" groaned Menenius. "He has caused the death of you all!"

Afra bent down and whispered in his ear. In a few words she had explained all.

"I alone am to blame, my lord, and I will die willingly; but save Ninus! Oh, save Ninus!"

At that moment there was the rattle of arms and the tramp of soldiers in the house. The slaves looked at one another, and Ninus now for the first time realised the truth. He gently drew Afra away from Menenius, and pressed her to his heart.

"Be brave," he said; "thou art spotless, and needest not fear death. We will die together as we had hoped to live together!" and he imprinted a passionate kiss upon her hot lips.

At the sound of the approaching soldiers Lucius made a great effort and raised himself on his elbow. Ninus rushed towards him, put his arm around him, and tried to make him lie down again.

"No!" cried Menenius. "I will save you—and the others. Listen! They are coming to take you away. Give me your hand, Ninus. Afra, pray that the Gods may give me a few moment's grace."

The cries of the slaves, who were seized by the soldiers wherever they were found, resounded through the place.

"Bid the centurion come here," said Menenius, his voice apparently stronger than before.

Two minutes later the officer entered the room.

"Most noble Menenius," he said, bowing low, "I come in the name of Cæsar and the law. Art thou able to answer two or three questions?"

"Aye! And I can give thee some information which will render thy presence unnecessary. There is some misunderstanding here. No crime has been committed against me. It was an accident. Caius, my son, come here. Listen to what I say, and see that thy father's dying wishes are carried out. Centurion, thou seest that I have but a short time to live, and thou wilt not doubt the truth of my words. The blow dealt by the madman Geticus was not intended for me; it was for Ninus, the surgeon. Geticus wished to destroy his happiness, but the blow fell upon me. Dost hear, centurion? The blow was for Ninus, and the law takes no action!"

A dead silence followed this statement. Afra and Ninus both cast thankful glances at Menenius, who made another effort, and continued:

"Caius, it is my wish that Ninus and Afra receive their freedom. Swear to me that thou wilt give it to them!"

"Father, oh! father, I swear it!" cried the grief-stricken Caius.

"It is well! Go, centurion, and liberate the slaves, that they may breathe freely again ere I pass away!" gasped Menenius.

The centurion wished to put a question, but Menenius waved him away with a last expiring effort. A few seconds afterwards the noble Lucius Menenius breathed his last.

Caius fulfilled his father's wishes: Ninus and Afra received their freedom, and were soon afterwards married. Ninus could not bring himself to conceal the truth from Caius, who was at first astounded; but he soon perceived that the words which his father had uttered with his last breath, although not true in the literal sense, were true in the higher and nobler sense, and he was content.

What became of Geticus nobody knew until some months afterwards, when his body was found in a thicket a short distance from Rome; but how he came by his death remained a mystery.

G. D.

Digitized by Google

A RETIRED BURGLAR'S REMARKABLE EXPERIENCE.

"ENTERING one night by a convenient cellar window a comfortable appearing house in a small town in the North," relates a retired burglar, "I found myself in due time in the drawing-room. I was pretty well tired out; I had been at work every night for a week, and hadn't been doing very well, either; I had come to this town to try the benefit of a change. I had only just got here, and I had my tools in my travelling bag with me. When I turned into the drawing-room of this house I saw over in one corner a table with some books and things on it, and alongside of it a very easy-looking high-backed chair. I set my lamp down on this table and my bag on the floor near by, and the chair looked so very comfortable that I thought I'd sit down myself just for a minute.

"The next thing I knew somebody clapped me on the shoulder, and I woke up very suddenly and stood up and saw standing in front of me, holding a lamp in his left hand, and holding out his right hand to me, a good-looking young man of twenty-five or so, who was saying to me in the heartiest sort of fashion:

"'Why, Uncle William, how in the name of goodness did you get in?'

"Now, just think what a fine cue that was!

"'Why,' says I, with the same hearty manner, 'I rung the front door bell for about three-quarters of an hour, I should say, but, maybe, I didn't ring it very loud, for really I hated to wake up anybody at this hour of night, and when nobody came I thought first I'd sit out on the steps till morning, but it was pretty cool out there, and then I found a cellar window that happened to be open, and I got in there just as easy as could be, and I thought I'd just sit here till morning, and I was comfortable enough, too.'

"As I was talking I stood with my back against the table, and put my hands on the edge of it, reaching for my lamp; I got it finally, and dropped it into my ulster pocket. Then I felt easier.

"'Well, we're jolly glad to see you; but we didn't expect you quite so early. I should have been looking out for you later, and then you wouldn't have had any trouble about getting in. The train was a little early, wasn't it?'

"'No-o,' I said, 'no, I don't think so.'

"'Well, you must be tired enough, anyhow,' said the young man, just a-beamin' with good nature, 'and I know you will want to go to bed. Come along. Just let me take your bag;' and he reached for it. But I said: 'Why, no; I can carry it just as well as you can.' I wouldn't have let him feel the heft of that bag for a good deal.

"Well, he started, and I followed him upstairs. He opened the door of a bedroom in the front of the house and stepped in, and I followed.

"'Looks familiar, hey?' says the young man, smiling, as he looked round.

"'Just as pleasant as ever,' says I, and then the young man said he hoped I'd sleep well, and shook hands again and said good-night and went out. Then I took my lamp out of my ulster pocket and set it down again, this time on the chest of drawers. I hadn't much more than set it down when I heard a knock on the door. I went and opened it. It was the young man back again.

"'Want anything?' he said.

"I told him 'not a thing,' and he said good-night again and went away.

"Well, I sat down and kept quiet for a while and looked about a little. It certainly was a very pleasant room, very comfortably and very nicely furnished; and just now the fresh bed-clothes were turned back invitingly. And there was considerable property worth carrying away; two or three silver bottles and a silver-backed brush, and some other knick-knacks, but I didn't touch a thing; I couldn't abuse such hospitality as that.

"The front window in this room opened on the roof of the verandah. After waiting about half an hour I opened this window and looked out. The roof was rather steep, and covered with slate; not the easiest footing in the world, but better than noisy tin. I shortened up the strap to my bag and hung it round my neck, and got out on the roof and sat down and crawled along slowly, making towards a corner so as to be sure of striking a post. I couldn't help thinking as I slid along that I seemed to be sort o' revolving round that verandah. I had come in by a window under the floor of it, and now I was going out by a window over the roof of it, and when I touched ground again I should have made a complete circuit. But when I had got about half-way down I had something else to think about; I heard a man coming along the road from the direction of the station, walking briskly; Uncle William, sure. He turned into the walk leading up to the house without slackening up a bit, with the air of a man who knew the way perfectly; Uncle William, sure enough.

"He stepped up the steps into the verandah and rang the door bell briskly and quite confident-like, but nobody came. When he'd waited a minute or too, he set his bag down kind o' hard; he was getting a little tired of waiting. Then he rang again. This time I heard somebody coming down the stairs and come up to the door inside and say:

"'Hallo, there!' It was the familiar voice of the young man who had welcomed me half an hour before.

"'Hello, Will,' said the man outside, and I could hear a little scrape on the floor of the verandah as he picked up his bag, expecting to walk straight in. But the door didn't open. Will, named after his uncle, no doubt, was evidently surprised.

"'Why, Uncle William,' he said, 'however did you get out?'

"'Get out!' said Uncle William—he was a little testy now, and beginning to get surprised himself—'I haven't been in yet. What's the matter with you, Will?'

"The nephew opened the door then, and let his uncle in, and shut and locked it behind him. Soon I heard them talking together, both at once; and then they went upstairs together, both very quiet; and it seems a waste o' words to say that then I slid down the post."

B. S. K.

Digitized by Google

DEATH ✣ OR ✣ DISHONOUR.

Translated from the French of Sacher-Masoch.

THE battle had been raging for two hours. It was an autumn afternoon, obscured by fog; Poles and Mussulmans had hurled themselves upon one another with furious shock, and now men and horses were hid in clouds of mist and dust and smoke. The shrill neighing of the horses and the thunder of their hoofs mingled with the cries of the combatants, the rattling of the fusillade and the ringing clash of lance and sword.

Vainly the general, stationed on a hill on which he had planted his standard, tried to follow the combat. All that could give him a clue of the state of affairs was the continued flashes of the batteries of guns.

Nothing was to be seen in the whole expanse of the plain but one great red blur, illuminating with its fires the murky heavens, with here and there a riderless horse or a wounded man. The troops had scattered in isolated combats; friends and enemies, Poles, Cossacks, Turks, and Tartars were mingled as if themselves blown about by the tempest wind that sweeps down from the Ural across the Sarmatian plain, and makes the many coloured leaves dance about in a mad saraband.

The fog favoured the resistance of the Poles; without its veil they would have soon seen that they were fighting ten to one. Savage cries of "Allah!" rose now and then above the roar of the guns; arrows fell thick as hail; lances clashed against other lances; yataghans were crossed with other menacing curved blades.

Often the adversaries went at it with their hands, knifing one another with short blows; even the horses bit one another in the fury of combat. Here a trunkless head bounded into the air, and the horse dashed away in the fog, still bearing a decapitated corpse; there, a soldier, pinned to the ground by a lance, clutched desperately at the empty air.

All at once a savage hurrah sounded on the flanks and rear of the Polish army. A horde of Turks burst at a mad gallop from the forest and threw themselves between the Poles and the river. The general did not detect the danger until it was too late. On all sides arose the cry of "Treachery! Treachery!" and each turned to flee for his life, trying to gain the bridge across the river. Before engaging in battle the Staroste Tarnowski had proposed in the council of war not to attack the Turks until they had crossed the river. The fate that the Poles had reserved for the enemy became their own portion by a sudden turn of fortune.

Almost stunned by this brusque reverse, but in nowise losing his courage, the intrepid commander of the cavalry forced his scattered troops to turn back. He threw himself before the flying horsemen, stopping them with gestures and cries, and finally succeeded in rallying some hundreds of fugitives, with whom he hurled himself upon the Turks.

It was in vain. The field pieces of the Poles had already been taken, and all at once an immense fire flamed up behind the conquered army. The camp followers had set fire to the bridge. At sight of this the bravest gave up the struggle, each thought only of saving himself, and those who fell into the hands of the enemy let themselves be massacred without resistance. The general had perished in the mêlée, and soon his skin, stretched and dried, covered the head of a drum offered as a trophy to the Sultan.

Thousands of men had been massacred and mangled by the hoofs of horses; thousands of soldiers, made prisoners, were tied to the tails of horses and led away to slavery. Of those who succeeded in gaining the river the greater part were drowned, some, a mere handful—composed for the most part of Cossacks—reached the further bank, thanks to the vigour of their horses, and found themselves for the time being in safety.

Two lance thrusts had wounded the Staroste Tarnowski. Just then a stray bullet struck him, and he sank down upon his horse's neck like a marionette when the string that sustains it is broken. There was nobody to assist him except Godomine, his young Cossack servant. The latter, who had many times given his master proof of his fidelity and devotion, sought once more to save him.

A pasha, in a flowing robe of blood-red velvet bordered in sable, bore down with flapping rein upon the wounded man. With incomparable skill he threw towards the Staroste the nooze of his lasso, which instantly enfolded the neck of the Pole. He was about to choke him, and was already rejoicing in the conquest of so noble a slave, when the Cossack severed the cord with a stroke of his knife, and disappeared with his master into the mists that rolled through the valley.

All at once the Staroste's horse staggered and fell. The Cossack caught his master, threw him across his own saddle, and resumed his wild dash for the river.

They had already reached in their headlong course the edge of the willows that lined the river, when the Staroste signified a desire to leave the horse. He could go no further; he felt that the end was approaching.

The Cossack dismounted, took his well-beloved master in his arms and bore him to the nearest tree; there he unfastened his tunic, and tried to staunch the blood that trickled from his bare chest.

"Do not take so much trouble," said Tarnowski; "God is calling me."

"May His will be done!" murmured the Cossack; "but if that is the case, I will accompany you, my master, to Paradise."

"No, no!" said the Staroste with an effort, for his voice was beginning to fail him. "My wife—shall it be her fate to end her days in the seraglio of the Sultan? No, no!"

He took breath, spat out the blood that choked him, and looked long at the Cossack, as if he would read his very soul.

Digitized by Google

Two riderless horses passed in their neighbourhood; one of them approached the dying man, neighed wistfully, and then, frightened, galloped away.

"Save yourself," continued the Starcste; "you alone of all my servitors I can trust as I would myself. Hasten home to Horgg; there, with your own hands, strangle my wife—'twere better so than that she become the prey of the Turks, 'twere better than to think that she will belong to another—so, no one shall have her."

Godomine looked at his master in awed astonishment.

"Do you comprehend?"

The Cossack made an affirmative sign with his head.

"You will carry out my command?"

Godomine nodded his head for the second time.

"Swear it to me."

The Cossack raised his hand and took the required oath.

"Good. Now I can die in peace, and you—go, and may God protect you!"

The Staroste fell back, and from his lips came a last orison. Then his eyes turned towards the north, like those of a man who, as he embarks upon a long voyage, casts a look upon his native land.

When the Pole had breathed his last, Godomine leapt into the saddle and urged his horse fiercely across the stream. A troop of Turks, coming up at full gallop, sent after the fleeing man a cloud of arrows; but none of them reached Godomine. He only turned his head disdainfully and spat towards them. When his horse had climbed the opposite bank, the animal, as if sharing his master's sentiment, shook his waving mane and neighed joyfully. The Cossack threw his horse into a gallop, and presently the field of battle and the torrent of fugitives disappeared, lost in the violet shadows.

A sparsely wooded country spread itself out before the Cossack. He made his way over the carpet of velvety green moss that lay beneath the beeches, oaks, and birches, which, growing, at generous intervals, were aligned in long avenues, spreading their great branches in all directions. The tops of these forest giants were so bushy that they hid the sky from sight, and only a few isolated rays of the sun flitted furtively through their foliage.

After having journeyed long under the fluttering leaves in the midst of the thousand noises of the forest, he slackened the pace of his foam-flecked steed. In this solitude the clamour of conflict could no longer be heard; one might almost have thought that there were no men upon the earth. The dry taps of the woodpecker, drilling with its beak the bark of the oak, or the cry of the vulture, alone was heard in that realm of peace.

It was night when Godomine, leaving behind him the wooded country, found himself amid the great marshes and pools of water, in whose calm surface was mirrored the pale light of the stars—little seas and lakes bordered with waving reeds. The intelligent Cossack horse advanced with much caution, now and then sounding with his hoof the treacherous soil. A pale mist rose in light clouds from beneath the earth, and about the horseman began the dance of the false fires of the marsh lights. The Cossack almost thought himself flying, like the Tsarewitch in the story, on the back of a winged wolf across the heavenly vault; above him floated the clouds, and all about twinkled the reflection of the stars.

It was not until the morning, on his arrival at a miserable village, that Godomine resolved to take a little rest. A dog greeted the unknown horseman with savage barking; a young girl in a short garment of sheepskin ran out, barefooted and with unbound hair, bearing upon her shoulders a yoke from which hung two buckets.

The Cossack helped her draw the water, and, in turn, she let him drink, and his horse as well. After that the young girl pastured her goats, and to appease his hunger he plucked and ate the berries that grew everywhere among the hedges. Then Godomine recounted to the frightened peasants all that had happened.

After a little he set out again, traversing fields and pastures, passing by villages and manors, saluted here by the peal of bells and there by the croaking of ravens that dotted the freshly harvested fields. And so he went on, hour after hour, across field and forest, moor and upland, never letting his horse rest an instant except at a spring or at the edge of a corn field.

Day was falling as he reached the sandy steppe on which was situated the estate of Horgg.

Already the chateau, locked in its belt of grey moss-covered walls, rose before him on a gently sloping hill. At the side of a road stood a cross, presenting to the passer-by the image of the dying Saviour. The windows of the castle gleamed in the first rays of the sun, and when Godomine arrived at the court the rooks greeted him from the height of the belfry with a discordant clamour.

The Cossack tied his horse in the court, mounted the narrow servant's stair, passed unnoticed through the ante-room, and heaved a profound sigh as he stopped before the door of the bed-chamber.

When he entered, a sort of rosy twilight flooded the great room. The sunlight came in, tempered by the curtains of the windows and of the bed that stood in the midst of the room, and on the Persian carpet which covered the floor, and on the bearskins of the bed it made shifting golden circles.

On the bed, half-hidden amid its snowy pillows and soft furs, lay a golden-haired woman of marvellous beauty.

The Cossack stopped before her, gazing on her with dumb emotion. One of the great blonde tresses of the Starostin flowed over her breast, uncoiled like a golden serpent guarding an enchanted treasurer; her gracious head, with its crimson half-opened lips, rested upon one of her arms; she breathed tranquilly, regularly, like a sleeping child, and the dazzling ermine on her gown, made of some soft stuff worked with gold, gently rose and fell in the even rhythm of her respiration. He felt pity for this beautiful young creature who slept so free from care, and it seemed to Godomine as if he felt the quickening of some new and unknown feeling, compassion, or love, that had just been born within his breast.

But his oath! he had sworn to make the wife follow her husband into the other world. Should he kill her in her sleep? Could he do it when she had opened her eyes? Ought she to pass away without a prayer?

No. He approached her slowly, nearer still, and pronounced her name aloud.

She sighed deeply and turned on her couch.

"My gracious lady."

She made another movement, and, lying on her back, she slowly opened her blue eyes wider and wider.

Godomine felt his heart beating.

"Oh, it is you," she murmured, and she quickly drew the coverings about her; "what is it? What has happened? Whence come you?"

"From the field of battle, Madame."

"Where is the Staroste, my husband?"

"Dead, Madame, dead; but, God be praised, Madame, he perished like a hero."

Digitized by Google

The shocked Starostin stared fixedly at this bearer of evil tidings, but she did not weep.

"Dead," she murmured slowly.

"We lost the day," continued the Cossack, "and the conquering infidels are pursuing us—are at our heels now. You cannot, you must not, Madame, be their prey."

"Well, let us fly," cried the beautiful widow.

"The last wish of my master," continued Godomine, "was for you, and he enjoined me to——"

"To accompany me?"

"No, Madame, no——"

"What, then?"

"To kill you."

The Starostin stared at Godomine with terror; then she set to rubbing her eyes.

"No; I am not dreaming, I am awake. But you—you are mad."

"No, Madame; but I must obey."

"You will never execute such a command."

"I have sworn a sacred oath to the dying Staroste. Pray, Madame, for you are about to die."

"To die!" She drew herself up, and, proudly lifting her beautiful head, she said: "Am I then so powerless? Go, miserable varlet, or I——"

She was about to pull the bell rope to summon help when Godomine swiftly drew the poniard from his belt and severed the cord with a single stroke.

"Pray, before it is too late," said the Cossack slowly.

"But I do not wish to die," she moaned.

"Pray!"

"I do not wish to."

"Then may God pardon me."

And Godomine took in his arms the beautiful widow, who shuddered through all her body and menaced him with her eyes; in the right hand of the servitor the steel of the poniard gleamed ominously.

"Pity!" cried the Starostin.

"Pardon me what I have said in this mortal panic," she continued; "I was mad! You are not cruel, your heart is good, you will have pity on me!"

"Pray!"

"My God! Must such a command be executed?"

She began to weep and pray. A burning tear fell upon the bronzed hand of the Cossack. He shivered, and released his victim.

"Take all that I possess," said the Starostin suddenly. "Take this necklace——"

"You are very generous, Madame," responded Godomine, "but I will not betray my master."

"What do you wish then?" stammered the Starostin. "You wish my blood? Why? Rather take me living—take me, I belong to you—save me——"

"Fear God, Madame!" cried the startled peasant.

She threw herself upon Godomine's neck, making of her arms a lasso like that which the Tartars throw in battle, the noose of which paralyses its victims and makes of him a slave. Godomine fell on his knees and hid his face in the soft, white billows of the fur that fell about the Starostin's form.

"You are so strong, so handsome!" she murmured. "Do you not care for me?" She laughed softly. "Oh, I knew it, too—deny it if you dare."

Slowly she drew to her the Cossack's face, and kissed him full upon the lips.

"Have pity on me!" murmured the unhappy man. For all response the Starostin pressed him more closely to her, and covered his face with fiery kisses.

"Unloose me, Madame!" cried Godomine, "let me go! I have not the blood of Judas in my veins!"

"Life is just beginning for us," continued the snarer; "for us the future is all rose colour—for the dead, ashes and silence. Is it not good to live and love?"

"Pity!" cried the Starostin.

Again she sought to draw the Cossack towards her. But her very abandon finally capped the climax of Godomine's indignation, and gave him back his strength.

"Unloose me, woman!" he cried. "Demon, tempt me no further!"

And winding her golden tresses about his hand, he thrust his poniard into the Starostin's heart. She gave one cry, a convulsive tremor shook her beautiful form, and, with a rattle in the throat, she sank down dead.

The Cossack knelt down and prayed in silence.

When he had made the sign of the cross he arose. The oath to his master was accomplished, his wife was dead. Ah, but she was beautiful, even in death, stretched upon the billows of blood-dyed ermine and half covered by her heavy golden locks!

The Cossack made upon her the sign of the cross. Then he left the chamber of death, hastened down the narrow stair, and leapt into his saddle, with a cry to those who gathered about him: "Our master is dead! The infidels are upon us! Save yourselves who can!"

Indescribable confusion followed this announcement.

But the Cossack had passed the portals and was off at a mad gallop across fields and prairies, ditches and streams, his horse clearing all obstacles with mighty leaps. To see his wild career, one might have thought that the dead beauty rode behind him on the horse, lashing both horse and rider with her golden tresses.

Arrived on the steppes, surrounded by a green undulating sea of flower-dotted grasses on whose slender fronds the sunlight danced, the Cossack curbed his smoking horse to a walk.

Then he cast a profound sigh, and, lifting his head, gazed long into the face of the heavens, like one who, fearless of reproach, looks straight into the eyes of God.

Digitized by Google

CONRAD'S ✣ LOVE ✣ STORY.

ON a summer evening, some ten years ago, a group of men sat round a table in the Café Louret, in the French quarters of New Orleans, sipping light wines and black coffee. They were a merry party, and a good story was told or a song sung between every round of drinks. The jolliest jester of them all was Jules Fougere, a young swell who sometimes painted, when luck was against him at the lottery, and who always had on hand a score of love affairs with pretty Creole women. He had just finished describing the dark hair and the dreamy black eyes of his newest lady love, when Paul Conrad, an artist, entered the café. Every man at the table knew Conrad well, and they called to him to join them.

"A story, Paul, a story!" cried one of the party, as Conrad said:

"Jules Fougere! You here? Pardon, I did not see you before, but, believe me, I am glad you are present. Yes, I will tell you a story, and it will be true."

Conrad addressed Fougere, and there was a peculiar emphasis to his words, but it was unnoticed, except by the man for whom they and their hidden meaning were intended. The Bohemian painter turned a trifle pale and emptied his wine glass at a gulp.

"I sold my last picture this morning," Conrad began, as he sipped the black coffee he had ordered, "and on my way home I planned a surprise for my wife. Some of you know my wife—my Juliet. You know how beautiful she is; you have seen her dark, dreamy eyes, but ah! you cannot know my love for her. Her voice is music to my soul! the light of her eyes guides my brush! my love for her is the inspiration of my life!

"In the jeweller's window I saw a beautiful necklace. The diamonds gleamed brighter than stars, and I said to myself: 'I will buy it for Juliet. It will make the love light shine in her eyes till the gems look pale. Yes, the diamond necklace shall be my present to my wife.' The price was more than half the price of my picture, but money was nothing to me when I thought of Juliet's happiness.

"With light steps and a happy heart I hastened home with the present. I hurried to Juliet's room and opened the door softly. Ah, the story does not interest you, my dear Fougere! Too many love affairs of your own to think of another man's love! But be patient to the end, and I promise the story shall interest you more than you think."

"I am deeply interested, Paul. Go on!"

Fougere grew a trifle paler, and others besides Conrad this time noticed that his hand trembled slightly as he raised his wineglass to his lips.

"I entered Juliet's room," Conrad went on, "but she did not meet me with open arms as was her custom. I glanced about the room. She was not there. Then the plan to surprise her with the pretty present came to mind. I would conceal it in the drawer of her dressing-case. She would find it when it was time to dress for dinner, and I would be there to see the glad sparkle in her eyes, to hear her exclamations of startled delight. Yes, I would surprise her, then she would prize the gift all the more.

"I hastened to the dressing-case, fearful she would return before I could hide the package. I opened the drawer, and there I found, not the dainty handkerchiefs of Juliet, but a picture, a photograph. Beneath the picture there was a letter, a letter to Juliet, my wife. I picked it up carefully, as one would touch a viper. I read it, words of love, words of passion, all addressed to her, to the woman I loved better than life. I saw the name; it was that of the man whose photograph I had found there with the letter.

"Ah, my dear Fougere, I see you are growing interested in my story!

"I put the letter back. Then I thought of the diamond necklace, the present I had bought for Juliet, the wife I loved. I threw it on the floor, I stamped on it; the glitter of the diamonds seemed to mock me; they were like serpents' eyes, and a serpent had entered my house. I took up the picture again. My brain was burning, but I wanted to look at that face once more, so I could not forget it.

"Then Juliet entered the room. At a glance she saw what I had discovered, and, falling on her knees at my feet, she confessed all and begged me to forgive. My love was dead, but there was no forgiveness in my heart. I looked down at the broken necklace; the gleaming diamonds were watching me, they seemed to laugh at my misery, and the pictured face of Juliet's lover smiled at me.

"I drew my dagger, and as she knelt there at my feet, I plunged it into the heart of Juliet, my wife, who was false to me!

"You start and grow pale, my dear Fougere! Does my story interest you so much? Stay, do not leave yet, the story is not finished.

"I ran from the house, leaving her dead there on the floor. Her blood stained the diamonds of the broken necklace. The picture and the dagger I brought with me. I have them now! See, here is the picture! 'Tis the handsome face of Jules Fougere! And here is the dagger! See the stain of blood on the blade there, and there! It is the blood of Juliet, my wife! The blade pierced her heart as it now pierces yours, Jules Fougere!"

With a lightning-like movement Conrad sprang forward and plunged the long blade of the dagger into the heart of his wife's lover, then turning to the horrified men round the table, he said quietly:

"Gentlemen, kindly call the police; I wish to give myself up!"

E. GARNET.

Digitized by Google

Detective and Prisoner.

Two men sat together in the rear seat of a smoking-car on one of the American railways, and chatted familiarly of the ups and downs of a miner's life, the topic being suggested by a landscape dotted with coal breakers and furrowed with coal roads. The freedom and interest of their conversation did not seem to be dampened by the fact that the younger of the two carried a revolver, while his companion wore a pair of those uncoveted articles of jewellery which are known in criminal circles as "bracelets."

The few passengers who had observed them learnt from the confidential coloured porter that they were a noted detective and his prisoner on the way to trial.

As far as ages went the pair might have been taken for father and son, the fine grey head of the one contrasting strongly with the crisp brown curls of his captor.

What crime had been committed the porter did not know, but hazarded a conjecture that it must have been a pretty bad one or George Munsen wouldn't have took the trouble to put them things on his wrists. Presently the porter and the conductor satisfied the joint demands of etiquette and curiosity by stopping to exchange a few words with the detective; the former then perched himself upon the coal-box directly behind the prisoner, and the latter dropped magnificently into the seat in front. The train was sweeping round a curve and past a broken trestle on the hillside, at which both of the passengers looked with some interest.

"I remember that place," said the older man.

"So do I," responded the younger. "I was born there. Came near being buried there, too," he resumed, after a moment's pause.

"How was that?"

"It's a long story," said the detective, "but I guess we'll have time for it between this and the next station. Away up there on the slope is the little settlement where I made my début, so to speak; from it to the bottom of the hill there used to be a gravity road—a long winding track, reaching from the settlement down to the top of a blank wall of earth, where a slide occurred the year I was born. On both sides of the track grew saplings that had sprung up since the disaster (what I am telling you happened five years later), and they crowded the road, and hung over the old rusty rails on which the coal cars used to run.

"You must remember that the houses were built near the mouth of the pit—that was one of the first mines worked in this country and one of the first to be abandoned. The time I am telling you about some men were walking up the track, and a lot of children playing near the top, climbing in and out of an old car which had lain there since it made its last trip, with the broken spraggs still in its wheels. The men were miners, all but one of them, who questioned his companions about their work and the country they lived in. He was evidently a stranger—probably a newspaper man.

"Presently, as they talked, a shout from the top of the slope attracted their attention, and they looked up just in time to see the car begin to move slowly down the grade. There was an impatient exclamation from the oldest man in the party. 'Them brats is always up to some mischief,' he said. 'They have started that old thing off at last. I've been expecting to see it go, any time this five year. They'll be breaking their necks yet with their tomfooling.'

"And another of the group added: 'We must dust out of this lively, unless we want to get our own necks broke: she'll either jump the rail or go to pieces at the bottom; lucky there ain't no one on board of her.' The stranger was looking anxiously up at the approaching runaway. His quick eye caught sight of something round and golden above the black rim.

"'There's a child in that car,' he said quietly.

"It was a second or two before his companions realised the awful meaning of that statement. 'A child! That was as if he had said that in a few minutes someone—perhaps one of themselves—would be childless. With one impulse they turned to look at the broken rails by the edge of the fault. Shuddering, they fixed their eyes again on the approaching mass, then hopelessly on each other. They could not dream of stopping the progress of the car. But, quick as thought almost, the stranger took hold of a sapling and bent it down till it nearly touched the track. 'Hold it,' he said to one of the men, 'it will help to check her.'

"A rod further down another, and then a third and fourth were held in the same way. So four of the party waited for a few breathless seconds, while the two remaining ones hurried further down; but one more effort, and the car was upon them. The first obstacle was whipped out of the hands of the strong man who held it, and the car rushed on to the second with scarcely lessened force. Again the barrier was brushed aside, but this time the speed of the old wreck was perceptibly less. By the time the fifth obstruction was reached, the new comer was able to clamber aboard and throw the child into the arms of his companion, but before he had time to save himself the old truck had regained something of its momentum, and was plunging on towards the precipice.

Digitized by Google

"Well, the man jumped just as they reached the edge, just before the vehicle shot over into the air, but he had very little time to choose his ground, and so landed, as luck would have it, on the only heap of stones in sight. The others picked him up for dead, and carried him to the settlement, where the miners held a regular wake over him. But he came to life in the middle of the festiv—the obsequies, I mean—and it was found that he was only crippled for life.

"The miners, folks not easily moved, were enthusiastic about the affair.

"A mass meeting was held, and an orator addressed the crowd from the top of an overturned barrel.

An orator addressed the crowd from the top of an overturned barrel.

"They also gave such testimonials as they could to show their gratitude and appreciation.

"One of these expressions took the form of a souvenir, signed by every man in the place, and stating in very grandiloquent language what the poor fellow had done. His quick wit seemed to them more wonderful than his courage and devotion in a community where neither quality is unusual at all. The man who takes his own life in his hand every day, and has frequently to fight for the life of some companion, values a 'brainy' action. In the box with the testimonial was a purse of fifty dollars and a curious old gold cross, that had been treasured by the mother of the child that was saved, as her piece of finery. On it was rudely engraved these words:

"'Given by the miners at the Notch to the man who risked his life for a child.'

"That was all. The poor fellow went away, and would have been forgotten, only that the old miners told the story sometimes to their children."

The prisoner was looking out of the window. The conductor fussed about as though ashamed of the interest he had shown in the story—a story which he did not doubt was pure fiction. Only the porter gave way to his sympathy, and asked whether the man had ever appeared in those parts again.

"Not that I know of," replied the detective.

"And was you the boy what he saved?"

"I was the kid."

"And you never heard tell what became of the man? What would you do if you should come across him some time?" Evidently the porter had an imagination which was trying to assert itself.

"Oh, I'd try to even the thing up somehow. I suppose common decency would demand that. I'd treat him as well as I knew how."

"Look here," said the prisoner, turning from the window with an apparent effort to change a conversation which, for some reason, had not seemed to interest him, "look here, old man, I've got a little keepsake, that your story just reminded me of, and if I could get at it I'd ask you to take charge of it for me till—till the thing is over. If you'll put your hand in there and pull out that piece of ribbon, so——"

The conductor almost jumped out of his seat.

"Hanged if it ain't the cross that you've just been telling about!" he shouted.

A month later the detective was undergoing a cross-examination by the conductor and porter.

"Yes, he was a bad lot—oh, yes, he didn't have a leg to stand on; the facts were all as clear as day. All true about the cross and the rest of it? Just as true as gospel. What had he been doing? Throwing bombs the last thing. Punished? Well, to tell you the truth, they won't be apt to punish him till they catch him again. Fact is, he got away from me somehow that same night. Who, me? Oh, no. I'm not on the force any more; I've been bounced."

SILAS MACKAY.

Digitized by Google

BRISK, THE AVENGER

BIBLIOTHECA BODLEIANA

THE widow of Paolo Saverini lived with her son in a poor little house on the ramparts of Bonifacio. The town, built on a spur of the mountain, seeming in places to hang suspended over the sea, faced across a narrow channel, that bristled with jagged rocks, the lower coast of Sardinia.

At its feet, a cut in the cliff, like a gigantic corridor, leading between precipitous walls up almost to the first house, served as a port for the Italian Sardinian fishing boats, and twice a month for the wheezy old steamer from Ajaccio.

On the white mountain side the group of houses made a spot yet more white. They look like the nests of wild birds, clinging to the rocks and looking down upon the terrible passage where few vessels dare venture.

The house of the widow Saverini, set upon the very edge of the cliff, has three windows that look upon the savage and desolate scene. She lived there alone with her son Antoine and their dog Brisk, a big, gaunt brute, with long shaggy hair, which accompanied Antoine on his hunting trips.

One evening, after a dispute, Antoine Saverini was killed with a treacherous knife thrust by Nicolas Ravolati, who fled that night to Sardinia.

When the old mother received the body of her son, which some neighbours brought to her, she did not cry, but remained for a long time staring at it motionless; then, extending her wrinkled hand above the corpse, she pledged to it the vendetta.

She wanted no neighbours to sit up with her, and shut herself up with her dead, keeping with her only the dog, which howled dolefully. Crouched at the foot of the bed, with its head towards its master's body and its tail pressed between its legs, the dog howled long and shrill, while the mother, leaning with fixed gaze over the corpse, wept silent tears.

The old woman began to speak. At the sound of her voice the dog was stilled.

"Go, go in peace. You shall be avenged, my little one, my boy. Sleep, sleep in peace. You shall be avenged, do you hear? Your mother promises it; and your mother always keeps her word, as you well know." And gently she leant forward and pressed her cold lips to the dead face.

Then Brisk began to whine with a monotonous heart-rending terrible sound.

They remained thus, the woman and the dog, until morning.

Antoine Saverini was buried the next day, and soon his name was heard no more in Bonifacio.

He had left neither brothers nor near cousins. No man was there to take up the vendetta. The mother alone thought of it, day and night.

Across the strait she saw, from morning to night, a white spec on the coast. It was a little village, Longosardo, where the Corsican bandits took refuge when hard pressed. They were almost the only inhabitants of the hamlet, and there, in sight of their native land, they awaited the moment when they could return to Corsica. In this village she knew Nicolas Ravolati had hidden himself.

All day long would she sit alone by her window, brooding on her vengeance. How could she accomplish it—alone, infirm, almost at death's door? But she had promised; she had sworn on the dead body. She could not forget, she could not wait. What should she do?

She no longer slept at night, she no longer knew rest nor respite, she thought always, seeking a means. The dog slept at her feet, now and again raising its head to howl mournfully. Since its master was no longer there it often howled thus, as if it would have called him—as if the brute's soul cherished a memory that nothing could efface.

But one night, as Brisk resumed his low howling, the mother had a sudden idea—the idea of a vindictive and ferocious savage. She mused over it till morning; then, rising before dawn, she betook herself to the church. She prayed, prostrate on the stone flags, imploring God to aid her, to sustain her, to give her poor, worn body strength to avenge her son.

Then she returned. She had in her yard an old cask with the head knocked out, which served to catch the rainwater from the eaves. She turned it over, emptied it, secured it to the ground with stakes and stones; then she chained Brisk to it and went indoors again alone.

She walked up and down in her chamber ceaselessly, now gazing always at Sardinia. He was over there, the assassin.

The dog howled all through the day and all that night. In the morning the old woman brought it water in a pan, but nothing more—not a bone, not a crust.

The day passed. Brisk, exhausted, slept. The next day its eyes shone, its hair bristled, and it tugged madly at the chain.

The old woman still gave it nothing to eat. The dog became furious, bayed in a hoarse tone. And so the night passed.

Digitized by Google

Then, at break of day, the old woman went to a neighbour and borrowed a truss of straw. She then took some old garments, which her husband had worn, and stuffed them with straw to simulate a human body. Having driven a stake into the ground before Brisk's cask, she tied this mannikin upon it so that it seemed to be standing up. Then she fashioned the head out of a bundle of old cloth.

The dog, surprised, looked at this man of straw and was silent, although devoured with hunger.

Then the old woman went to the butcher's and bought a long string of sausages. Returning to her own house, she lit a fire near the kennel in the yard and broiled the sausages. The dog, famished, bounded about and foamed at the mouth, its eyes fixed on the sausages, the fumes of which drove it almost mad.

Then of these smoking sausages the old woman made a cravat for the man of straw. She fastened it firmly round the neck, as if to make it part of the straw figure. When this was done she unchained the dog.

With a mighty bound the beast seized the mannikin's throat, and, with its paws on its chest, began to rend it to pieces. It fell down, a bit of the prize in its jaws, then jumped again, forced its teeth into the cords, tore away some morsels of food, fell again, and leapt at it again ferociously. It carried away the face in great mouthfuls, rending it into strips with its long sharp teeth.

The old woman mutely watched it all, her eyes blazing. Then she chained up the beast again to his cask, starved it for two days, and recommenced this strange exercise.

For three months she trained it to this sort of struggle, to this repast won only by his fangs. She no longer chained the beast, but with a gesture set it at the mannikin. She finally taught it to tear it, to devour it, even though there was no food concealed in its throat. She presented it with the sausage afterwards as a reward.

As soon as the dog saw the mannikin it trembled, then turned to its mistress, who hissed "Go!" pointing with her finger.

When she judged the time had come, the widow Saverini went to confession one Sunday morning with ecstatic fervour; then, having assumed masculine garb, looking like a ragged old man, she made a bargain with a Sardinian fisherman, who took her, accompanied by her dog, to the other side of the strait.

She had a string of sausages in her bag. Brisk had been starved for two days. The old woman gave the beast a sniff of the fragrant food every now and then to excite it.

They reached Longosardo. She went to a baker's shop and asked to be directed to Nicolas Ravolati. He had resumed his old trade of carpentering, and was at work alone in the back of the shop.

The old woman pushed open the door and called loudly:

"Nicolas!"

He turned; then, loosing her dog, she cried to the trusty brute:

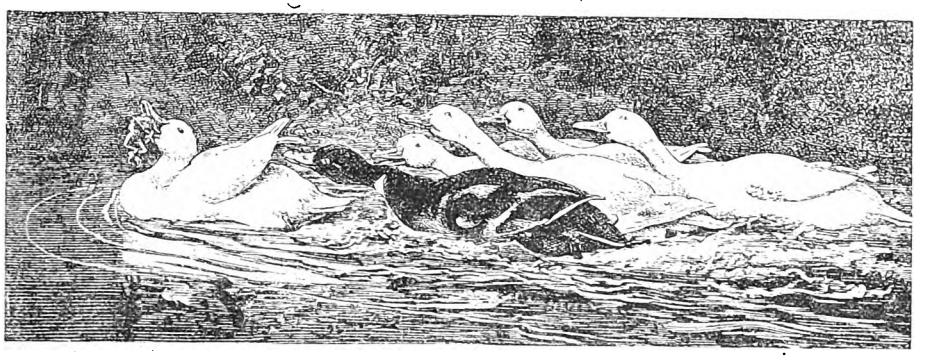
"Go; eat, tear, devour!"

The famished animal sprang and seized the man's throat. The man threw out his arms, seized the dog, and rolled upon the ground. For some seconds he struggled, his feet striking the earth. Then all was still, while Brisk tore his throat to ribbons.

Two neighbours, seated at their door, recall perfectly having seen an old man go out with a half starved dog, which, as it went, ate something which its master gave to it.

At evening the old woman reached her home. She slept well that night.

LE VIER.



Digitized by Google

MR. JOHN WYLIE'S LITTLE PLAN.

MR. JOHN WYLIE was bitterly disappointed. He had been in the private inquiry business for over fifteen years, and never before had he experienced such a reverse. It was an affair that had attracted the greatest public interest and attention. A success in it would have established his reputation as a detective officer. But he had failed utterly and ignominiously.

This is how matters stood when he was called in by Sir Henry Heaviside to investigate it. On the 15th of November Sir Henry was away from home. On that night, his wife, Lady Helena, supported by her father, the Marquis of Doltshire, had given a little dinner, which was followed by a reception. Her ladyship had, as usual, been rather slow in dressing, and when the dinner-hour arrived she was greatly pressed for time. In her haste she had neglected to replace her jewels, which she intended to put on after dinner and previous to the reception, in the safe, and contented herself with locking the door of her boudoir and putting the key into a drawer in her bedroom. After dinner she found the key where she had left it, and reopened the door. On entering her boudoir she discovered to her amazement that the window was wide open. A moment's investigation showed her that all the jewels she had left upon her dressing-table when she hurried down to dinner were stolen. Their value was close upon seven thousand pounds.

This was, I repeat, how the matter stood when Mr. John Wylie was called in, and practically it was in the same state when, after six weeks' laborious investigation, he gave up the inquiry in despair. He suspected much, but he discovered nothing. It was clear to him that the robber, whoever he might be, was perfectly familiar with the house and with Lady Helena's careless ways. It was also clear to him that the window found open—which was twenty-five feet from the ground, and which showed no evidence of having been forced—was left open as a ruse to mislead the detectives.

He felt quite sure that the robber had entered the boudoir by means of Lady Helena's key, and that, if he left the house at all, he went out by a side door, which was fastened only by a spring lock. He was inclined, however, to believe that the thief was one of the household, and that the jewels were still in the house. Acting on this belief, he searched the house from top to bottom, examined all the servants' boxes and cupboards, and watched diligently all their movements; but, after six weeks thus employed, he had found nothing to implicate or even throw suspicion on any one in particular. He confessed himself utterly baffled.

As one day seated in his sanctum he was very mournfully turning over in his mind the question of his failure, there was a knock at the door.

"Come in," he cried out.

The door opened, and the office boy put in his head.

"Lady wants to see you, sir."

"Show her in."

The next moment a tall, stately, thickly-veiled lady was ushered into the detective's private office. Mr. Wylie offered her a seat, which was silently accepted. As soon as the door was shut again, she raised her veil and showed a handome, refined face. Then without much more ado, she introduced herself.

"I am Lady Moodie," she said, "wife of the banker of that name. And I have come here," her ladyship continued, "in very great trouble, to see if you can assist me."

"You may rely upon it, Madam," said the detective, "that I shall use my utmost efforts to do so."

"I will tell you," Lady Moodie went on, without noticing Mr. Wylie's remark, "the whole story as shortly as possible. Owing to my health, I had to winter last year in Florence. My husband's business and parliamentary duties would not permit him to join me. While living there by myself I met an Italian gentleman, with whom I formed rather an intimate friendship. You should know," she added hastily, "that there was nothing improper in it, though there was much that was imprudent."

"I quite believe you," said Mr. Wylie.

Lady Moodie seemed rather irritated than gratified by this assurance.

"Thinking," she continued, after a pause, "that he was an honourable man, I frequently wrote to him, and some of my letters—one or two of them, at any rate—would, I am afraid, bear to a jealous mind a very different meaning from that intended. When I returned home he followed me. By my influence he was received in Society here—not only so, but I assisted him from time to time with money. At last his demands became too extortionate, and I refused them. Then the miserable scoundrel turned upon me, and threatened that if I did not comply with his requests he would give the letters to my husband. He had mistaken his woman," Lady Moodie concluded passionately. "I would rather die than give a penny to the menaces of a coward!"

"May I know the gentleman's name?"

"Count Ulrici."

"Whew! The male professional beauty!"

Mr. Wylie, like everybody else, had heard of the Count. He was considered by all to be the best-looking, best-dressed, and best-mounted man to be seen in Rotten Row. He was reputed to be very rich, too, and it was this revelation as to the means by which he lived that astonished Mr. Wylie.

"I presume," said the detective, after a pause, "that you wish me to get possession of these letters?"

"Precisely," answered Lady Moodie.

Mr. Wylie reflected for some moments in silence, then he said:

"I really don't see how I can get them without committing a burglary."

"Couldn't you be induced to risk that?" asked Lady Moodie eagerly.

The detective started. Evidently her ladyship was not inclined to stick at trifles.

"Well, you see," said Mr. Wylie very deliberately, "burglary is rather a large order."

"I'm willing to pay anything to balk the coward," replied Lady Moodie fiercely.

"That's all right," answered Mr. Wylie; "but money's of little use to a man who's doing ten years."

At his words Lady Moodie's face became downcast. She was disappointed. Mr. Wylie noticed this.

"At any rate," he said to her, "let burglary be the last thing. We may be able to hit on some easier expedient. Let me see now." And he reflected a moment. How many of those letters are there?"

Digitized by Google

"Some forty or fifty."

"Ah, so many? He couldn't, then, carry them about with him. Has he any servants?"

"Just one—a valet—an Italian, like himself."

"Hum. I wonder whether he could be bribed? Most Italians can. If I had a week or two to gain his confidence——"

"Impossible. If five thousand pounds be not given to Ulrici within a week the letters will be in my husband's hands."

"Oh, is that the case?"

"Yes; Sir Charles and I leave for Darklingbourne—that is our place in Doltshire—to-morrow, and the Count says that this day week he'll follow us, and that if on his arrival I don't give him that amount he will at once hand the letters to my husband."

"By Jupiter!" exclaimed Mr. Wylie, jumping excitedly to his feet. "By Jupiter, I have him! Excuse me, my lady," he added more calmly, "I think I see a way out of the maze. Do as you intended. Let him follow you to Darklingbourne, and if he presents himself to you there, defy him. You may do so with impunity, for he will have no letters to produce."

During the ensuing week Mr. Wylie kept a strict watch upon all the movements of the Count. He contrived, too, to discover a good deal regarding his past life and his future plans. He picked up an acquaintance with his valet, and from him discovered that his master intended to carry out his threat of going to Darklingbourne. The valet had orders to have his portmanteau ready, packed with everything necessary for a few days' stay from home.

On the evening preceeding the day on which he was to see Lady Moodie at Darklingbourne, Count Ulrici drove to Euston. Mr. Wylie, who had ascertained beforehand the train by which he intended to travel, was there awaiting him. The detective was disguised. He was an adept in that business, and now his own mother would not have known him. He had provided himself with a first-class ticket to Rottenborough, the station nearest to Sir Charles Moodie's seat.

The Count came to the station unaccompanied by his servant. Mr. Wylie noticed that his luggage consisted of a large portmanteau only—no doubt the one that the servant spoke of. It was marked on the side with the Count's initials "R.U." As it was too big to be taken conveniently into the carriage, its owner directed it to be placed in the luggage van.

Having marked well the portmanteau and the van into which it was put, Mr. Wylie took his seat in the train in a compartment not far from the Count's. When the train reached Willesden he got out and went into the refreshment-room. There he remained until the train had begun to move, when he rushed upon the platform too late to get in.

"Confound it!" he exclaimed, in affected vexation, "I'm left behind."

"Very sorry, sir," said a porter; "where are you for?"

"Rottenborough. When is the next train due?"

"No other train to-night, sir. You'll have to wait till four to-morrow morning."

"My gracious!" exclaimed Mr. Wylie, apparently much put out by the information, "what on earth am I to do? My luggage has gone on."

"Train stops at Harrow, sir. I'll telegraph there and have it sent back by the next train."

"Thank you; I wish you would. If I am to stop in town over-night I must have it."

"Very well, sir. What is your baggage like?"

"It is a large leather portmanteau, and was put into the through van for Rottenborough. They'll be able to distinguish it easily, as it has my initials on it."

"And they are, sir?"

"R. U."

The porter went off to telegraph, and the detective returned to the refreshment-room. There Mr. Wylie remained for some time, apparently absorbed in the consumption of a glass of beer, but really wondering what the result of his stratagem would be. He greatly feared lest the Count might notice his portmanteau being removed from the van, and instead of a message coming that the luggage would be sent back at once, one would arrive directing his arrest. So great was his anxiety on this point that it seemed to him hours before the porter turned up. Then, to his relief, he learnt that the portmanteau had been taken from the van at Harrow, and would be sent back by the next train.

When the next train arrived at Willesden the porter pointed out to him the returned portmanteau. Sure enough, it was Count Ulrici's. Letting it remain where it was, Mr. Wylie jumped into a compartment and proceeded with it to Euston.

At Euston, Mr. Wylie claimed the portmanteau, and boldly putting it on top of a cab, drove to King's Cross Station on the Underground Railway, and there he took a ticket to Charing Cross. Carefully choosing an empty compartment, he contrived during the course of his journey to effect a change in his disguise such that, while no more like himself than ever, he was still a very different looking man from the one who claimed the portmanteau at Willesden. When he arrived at Charing Cross it was quite dark, and there were few people about. Taking the heavy portmanteau in his hand, he carried it himself from the station to his office in Duke Street.

The moment he got safely into his private office he produced a bunch of skeleton keys and set about picking the lock. Succeding in this, he eagerly searched through the articles in the bag for the letters he wanted. To his chagrin, he could discover no trace of them. Over and over again he searched the contents, but each time with the same result. At length he paused in his work, almost fainting with anxiety and disappointment.

"Another failure," he said to himself, "and a worse one than before." As he spoke he continued aimlessly turning over the portmanteau's contents. "What a fop the fellow is!" he exclaimed. "Why, half of his luggage is brushes! And now that I notice it, what strange brushes they are! What heavy backs they have!"

The backs of the brushes certainly looked very thick, and when Mr. Wylie examined them closely he found that they were even thicker than they looked, for the hair in the centre was much shorter than at the sides, and the backs, therefore, must be deeper there. Indeed, they looked so suspicious that the detective at once began to try to see if they did not open in some way or other. He soon discovered that they did. The top scale of polished wood ran in a kind of groove, and was easily moveable. He pulled it back, and there in the middle was a hollow space crushed full of letters. Trembling with excitement, he lifted them out and looked at them. To his delight they were the very ones he was in search of.

There were two cases, each containing two brushes. In the first brush he opened there were sixteen letters from Lady Moodie; in the second there were fifteen. These were all in English. The brushes in the other case had also moveable backs, and contained letters, but a glance at the handwriting showed him very plainly that they were not Lady Moodie's.

Digitized by Google

He glanced rapidly over the letters. Their contents were of the most innocent character, mere commonplace congratulations and inquiries, such as a friend would write to a friend.

"I don't see," said the detective to himself, "why she should be afraid of her husband getting these. But she said there were more than forty of them, and there are only about thirty here. Let me see. By Jove, I have it! She told me there were only a few that were of a doubtful character. It is just those few that he has in his pocket, and I've failed again!"

He sat silent and still for a moment, dazed by this discovery, but he quickly regained his habitual coolness and decision.

"Well," he said, "I may as well see what the other letters are about."

He began rapidly to read them. They were in various handwritings, but most of them in one he somehow or other thought he had seen before. These letters were simply signed with an "H," and were couched in the most affectionate terms.

"I wonder who this 'H' can be?" he said. "She's evidently very much gone on the Count, and no mistake. There's a 'love' or a 'darling' for every other word. Here's an invitation for the 15th; how sweet it is. But here is one in which she has gone farther than the 'H.' It is signed 'Helena.' Now, I wonder who 'Helena' is? Hullo, what's this? A letter from a man, and signed 'Svendeleri'—the old Jewish money lender and receiver of stolen goods. That, at all events, looks suspicious."

He read the letter over carefully. When he had finished it he lay back in his chair and drew a long breath.

"Good Heavens!" he said, when he had recovered his composure, "this is a discovery! Was there ever anything so fortunate? I'm off by the morning train, and our friend will be safely in quod before he has a chance of seeing Sir Charles. But stay, it isn't quite so simple as I thought. I must account for the way I came by this paper, which will be difficult. Beside, I'm not sure it will be evidence against him unless it's found in his possession. Let me see."

He paused and reflected. Then, after a few moments, with a cry of triumph, he set to work replacing the contents of the bag. When everything was in it except the letter from Svendeleri and Lady Moodie's correspondence, he selected about ten of the most innocent of her letters, and, replacing the remainder in the backs of the brushes, locked up the portmanteau. Then he placed Svendeleri's letter in one of Lady Moodie's, put them in his pocket, restored his disguise to what it was when he claimed the Count's luggage, and taking the portmanteau in his hand, left the office. When he reached the Strand he called a cab and drove to Euston. At Euston he asked for the station-master.

"This I find," said the detective to him, "is not my portmanteau, after all. I thought it was at first, as it has my initials on the side and is about the same size, but I find that my key won't go into the lock, so it can't be mine."

"No, sir, it isn't yours," replied the station-master; "it is Count Ulrici's. He's been kicking up an awful row about it. We've had half-a-dozen telegrams from Rottenborough already. I'm glad it's recovered. What about your own, sir?"

"That's the question. You had better telegraph down the line about it. It must have been put out at one of the stations the five o'clock train called at. I'll call and hear what news you have to-morrow. Good-night."

Before four o'clock the next morning Mr. John Wylie was at Euston, not disguised this time, but in his usual costume. He took a ticket by the first train for Rottenborough, where he arrived about eight. After swallowing a hasty breakfast at the hotel in that interesting town, he obtained a cab and drove to Darklingbourne. There he inquired for Sir Charles Moodie. Sir Charles at once saw him.

He informed Sir Charles that he was a detective. He had long, he said, been shadowing a foreigner who was suspected of a great crime, and who, he learnt lately, was about to try to levy blackmail upon Sir Charles by pretending to have letters from Lady Moodie which reflected upon her reputation. He was anxious to have a talk with this gentleman in an unsuspected character, in order to try and obtain some unguarded statements from him. He begged Sir Charles to allow him to represent himself as Sir Charles when the scoundrel came to the house. The baronet seemed very adverse to such a course, but Lady Moodie, who was called in for a consultation, so strongly supported it that at last he was induced to consent.

About midday Count Ulrici arrived. He sent up his card to Lady Moodie, but she refused to see him. Then he asked for Sir Charles. He was at once shown into the library, where the detective was. The Count had never seen Sir Charles, who, involved in business cares, seldom went into gay company with his wife.

The Count at once proceeded to business in the coolest and most impudent manner. He had no diffidence or hesitation about stating what sort of relations he wished Sir Charles to believe had existed between him and Lady Moodie. He said he had letters in her handwriting to prove the truth of his statements.

"Show them to me," said the detective.

The Count handed over the letters. After looking at them for a moment, Mr. Wylie proceeded to read them one by one. When he had finished he paused, and said very coolly:

"I see nothing incriminating in these against Lady Moodie. They are all of the most innocent description. But what is this?" And he held up Svendeleri's letter.

The Count turned deadly pale.

"Can I have made a mistake?" he muttered.

"I am afraid you have," said Mr. Wylie, and he touched a bell.

As he did so the Count sprung madly upon him. There was a moment's fierce struggle, but before the Italian could overcome Mr. Wylie, Sir Charles and a servant rushed into the room and seized him.

"Too late, my hearty," said the detective to the Count. "Look, Sir Charles, these are the letters he received from Lady Moodie; more innocent notes woman never penned. And see what I have discovered among them—a letter from that Jewish scoundrel Svendeleri, offering £2,000 for the Heaviside diamonds, which were stolen about two months ago. There stands the thief!"

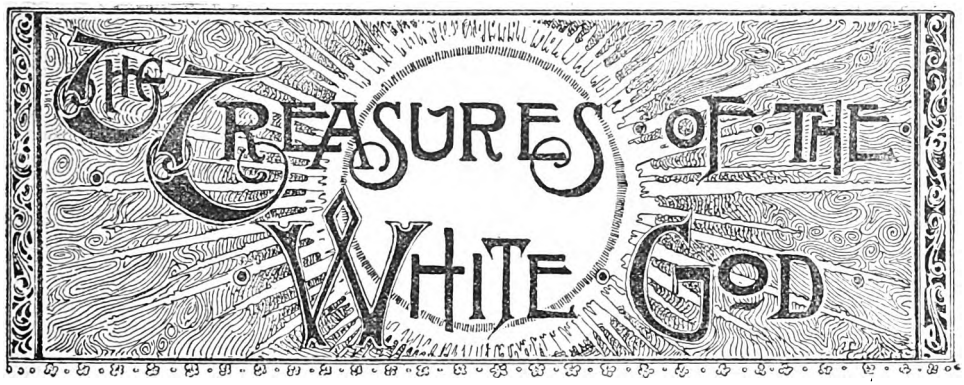
"What!" exclaimed the Count, "you're not Sir Charles Moodie?"

"No; I'm John Wylie, private detective, at your service."

"What a fool I was," exclaimed the Count, "not to see how it came about that my luggage went wrong."

N. N.

Digitized by Google



The Story of a Shameful Crime.

SUMMARY.

ROBERT LANE, escaped convict No. 407, alias Adrian Burgoyne is tracked to the World's Fair Grounds at Chicago. He is last seen, after an exciting chase by Mr. Inspector Grey and his assistant, Detective Dean, locked in a burning boat on the lake. Detective Dean finds a cipher in the convict's bed, which he sells to Mr. Richard Sheldon for £2,000. A Col. Lytle calls on Sheldon. They recall Burgoyne's history as follows: Ralph Ringold, when dying in Mexico left a packet containing £6,000 in the hands of Burgoyne for his friend Richard Sheldon, whom he appointed guardian of his daughter Patrice's fortune. Burgoyne overheard Lytle and Sheldon arranging to appropriate the treasure, and threatened to expose them. They caused him to be convicted of a crime, and sentenced to penal servitude for life.

They then discovered, when too late, that he had with him in cipher the secret to Ralf Ringold's hidden fortune and treasures in Mexico.

The cipher is now in their possession, but Patrice Ringold has the key.

Adrian Burgoyne escapes from the burning boat. He meets with a severe accident, which disfigures him beyond identity.

Richard Sheldon visits Patrice to obtain the key to the cipher. This, however, she had dropped the day before on the cliff, with her Bible. She hastens off to find it.

She falls over the cliff, but is rescued by Adrian Burgoyne. Startled by the sudden sight of Col. Lytle, he himself loses his balance and falls. He checks himself, however, and discovers the lost Bible of Patrice. He carelessly throws away the loose cover, and visits Patrice. He tells her of all he has gone through, and shows her a copy of the cipher which fell into Detective Dean's hands tattooed on his arm. He is rewarded by the words of Patrice: "I adore you!"

CHAPTER XIV.

MISSING!

ONCE in a lifetime Heaven sends some gleam of joy that overshadows all other experiences. To Adrian Burgoyne that rare flitting moment of happiness supreme had come.

"I adore you!" The outpouring of a young impetuous soul, free from guile as that of an angel, charmed, fascinated by the wonderful picture of fidelity presented by the hero martyr before her, that utterance was the grateful spontaneous expression of a heart true, tender, and loving beyond compare.

Adrian Burgoyne reeled for joy; he stretched out his eager hand towards Patrice to deter the homage that he felt was due from himself to her—perhaps to pour forth the story of the ardent love with which her beautiful face and the revelation of her true, womanly soul inspired him.

But Patrice had disappeared from the window, coy, abashed at being betrayed into an expression of her vivid emotion; startled slightly, too, Burgoyne adjudged, for the single, quickly uttered, warning-toned word quivered on the air.

"Hasten!"

He turned to leave the spot, with a wild, fierce joy untrammelled, because perfect trust and innocence had spoken, and he knew their deep sincerity; jealously active, for he was ever battling back the haunting thought that he was an ex-convict; that he did not stand on the plain, even basis of ordinary men.

Gliding past a tall lilac bush, he halted. The aroma of fine burning tobacco was borne towards him. Glancing at the front of the house, he saw a glowing point of light—the end of a cigar—and its flare partially revealed its possessor's identity.

"Lytle!" breathed Burgoyne, in an intense tone of voice. "Did he overhear us? Scarcely; but he is coming this way."

Lytle's indolent pose indicated little of the curious or excited lurker. On the contrary, it was evident that he was strolling casually about the garden, that he had just left the house, and that he was entirely unaware and unsuspicious of the absorbing and important interview that had just so strangely taken place at the open window of Patrice Ringold's room.

The lilac lay directly in his path. Its sparse verdure barely sheltered the crouching Burgoyne at a distance. Should he pass directly by it, he could not help noticing the intruder in the garden.

Anticipating and determined to evade a meeting at short range, Burgoyne acted promptly.

He darted from his covert and across the garden beds. Speeding, lithe as a deer, to the fence, he scaled it.

A single glance backward showed Lytle motionless, much in the pose of a surprised animal taken off its guard, peering after the fugitive, and giving utterance to a prolonged suspicious "Ah!"

Had he recognised him, or connected him in any way with the man of the cliffs? Would he suspect that he had been a visitor to the cottage—a surreptitious one?

"Let him think what he likes, he cannot overtake me," murmured Burgoyne recklessly. "Soon I will return; soon Patrice shall be removed, for ever safe from the menace of his baleful power. Oh, sweet one! dear one; the very light of Heaven has come into my broken, joyless life!"

Digitized by Google

He trod on air, he felt equal to a conflict with leagued giants. The past was a dark abyss to forget. The future, golden winged, ecstatic, seemed all illumined with hope and happiness under the glamour and glow of love, sweet love.

She loved him! He could understand how that pure soul, reading his own through eyes untrammelled with earthly taint or selfishness, had passed by his scarred and acid-changed face, and, through the windows of his heart, her eyes had read the true worth of courage and devotion that made him a hero, a lover to cherish in her ardent, impetuous sight.

"The cover to the Bible," soliloquised Burgoyne, as he ran on fleetly. "How strange, how careless, that I should cast aside a treasure, the one-important clue to all the Ringold secret! But it is safe—oh! it must be safe. Who would pick it up, or, doing so, would think of exploring its soaked, matted surface, any more than myself? It was near a little school-house, in the playground, that I flung it away. I shall find it there. Then to hasten a return to the cottage. Patrice will be ready, awaiting me. I will convey her to some remote town, as far away from those villains as my means will allow. I will place her in safe, motherly hands. Then a brief adieu, and, inspired by her love, I start out, single-handed but confident, to win the battle of right against wrong, to secure for her the fortune hidden away—the tattooed chronicle, the cipher alphabet key will tell where."

Burgoyne found the little white frame school-house at last, after a vexatious delay, for he was comparatively unfamiliar with the district, and lost time pursuing a wrong road. He crossed the playground as he had done that morning. He ransacked his mind for a clear memory of the abandonment of the Bible cover.

Somewhere, in crossing that broad expanse of lawn, he had cast the precious cover away. Where? He found himself utterly unable to decide upon the exact spot, but he began searching the ground in every direction.

Over it once, over it twice, he crept on hands and knees. No result. He began to tremble. Was the precious secret to elude his grasp? Had some careless school-boy made it a target for a football kick? Could it be possible that it had fallen into hands friendly to his enemies?

"If only I had a lantern," he decided finally, "I could search more systematically. There is a house over beyond the road. I will see if I can secure a light there. An hour lost—more," continued Burgoyne, hastening his steps with vivid concern. "I must return to Patrice. Every moment may be vital, but the Bible cover first. To lose that means beggary for her."

He quickened his pace to a run, planning a rapid return. A swift march over the playground, and a prompt dash for the cottage, and the cover would be found.

Just at the road, however, he came to a halt, with a vivid shock.

It was where a diverging line ran towards the village and past the Loring cottage. Just at his hand he had noticed the glow of a light, and, peering closer, he discerned the outlines of a vehicle, with two pawing, spirited steeds attached.

Upon the driver's seat sat a grim figure; the carriage door was open, and just at that moment, at a rustle in the shrubbery lining the road, two forms—one hurrying, the other reluctant—stepped into view.

"Here is the carriage," spoke the former of the twain.

"A man! Lytle; the midnight carriage!" gasped Burgoyne with a violent start. "I begin to understand!"

He was about to rush forward impetuously, when a thrilling voice checked him.

The companion of Colonel Lytle, drawing back free from his detaining grasp, shrank timorously.

"Why have you brought me here?" she cried. "You said you wished to give me some instructions from my guardian, Richard Sheldon, and——"

"I intend to take you to him, instead!" answered Lytle, suddenly seizing the girl, and dragging her towards the open door of the vehicle.

"I will not go! I will not go!" shrieked Patrice, wildly struggling in Lytle's grasp like a fluttering dove in the net of the fowler. "Mrs. Loring—Adrian! Help! help!"

CHAPTER XV.

KIDNAPPED.

AMID her fervent terror and helplessness, Patrice Ringold had well-nigh betrayed the identity of the man who lingered so near to her that he could have touched her flowing tresses of gold.

For an instant, the mandate of the sweet lips framing his name for the first time acted upon the impetuous Burgoyne as would a battle-cry to a valiant knight. With one blow he could send the scoundrel, Lytle, sprawling at his feet. A flash of prudence, of caution, stayed his impulse, however, and, as Lytle spoke, curiosity to learn if he had noticed what Patrice said, held Adrian Burgoyne's clenched hand in abeyance.

Apparently the schemer had not caught the word that would have aroused his keenest suspicions, amid Patrice's incoherent utterances.

"Stop!" he ordered with a savage scowl. "You can gain nothing by alarming others. I appear here as the authorised agent of your relative, Richard Sheldon. I am taking you to him——"

"I will not go! You cannot compel me!" panted Patrice wildly.

"Yes, I can. I have the legal power, girl!" And Lytle glowered down into the fine, shrinking face darkly. "You have deceived me."

"I—oh! let me go! You frighten—you terrify me!"

"It may well be so. You are playing a double game, and I know it!" hissed Lytle menacingly. "You pretend to have lost the alphabet key. I doubt it. Even if so, you can remember it, if you would. You have some friend, some lover, who is in a secret scheme with you to defeat my plans, for I saw a man skulking in the garden an hour ago, and that hastened my departure. You will tell the truth, however! Once Sheldon demands it, you will reveal what you know—what you are hiding from us—or he will make you wish you had. Into the carriage, I say! Sheldon shall decide this muddle. In with you!"

Slam.

"Drive on!"

Crack! went the driver's whip. The spirited steeds sprang from their haunches. Adrian Burgoyne started forward with a gasp of dismay, a moment too late.

So quickly had Lytle forced Patrice into the carriage, sprung in himself, slammed the door of the vehicle to, and given the order to the driver to start, that Burgoyne, about to dart forward and rescue the struggling girl, was grazed by the whirling wheels, and brushed, unnoticed and baffled, to one side.

The frantic shriek for help of the kidnappped girl mingled with the grinding of the wheels and the clattering hoofs of the horses.

"He is taking her away to torture, to imprison her, to wrest her secret from her lips!" gasped Burgoyne in alarm. "It shall not be. The driver is in his pay, a mute, faithful ally; but, ten to one, or ten against one, I will balk his designs!"

Down the smooth, hard country road, in pursuit of the fast-disappearing vehicle, sped Burgoyne. The practised steeds seemed to fairly fly on their course. They outdistanced the runner, expert and determined as he was, and, turning a curve in the road, were lost to sight finally, their echoing hoofs, beating out a swift flight, being the only reminder of even their remote proximity.

Digitized by Google

Still the pursuer kept on. He was gasping for breath now, wild-eyed, frantic, in despair. He must not lose trace of Lytle! Such men plotted to succeed, and once again imprisoned in some safe retreat, he would have all the difficult work of finding Patrice once more to do.

Besides, she was no match for such deft schemers. In an inadvertent moment she might drop a hint as to his escape, and the meshes of the law would again close about him.

For an hour Burgoyne sped on. He was forced to rest twice from sheer exhaustion. Just as he turned a curve in the highway he uttered a joyful cry.

A few hundred yards ahead, and about to strike off into a road leading through a dense belt of timber to the lights of a distant hamlet, he made out the carriage he had shadowed.

A broken trace had delayed it, and patching it up, the driver was making for the nearest town, to secure a new one.

Burgoyne dashed ahead at a new spurt of speed. A grim, resolute glitter shone in his eye, as at last his hands closed round the rear bar of the vehicle.

The rude log hut.

It was a closed carriage. Even the conventional little back window was not present. As he clung there, and ran along to keep pace with the carriage, he heard the low, pitiful moans of one of its occupants.

Poor Patrice, unheeded, and unhindered by her grim, watchful captor, lay back among the cushions, wailing despairingly.

The utterance fired the heart of her companion to renewed zeal and determination. Desperate resources were called for. Once the hamlet ahead was reached, a renewal of the former rapid progress of the vehicle would defeat all plans of pursuit or attack.

Force must be met with force. Upon the issue of the passing hour depended all his own future, as well as that of the stricken, terrified creature whose sighs pierced his heart like a searing, red-hot iron!

With a light spring, Burgoyne lifted himself clear of the ground, and secured a foothold on the rear axle, a firm clasp across the top of the carriage.

Clinging there, he peered ahead.

The driver, absorbed in directing his horses safely down the brambly, branch-sheltered road, was too intent on his task to notice him.

Burgoyne formed a speedy plan of procedure. He would climb noiselessly over the top of the vehicle, reach the driver's seat encircle his neck with one arm, suddenly choke and menace him to silence and submission, gag and secure him, stop the horses, boldly attack the villain within the vehicle, and rescue and fly with Patrice.

It was the one desperate, the only means of accomplishing a tangible result—by force and strategy.

He crept over the glassy roof of the carriage. It swayed into a rut and out of it at that moment, starting up the horses, but Burgoyne preserved a safe equilibrium.

He reached out one hand to grasp the driver round the neck.

Just then an unforeseen accident occurred.

He felt the horses spring forward. He saw the driver evade his clutch by suddenly ducking down his head.

Not to escape him, however. No; the driver was blissfully ignorant of the free passenger he was carrying along the rutty, unfrequented road.

An overhanging branch had brushed dangerously near to the top of the carriage, and he saw it in time, and it barely swept clear of his head.

Too late, Adrian Burgoyne saw it also. He tried to evade it, was caught by it, swept along by it, hurled over the back of the carriage, struck the ground with a thud.

Then he knew no more, and the carriage sped forward, leaving the brave but baffled champion of a loved one's cause bleeding, senseless, and unnoticed in the middle of the dark and lonely country road.

CHAPTER XVI.

FOUND.

AN hour of paradise—a lifetime in an abyss of despair!

Slowly through the confused, aching brain of Adrian Burgoyne that sentiment forced its way with the first waking moment of consciousness and reason.

All, all was lost! The woman he loved was in the power of bold, unscrupulous enemies, the precious key to the enigma of the secret cipher was gone, he himself lay helpless among strangers; all the bright promises of that fervent, delightful hour that he had passed learning to worship the purity, the beauty, the devotion of Patrice Ringold, had vanished into the blackest gulf of hollow, haunting misery.

Where was he? What space of time had elapsed since he had striven to rescue the kipnapped Patrice, and had been swept from the roof of the speeding carriage, like a leaf in the storm.

He projected the query vaguely, aloud, but in a weak, pained tone, and he opened his eyes, as the response came promptly, to view the walls of a rude log hut, and its ruder inmate, a brawny, honest-faced man, sharpening an axe at the hearth.

"You're in my bunk, which I've slept on the floor in consequence," came the bluff, candid avowal. "My daughter has been looking after you as well as doing her other work. Not that I mind it, partner—I ain't quite that heartless—only you've been at it day and night, nearly until yesterday, and I couldn't sleep even there."

"At what?" asked Burgoyne vaguely.

"Raving—stark staring delirious. First it was gaol—then a boat—then a gal. My! how you did carry on about that gal! Better?"

A shade of anxiety crossed Burgoyne's face at the allusions of his new acquaintance. He understood now. The fall from the roof of the carriage had been a fall to injury and illness. Perhaps the overstraining experience of preceding days of adventure, exposure, and suffering had aided a climax of unconsciousness and delirium.

Digitized by Google

"Don't fret," spoke the man again. "I didn't understand the gist of your wanderings. You've told no secrets. You see, I'm a woodchopper. Found you in the road. Brought you here. Nursed you since. Better?"

"I hope so. And how long have I been here?"

"Just eight days."

"Heavens!"

The disclosure fairly appalled Burgoyne. He uttered a dispirited moan, and sank back helpless.

"And if you care to go round again in good shape," advised his bluff nurse, "you'll lay still another eight days. Oh! don't think of intruding on me. It's rough fare, but you're welcome to it."

The week that ensued was one of torturing doubt, agony, and suspense to the convalescent wanderer. He looked less than ever like the Adrian Burgoyne of convict garb, as he one morning started from the hut, leaving with his kind-hearted friend half the little store of money he possessed, and his sincerest gratitude.

"My daughter has been looking after you."

Somehow he seemed changed, even to himself. The hours of patient, though galling inactivity spent in convalescence had afforded him an abundance of time for reflection, and he had passed already through the chastening furnace of fear, dread, and suspense. With the calm courage of undaunted resolve had come the assurance of final victory. His one thought was of Patrice. If he could find her, if he could only place her beyond the possible power of harm or persecution from her enemies, he would be content.

And why might he not find her? She had probably been removed to the city, within the shadow of Richard Sheldon's subtle craftiness. All he could hope to gain from his prisoner was a knowledge of the cipher alphabet. Once satisfied that she did not possess it, or a memory of it, he might cast her adrift, or even return her to the obscurity of her own cottage.

At all events, he would watch the plotters, shadow them, penetrate their secrets, gain a clue to the whereabouts of their fair prisoner.

Burgoyne set his face citywards. Then he faltered.

"The lost Bible cover!" he murmured concernedly. "It is almost useless to think of searching for it after this lapse of time, but I am near the place where I cast it away. Yes, I will make a final search for it."

He reached the vicinity of the district school-house, and went all over the playground once more. He sighed sadly as he failed to discover a trace of the coveted book-cover.

"Some one has picked it up," he reflected, "and has thrown it aside again as valueless. The rain, the wind have scattered it in fragments. That ends the quest for Ralph Ringold's hidden fortune!"

He was wearied with the long walk and the arduous search. At the edge of a meadow he sat down to rest, reflect, and recuperate.

Fifty feet distant was a group of urchins engaged in flying a kite. The brisk, clear breeze had sent their paper kite aloft like a bird. It swayed in the far azure like a living winged creature.

He watched them casually, aimlessly. He started into a token of kindly interest in their boyish sports as two members of the little throng massed about the proud owner of the kite, came timidly towards him.

"I say, Mister," began one of them, and then he paused, abashed at Burgoyne's lifted gaze, and dug his bare toes into the loose dirt in an embarrassed way.

"Have you got a pocket-knife?" supplemented his bolder companion, completing the appeal.

"I think I have," responded Burgoyne accommodatingly. "What do you wish?"

"We've been sending messengers up on the kite, and we want to send some more," vouchsafed the lad.

Burgoyne understood. By "messengers" the boy meant square or circular pieces of paper or cardboard. A hole would be made through these, the string run through it, and the wind would blow the whirling fragments clear up to the kite.

"I want the knife to rip off this cloth, and cut out a piece of the pasteboard under it," continued the boy. "It's heavy, but it'll do, and——"

"What is it?"

"A book cover."

"What!"

With a vehemence that fairly shocked the urchin, Adrian Burgoyne snatched from his hand the dark, fluttering object he had exhibited.

"It cannot be!" he gasped, almost inarticulate with powerful, overwhelming emotion. "Yes, it is—the lost book-cover!"

The missing Bible cover! Yes, there it was; he recognised it in a flash. Dew and damp had defaced it, the trampling of many feet had dented and disfigured it; but even yet, inside, he could trace in faint outline the inscription he had read that fateful morning after meeting Patrice Ringold—"From her loving mother."

With trembling fingers he spread it open. His soul in his eyes, he delved into its rear compartment—a flap-pocket formed of a piece of cloth.

Would he find it? Had the mistreated receptacle of a mighty secret kept close and sure the sacred, vital trust?

He groped, he shook the cover roughly, he tore the cloth lining apart, and then——

A heartrending groan escaped his lips, and he fell back, nerveless.

He had found the Bible cover, but the inclosure, the precious, treasured key—was gone!

(To be continued.)

POSTAL RATES.

SHORT STORIES will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON, at "Pearson's Weekly" Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

THE JOHN NOBLE
HALF-GUINEA COSTUMES

Direct from the Largest Firm of Costume Manufacturers in the world, have secured beyond a doubt the ADMIRATION OF THE WORLD. Being Absolutely Without an Equal Anywhere for Stylish Appearance, Durability, and Actual Money Value. 10/6

TWO GOLD MEDALS AWARDED.

These Costumes have received the highest praise from the leading journals of the day, and are justly regarded by all purchasers as Even Better than Advertised.

Each Costume scientifically cut, tailor-made, and beautifully finished in an exceedingly smart mode, as illustration. The design consists of full wide Godet skirt with belt, also very neat bodice with full front and broad box-pleat down centre, trimmed bold silk cord and three large buttons. Collar and cuffs outlined silk cord; saddle and sleeves lined.

Price complete only 10/6, packed in box and sent carriage paid for 9d. extra.

Sizes in stock fit any figure up to 38ins. round bust under arms, skirts being 38, 40, and 42ins. long in front; larger or special sizes made to measure, 1/6 extra.

THE JOHN NOBLE COSTUMES FOR YOUNG MISSES

are made in the John Noble Cheviot Serge, and trimmed military braid as illustration. A large box-pleat down the centre of the lined bodice, and a fancy pocket at each side of the skirt, complete a charming design at these prices: FROM 8/6

Lengths	35	38	42	46	50 inches.
Prices	8/6	9/6	10/9	12/-	13/6 each.

Each costume packed in box and sent carriage paid for 9d. extra.

KNOCKABOUT FROCKS FOR GIRLS are also supplied in the John Noble Cheviot Serge, with saddle top, long full sleeves, and pocket, at following prices: FROM 1/6

Lengths	21	24	27	30	33	36	39	42	45 ins.
Prices	1/6	2/-	2/6	3/-	3/6	4/-	4/6	5/-	5/6 ea.

Postage 4½d. extra. Lengths stated above are from top of neckband to bottom of skirt in front.

COLOURS: Any of the above garments can be supplied in Black, Navy, Brown, Myrtle, Bronze Green, Electric Blue, Ruby, Dark Cinnamon, Fawn, or Grey

The JOHN NOBLE CHEVIOT SERGE in which the above garments are made is a fabric of world-wide fame and durability, measuring 52ins. wide. The full Dress Length of Six Yards can be supplied for 7/6, or any length at 1/3 the yard. Colours as above 7/6

PATTERNS, also "THE BOOK OF THE SERGE," and FASHION SHEETS of numerous other designs in Ladies' and Children's Costumes, etc., sent Post Free on application. Please mention "Short Stories" when ordering.

JOHN NOBLE LTD., Brook St. Mills, MANCHESTER.

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,

SUCH AS

Sick Headache, Constipation,
Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion,
Disordered Liver & Female Ailments.

ANNUAL SALE SIX MILLION BOXES.

In Boxes, 9½d., 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

A SIGNAL SUCCESS.

"'Tis not in mortals to command success, but we'll do more, Sempronius, we'll deserve it."

THE PEARSON POTTERY CO., HANLEY,

ARE SELLING FAST THE MOST WONDERFUL PACKAGE OF - - - CROCKERY IN THE WORLD. - - -

100 PIECES

FOR £1 1s.

A beautiful Dinner Service of 50 pieces is guaranteed Worth the Guinea alone, consequently a Charming China Tea Service, and a useful Collection of Crockery, are given FOR NOTHING.

Thousands sold all over the world. Everybody not only satisfied but amazed at the quantity and quality given.

The Secret of the Success.—The PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY are manufacturers, not middlemen, like many other advertisers. The PEARSON POTTERIES have nearly 2,000 feet frontage to the town of Hanley.

Hundreds of these packages are applied for as Wedding or Birthday Presents. And what more useful present can be given? Every item is useful.

THE THIRTY SHILLING BAZAAR PARCEL IS SELLING WELL. APPLY AT ONCE.

Send a Post Card for Particulars. You will never regret it. Freedom from breakage guaranteed. All letters to the

PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY, HANLEY.

VIOLIN MADE EASY.

The "CARRADOS TUTORETTE" (patent) saves years of practice and pounds in tutors' fees. Positions and Shifts learnt at once. Post free, nickel plated, 1s. 6d. (P.O. only). FINCH & CO., 6, Garfield Rd., London, S.W. FITS ALL VIOLINS.

RED NOSES

Caused by INDIGESTION etc. All who suffer from this disfiguring complaint should write for DR. HOWELL'S RENOWNED REMEDY, 22, Glasshouse Street, London, W., who guarantees a cure in a few days. 2/6 a box.

Established 1886.

24 PORTRAITS Stamp size, for 1s. 6d.; 100 for 3s. 3d. Twelve Carte Portraits, 2s. 6d.; six for 1s. 6d. Twelve Cabinet Portraits, 5s. 6d.; six for 3s.; three for 2s. Enlargements, 8in. 3s.; 12in., 7s. 6d.; 15in., 10s. 6d. Send Carte or Cabinet and P.O., and you will receive highly finished Copies with Original.

FRANCIS & CO., 29, Ludgate Hill, London.

THIN BUSTS

Quickly transformed and a good figure permanently obtained by a perfectly harmless, simple, and inexpensive self-treatment. Success guaranteed. For particulars, free, send stamped envelope in confidence to "Madame B. J.," Oriental Toilet Co., 87, Strand, London.

RED NOSES

Permanently cured in a few days by a simple, inexpensive self-treatment. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope to Dr. A. M. CURTIS, York Chambers, Adelphi, London, W.C.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

GIVEN AWAY £5,000!

GRAHAM & CO.'S MONSTER GIFTS.

IMPORTANT NOTICE.—Messrs. GRAHAM & CO. intend to present their Customers with a Monster Parcel as a means of advertising their celebrated

EGYPTIAN GOLD JEWELLERY.

For the small sum of 6s. 6d. we will send as follows:—

NOT A TOY

WE GIVE YOU A WATCH.

	Our Price.
One Gent's Egyptian Gold Albert, or one Lady's Egyptian Gold Albert	2s. 6d.	FOR 6s. 6d.
One Seal or Locket for Chain	1s. 6d.
One Gent's Carbon Diamond Ring, or one Lady's 5-stone Diamond Ring	3s. 6d.
One Gent's Carbon Diamond Scarfpin, or one Lady's Fashionable Brooch	2s. 6d.
One Pair of Cuff Links, or one Carbon Diamond Bracelet ...	2s. 6d.
Total	12s. 6d.

In addition to the above Every Purchaser will be Presented Free of Charge with one of our handsome

KEYLESS WATCHES.

USUALLY SOLD AT HALF-A-GUINEA.

Read what is said by those who have purchased.

WANTS A SECOND PARCEL.

Lowick-by-Neale, Northumberland, August 17.

GENTLEMEN,—Received to-day your second parcel of jewellery, with which we are immensely pleased. We really wonder how you can do it. The watch itself is worth more than the money charged for the whole. Many thanks for punctuality.—Very truly yours, WILLIAM McISAAC.

GOES BETTER THAN HIS £15 WATCH.

11, North Street, St. Peters, Tunbridge Wells.

GENTLEMEN,—Some few weeks ago I sent to your firm for the jewellery and advertised watch, of which I am surprised; the watch is a beautiful timist. I must admit, in fact, it goes better than my £15 gold watch; and for the jewellery it is astonishing value. I think you must lose money over such gifts, as I term it. The watch alone is worth double the 7s. I enclosed. I have shown it to several of my friends, and they were astonished. You can add this to your testimonials if it will be of any service.—I am, Gentlemen, yours faithfully, LEWIS C. RHODES.

GUARANTEED TO KEEP CORRECT TIME.

Any Watch not received in going order will be exchanged.

Every Watch is Carefully Examined, Timed, and Guaranteed a Correct Timekeeper. Call and see them.

We do this to save the enormous cost of advertising, preferring to give our customers the benefit. As we lose money on each parcel we cannot supply more than two parcels to one person. If you cannot call get a P.O. at once, and send for this wonderful parcel. Orders will be executed in Rotation. MONEY RETURNED IF NOT AS REPRESENTED.

NOTE.—The entire parcel will be sent for 6s. 6d. (post free, registered, 7s.). Each customer will receive gratis one of our HANDSOMELY ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUES. Be sure and call or send to-day for the

6s. 6d. Monster Presentation Parcel including the Handsome Keyless Watch.

S. S. GRAHAM & CO., 277, STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

Digitized by Google

A TEN-POUND PRIZE. (SEE PAGE 823.)

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 369. FOR WEEK ENDING JANUARY 25TH, 1896. [ONE PENNY.

100 YEARS' WORLD-WIDE RECORD OF SUCCESS.

NORTON'S

CAMOMILE

PILLS

INDIGESTION BILIOUSNESS HEADACHE
STOMACH & LIVER COMPLAINTS DEBILITY

THE BEST OF ALL TONICS and a GENTLE APERIENT. Mild in Operation, Perfectly Safe, and Free from Injurious Drugs. Sold Everywhere in Bottles at 1/1½, 2/9, and 11/- each.

Ask for "NORTON'S CAMOMILE PILLS," and do not be persuaded to purchase an imitation.

Prepared by NORTON'S, Limited. 21, Spital Square, London, E.

Trade Mark—One Little Bottle.

MASON'S

EXTRACT OF HERBS

For the Immediate Production of

BOTANIC BEER.

A Nine-gallon Cask of Alcoholic Beer from a Brewery will cost you 10/6, but Eight Gallons of Beer made from

Mason's EXTRACT of HERBS

Can be obtained for 6d., plus a pound or two of Sugar and a little Yeast.

THE FINEST BEVERAGE IN THE WORLD.

Inventors and Manufacturers:

Newball & Mason,

HYSON GREEN WORKS,

Nottingham.

If unable to obtain it in your neighbourhood, send 9 stamps for sample bottle; or samples of both Wine Essence and Extract of Herbs, post free for 15 stamps.

RISING SUN STOVE POLISH
EASIEST, QUICKEST, CHEAPEST, & BEST BLACKLEAD IN THE WORLD

Risin' Sun METAL POLISH

Gives a beautiful soft brilliant polish to all kinds of Metal.

1 GREAT BOONS 3 THREE

A sample of any one post free 2 stamps.

Name this publication

C. CHANCELLOR & CO. London, E.C.

MACK'S DOUBLE STARCH
CONTAINS IN PROPER PROPORTIONS GLOSS, BORAX, GUM, WAX, & &c.

SEVEN PRIZE MEDALS.

C. BRANDAUER & Cos
CIRCULAR POINTED PENS

These series of pens neither scratch nor spurt. They glide over the roughest paper with the ease of a soft lead pencil. An assorted sample box for 7 stamps from the works, Birmingham.

Digitized by Google

"THE NIMBLE 9D."

Great Reduction in price to 9d. per lb. in order to reduce stock, but

QUALITY GOOD AS EVER.

NEARLY 100,000 BEDS ALREADY SOLD

TO THOROUGHLY SATISFIED PURCHASERS.

NEWHAM'S LINCOLNSHIRE FEATHER BEDS

THESE BEDS are warranted doubly purified, dusted, and perfected in our own extensive factory at Boston, Lincs., made in strong linen bordered tick. The quality, sweetness, and purity of every bed guaranteed. These beds ALWAYS GIVE SATISFACTION, and many thousands of purchasers have sent us flattering testimonials and other orders for beds. Note following prices, which are 25 per cent. less than our recently advertised prices.

No. 1—Single Bed, Bolster and Pillow, 6ft. 3in. by 3ft. 6in., weighing 40lbs.	30/-
No. 2—Double Bed, Bolster, and Two Pillows, 6ft. 6in. by 4ft. 6in., weighing 50lbs....	37/6
No. 3—Double Bed, Bolster, and Two Pillows, 6ft. 6in. by 4ft. 6in., weighing 55lbs.	41/3
No. 4—Extra Size Bed, Bolster, and Two Pillows, 6ft. 6in. by 5ft., weighing 65lbs.	48/9

Any sized Bed only 9d. per lb., Carriage Paid, to any station in the United Kingdom. FEATHERS ONLY 9d. PER LB. The trade supplied. All orders must be accompanied by cheque or P.O.O. (which, as security to purchasers, may be post-dated ten days). Send for samples of Feathers and Ticks, Price Lists, etc., which will be sent Post Free and need not be returned. A great reduction on three or more Beds. Please mention this paper.

S. S. NEWHAM & CO., Boston, Lincolnshire.

MRS. JACKSON

An artist's wife, residing at Norton, near Malton, states: "I am deeply grateful to you for the good received through taking your Wind Pills. I suffered severely from

INDIGESTION, SPASMS,

and LIVER COMPLAINT. The doctors gave me up as incurable, nor did I think it possible for me to recover. I scarcely dared to eat any food, fearing suffocation. Seeing an advertisement of

Page Woodcock's Wind Pills,

I resolved to try them. After taking a few small boxes I lost all the painful symptoms, and now enjoy good health. Publish my statement as you please."

All sufferers from INDIGESTION, LIVER COMPLAINTS, WIND on the STOMACH, SICK HEADACHE, BILIOUSNESS, etc., should avail themselves of this most excellent medicine.

☞ The Wind Pills being purely Vegetable, Tasteless, and Mild, and Tonic in their action, may be taken with perfect safety by the most delicate of either sex.

Of all Medicine Vendors, at 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. Post Free for P.O. or Stamps from PAGE WOODCOCK, LINCOLN.

EPPS'S

GRATEFUL.—COMFORTING.

COCOA

TO THE DEAF.

A Gentleman who cured himself of Deafness and Noises in the Head after fourteen years' suffering, will gladly send full particulars of the remedy post free.—Address, H. CLIFTON, Amberley House, Norfolk Street, Strand, London, W.C.

TO TOBACCONISTS COMMENCING.

£20 See Illus. Guide and Catalogue (250 pages), 3d. "How to Open a Clear Stores, from £20 to £2,000." TOBACCONISTS' OUTFITTING CO., 186, Euston Road, London. (Over 50 years' reputation.) Manager H. MYERS.

S.S. S.S.

PEARSON'S

£100

COUPON.

No. 4

Jan. 25, 1896.

S S. S.S.

HAIR DESTROYED.

A doctor's widow knows of a simple, inexpensive remedy that permanently destroys the roots, and will forward particulars free to all those afflicted sending stamped envelope. Address Mrs. B. D. WOOD, 4, DUKE STREET, VILLIERS STREET, LONDON, W.

ARE YOU LITTLE?

If so, wear the "A D" Invisible Elevators (Regd.). Will increase your height up to four inches; the only approved means; detection impossible; simple, inexpensive. Send stamped envelope for particulars to the ORIENTAL TOILET CO. (B 5 Dept.), 87, Strand, London.

DOUGLAS, HUNGERFORD, AND WILLIAMS.

PROFITS PAID DURING 1895.

Jan. 2, £8 per cent., Feb. 1, £6, Mar. 1, £5, April 1, £8, May 1, £7, June 2, £10, July 1, £9, Aug. 1, £9, Sept. 2, £8, Oct. 1, £8, Nov. 1, £7, Dec. 2, £7.

Total for 12 months £92 per cent., an average of nearly £8 PER CENT. PER MONTH.

PROFITS PAID DURING 1896.

Jan. 2 ... ... £6 per cent.

OUR NEW ILLUSTRATED MANUAL mailed free upon request, showing how these profits may be made WITHOUT SPECULATION. Cheques for profits mailed promptly 1st of each month, and for withdrawals of capital on 2nd and 16th of each month. Trial investments of £5 and upwards may be made.

We have not a dissatisfied Client.

DOUGLAS, HUNGERFORD, & WILLIAMS, 5, Copthall Avenue, London, E.C., and 11, Place de la Bourse, Paris.

SULPHOLINE LOTION

For clearing the skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness, giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance.

SHILLING BOTTLES.

HAIR DESTROYED

permanently and absolutely by an entirely new and harmless self-treatment, total destruction guaranteed. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope. Prof. F. T. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

BLUSHING

Permanently cured. A Pamphlet giving sound practical advice and particulars of a successful treatment for a rapid, simple, and inexpensive home-cure, forwarded free to all upon receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—Prof. B. L. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

TOO STOUT

Dr. Grey's FAT REDUCING Pills.

A safe, rapid, and permanent reduction and improvement in health and breathing guaranteed. A special preparation kept for stubborn cases (either sex) which have resisted other treatment.

ABDOMINAL OBESITY A SPECIALTY.

2/9 and 4/6 per box, plain wrapper, post free to all parts. Dr. O. GREY, 57, Weymouth St., Portland Pl., London, W.

VIOLIN STRINGS.

4 Best "E's" (samples) 9d., post free.

S. S. CARY, NEWBURY.

TOOTH-ACHE

CURED INSTANTLY BY

BUNTER'S Prevents Decay. Saves Extraction. Sleepless Nights Prevented. Neuralgic Headache and all Nerve Pains Removed by BUNTER'S NERVINE. All Chemists, 1s. 1½d. NERVINE

NOSE

A RADICAL PERMANENT CURE Medically approved for Red Noses, 3s. 9d. post free, under cover. Pamphlet "Red Noses, Cause and Prevention," 1s. Machines for Ugly Noses. Particulars for stamp. LEES RAY, Specialist, Wavertree, Liverpool.

HAIR DESTROYED.

A lady who has permanently destroyed Superfluous Hairs on herself, will be happy to forward free, to all similarly afflicted, full particulars of a simple, inexpensive and harmless self-treatment. Send stamped addressed envelope in confidence to Mrs. "T. D.," 87, Strand, London.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

No. 369.] For the Week ending January 25th, 1896. [ONE PENNY.

No. 2 Box, Warnborough Loop.

A COSY fire was burning in the little signal cabin known as the "No. 2 Box, Warnborough Loop." This cabin was about midway on a loop-line of about nine miles that left the main line at Stanford Junction and joined it again at Warnborough. It was used as a relief line upon which some of the regular and most of the extra day traffic was worked. The cabin in question adjoined no station, but was there for the purpose of protecting a level crossing. About three miles further on was a similar cabin, "No. 3 box," and then came Warnborough station.

Only two or three scattered houses stood near the cabin; one of them was the little cottage inhabited by the signalman, whose term of duty lasted from ten a.m. till nine p.m., there being no night trains run on the loop. Another was a house in which I resided. I was the foreman of the "Warnborough loop" gang of platelayers, and often when my work for the day was over it was my custom to repair to the signal cabin for a pipe with Joe Bradford, the signalman. This, of course, was contrary to strict regulations, but I am afraid I winked at them occasionally. Sometimes I even went so far as to work the signals myself, and often I would assist Bradford in making the train entries, he being rather a slow writer; in fact, I knew quite as much about the work as Bradford did himself.

On the evening in question Bradford was very much "down in the dumps," and I had dropped in to cheer him up a bit. He was a widower and lived with his daughter, Elsie, of whom he was passionately fond. She had taken a chill a short time previously, and was laid up with a very bad attack of pleurisy. The doctor had been in the morning and had pronounced the case to be a very serious one, especially as the weather was bitterly cold—it was the 21st of January, I remember seeing the date on Bradford's tablet calendar.

It was a little after half-past seven in the evening, the night was pitch dark, and one turned with a feeling of comfort to the cheery fire which was blazing in the cabin. Bradford stood in front of his instruments; he was expecting every moment to receive a message from Stanford to the effect that the 7.37 train to Warnborough was being dispatched along the "loop." This train was sent round by the loop every evening to allow of the express from London taking the main line.

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

"Ah, it's heart-breaking work, Charlie, having to stay here, and that poor lass in pain. I wish I could be with her. And yet I suppose it's the duty that prevents me breaking down altogether."

"You don't feel like that, I hope, Joe?"

"No, mate. I ain't afraid o' breaking down. I feel the responsibility too much. But I don't know what I should do if it weren't for your wife's kindness. I know I can trust my gal to her."

My wife was nursing his daughter, and we were both glad to be of service to the poor fellow.

"Don't you think you might knock off for a week?"

"No, mate. It's better I should be at work. Besides, God knows my lass wants all the money I can earn her now."

A tap came at the door and my wife entered. She gave a swift glance at me that told me Elsie was no better. Bradford turned his head towards her without moving from his post.

"How is she, Mrs. Wilson?"

"Much about the same. She keeps crying to see you. You couldn't spare just a moment, could you?"

"Not now," he replied in a husky tone, "maybe I'll come presently, though it's against the rules."

My wife gave me a pleading look. I knew it was wrong of me, but I said to him:

"Can't I work the 7.37 through for you?"

"No, Charlie; it wouldn't be right. I'll drop in as soon as I can, ma'am. Ah!"

The bell rang. The 7.37 was leaving Stanford, and the signalman in "No. 1 box" was advising us thereof. My wife left. Bradford returned the signal, received the answering message, turned the wheel which closed the gates of the level crossing to the road, and opened them to the line, and pulled the levers connecting with the semaphore signals. The needle of the "block telegraph" now pointed to "train on line," referring to the "block" between No. 1 and No. 2 cabin, and Bradford passed on the "be ready" signal to "No. 3 box."

Meanwhile, I had risen, and with Bradford's permission was entering the train in his "log-book." I remarked that it had started about three minutes late. Presently we could distinguish the head-lights of the engine in the distance, and the mysterious rumble which always heralds an approaching train.

Crash! Bradford had put one of the levers back as the train passed the "distant signal." In a few moments we looked out on the rushing line of lights. Crash! the second lever was reversed, the train having passed the signal beyond the gates, and once more the red light shone forth into the night. The message was sent back to No. 1, "line clear," and the needle pointed to these words on the dial. "Train on line" was wired to No. 3, who responded by fixing his and our needle to those words on the dial belonging to the "block" between us. I entered in the book the time the train passed our cabin.

Bradford opened the gates again, then he stood before his instruments waiting for the signal from No. 3, when his duty in regard to this particular train was over. Very soon the bell rung, was duly answered, and the needle on the "tell-tale" dial swung back to its normal position of "line closed." I made the third entry in the book, stating the time at which the train had cleared "No. 3 box."

Then Bradford turned to me with a sigh of relief, and said:

"Now there isn't another train due before the 8.40 from Warnborough, for it's a very rare thing to get any extras running over the loop after seven. I'll just run over the road and see my poor lassie for five minutes. You'll stay here, won't you, mate?"

"All right, I'll stop. But look here, Joe, supposing anything happens. What am I to do?"

"Oh, I shall be back before that. There's no danger, but if the bell should ring, rush over to me at once."

I promised to do so, and he went out. I sat down by the fire and puffed away at my pipe lazily. Five or six minutes passed, certainly not more, and I happened to glance aside at the instruments, when, somewhat to my surprise, Bradford was standing in front of them once more. I thought for the moment it was rather strange that I should not have heard him enter the cabin, and then said:

"Well, how is she, Joe?"

He made no answer, and I was about to repeat the question when the bell in front of him suddenly rang. I recognised it as a warning from No. 1 box. Bradford replied at once, and then four consecutive rings announced the fact that a special train was leaving Stanford for Warnborough by the loop. I rose.

"Lucky you came back, Joe, isn't it? Shall I enter it for you?"

He merely nodded in reply. I entered the train. It was exactly four minutes past eight. Meanwhile Bradford had done everything that I have described in the signalling of the previous train. The "tell tale" on the first block was at "train on line," and on the other at "line clear."

Presently I could see the approaching headlights of the special. They consisted of a green and a white light placed the one over the other in the centre, indicating that the train was bound for Highfield—a large town some twenty miles beyond Warnborough. As she passed the cabin I counted eight coaches with the brake-vans, which latter were "composite," with compartments for passengers in addition to that of the guard. The red "tail light" speedily vanished into the distance. Bradford had reversed the levers and opened the gates. I had "entered" the train, the first "block" pointed to "line closed" and the second to "train on line." Bradford stood in front of the instruments with his finger on the button ready to return the signal of No. 3 box. That box, as I have said, was about three miles further down the line. Trains generally did the distance in about six and a half minutes, and they took this length of time because of a very sharp curve about a mile beyond us, where they had to reduce speed considerably.

The usual six and a half minutes were over and yet no ring came—eight—nine—ten minutes and still the little indicator pointed to "train on line." Bradford's face grew paler and paler, but he never said a word in answer to my questions. In silence we waited. I glanced at the clock. It was almost half-past eight. Something must have gone wrong! It was a clear, calm night; I went to the window, slid it aside, and leant out into the darkness, listening intently for a few moments, but I could hear nothing. When I turned round Bradford had gone! For a whole minute I felt quite paralysed with alarm. Then I rushed to the indicator. It stood at line closed, and yet I knew that it was impossible for it to have moved without the bell ringing twice. I was making for the door when, to my relief, Bradford re-entered the cabin.

Digitized by Google

"Why! Whatever have you opened the window for!" he ejaculated. "Isn't it cold enough?"

"Where have you been? Is she safe?"

"Safe? Poor lamb, I wish I could say she was."

"I don't mean Elsie. I mean the 'special.'"

"'Special?' What special?"

"Why the one that passed through over a quarter of an hour ago. What was the matter? Why didn't the bell ring if she's cleared No. 3? Why did you go out?"

"What on earth do you mean? You're dreaming, man! There's been no train since the 7.37. I should have heard it—you'd have sent for me."

"Do you mean to say you haven't been in here for the last five-and-twenty minutes?"

"Been in here? No, of course I haven't. I've been sitting with Elsie. Your wife will tell you so."

I went to the log book. There was the evidence.

"But look here, Joe. Here are the entries." He looked and looked again. He couldn't make it out. I told him the whole thing. He declared he had only just returned from his house.

"You've been dreaming, Charlie. You've done it all in your sleep."

"I suppose I must have," I replied; "but it seemed so real, every bit of it, except that I never heard you come in or go out."

"Well, let's make sure." And he wired to both boxes. They replied: "All correct." I could only conclude that I had undergone a kind of nightmare. Joe drew a line through the entries, marked "error" on the side of them, and initialed it. Very soon the up train from Warnborough was signalled and passed us, and then I left the cabin, pondering deeply.

The weather changed the next day, and with it Elsie began to mend. Bradford and I had several discussions over what we both concluded had been a most remarkable dream, until we decided to let the matter drop altogether.

It would probably never have been revived if it had not been for the strange sequel which I am about to relate. I will merely give the details as they occurred, and must leave the reader to judge how much of the supernatural played a part in them. Whatever view of the case be taken, however, it must be confessed that there was at least an extraordinary coincidence.

A year had elapsed, and I was once again smoking my pipe in "No. 2 box." Bradford was in good spirits. His daughter was about to be married to my nephew, a strapping young guard on the line, and he was very pleased with the match. She stood before us now, the picture of health and beauty, having brought us in two steaming cups of coffee.

"Where's Ernest to-day, Elsie?" said I, "I haven't seen him all the week."

"I fancy he's been up to London, Mr. Wilson, on the Highfield excursion. I had a note from him yesterday, and he was expecting that job."

"Ah, that was worked on the main line this morning," said Bradford. "Have a bit of supper ready for both of us soon after nine, will ye, lass?" he added, as she was about to retire.

"All right, father," she replied, and went out, closing the door.

"The 8.37's late to-night," remarked Bradford glancing at his clock. "She's generally well up to time, too."

I looked at the clock, and in doing so my eye rested on the calendar below, "January the 21st." I remembered the date in an instant, but said nothing, merely smiling to myself at the recollection of my strange hallucination.

"Ting."

"The 'attention' signal," Bradford replied.

"Ting, ting, ting (pause), ting." Ordinary passenger train. Everything was done as usual, and we stood waiting for the train to pass.

One of the signalman's duties is to see that the "tail lamps" on all trains that pass his box are properly fixed. These tail lamps are attached to the rear of the last vehicle of each train, and play a very important part in the working of the line. They act as danger signals should a train by any irregularity overtake another, for then the driver of the second train can see at once what is in front of him. They also enable the signalman to see that the whole of the train has passed him. Accordingly Bradford looked out of his cabin as usual while the train passed. There was the "loop-line" single red light on the brake-van. Everything was correct.

In a short space of time we received the signal from No. 3 box that the train had passed safely, and Bradford drew a chair up to the fire with the intention of having a comfortable chat and smoke. We had scarcely begun a conversation when the bell sounded. It was a communication from No. 1 box.

"Hullo," said Bradford, as he pressed the button in reply, "something extra, I suppose."

"Ting, ting, ting, ting," Four rings without a pause. A special express train was starting from Stanford. I made the entry while Bradford worked the instruments in silence. Presently, as I heard the rumble of the train, I looked along the line and could distinguish the head lamps—a white light over a green.

"The Highfield excursion," said my companion. "I suppose they haven't room for it on the main line."

Crash! Our lever had been put back. The train had passed the distant signal.

"Why, what's the matter, Charlie?" he exclaimed, for I had seized him by the arm.

"My dream!" I exclaimed. "It's exactly the same——"

"Nonsense—let go, man—I can't see her pass."

I can never tell exactly how it happened; I am not naturally superstitious, but the coincidence of the date and the whole scene seemed to stagger me at first, and then give me a wild desire to stop the train. I looked out as she rushed past, and counted eight coaches, and the brake-vans were composite. I glanced at the dial. The indicator was at "line clear" for the next block. Everything was right, and yet a mighty impulse came to me that I could not resist. It was all the work of a few seconds. I took Bradford by the shoulders, hurled him out of the way, and reversed the second lever which worked the signal about 250 yards down the line. The train could not have been more than seventy or eighty yards off when the green light changed into an ominous red glare. There was a whistle and I could see the sparks fly from the wheels as the vacuum breaks were applied to bring her to a standstill.

"Good God, Charlie! are you mad? Don't you see what you've done? You've stopped the train! What am I to do?"

"I couldn't help—" I began, when—"Ting, ting, ting, ting, ting, ting," six consecutive rings from No. 3 box. We both stared dumbly at each other, for we knew well what it meant.

Those six rings were the "Obstruction Danger Signal."

Digitized by Google

Something was on the line between us and the next box.

Bradford instantly repeated the signal according to regulation. Then he gave eight rings to "No. 3," thus informing him that he had closed the entry to the block in time.

"Charlie, you'd best get out," he said. "There's no knowing what's up."

"All right," I replied, and left the box. I was joined outside by Elsie, who had heard the whistle.

"What's the matter, Mr. Wilson?"

"I don't know. There's a block on the line somewhere, I think."

"How did it happen?"

"That's more than I can tell you."

It was more than I could tell her. I was puzzling my brain to think what had taken place. How was the line blocked? A train had been along only just before and must have passed No. 3 correctly, because he had signalled it. He dared not have done this if he had not seen the tail lamp on the brake-van, and as he had obviously seen this, it was clear that no vehicle could have broken away from the previous train.

While I was pondering over the matter, Joe put his head out of the window and waved a lantern as a signal for the train to back towards the box. Slowly she did so. The rear guard was at his window as she stopped by the box.

"What's up, Mr. Bradford," said a well-known voice.

"Oh, it's Ernest," whispered Elsie.

"Hush," I said, "let's listen."

"Well, I can't quite make it out yet," replied Bradford: "but No. 3 says that something's broken loose from the last train between here and Warnborough—probably this side of No. 3—but no one seems to be sure where."

It was a mystery!

"That's a rum go," said the guard. "Didn't No. 3 see her tail-lamp?"

"Yes, he says he did. Hullo! here's a message coming."

A few moments passed, and Bradford appeared again at the window.

"You've got to wait here for the 8.40 from Warnborough. She'll have a special engine on and will take you back to Stanford in her rear. Then you'll proceed to Highfield by the main (there were crossing points opposite the box so that the train could be moved to the up line). They'll spot the block coming along and report here."

Great was the grumbling among the passengers at the delay, though I don't think Ernest minded much, for he managed to have a quiet five minutes with Elsie while we were waiting. She, poor girl, was crying at the thought of his being so near a probable accident.

Presently the up-train was signalled, and came to a halt opposite the box. Then we learnt what had really happened, and a most extraordinary thing it was. It appeared that at Stanford Junction a "foreign" carriage truck had been attached to the rear of the train. Now the man who was responsible for attaching this truck had forgotten to take the tail lamp from the break-van and fix it to the rear of the truck. Both the signalman at No. 1 box and ourselves, therefore, had seen the red light on the brake-van, because on account of the lowness of the truck there was nothing behind to obscure it, and we had imagined that it was on the last vehicle—not seeing the truck at all.

This truck had broken loose on the curve I have mentioned, between us and No. 3, but, of course, the tail-lamp being on the break-van, appeared correct to the signalman there, and not until the train drew up at Warnborough was the discovery made. Now comes the second extraordinary coincidence. All our trains were fitted with the vacuum brake, and that meant that in the event of a vehicle becoming detached the pipes would break, and the vacuum act at once, stopping the train. How was it, then, the train in question was not stopped? Because this particular truck belonged to a company who had adopted the Westinghouse brake, and so could not be connected to the vacuum. Sometimes a single "foreign" truck (as in this case) is attached to the rear of a train without brake communication, but never more than one. It was this curious combination of circumstances that had caused the train to proceed to Warnborough apparently "all correct."

Little remains to be said, except that Bradford was complimented for his smartness in stopping the train. No. 3 had been in agonies for a few moments for fear his signal had been given too late, for if the train had once passed the outer signal post before the green light had changed to red, no one could have saved her from coming into collision with the truck right on the dangerous curve.

But no one ever knew that the red light had flashed out ten good seconds before the signal was received. We never mentioned that to a soul. I don't know whether you will call it a dream, or a warning, or only a mental hallucination, but of this I am certain—that if I had not reversed the lever on the spur of that momentary impulse, the excursion train would assuredly have been wrecked. The needle would have pointed to "train on line" long after the time that she ought to have passed No. 3 box.

VICTOR LORENZO WHITECHURCH.

Next week will commence in

SHORT STORIES

A SPLENDID SERIAL STORY

by MISS WINIFRED GRAHAM, author of "Through the Valley," etc.

Each instalment will be profusely illustrated by MR. RAYMOND POTTER.

IF YOU WOULD WISH TO EARN

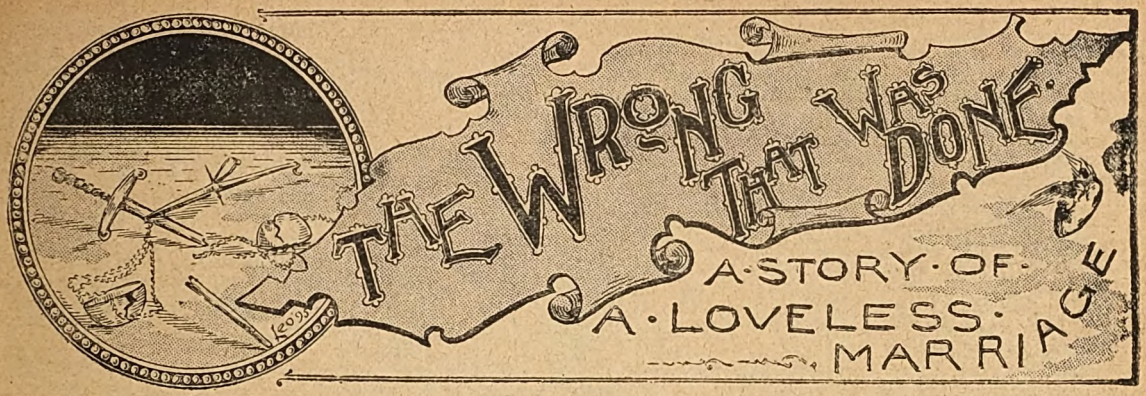
£100,

Collect as many Coupons as you can from

SHORT STORIES, STORY TELLER, PEARSON'S WEEKLY.

Full particulars of this magnificent offer appear in previous issues of Short Stories. The S.S. coupon is on the second page of cover.

Digitized by Google



By E. C. WAGGENER.

CHAPTER X.

It was the last day of October. The first bright autumn days had given place to misty mornings and cold grey twilights, and the woods that only a little while ago were flaming in gold and russet and scarlet, had faded to sombre brown. Helen had grown strong enough to walk about the rooms, and sometimes, when the days were fair, even ventured as far as the garden, where she would sit for hours, her tired eyes fixed gloomily on the distant blue hills.

She was still very weak, however, and had grown so irritable and peevish that it required great patience on the part of Kitty to coax her out of her strange moods. On this particular day she had been unusually impatient and fretful. She had insisted upon having her lounge drawn up close to the window, where she could look out at the fading woods and fields, but had suddenly complained that there was nothing worth seeing, after all, that the light hurt her eyes, and she knew, she was very sure, that Kitty hadn't the least consideration for her in placing her in such an uncomfortable position.

Presently she fell into a doze.

"I will lower the blind a little," said Kitty, paying no attention to the peevish tone. "Now, that's better. The room is just dark enough to be pleasant, and you can enjoy the view without hurting your eyes. Shall I read to you?" she asked, a little frightened at the queer look in the beautiful eyes raised to hers.

"No. Why should you read to me? I am getting tired of being kept in the house all the time. Why can't I go out for a walk? It has been so long since I was in the woods. And the brook looks so cool and pleasant from here. I think I would like to bathe my feet in it, just as I used to do when I was a little girl. I'm certain I could walk that far if I tried really hard."

"To-morrow you may go," said Kitty soothingly. "You are hardly strong enough."

"I am perfectly well," interrupted Helen angrily. "You keep me shut up here day after day, as if I were a prisoner and you my gaoler. I am not allowed to visit any of the neighbours or to see any one but you and Betty and the doctor. I think it's very hard that I'm not permitted to do as I please in my own house."

"I didn't know you cared for company, or that you wanted to visit any of your neighbours," said Kitty gently. "You asked me not to allow them to come, and I have kept them away to please you."

"And I'm sure I don't want to see any of them," cried Helen, her mood suddenly changing. "Oh, Kitty, I'm so miserable!" she added passionately. "I wonder why it is that I live on when I want so much to die."

"Oh, Helen! live for me," said Kitty, taking the wasted hand in her own and holding it fast. "I will do my best to make you happy, dear. We will go away from here—anywhere you wish to go—and together we'll begin a new life. You are too young to wish for death—and I want you and need you so much."

"You know that you don't mean a word you're saying," exclaimed Helen, with a wild, strange laugh, wrenching her hand away and rising weakly to her feet. "In your heart, this very moment, you are wishing I would die, so you could marry Gifford. Why can't you be satisfied with knowing that, if I am his wife, he hates me and loves only you?"

Kitty looked at her with an expression of such pain and astonishment that her eyes suddenly lost their wild light, and her lips began to tremble.

"Don't mind me, Kitty," she said humbly, hiding her poor wasted face on her sister's shoulder. "If you knew what pain is here," and she passed her hand wearily across her hot forehead, "and how I long for Gifford at times you wouldn't think hard of me for the foolish words I say."

Digitized by Google

"I know you are ill and troubled, and that you don't mean half you say," returned Kitty gently.

Helen sighed and looked wistfully out at the window.

"I have always loved this month," she said presently, breaking a little silence. "It is so bright and beautiful. And I have thought so often that, of all the months in the year, I would rather die in October. Kitty"—changing the subject abruptly—"do you remember the time we went to the woods and found those strange-looking leaves? It was in October, I think, for the woods were very pretty then."

"Yes, I remember it perfectly," said Kitty. "I know you said the leaves looked as if they had been dipped in blood, they were so red."

"I have them in my box yet. But they are faded and dead now. It has been so long, so very long ago, since I gathered them. What day of the month is it, Kitty? I think I have forgotten to count the days and weeks."

"The last day of October. Why did you ask, Helen?"

"Because I don't want to die in November. It is such a dismal month, and this one has been so bright and beautiful."

Kitty made no reply. With every evidence of a coming change before her, she could not bring herself to believe that Helen would die. Yet did she not lie awake night after night, her heart heavy with gloomy forebodings? Had she not watched for nearly four months the slow wasting of that pallid face with the despairing thought that it would soon be hidden from her sight for ever?

"Do you remember the time when we went fishing in the brook, and Ben Freeman caught the eel?" asked Helen, her mind reverting to the past again. "I have laughed many a time since then, when I thought of how scared you were when Ben tried to put it in your hand. Then, when Aleck Smith cut his foot with the scythe, the next day, how you screamed when you saw the blood, and how Aleck scolded and cried because I didn't tie it up fast enough. What happy days they were, Kitty! Even father's ugly ways didn't keep us from having a good time occasionally."

For nearly an hour she talked thus, sometimes rationally, again in a strange, incoherent way that frightened Kitty; yet her talk was always of the past. Not once did she refer to her trouble. She seemed suddenly to have forgotten it. Presently she fell into a doze, but soon awoke with a start.

"I think I shall go to bed," she said. "I feel unusually tired and sleepy. Perhaps I've talked too much to-day, but somehow I couldn't help it. Don't sit up long to-night, Kitty, for I won't need anything, and it really is not necessary for you to be so watchful of me. And tell Betty she may go to bed, too. I can't endure to have her sitting by me all night. She stares at me so. And sometimes she falls asleep in her chair, and snores so dreadfully that I can't rest a bit. I hope we'll soon be able to do without her."

"I am so tired of this old lounge," she added, when Kitty had helped her to undress. "Would you mind letting me sleep with you to-night, Kitty?"

"You know I will be glad to have you," answered Kitty, as she carried her over to the bed and tucked her snugly in. Then she stooped down and kissed her with unusual tenderness.

"Good-night. I shall not stay up much longer," she said.

The morning sun flooded the room with a golden light, one long bright ray falling directly across Kitty's eyes and waking her suddenly from a heavy sleep. She glanced quickly at the lounge, forgetting for a moment that Helen had asked to share her bed, and, seeing it empty, sprang up and crossed the room hastily.

A search was made through the house.

Then remembering, all at once, that she had fallen asleep with Helen's arms around her, she went back to the bed. But if she had been a little frightened and bewildered at seeing the lounge empty, she was alarmed beyond measure when she found that her sister was not in the bed. Her clothes lay on a chair just as they had been placed there the previous night, but Helen herself was not in the room.

Kitty felt a strange pain in her heart as she hastened into the adjoining room to arouse Betty.

"Betty, get up and help me to find Helen," she cried, shaking the girl roughly. "Her clothes are on the chair just as I placed them last night, and her slippers are on the little stool in the corner; but she is nowhere in the room! Oh, Betty, what does it mean? When and where could she have gone?"

"Isn't Miss Helen in bed and aslape?" asked Betty, yawning and rubbing her eyes stupidly. "Shure, I left ye both slapin' side by side as innercent-like as two babies."

"She is not in bed—she is not in the room," said Kitty excitedly. "Get up at once, girl, and help me to find her. Did she pass through this room? or have you been sleeping too soundly to see or hear anything?"

"Shure an' she's not fur off," said Betty reassuringly, as she drew on her clothes. "Do you look into the other rooms while I take a peep in the garden. She can't have gone fur, an' her so weak."

But a search through the house and a careful survey of every nook and corner about the place failed to show any trace of the missing one. By this time Kitty was almost wild with fear and excitement; and remembering Helen's strange mood of the previous day she hurried Betty off to the doctor, summoning him to her aid at once.

"It is very probable that she has wandered off to some of the neighbouring houses," he remarked, when Kitty had told him of Helen's singular disappearance. "Come, you must not give up," he added cheerfully, as he looked at her white, despairing face. "No doubt we will find her presently. I will get some of the neighbours to help me, and we'll begin the search without delay."

"I shall go, too," said Kitty eagerly. "I couldn't endure to stay here and wait. Anything will be better than this terrible suspense."

So a thorough search began; but it proved in vain until late in the day. Then some one suddenly remembered to have seen a white object moving slowly about the churchyard the previous night.

"It was nigh about midnight, an' I was comin' from the station when I seen it," he explained. "I run every step of the way home thinkin' mebbe it was a ghost. Hit might a-been her."

Digitized by Google

So up to the churchyard they went, and there, at the foot of a little child's grave, they came upon the object of their search, lying face downwards on the cold, wet grass, her white nightdress soaked with dew and stained with weeds, her feet torn and bleeding from the sharp stones and cruel briars that had bruised and lacerated them.

The night had brought Helen her wish. She was dead.

CHAPTER XI.

QUIET little Looe was full of unusual bustle and confusion one morning in the following April. Waggons and carts rattled noisily over the narrow streets, children laughed and played and sung in the bright sunshine, and even the surliest farmer, at work in his field, found it impossible to keep back a little burst of song or a merry whistle as his eyes took in the brightness and beauty of everything around him. It would have been a sad heart indeed that could not have found some pleasure on such a day, with its wild splendour of purple skies and budding leaves, its warm, sweet winds, and jubilant songs of bluebird and thrush and lark.

Had they not heard unearthly sounds?

For six months—ever since Helen's death—the little cottage had remained closed. Standing in the deep shadow of its waving trees, it wore a strange, desolate look with the glad tumult of life everywhere around it. The superstitious ones declared that it was haunted. Had they not seen, on dark, stormy nights a light burning in the window and the face of the dead girl pressed against the pane? Had they not heard unearthly sounds in the vacant rooms night after night? And had not the bravest man in the village been frightened away by the terrible groans and shrieks that had issued from the house when he had gone there to investigate? So it came about that the place was shunned even by those who were sensible enough to turn a deaf ear to the stories concerning it.

Vague reports had been circulated at first about the sudden and unexpected separation of Helen and her husband, but they were only uncertain rumours that could not be substantiated, the facts of the case never having become known. No one in Looe had seen or heard of Gifford Vane since his disappearance. He was as completely lost as if the earth had opened and swallowed him up; so the gossip and speculation concerning his probable fate had gradually given place to other thoughts.

Yet the gossip was suddenly revived this bright April morning by the sudden appearance of Kitty North in the village. At the station she merely nodded to the familiar crowd that was gathered on the platform, then hurried off in the direction of the deserted cottage.

"I wonder what she's up to now?" remarked a woman to her neighbour. "'Pears as if every time Kitty North comes to Looe some sort of trouble comes with her, or follers close after her. Maybe she's come after Helen's things. It's just a shame that them things is a-layin' in there, spilin' an' gittin' covered with dust an' mould, an' nobody to use 'em."

"Well, I'm shore I don't want 'em," said the other, as she set down her basket to watch Kitty. "I wouldn't use 'em fur nothin' in the world if I could he'p it."

"As fur that, neither would I," rejoined the first speaker, a slatternly-looking woman, who held a sickly child in her arms, which she was trying in vain to quiet. "I'd be afeard that anything from that house would bring me bad luck. There! I knowed she was goin' straight to the house. Now les' watch an' see what she's goin' to do."

Taking a key from her pocket, Kitty unlocked the door and went in, emerging, a few minutes later, with a small basket in her hand. Fastening the door securely, she hurried off down the garden path.

"See, she's gone to diggin' up flowers," said the woman with the child. "I wonder what she's goin' to do with 'em?"

"Plant 'em on Helen's grave, most likely," remarked the other. "I told you so!" she added presently, as Kitty came through the gate, the basket filled to the brim with flowers, and went slowly up the hill in the direction of the graveyard.

On reaching the graveyard, Kitty paused by a mound that was directly under a large yew-tree, and clearing it of the young, tender grass that covered it, she proceeded to plant her flowers—a white rose that of all her garden treasures had been Helen's favourite, a young lily that was sending out fresh green leaves, and a tuft of white violets already in bloom.

"Oh, Helen, Helen!" she whispered, as she bent over her loving task, "have all the bitter tears I have shed since you went away atoned for the past? Through the mysterious shadows that keep you from me, do you see and understand how dark and desolate life has grown to me?"

Presently, when her work was done, she sat down under the yew-tree, and, leaning her face in her hands, fell into a long and mournful reverie. It was not the Kitty North of old who sat there in that weary, listless attitude—not the proud yet warm-hearted and impulsive girl who had been so ready to give up the one love of her life that Helen might be happy—but a humble, sorrowful woman, out of the ashes of whose past no hope had yet arisen. Her face had grown thin and sharp, her eyes heavy and dim as though they were constantly shadowed with tears, and a grey hair gleamed here and there in the braids of her soft brown tresses.

The familiar crowd.

Digitized by Google

"How fast I have grown old!" she said, pushing her hair from her forehead with a gesture of weariness and pain. "Is he as changed, I wonder?" And as if in answer to the question in her heart, she looked up to see before her, his eyes looking straight into hers—Gifford Vane!

"Now les' watch and see."

"You here?" she gasped rather than spoke.

"Yes," he answered quietly, but in a hard, bitter voice. "Don't look so frightened," he added, coming a step nearer. "I am no ghost."

Yet truly he was but the ghost of his former self, Kitty thought, as she looked at his changed, haggard face.

"Why do you come now, when it is too late?" she asked in a voice that shook with suppressed emotion. "Why —"

"I was sent away," he said, in a tone that awed her into silence. "I only heard a few weeks ago that she was dead. Answer me this: Did she hate me to the last?"

"No, she forgave you; she said so many times before she died."

"I wanted to come back, but I was afraid. She had told me that she hated me, and never wanted to see me again. What could I do but go away after that?"

Kitty was silent.

"Kitty"—speaking the old familiar name in a softened voice—"do you think she would have lived with me again if I had come back?"

For a moment Kitty hesitated.

"I'm afraid not," she said, in a low, unsteady voice. "She could never have trusted you again."

"I did not expect it after what passed that night," he said quickly. "Even after I heard that she was dead I was afraid to come. Yet I felt a strong desire to see once more the little home she loved so well, the garden she tended with such busy hands, and the grave where they had laid her to rest. By some lucky chance no one saw me get off the train last night, so I hurried on to the house and succeeded, after a time, in getting in.

"God only knows what I have suffered in the last twelve hours. Alone in that house, with everything to remind me of her, and not a friend in the village to whom I could look for sympathy or comfort! Kitty, we both wronged her deeply—you in urging me to take the false step I did; I in marrying her when I felt in my heart that I could never learn to love her."

"It is too late for regret now," she said with a sigh. "We can't bring her back any more than we can bring back our own lost youth. We can do nothing but endure the consequence of our miserable folly and mistake."

"It is not too late," he said, holding out his hands pleadingly. "Oh, Kitty, why can't we live the rest of our lives together? What is there to come between us now? What is there to prevent us from being happy? Forget the past and give yourself to me. Let all those miserable days be forgotten and come to me; for, oh, Kitty, I need you and cannot live without you!"

He was close beside her, looking down into her troubled face with the light of a great love and longing in his eyes; but she turned away with a little shudder of pain.

"My love died long ago," she said in a low voice, not daring to raise her eyes because of the utter misery she knew she would read in his.

"I do not believe it," he said fiercely. "Such love as ours will only grow stronger with the years."

"Listen to me," she said, her voice firm and sweet, yet strangely sad. "If Helen had not come between us, there was something else that would have kept us apart. You asked me once to explain to you why I remained hidden from my friends after I left auntie, and I refused to tell you anything—"

"But I was quite willing to take you to my heart again without an explanation," he interrupted eagerly. "I told you so several times, and I tell you the same thing now."

"But I want you to know. It is a secret that was known to no one but my stepfather. Perhaps he only guessed it. I do not know, and it matters very little now."

"Well?"

"Instead of teaching a school, as my friends thought, those four years were spent in an asylum. I knew you would start and turn from me; I knew you would shudder at the thought of ever caring for a woman on whom the curse of hereditary insanity rested."

"If it rested on you, did it not rest on Helen, too?" he asked gravely. "And yet you advised me to marry her!"

"Because I hoped and believed she would escape."

"And I am willing and ready to run the same risk with you. You are afflicted with no malady now; your mind is as clear and free from insanity as my own. And even if it were not it would not make the slightest difference to me. Who except the utterly wretched ever go mad? And I would guard you so tenderly."

"Hush!" she said, with a gesture of pain. "Helen, lying here in her grave, parts us more utterly than Helen living and your wife could have done. Forgive me," she added with sudden gentleness, "but you know as well as I that no happiness could ever come of such a marriage."

She looked up quickly as she spoke, and her eyes grew dim at the sight of his suffering face.

"Kitty," he said, his voice full of persuasive tenderness, "I tell you it is not too late for us to be happy. I gave you up two years ago, when my heart pleaded to keep you always—to suffer nothing to come between us; but I cannot give you up now, even after what you have told me. And I am not asking you to share a life of poverty with me. My uncle, from whom I had been estranged for several years, died two months ago, leaving me a rich man, as one counts the wealth of this world; but my money will bring me no comfort, no pleasure, no enjoyment, unless you share it with me."

"I cannot," she answered, her face pale and troubled. "I could never forget that you ruined Helen's life, and sent her to her grave in the bloom and freshness of her youth. Yet I wish to part with you in peace and friendship. Here, by her grave, let there be no bitterness between us, for, remember, she loved us both."

"There can be no such thing as friendship between those who have loved as we have loved," he said quickly. "I told you this once before. If we part it will be to meet as strangers hereafter, for I will never willingly cross your path again."

"Yet we will part in peace?" she pleaded, coming a step nearer, and holding out her hand.

"In peace? Yes," he answered, taking her hand and holding it as if he never meant to let it go.

"It is for the last time," she said, lifting her eyes, dark and troubled and full of misery, to his.

"It is for the last time," he repeated mechanically.

And thus beside Helen's grave, in the fair spring weather, they parted, these two who were destined never to meet in life again.

He turned as if to go, but coming back suddenly, gathered her in his arms, and, holding her close to his heart, kissed her pale lips as he would have kissed them had she been lying cold and lifeless before him.

"Good-bye, my love, my life!" he said.

And the next moment she was alone.

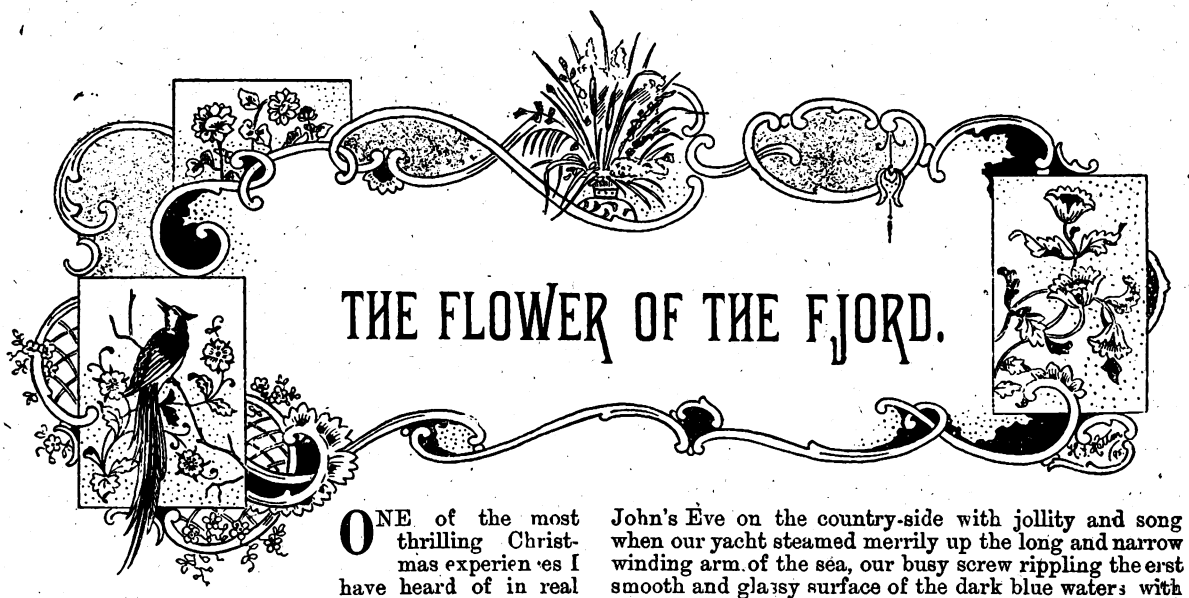
THE END.

Digitized by Google



THE FLOWER OF THE FJORD.

ONE of the most thrilling Christmas experiences I have heard of in real life—so thrilling that I am glad it was not my own—happened to a friend of mine, Harold Harrison by name, shortly after he settled in Norway, some years ago. He shall tell you the story in his own way.

* * * * * * *

I shall never forget the Christmas Eve of 1888, nor the snow-clad cliffs that tower above the dark blue waters of Trondhjem Fjord. Two things happened then and there which will never be erased from my memory. One has given me some strands of grey in my black hair, some extra furrows on my forehead, and a weak right arm; the other has given me the keeping and cherishing of the fairest flower of womanhood that ever blossomed in the North.

In company with a well-chosen party of acquaintances, steady-going young fellows, not too studious nor too gay, I had journeyed to the Land of the Midnight Sun in the summer of that year, by one of the excellently appointed steam-yachts which voyage to and from the grim North Cape. It was my first visit to the famous country of vikings and sagas, and I need not tell how pleased and interested was I, who had lived for the most part in the smoke of London, with every fresh glimpse of the picturesque and wave-worn shore of the old Norseland.

After a most troublesome tossing on the choppy North Sea, our first halt was at Bergen, the town of fish and fishermen, where even the price of an article is told as so many herrings, or other of the finny tribe. Muscular-bodied men are the fearless fishers, powerful of jaw, shaggy of beard; with high cheek-bones, thickly-tangled hair, rolled-up sleeves, large boots, red shirts and coarse trousers, and invariably with knife and marlin-spike in hand. We spoke to several, finding them, despite their bluff appearance, surprisingly well-informed, and honest to the core. This will equally apply to those we met at Trondhjem, and all along the coast.

It was at Trondhjem, a town of 25,000 inhabitants, on the Fjord of that name, situated in 63° N. lat.—I like to be particular—that I first saw Thelma, the lovely daughter of the wealthy landowner, Brun Nillson.

They were keeping the mid-summer festival of St. John's Eve on the country-side with jollity and song when our yacht steamed merrily up the long and narrow winding arm of the sea, our busy screw rippling the erst smooth and glassy surface of the dark blue waters with unceasing whirl. On either side bold shores rose sheer from the water, snow-flecked peaks towering up to a sky softened by drifts of dull grey cloud streaked here and there with rosy tints of the low-down sun, while as the ship sped on, now appearing landlocked by the rugged hills, and anon steaming up a wider space, the tinkle and splash of tiny cataracts falling down the mountain sides struck pleasantly on the ear. Now and then came the sound of the shepherds' "jodelling" across the sparsely cultivated valleys inland, mingled with the bleating of sheep and the short, sharp barking of watch-ful dogs.

When, to crown this perfect picture of sea, sky, and shore seen at its best in the soft, slow dying of a summer's day, with the sun sinking to its lowest in a gentle glow of light beyond the western, mist-topped hills, I caught sight of Thelma on the landing-stage, waiting to send some message by boat, I thought that nothing more was needed to make it the fairest scene that human gaze had ever rested on. Thompson would tell you, no doubt, that I had no eyes for anything but the tall, fair girl in her holiday scarlet and brown, and he would be right, but was there not excuse for such concentration?

Who, looking into those large blue eyes, full of truth and trust; looking at that sweet young face—grave in repose, yet lightly moved to winsome smile and catching mirth—framed in its glory of pale gold hair; noting the healthy, witching outlines of the lovely form, and taking in at a glance the neatness and inexpressible charm of the homely attire, could fail to be enchanted with the vision, or, being a man, to fall in love therewith? "Of all men, not Harold Harrison!" said I.

Our stay at Trondhjem was not long, and I found no way that time of speaking to the rich Thane's daughter, but whether it was from chance or design, I found that when I strolled alone to the little quay, at what in lower latitudes was sunset, smoking my evening briar, Thelma, too, would be there, as though waiting for some one. Mostly, a girl friend was with her, or a sturdy brother, and always a big, rough hound named Wolf. How I fretted and fumed that I knew so little of Norwegian and so much of Greek; that I could read so much that had been written two thousand years ago, and I could not talk to this maid in the year of grace 1888. I resolved to remedy this defect in my education as soon as possible, and nearly worried the life out of Thompson, our champion linguist, in the furtherance of my resolve. Poor old chap! He put in a great amount of hard work as interpreter on that voyage, and would have gone home richer than he went away had he been paid at professional rates.

Digitized by Google

The others had no care for my mute romance, and so our yacht's prow was pointed for the mouth of the creek after a week's exploration of the vicinity. Amongst the crowd that gathered to see us off I noticed Thelma, and even thought I saw her cast a glance of longing and regret upon me as the trimly-built craft sheered off.

Up the rugged coast, with its quiet, dark inlets and black rocks, passing the one thousand feet high Raft Sund, and ever steering north, we came in turn to Hemmingsvaer and Svolvaer, and, higher still, to Tromsö, Hammerfest, and the Lofoten Isles, and thence, through the chilly waters of the Arctic Sea, to the gaunt old sentinel who guards the approaches to the frost-bound region of the Pole, the famed North Cape.

Black and vast it loomed against the clear, cold sky, frowning upon the round red ball of the midnight sun that flushed with crimson the scanty shreds of cloud hovering in the zenith, and cast a glittering path of dancing light upon the silent, solitary ocean, stretching, unbroken, to north and west, far as the eye could see. Grand, solemn, and sublime it rose from the sea that laved its base—in peace when we saw it—a striking type in its still impressiveness of the mighty forces which outlast the swiftly-ebbing tide of human weal and woe. Grander still must it appear when the storm rages round it, the wind howls fiercely from the portals of the unknown north, and the wild waves dash in vain, mad fury on its rocky sides, their high-flung spray wetting the patches of lichen which cluster on it, and mingling with the falling drops thrown off the white cascades which furrow its weather-beaten breast. I admired it like the others; but I thought of Thelma, wondering if she were waiting on the quay at that hour, and was glad when the ship's head turned, and her keel ploughed on to warmer southern shores.

We put in at Trondhjem again for another week, and by then, having gained a smattering of her tongue and spoken once with her, I was loth to leave my Thelma; so loth, indeed, that the yacht went back without me, bearing word to all in England, whom it might concern, that I had resolved to winter in Norway. The fellows chaffed me much, saying I was a lucky dog to get off my work so easily, and sardonically wishing me joy with the Flower of the Fjord, as they styled my charmer. Quoted Thompson, as a parting shot:

Knowledge comes, but wisdom lingers, and I linger on the shore.

Left alone, I made headway with my Norwegian, for it needed little persuasion on my part to induce sweet Thelma to take pity on my loneliness, to present me to her family and friends, and to guide me, in her free, artless way, to all the places round where the prettiest views were obtainable, where the rarest flowers grew, where the best fishing could be had. I had already gained the good graces of gruff, staunch Wolf, by sundry surreptitious tit-bits, and with him leaping and bounding beside us, as though I had been his master all my life, we two went forth to the hills and dales, gathering the blue gentians from the snow-topped heights, the frost-lilies from the white-mantled tarns, the whortleberries from the sunny slopes.

At last I spoke to her of love, pouring out my passion-laden heart, and vowing to give up my native land and live at Trondhjem for her sweet sake, if so she desired. She listened gravely, not saying a word till I had finished, and, holding her soft, warm hands in mine, looked appealingly into her face for the verdict. Then she spoke; her words at once a message of pleasure and pain.

"I will not deny that I love you better than all the ruddy-haired wooers who daily sit in my father's hall," she said, "and—and I could not if I would. But my heart misgives me of the future. My people like not the dark southerners as kinsfolk, deeming golden locks a necessary thing in all good wives and husbands. Also, my parents design me to be the bride of young Olaf Jonson, whose temper is quick, and whose anger is to be dreaded. So I fear, and could almost wish that you had never come at all; and yet——"

"And yet," I broke in eagerly, "you are glad that I have?" She did not speak, but eyes have a language all their own, more easily understood and wider-spread than Volapuk, and her eyes answered "Yes." "As to all other things," I continued, "I care nothing for them now you have told me your love. Tell me, though, if you have any liking for Olaf, the tall, bronze-faced farmer who glared at me so evilly yesterday?"

Thelma shuddered.

"I distrust him, I almost hate him," said she. "It is so different with you, to whom my heart went out when I first saw you on the ship, as the perfume of the rose goes out to meet the strong west wind."

"As my soul longed for you that day, my Thelma, my Northern Rose," I said, extending the simile. "And, now you have confessed what I desired you to, I declare that I will never leave this place until you are my wife, and are willing to go, let whoever or whatever will stand in our way."

"We will hope for the best, Harold, my love," replied the girl, "but I fear."

Then we talked and acted after the usual manner of lovers, which is a tale too often told to need repeating here. The days sped on thereafter with a quiet happiness, save for the scowls of Olaf and the frowns of Brun, my dear one's father; and never was autumn so short as that. It seemed but a few days after the yacht had left the fjord when the snow began to settle thickly on the grand, grey, fir-clad hills and bare, scraggy heights; when the lonely cow with heavy collar was brought in and tethered in her stall; when the large, thick rye-cakes made in summer were taken down from the ceilings; when the miserable mongrel dogs that haunt the towns began to make night restless with their hungry howling; and when the skates were cleaned and oiled, and winter furs put on.

The lady-ferns had already turned to vivid red in the breath of the keen cold winds when Thelma and I joined hands in troth; but not till Christmas Eve, when the Yule-logs brightly blazed on the cosy hearths, could I claim her for my own with the goodwill of her people. This was how it came about.

All day long the jolly folks had been making ready for the festival of the Nativity, and when most of the country people had taken away their bulky purchases from the town, driving their sledges merrily over the snow, their comical-faced, short-bodied horses, thick of neck, stout of leg, large of head, and shaggy of mane and tail, plunging through the drifts with an eagerness that told of desire to be at home, I wandered up a steep and slippery path to a walk that wound along the edge of the fjord, where Thelma often went, braving its dangers with her native hardihood.

Digitized by Google

The waters of the creek looked purple black in the night shades, and its surface was unruffled by aught save the long, powerful, sweeping strokes of a fisherman pulling home. I was revelling in the solemn silence of the twilight, broken only by the dripping of the water from his oars, or the occasional tinkle of far-off sleigh bells, and thinking, as I scrambled from point to point, how easy it was to imagine that solitary boatman an ancient Viking, and to people the shores with the shades of the hardy heroes of the past, and the inlet with their long, low, war-dragons, painted and shield-hung ready for the sea, when a fresh sound fell upon my ears, and turning an angle in the cliff, I came face to face with a scene that sent a shiver through me and caused my heart, for a moment, to stand still with horror.

There, on the very verge of the frost-bound rock knelt my darling, her golden hair streaming over her shapely shoulders, and her white, dimpled hands locked together in supplication to a threatening form that towered before her. I took a step forward, and saw that it was Olaf, my rival, transformed by the culmination of his long-smouldering jealousy into a reckless, wild-eyed maniac.

His clenched hand was before Thelma's eyes, and it would need but one strong thrust, swiftly delivered, to send her headlong over the treacherous brink into the calm, cold waters far below. Shaded by the overhanging cliff, and unheard by them in their fearful situation, I crept softly nearer to the twain, fearing to betray my presence till I was close enough to act. However, I could hear what they were saying.

"Choose between us and here!" growled Olaf, shaking his knotted fingers at the frightened girl; "choose between your love for that cursed foreigner and a wedding with me."

"Have you no mercy?" pleaded Thelma, never taking her beseeching eyes from his face.

"None, as you have had none for my sufferings," hissed the madman, chafing under that earnest gaze. "You will marry me, or one touch of my hand sends you over here to seek Death for your bridegroom. Ha! ha! he will welcome you well, will that hoary old man, who has married so many; and a loving wife you will make him, lying cold and white under the salt water! Come, make up your mind, my trembling one."

He laughed horribly, and the sound echoed strangely from the stolid hills. I was within a few paces now, still unheard, unseen. Her eyes flashing with a sudden resolve, as one in the last strait, Thelma answered him: "How can I wed one who seeks my life? How can I forsake him whom I love? Yet, Olaf, let me go, if you have any heart in you."

He laughed again—a fierce, mocking laugh—drawing back his arm, and muttering: "Die, then, and see if he you love will come to you down there!" In a moment I had leaped to his side and pinioned him, holding him, writhing in my grasp, whilst I waited for Thelma to rise to her feet.

With a cry of joy and relief she sprang up, heedless of the insecure foothold, and the next thing I knew she had slipped and fallen, and was disappearing over the icy edge. I released Olaf instantly, and, springing towards her with frenzied impulse, caught her upthrown left hand in my right, and a jutting point of rock in my left, and hung there, supporting us both by that precarious hold. Her whole weight was upon my right arm, for the rock-face, that went sheer down a hundred yards or more to the fjord, was hard and smooth, giving no footing, whilst, tried as I was by the strain, I could not raise myself to firmer ground.

"Do not lose heart," I said to Thelma, looking down at the white, troubled face; "I will hang here as long as my muscles will hold together. Keep fast hold of me with both hands."

"Some boatman will surely see us, or hear our cries," said she, "before the darkness falls. But where is Olaf?"

Where? indeed. Even as she spoke I glanced up and met his evil gaze. He was standing over us, noting my position, exulting in the certainty of a mad revenge.

"I am not far away, sweetheart," he jeered, "not so far that I cannot bid you two farewell for ever, while your hands are clasped and your fates bound in one. Say, will you give me sweet Thelma for my wife, foreigner, or take her with you now?"

My heart sank, and I must own that in that fearful strait my nerve failed. Whose would not have done? My sinews were cracking under the terrible strain, and shadows spun round before my eyes. Yet I held on, endeavouring to temporise with my enemy, even promising him his wish.

With a madman's cunning, however, he saw my intention, shaking his head like a knowing child; and raising his foot, brought it down with sudden force upon the hand with which I grasped the little pinnacle of rock which alone kept us from destruction. The pain was keen—all the keener because of the cold—and I winced, but still held on.

A dog barked in the distance, and a fisherman below, hearing our cries and seeing our plight, was pulling for the shore with might and main. But the night was very near—already the sun was half hidden beyond the hills—and we were lost unless I could gain time.

"I cannot hold much longer," whispered Thelma faintly.

"Nor I," I answered. The stress was growing worse each second, and my fingers, numbed with the icy air, were gradually relaxing. Sudden as a flash of light a new thought struck me. "Grasp me round the waist, if you can," I said, "so I can get my right hand free."

In moments of peril we can do what at other times is impossible, and Thelma complied with my request, whilst I clutched the jutting crag with the disengaged hand.

But red-haired Olaf was not to be baulked of his fiendish purpose easily, and finding kicking of no avail to loosen my grip, calmly knelt down and drew his great knife from his pocket, opening it with malignant deliberation. I saw his object at a glance; the blood seemed to freeze in my veins from terror, and I nearly screamed aloud with fright. Down flashed the keen-edged blade upon my left hand, cutting a deep red gash across, though instinctively I drew it aside. Again it fell, and the hand, weakened by its previous work, hung limp and nerveless at my side.

I supported our united weight on my right arm alone now, and the joints and knuckles felt on fire with the awful tension. Only a little longer could I hold, when once more the cruel knife was raised to strike. I waited, catching my breath and gritting my teeth with despairing determination. Olaf held the weapon in air a moment, enjoying my distress—how long those seconds seemed—and then it fell, but not upon my hand.

Digitized by Google

A bulky, shaggy form, with angry growl, rushed up the path out of the darkness, and, leaping on the would-be murderer, diverted his aim and sent him sprawling on his back within an inch of the precipice edge. He struggled, striking at the dog fiercely, but Wolf sprang aside, and missing his footing on the frosty brink, the wretched man reeled a moment, then fell down, down, into the black, deep waters. There was a faint splash, a little struggling, and all was still.

Then strong arms pulled me up until I could embrace the point of rock firmly, and the same arms raised Thelma to the level of the path.

Exhausted, weary, we lay there helpless, while the kindly fisherman chafed our numbed limbs and bound up my bleeding hand.

* * * * *

So we were saved, thanks to faithful Wolf and the boatman Bjorne, and when we went together that Christmas Eve into old Brun's halls all aglow with light and resonant with merrymaking, and told our tale, they cheered us till the rafters rang again, drinking to our health and happiness with boisterous applause, even the stern-faced host himself relenting and bidding me welcome in his house as a son.

What cared I, then, that in my black hair they found some threads of grey, and on my forehead removeless wrinkles? What care I now that my right arm is weak in the shoulder-joint, and cannot lift a heavy weight? The Flower of the Fjord is my own sweet blossom now, and I am amply paid for the agonies I underwent to gain her.

When the days lengthened and the nights crept in again, we wandered forth together as before, culling the early snowdrops and the lovely fifa-flowers, taking Wolf with us always, and stopping often to chat with staunch old Bjorne. The Wolmar fire burnt brightly at our betrothal, and when the midsummer festival came round again, it found us man and wife. I am staying in Trondhjem now, and when my darling asks if I do not long for my own land I can only say:

"This is my own land, now, my Thelma, for all that I love most is here, and I think there is no place so beautiful on all the earth."

And when I ask if she regrets that she has not married one of her own ruddy-haired countrymen, she says, her soft hand stealing into mine:

"There is no countryman I love like you, Dear Heart, so why should I regret?"

I have no answer to make to this, but we understand each other, and love's silences are more expressive than many words.

GEORGE C. WALLIS.

THE VENGEANCE OF PADRE ARROYO.

PILAR, from her little window just above the high wall surrounding the big house set apart for the women neophytes of the mission of Santa Ines, watched, morning and evening, for Andreo, as he came and went from the rancheria. The old women kept the girls busy spinning, weaving, sewing; but age nods, and youth is crafty.

The tall young Indian, who was renowned as the best huntsman of all the neophytes, and who supplied Padre Arroyo's table with deer and quail, never failed to keep his ardent eyes fixed upon the grating so long as it lay within the line of his vision. One day he went to Padre Arroyo and told him that Pilar was the prettiest girl behind the wall, and that she should be his wife. But the kind, stern old Padre shook his head.

"You are both too young; wait another year, my son, and if thou art still in the same mind thou shalt have her."

Andreo dared make no protest, but he asked permission to prepare a home for his bride. The Padre gave it willingly. At the end of a month he had built him a cabin among the willows of the rancheria, a little apart from the others. When the cabin was built his impatience slipped its curb, and he besought the priest to allow him to marry.

"Orion," said Padre Arroyo sternly—he called all his neophytes after the celebrities of earlier days—"have I not told thee thou must wait a year? Do not be impatient, my son; she will keep."

Andreo, dejected, left the Padre. As he passed Pilar's window, and saw a pair of wistful black eyes behind the grating, his heart took fire. No one was within sight. By a series of signs he made his lady understand that he would place a note beneath a certain hole in the wall.

Pilar, as she went to and fro under the fruit-trees in the garden, or sat in the long corridor weaving baskets, watched that hole with fascinated eyes. She knew that Andreo was tunnelling it, and one day his work was accomplished. But how to get the note? The old women's eyes were very sharp when the girls were in front of the grating! Then the civilising development of Christianity upon the heathen intellect triumphantly asserted itself. Pilar, too, conceived a brilliant scheme. That night the Padre, who encouraged any industry, no matter how eccentric, gave her a little garden of her own—a patch where she could raise sweet-peas and Castilian roses.

Pilar spent every spare hour bending over her "patch," and the hole, at first no bigger than a pin's head, was larger at each setting of the sun behind the mountain. The old women, scolding in the corridor, called to her not to forget vespers.

On the third evening, kneeling on the damp ground, she drew from the little tunnel a thin slip of wood, covered with the labour of sleepless nights. She hid it in her smock, then ran with shaking knees and prostrated herself before the altar. That night the moon streamed through her grating, and she deciphered the fact that Andreo had loosened eight "adobes"—the clay bricks—above her garden, and would await her every midnight.

Digitized by Google

Pilar sat up in bed and glanced about the room with terrified delight. It took her but a moment to decide the question; love had kept her awake too many nights. The neophytes were asleep; as they turned now and again, their narrow beds of hide, suspended from the ceiling, swung too gently to awaken them.

Pilar slipped from the bed and looked through the grating. Andreo was there. She waved her hand and pointed downwards to the wall. Then throwing on the long, coarse, grey smock that was her only garment, crept from the room and down the stair. As she crawled through the opening, Andreo took her hand bashfully, for they had never spoken.

"Come," he said, "we must be away before dawn."

They stole past the long Mission, crossing themselves as they glanced askance at the ghostly row of pillars; past the guard-house, where the sentries slept at their post; past the rancheria; then, springing upon a waiting mustang, dashed down the valley.

Glancing over Andreo's shoulder she watched the mass of brown and white buildings, the winding river, fade into the mountain. Then they began to ascend an almost perpendicular steep. The horse followed a narrow trail; the crowding trees and shrubs clutched the blanket and smock of the riders. After a time trail and scene grew white; the snow lay on the heights.

"Where do we go?" she asked.

"To Zaca Lake, on the very top of the mountain, miles above us. No one has ever been there but myself. Often I have shot deer and birds beside it. They will never find us there."

The sun rose over the mountains of the east; the crystal moon sank in the west. Andreo sprang from the weary mustang and carried Pilar to the lake.

A sheet of water, round as a whirlpool, but calm and silvern, lay amidst the sweeping willows and pine-forested peaks. The snow glittered beneath the trees, but a canoe was on the lake, a hut on the marge.

Padre Arroyo tramped up and down the corridor, smiting his hands together. The Indians bowed lower than usual as they passed, and hastened their steps. The soldiers scoured the country for the bold violaters of Mission Law. No one asked Padre Arroyo what he would do with the sinners, but all knew that punishment would be sharp and summary.

A week later, in the early morning, Padre Arroyo sat in the corridor. Suddenly he leant forward on his staff and lifted the heavy brown hood of his habit from his ear. Down the road, winding from the Eastern Mountains, came the echo of galloping footfalls.

He rose expectantly and waddled out upon the plaza, shading his eyes with his hand. A half-dozen soldiers, riding closely about a horse bestridden by a stalwart young Indian, supporting a woman, were rapidly approaching the Mission. The Padre returned to his seat and awaited their coming.

The soldiers escorted the culprits to the corridor; two held the horse while they descended, then led it away, and Andreo and Pilar were alone with the priest. The bridegroom placed his arm about the bride and looked defiantly at Padre Arroyo, but Pilar drew her long hair about her face and locked her hands together.

Padre Arroyo folded his arms and regarded them with lowered brows, a sneer on his mouth.

"I have new names for you both," he said, in his thickest voice. "Antony, I hope thou hast enjoyed thy honeymoon. Cleopatra, I hope thy little toes did not get frostbitten. You both look as if food had been scarce. And your garments have gone in good part to clothe the brambles, I fear. It is too bad you could not wait a year and move in your cabin at the rancheria, by a good fire, and with plenty of frijoles and tortillas in your stomachs."

He dropped his sarcastic tone, and rising to his feet, extended his right arm with a gesture of malediction. "Do you comprehend the enormity of your sin?" he shouted. "Have you not learned on your knees that the fires of Hell are the rewards of unlawful love? Do you not know that even the year of sackcloth and ashes I shall impose here on earth will not save you from those flames a million times hotter than the mountain fire, than the roaring pits in which evil Indians torture one another? A hundred years of their scorching breath, of roasting flesh, for a week of love."

Andreo looked somewhat staggered but unrepentant. Pilar burst into loud sobs of terror. The Padre stared long and gloomily at the flags of the corridor. Then he raised his head and looked sadly at his lost sheep.

"My children," he said solemnly, "my heart is wrung for you. You have broken the laws of God and of the Holy Catholic Church, and the punishments therein are awful. Can I do anything for you, excepting to pray? You shall have my prayers, my children. But that is not enough; I cannot—ay, I cannot endure the thought that you shall be damned. Perhaps—" again he stared meditatively at the stones; then, after an impressive silence, raised his eyes. "Heaven vouchsafes me an idea, my children. I will make your punishment here so bitter that Almighty God in His mercy will give you but a few years of purgatory after death. Come with me."

Pilar, almost fainting, shrank back as they reached the narrow, spiral stair which led downwards to the cells.

"Ay, I shall die, my Andreo," she cried. "Ay, my father, have mercy."

"I cannot, my children," said the Padre sadly. "It is for the salvation of your souls."

"Mother of God, when shall I see thee again, my Pilar?" answered Andreo. "But, ay, the memory of that week on the mountain will keep us both alive."

Padre Arroyo descended the stair and awaited them at the foot. Separating them, and taking each by the hand, he pushed Andreo ahead and dragged Pilar down the narrow passage.

At its end he took a great bunch of keys from his pocket, and, raising both hands, commanded them to kneel. He said a long prayer in a loud, monotonous voice which echoed and re-echoed down the dark hall, and made Pilar shriek with terror. Then he fairly hurled the marriage ceremony at them, and made the couple repeat after him the responses. When it was over, "Arise," he said. The poor things stumble to their feet, and Andreo caught Pilar in a last embrace.

"Now bear your incarceration with fortitude, my children; and if you do not beat the air with your groans I will let you out in a week. Do not hate your old father, for love alone makes him severe, but pray, pray, pray."

And then he locked them both in the same cell!

GERTRUDE ATHERTON.

Digitized by Google

CHAPTER I.

ONE evening I entered the smoking-room of my club, and saw a few friends of mine ensconced around the table in a distant corner. They were talking so seriously that they took no notice of my entrance.

"I do not think this sort of thing ought to be allowed," one of them was just saying as I joined the group. "It's nothing more or less than a disgrace to the society which tolerates it—which enjoys it, rather."

"My dear fellow," answered another of the party, "half the charm is in the danger. The risk that poor woman runs of killing herself is exactly what attracts hundreds of people there to see her. It's the very spice of the whole performance. Our civilisation is only skin deep—the barbarian is just beneath the surface. Old Rome had its gladiatorial shows—we in modern Europe find a faint excitement in watching men and women jeopardising their necks for the sake of a living."

"What in the world are you talking about?" I asked.

"About Julie," was the reply. "You haven't seen her? Then, my dear fellow you ought to do so—she's really worth it. The way in which she twists and throws herself about on the trapeze swung right up among the rafters of the building is enough to make one turn cold all over. It's fearful. She must have a nerve of iron, though she is such a slight and delicate-looking thing." The speaker pulled out his watch at this point. "Look here," he continued, "Julie doesn't come on till ten o'clock or after. There's plenty of time. Let's all go together and see her."

I held out for a minute or two, for I never much cared for performances of that kind. But all the rest seemed anxious to go, and not wishing to appear unsociable, I at length yielded, and agreed to make one of the party.

I do not think that I shall ever forget the appearance of Mademoiselle Julie as she walked on to the stage that night and stood kissing her hand to the excited crowd with which the hall was filled. She was a woman of delicate and almost fragile build. I had expected to see a woman of masculine type, coarse in development, and vulgar in manner. But Julie was nothing of the kind. There was something so charmingly modest and retiring about her—something so simple and innocent—that it was only by an effort that one could persuade oneself that the figure upon the stage was really the famous acrobat of whose daring feats there had been so much talk

Indeed, for the moment all thought of the coming performance was lost in silent admiration of the beautiful picture which was thus presented to the gaze. A kind of thrill went through the expectant crowd, and a perceptible hush fell upon the people before their pent-up feelings could find vent in a wild outburst of applause. And no wonder. A more perfectly lovely woman than Julie it has never been my lot to behold.

There was something dazzling—something intoxicating in her beauty.

As you looked at her you lost for the time being all remembrance of her profession. You thought only of the perfect features; the clear, lustrous eyes; the light, supple form; the unconscious grace of every attitude and movement. It was only with a shock that you suddenly woke up to the recollection that after all Julie was only a circus-woman, a performer of athletic feats, whose life, could the truth about it only be known, would probably turn out to be one of misery and poverty, and, most likely, of degradation.

But no thought of what Julie might be behind those mysterious scenes came now to break the spell of fascination which held the crowd breathless and still. Every eye was intent to follow her as she carelessly sprang forward and caught the bar, which had been let down almost to a level with the stage. Then, holding easily to this, she was carried aloft, up—up—over the heads of the people, up, beyond the gas jets; up, till she reached the trapeze which had been swung for her among the very rafters of that lofty building. One light spring from bar to bar, and there she was, supported only by her hands at that dizzy height, and gazing down, with the same strange, daring, unreal smile, at the sea of wondering, upturned faces a hundred feet beneath.

No wonder that we held our breath, and that some even turned away, afraid to watch her. It seemed at times as though she were bound to fall. The giddy recklessness with which she flung herself out into space, and caught the bar again as though it were only by accident that she did so; her sudden whirls and unexpected gyrations, the constant succession of difficult feats, performed so rapidly that the eye could hardly follow her movements, made the brain reel, and almost caused the heart to stand still in its pulsations.

How those about me behaved I do not know, but I sat like one entranced, with eyes that refused to quit the slight woman's form yonder above me, and a hollow feeling of sickness within, which I should attempt in vain to describe.

Digitized by Google

At length the spell was broken. Amid the deafening plaudits of the spectators, Julie descended and stood once more upon the stage, with cheeks flushed by her exertions, but otherwise apparently unmoved by the performance which she had just gone through. While she was being recalled again and again, returning to bow her acknowledgments with the same old unreal smile, I became aware of two men standing at my side whom I had not observed before.

One was a stout, dark, vulgar-looking fellow, seedily dressed and smelling strongly of stale tobacco; the other was tall, handsome in a sense, with two diamond rings on his fingers and a diamond pin of enormous dimensions at his breast. Judging from the expressions on their faces, they had been observing the recent exhibition with the coolness of professional men.

"She'll do," said the vulgar man, nodding approvingly.

"Yes," answered his bediamonded companion, "she'll do right enough, if you only get her in time. Of course she'll kill herself sooner or later, so you must get her as early as possible."

"She's got another six weeks to run here," the other said.

"That's bad," was the reply. "I don't know how long she's been at it, but the chances of her breaking her neck before another six weeks are out are enormous. A pretty penny she's been in Bowder's pocket, to be sure."

I turned away sickened. These were the proprietors or managers of some other place of amusement, I supposed. But I could no longer listen to such conversation.

On the way home we talked of nothing but Julie. We had all been strangely fascinated by her wonderful beauty, and concurred in pronouncing her performance the most daring thing of the kind we had ever seen.

"She'll do," said the vulgar man.

"It'll be another version of the old story of the pitcher and the fountain, I am afraid," said one of us; "Julie may go through that kind of thing for a thousand nights, but she's almost certain to meet with an accident at last. One mistake does it, you see. The misjudgment of the hundredth part of a second or of an inch, and it's all over with her."

"And she does not seem to have a twinge of fear," I said.

"Certainly not; that would prove fatal. All such feats as hers must be done in cold blood, or they cannot be done at all. The slightest nervousness, hesitation, self-doubt, would destroy that perfect rhythm of nerve and muscle which alone makes them possible.

Just before we parted that night a sudden thought struck me.

"Did you notice——" I began; but I interrupted myself with a laugh and a contemptuous, "After all, 'twas nothing."

"Notice what?" chimed my companions in a chorus.

"Well, did you notice," I said, "the peculiar searching glance that Julie cast round the house the moment she got on to the stage?"

Strangely enough, every one had noticed it.

"It was exactly as if she were looking for someone," I remarked.

And everyone agreed that it was so.

CHAPTER II.

MADEMOISELLE JULIE'S performance had taken more effect upon me than I realised that same night. I went to bed, supposing that by the morning I should have forgotten all about her, but in this I was entirely mistaken. The recollection of her slight girlish figure and strangely beautiful face haunted me for days, and before the week was out I was impelled by a force I could not understand, and did not stop to analyse, to go and see her again.

I went, not only once, but four or five times. I did not enjoy watching her; her wild daring turned me cold and sick, and I breathed a sigh of relief when she once more descended to the stage. Still, I did not seem to be able to keep away from the place. The charm of that woman's presence was too strong, when combined with the morbid and sensational fascination of her exhibition; and again and again I found myself in the heated and unwholesome atmosphere of that crowded hall. I learnt afterwards from others that their experiences had been similar to my own.

It was at this time that, for the most part, I became acquainted with Julie's history. Little by little, setting with the utmost care the purely mythological from the genuine elements in the thousand stories which went the round about her, I succeeded in piecing together a kind of hypothetical biography which threw a good deal of light on her present character and conduct. After the occurrence of the incident, which I shall presently narrate, I was able to fill up the gaps in my history and to find the complete explanation of the woman's strange and wild career.

She was the child of circus performers. Her father was a clown, her mother an equestrian lady. From her very earliest days Julie had been before the public. Even as a child she had attracted a good deal of attention by her daring and natural grace; and as she ripened into girlhood, and developed the marvellous and resistless fascination of which I have spoken, she came to be in ever increasing request. She travelled with her parents all over Europe, as well as in the United States; and everywhere she went she met with the most astonishing success. During all this time, however, she had habitually performed with the protection of a net.

Digitized by Google

Two years before her sudden advent in London, Julie was fulfilling an engagement in Paris, when, as frequently happened, a young man who had seen her again and again, besought an introduction. More persistent or more fortunate than the tribes of suitors who everywhere followed her steps, young Zyll—for such was his name—at length found his way into her presence. He was madly, passionately in love with her, he said. In her alone now rested the whole happiness of his life. Would she—could she—refuse him when he came to throw his life and his possessions at her feet?

I know not how long Zyll urged his suit, but at length Julie lent him a willing ear. Handsome, elegant, attractive, he possessed every gift likely to prove availing with a girl of Julie's warm and highly-strung temperament. She returned his love with all the ardour of her nature, and presently forsook the circus-ring at his request.

Months went by, when the shadow fell, and the tragedy of Julie's life began. Her lover tired of her—his passing passion was satisfied; and do what she would, she could not succeed in regaining his wandering affections. One day he made a journey to Paris, on business—purely on business; and he never returned. Hopeless and broken-hearted, Julie went back to her old life, only retaining his name as the one fond memento of her short, sweet dream of bliss.

She went back to her old life, but not in the old way. Everything that made existence bright to her belonged to the past, and with nothing to live for, nothing to hope for, nothing to care for, she grew reckless of life.

Danger went for nothing with her now. Feats at which she would have shuddered a year ago seemed easy and simple in her present state of heedless, thoughtless daring. Bold and venturesome as she always had been, she was a hundredfold more bold and venturesome than ever now.

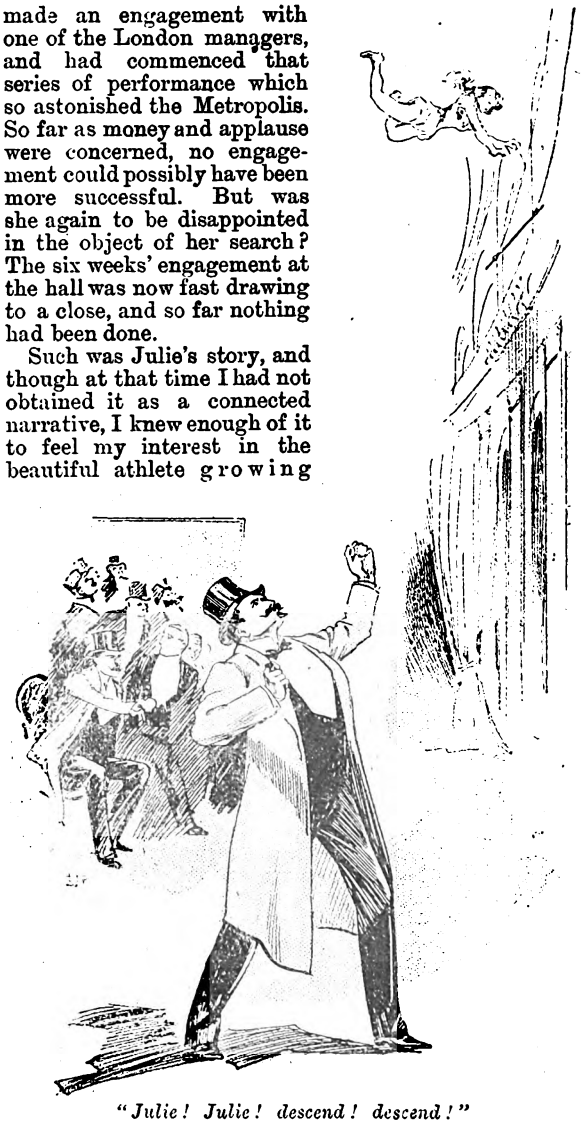
She seemed to have lost every sensation of fear—to have forgotten what the word danger meant. When those about her remonstrated and warned, she only laughed her light, silvery laugh. "Ce n'est rien—rien—rien," she said carelessly, and that was all they ever got out of her.

I have said that she had nothing left to live for; but that is not quite correct. She still kept one object before her—the rediscovery of her lost and faithless lover. The search was a wild one, the chances that its end would ever be attained seemed, indeed, extremely remote. But Julie, keeping her intentions to herself, went from city to city and from country to country, trusting ever that one day she might find some traces of Zyll, and in spite of a thousand disappointments, hopeful still that ultimately she might meet with success.

"It is not as if I were a woman of private life," she would say to herself; "wherever I go my name becomes known. One day he will hear it mentioned, and if it is only out of curiosity he will come and see me. Then, when he knows what danger I run in every performance, his heart may be touched once again, and he may find that still he loves me too well to let me break my neck. Allons. I must find him sooner or later. Do not let us be cast down."

Nearly a year after her return to public life, Mdlle. Julie, as she was professionally called, heard accidentally that Zyll was in England. Before long she had made an engagement with one of the London managers, and had commenced that series of performance which so astonished the Metropolis. So far as money and applause were concerned, no engagement could possibly have been more successful. But was she again to be disappointed in the object of her search? The six weeks' engagement at the hall was now fast drawing to a close, and so far nothing had been done.

Such was Julie's story, and though at that time I had not obtained it as a connected narrative, I knew enough of it to feel my interest in the beautiful athlete growing more keen than ever. I had become quite a constant patron of Bowder's entertainment, and, by dint of continually watching the performance, had by this time grown sufficiently accustomed to its danger to be able to take my place among the crowd without those feelings of sickness and horror which I had at first experienced.



"Julie! Julie! descend! descend!"

CHAPTER III.

AT length the last night of Julie's engagement in London had come. All the necessary arrangements were made, and she was to start the first thing the next morning for Liverpool, where she was to perform until Christmas. I had made up my mind to see her for the last time before her departure, and started off quite early in the evening, knowing that on such an occasion the number of spectators would be very great.

I was not deceived. When I reached the hall the entrances were already blocked by large crowds, waiting for the opening of the doors. Evidently it was to be quite a gala night. However, not caring to take my chance in such a multitude, I quietly walked round to the manager of the Hall's hotel, close at hand, and got him to give me an order which I knew would admit me to a good seat, even after the doors were thrown open. Expecting that I was to meet one of my friends there that evening, I made him write the order for two, and then strolled off to look for my friend, feeling secure as to my own place.

Digitized by Google

I waited half an hour after the appointed time, and as he did not appear I determined to give him up and enter at once. But just as I was about to pass in at the door my attention was attracted by the figure of a man, who was engaged almost at my side in studying the programme bill with the most extraordinary interest.

He was a tall and very handsome man, faultlessly dressed, with the manner and appearance of a gentleman, and probably about thirty years of age. As I stood for a moment looking at him with some curiosity, he turned abruptly on his heel, with a very excited movement, and, catching sight of me, touched his hat. This action confirmed me in the already formed opinion that he was a foreigner.

"Excuse me, sir," he said, speaking rapidly and with ill-concealed emotion, "excuse me, sir, but are you going in there?"

I announced that such was my intention.

"Can you tell me," he continued, with the same tone and manner, "if there is anything there worth seeing?"

"Certainly," I replied. "they give a very good entertainment."

"H'm." He paused for a moment as if he were hesitating as to whether he should proceed. "And—and this Mademoiselle Julie, is her performance good? I am a Frenchman and a stranger in London," he added, by way of an explanation.

I told him that it was Julie more than anyone else who was just then filling the house night after night.

"And what is she like?" he asked quickly, looking straight into my face with his keen grey eyes.

"There is her photograph." I answered, pointing to a frame which stood just inside the door.

I watched him approach the frame and stagger back as he caught sight of Julie's face. I touched his arm, and, as he turned in response I saw that his face was ghastly pale.

"I—I must go in and see her," he said, passing his hand nervously across his brow.

"The house is very full now," I said, "and you will have great difficulty in finding even standing room. But see, I have a ticket which will admit two. If you will come with me I shall be pleased."

He stammered out some hardly comprehensible words of thanks, and we went in together. The house was indeed crammed, but there was still the open space kept clear as usual beneath the trapeze.

At length ten o'clock came. A kind of buzz of anticipation ran through the expectant crowd; the orchestra gave one loud, long-drawn chord, and Julie appeared, brighter, more beautiful, more goddess-like than ever. The man at my side gave a bound upon his seat, and an exclamation which happily was drowned in the deafening cheers with which Julie was welcomed.

I saw the dark, lustrous eyes wander as usual over the upturned faces, but though they appeared for a moment to rest on the very spot where we were sitting, they evidently saw us not. But, none the less, they seemed to have a strange effect upon my companion, who sat white and trembling, his starting eyes fixed upon the athlete with an intensity of meaning and despair which I shall never, never forget. "Mon Dieu! Mon Dieu!" I heard him mutter beneath his breath, and instinctively I seized his arm. His hand touched mine as I did so. It was deadly cold, and the fingers were closed in a convulsive grasp.

And lay, a mangled, quivering mass at her lover's feet.

With the same old careless smile, which, as I knew so well now, was only assumed, Julie sprang forward and caught the bar; and then, once more, up she went, above the orchestra, above the gas-lamps, up, up in the very roof of the building. There she hung again upon that fragile support, gazing down from the dizzy height, swinging idly, carelessly, until, with a mad impulse, she threw herself over, and with a sudden turn of the body, sat lightly upon her terrible seat.

Never had she seemed more daring and more reckless than on that fearful evening. The vast crowd of spectators seemed with one accord to hold their breaths.

"Mon Dieu! It is terrible!" cried the man at my side, suddenly giving vent to his pent-up emotion; before I could do anything to hold him back, before even I could realise what he was about, he had disengaged himself from my grasp, and had sprung forward into the open space directly beneath the trapeze.

"Julie! Julie!" he cried hoarsely, "descend! descend! It is I—François! For the love of Heaven come down!"

The orchestra paused as he spoke — a death-like silence fell upon that horror-stricken crowd. Paralysed, no one moved. But the voice, the well-known, the long-lost, the still-beloved voice, had reached the dizzy height where Julie hung. It was too much. A faint scream from above, echoed by one fearful heart-rending shriek from below, and then Julie fell straight, like an arrow, into the open space beneath her, and lay, a mangled, quivering mass at her lover's feet.

HAROLD DEWHURST.

Digitized by Google

The Pilot's Story.

Only once during the whole of his long career as a pilot had old Jean Strabbe been afraid; and that circumstance was no reflection on his courage, but was born of the superstitions which seem to be a part of the nature of those rough men of the coast. This incident in his life was connected with his own domestic affairs; the story, as told to me, was full of interest.

Ten years ago, the family consisted of Jean Strabbe, his daughter Jeannic and three sons; the mother was dead. Jeannic was nineteen, and three boys twenty-one, twenty-three, and twenty-five respectively. One day Jean was surprised by a visit from Yvon le Gonic, the Captain of a coasting vessel, who, without beating about the bush, asked for the hand of his daughter. Jean scouted the idea; Yvon was twelve years older than his daughter and had the reputation of being a brutal, drunken, low-minded fellow. To give his daughter to such a man, was (in his opinion) to make her miserable for life. But—as the old man said quaintly—he had reckoned without Jeannic. She had made up her mind to marry Yvon; she was sure that she could reclaim him, and she would be his wife come what might.

There was no help for it; so the marriage took place in due course and the two lived in a cottage at the other end of the village.

Yvon le Gonic seemed to have become a changed man; he did not frequent the inn when on shore, as he had hitherto done; he became cleaner in his habits, more respectable in appearance and manners; and he treated his wife, of whom he was seemingly very fond, with every consideration. In short, after nearly a year, Strabbe and his sons began to entertain kindlier and better feelings towards him, and to regret that they had thought so ill of him.

But alas! it was soon over. One day they learnt almost at the same minute that Yvon had either given up or lost his position, and that he and his wife had left the village. Left the village! Jeannic gone, and without a word to her poor distracted father as to their destination!

It was a terrible blow to the old pilot, as well as the boys, for in their rough way they were devoted to their sister. They made inquiries about the fugitives, but without success; and as months went by without news they felt that she was lost to them. Not until two years later did they hear from Jeannic, and then Strabbe received a letter containing three words only: "Come to me." It was signed "Jeannic," and the postmark was that of a small town many miles away.

Strabbe and his boys immediately responded to the call, and that same day they stood by the side of the dying woman. She was just conscious of their presence, and smiled like a happy child. Before sunset she was dead.

From the priest who had attended to her wants at the last Jean gleaned a few details. Soon after settling in the town Yvon had fallen back into his old ways. He had shamefully ill-treated his wife, and, in fact, had behaved just as the old pilot had feared when he first refused to agree to the marriage. Jeannic had died from privation, accelerated by injuries inflicted a few days previously by Yvon in a drunken fit. Yvon had fled, nobody knew whither.

Why had his daughter not written to him? Pride probably had prevented her. So poor Jeannic was buried amid the sobs of the four rough fellows, who returned next day to their home in Penmarch full of vengeful feelings towards Yvon le Gonic.

Three years passed away. Nothing had been heard of Yvon le Gonic at Penmarch.

It was the afternoon of an August day in 1892. Jean and his "boys" sat in the old weather-beaten cottage smoking their pipes and listening to the howling of the storm. A dreadful gale had been blowing since the morning; the sea was dashing furiously upon the rocky coast and around Penmarch Point—such a sea as few would care to be out in, and certainly no Captain in his senses would have deliberately risked his vessel by trying to round the Point in such weather. So the four men had settled themselves down to as quiet a day as possible.

A heavy bang at the door made them all start to their feet. The youngest son opened the door and found himself face to face with a gentlemanly man enveloped in a mackintosh.

"I want Jean Strabbe, the pilot," he said. "Phew! Let me come in out of this!"

The young man stood aside and allowed the stranger to enter.

"Are you Jean Strabbe?" he inquired of the old man, after hastily scrutinising the four.

"I am," replied Strabbe. "But you are wet——"

"No matter," exclaimed the new-comer hurriedly. "See here. I am the agent of Messrs. Duval, of Concarneau. We have a brig off this coast which will inevitably be lost unless she rounds the Point. To do that we want a pilot—a pilot with nerve, for no half-hearted pilot can save the vessel in such a sea as this. The captain must have been mad not to have run into J—— and waited. His instructions were to lose no time, but the fool was not told to risk the vessel in this manner. Well, it amounts to this, if that vessel is lost we shall never get the insurance money under the circumstances, and we shall lose immense business by failing to execute this order to time—because if the cargo is lost we cannot carry out the order under a month. So we want a pilot to go out to the vessel, which is beating about out there making signals for a pilot just as though the sea were as smooth as glass—the madman!—and take her round the Point to F——, and we will give ten thousand francs for the job. I am told that you are the only man who is dare-devil enough to undertake the task. Will you do it?"

Digitized by Google

The agent stopped, quite out of breath with hurried talking and anxiety, and looked at Jean.

"What vessel is it?" asked Strabbe absently, for he was really thinking of the possibility of doing what was required.

"The Marie, Captain, Yvon le Gonic," replied the Agent, repeating the formula mechanically.

A cry broke from the lips of the four men simultaneously. "Curse him!" exclaimed Jean through his clenched teeth.

The Agent looked from one to another in bewilderment. "What is it?" he asked.

The old pilot was the first to recover his composure.

"Yvon le Gonic is the greatest rascal on this earth!" he cried vehemently. "Any ship commanded by him is doomed. God is taking vengeance on him for his villainy, and I cannot go out to help him, for that would bring down Heaven's wrath upon me also."

"What nonsense is this?" asked the Agent angrily.

"It is no nonsense," replied Jean solemnly; "I can't do it."

"Yvon ought to know this coast," said the youngest son.

"He doesn't. He wasn't a pilot, and he didn't come this way often."

"If he did know the coast he couldn't save the ship. He is doomed!" exclaimed Strabbe.

"Well," sighed the Agent, "I have done what I could. We can get over the loss of the boat and the business, and perhaps the captain deserves to drown, but I'm sorry for the others. Twelve of them to drown because the captain is a rascal! Poor fellows!"

Jean started; he had forgotten the crew. His face assumed a troubled look. What was he to do? On the one hand, he firmly believed that what he had said was true; but, on the other hand, ought he to allow the twelve men—all with wives and children, maybe—to drown without doing what he could to save them? His superstitious fears made him tremble to undertake this job, and his honest, manly feelings bade him try.

"I will try it!" he exclaimed. "But," (under his breath) "I know I cannot do it. It is God's will."

"I will pay——" began the Agent.

"No!" interrupted the pilot. "I want no money for trying to save my fellow man. Come, boys," turning to his sons, "just a drop of cognac, and out with the boat."

Thirty minutes later they were pulling hard towards the vessel, which was struggling with the waves and lying to as much as possible to avoid the rocks. It was fearfully hard work to pull the boat even for such muscular fellows as the Strabbes, but they bent to the oars with all their might, and made fair headway. Old Jean Strabbe was terribly upset; his nervousness increased as they slowly neared the vessel, and it became evident to his sons that unless he regained possession of himself, he could never accomplish the task of piloting the vessel round the Point. They themselves were not pilots; they were fishermen.

At last, after two hours' hard work and many narrow escapes of being capsized, they reached the Marie. A rope was thrown to them, and five minutes later they were on board and their boat hauled up.

With ashen-grey face, Jean Strabbe looked about him with a bewildered air. His superstitious fears, strange as it may seem to us, were rapidly mastering him and rendering him totally unfit for his work.

"Are you a pilot—can you get us out of this fix?" asked a well-known voice gruffly. Jean turned and found himself confronting Yvon le Gonic.

"Yes, Yvon le Gonic! So we meet at last, you villain!"

The Captain uttered a fearful oath as he recognised the father of the woman he had hurried to her death. Forgetting himself for the moment, he let go his hold and stepped forward with uplifted hand to strike the old man; but even as he made the movement a heavy sea caught the ship and made her heel over. Yvon lurched sideways and fell, and before he could recover himself another wave swept over the deck. When it was gone, the Captain had disappeared.

Nothing could be done to save him. Two of the men watched for any trace of him, while the others continued their work on the vessel. A complete change came over Jean with the disappearance of Yvon.

"Heaven has avenged my little Jeannie," he murmured, "and Heaven will now save the crew." His composure returned, and, as though to prove the truth of his remark, the sea became just a little calmer, and the prospect of saving the vessel correspondingly brighter.

Jean's anxiety seemed to vanish entirely now; he had confidence in his own ability, and he believed that the death of Yvon was the sacrifice required by an outraged Providence. He issued his orders calmly, orders which were willingly obeyed by all, including his sons, and the vessel was slowly, but safely, conducted round the Point into port.

And that is the story, for it only remains to be added that the owners insisted—in spite of Jean's remonstrances—in paying over the ten thousand francs which had been offered by their representative.

GEO. DAY.

Digitized by Google

The Survival of the Fittest.

DRAGGING itself westward across the dreary plains of Utah, the overland train, from a vantage point in the sky, looked like a small horsehair snake crawling over the earth's surface. The earth—almost the air—was white with the heat of the summer sun. All was vastness, immensity, silence, loneliness; above, the flawless blue; below, those seemingly illimitable plains of reddish yellow, streaked with alkali white, that swam back and forth below the eyes in parallel lines, until far off they melted into a low, long stretch of shivering light, the mocking water mirage at the base of the mountain ranges hundreds of miles away. Encompassed by that horizon there was nothing of life except within that desultory moving train.

Packed in the emigrant, or third-class, car of the train was a crowd of tired, miserable, and dirty people. They looked out listlessly at the passing landscape, or stupidly at each other, or twisted themselves into all sorts of uncomfortable positions on the hard wooden seats in vain efforts to secure a little sleep.

Perhaps the most unprepossessing of them all was a dark-featured, roughly-dressed man. Beside him was a very little girl in a blue dress. His lowering, repellent face had a scowl upon it which suggested the convict or the desperado; but he was neither. The scowl and the unconscious sneer about his ugly mouth were born simply of a long and thoroughly fruitless struggle with misfortune.

Although pretty, it was easy to see that the little girl was his child. She was the solitary ray of sunshine in that railway steerage. Even the dull faces of the people in the carriage took on an expression of tenderness when they looked at her, for she had cheered them during the last three weary days with her joyous laughter and merry play. Just now she was lying asleep on the breast of the ill-favoured-looking man, one chubby hand pressed against his rough, unshaven cheek. It was unnecessary to ask if the child had a mother.

She was a momentous factor in a mighty problem to the man whose arm was about her, and whose knit brows and troubled face showed me how hard it was he studied it. A crazy letter had come to him across the Continent, and he had left the tenements of New York to try and reach the golden land of California. He had started with hardly sufficient money to take himself and child more than half the distance, but he had a confused sort of an idea that he would in some way reach his destination. Better it was, at all events, than to remain in the noisome Hester Street den, where, without work or the prospect of any, his little sum of money would soon be gone.

The station to which his scanty purse had enabled him to buy a ticket for himself and child had been passed hours before, and he was wondering how soon the conductor of the train would discover the shameless imposition he was practising upon the railway company. He had not much longer to wait, for presently the autocrat of the train, in a hurried passage through the carriage, stopped suddenly before him and asked for his ticket.

"Hello, where are you going?"

The man looked up in what was intended as a humble, respectful, and piteous appeal, but his lip curled up over his teeth like that of a harried dog. He could not help it. His voice was mild enough, as he said:

"I am going to California, sir, with my little girl."

The man's looks seems to irritate the not too even temper of the railway official.

"You are, eh? Well, where's your ticket for the rest of the way?"

"If you would please let me go through the train with my little girl," replied the unfortunate one falteringly, "I think I could raise the money."

The baby girl was now wide awake, her big, round, dark eyes fixed wonderingly upon the conductor.

"Go through the train? Not much. Third-class passengers stay in this carriage. You get off at the next station," said the conductor in a voice of fierce warning as he passed on.

Digitized by Google

The man looked despairingly at his fellow-passengers. There was a glimmering of sympathy and pity for him in some of their woe-begone faces, but there was little money in their pockets even if they desired to help him.

In about an hour the conductor came into the carriage again and gave the bell-rope a vicious pull. The engine responded with two short whistles, and gradually the train slackened its speed and stopped.

"Come, now, you get off here," said the conductor roughly; "we're behind time already, and you want to hurry up about it."

Again the man's lip curled in an ugly way, but he made no answer, except to gather up the few paper bundles of bread and meat on the seat before him. Then, taking his child in his arms, he followed the conductor to the platform and stepped off the train. Before it was under way again, however, a humane man on the last step called out to him:

"Say, partner, there ain't nothin' here. This is only a signal station. The East-bound'll be along in a few hours. Stop her and board her. The conductor on that train'll let you on. It's a shame to put that kid off in such a place."

In truth little about the place indicated a railway-station. There was a closed sentry-box looking affair beside the lines, and fifty yards behind it the remains of an old hut. Not even a trail showed where it was that any human being had visited the spot. And around was the dreary waste of billowy plains and the burning sun overhead.

In the rear of the signal-box its projecting roof had cast a little shade, and here the man sat down upon the ground with his child still in his arms. Strange things, for him, came into his eyes—tears. The little one looked up at him in a puzzled way, and he hastily brushed his hand across his face, and left a broad smudge of railway soot upon his cheek. She clapped her hands, and laughed with glee at his funny face.

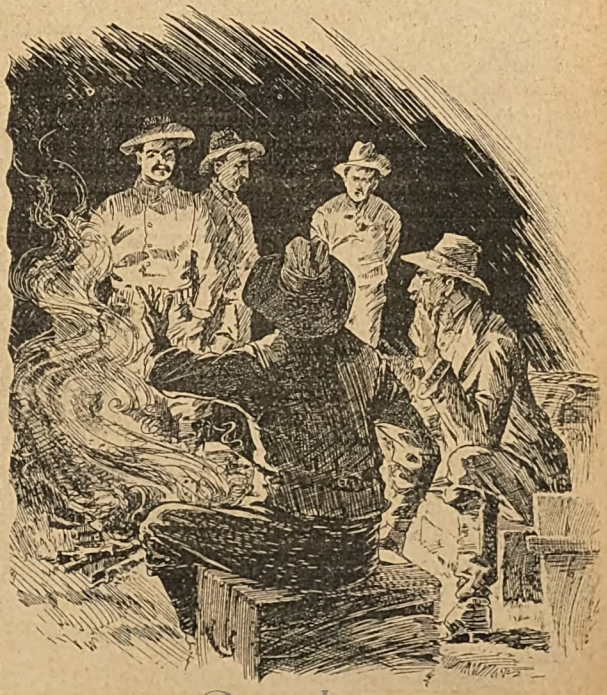
Then thirst came to them—that awful, torturing, unreasoning thirst which the desert alone can give. The child cried for water, and the father left her in the scanty shade and stepped out into the glaring sun. Neither in the sky nor in the parched ground was there a drop of moisture, and he knew it. He returned and tried to comfort her, and then he sat down again, buried his face in his hands, and tried to think. The evening was coming on when he rose to his feet with a new resolve.

Away far off in the west a thin, almost imperceptible, streak of smoke told him that the east-bound train was approaching. Near the lines he found a dirty shred of a flag hanging to a stick, and he placed it in the socket of an upright post standing in front of the house. Nervously his fingers fumbled in his pockets until he produced the stump of a lead pencil. Picking up a piece of pasteboard, he wrote upon it, in great, rough letters:

SOME ONE TAKE THIS CHILD!
SHE HAS NO PARENTS.

With a string he placed the placard round the neck of the little girl. This done, he took her in his arms, kissed her again and again, pointed to the smoke that was becoming blacker and longer, and told her that water was coming. When the rails began to sing of the approach of the coming train, he placed her near the lines, and then ran and hid himself in the hut.

From his hiding-place he looked out and eagerly watched the child, while the rattle and clamour and thunder of the train grew louder in his ears. On it came with a rush and a roar, and flew past the station in a gale of wind and dust. The man's heart died within him, and then it beat wildly again. The train had stopped several hundred yards past the station and was coming back to the sentry-box. The driver had seen the tattered flag.



Sitting by the camp fire.

Digitized by Google

As the long train rolled slowly backward, curious and inquiring heads protruded from the windows. The gold-emblazoned conductor stepped off and looked about him in wonder. Not for several moments did he discover the child. Immediately there was a crowd about it, and the placard was passed from hand to hand. A white-jacketed porter came out of a Pullman car and placed a wooden step on the ground before it. He was followed by a lady in black, who descended from the carriage and joined the throng.

A pair of eager, yearning, beseeching eyes watched it all from the hut. To the man in hiding it seemed that the determination of his child's fate never would be reached. Finally he saw the lady in black take the child in her arms, kiss it, and re-enter the carriage. The passengers scrambled back, the conductor waved his hand, and the train moved on.

Then the father came forth and gazed longingly at the departing train—gazed at it until it became smaller and smaller—until it became a dot in the plains—until it vanished—and he knew he was alone.

He stretched himself on the baked ground that night to sleep, but could not. Two little stars in the firmament—modest little stars very near together—reminded him of the eyes of his child, and he tried to fix his thoughts on them and of her, but it was in vain—he could not forget his thirst.

The terrible sun rose the next day and looked down upon him as its victim. He endeavoured to eat some of the bread he had saved, but the dry crumbs were torture to his throat. One thing only was there to do—to follow the lines until an inhabited station was reached. It might be fifty miles—it might be more—but there was no salvation away from the railway.

He started off bravely enough, his longing eyes fixed on the ever receding point where the glistening rails met in the far perspective. But sometimes his gaze wandered even further on to where it surely seemed that blue-green trees were bathing their feet in cool waters.

At noon, when resting for a while, he heard the rattle of an approaching goods train. Hope welled up within him, and he fondly imagined himself sitting by the camp fire at the diggings listening to the oft-repeated tales of the fabulous fortunes to be made in these parts. He stood on the metals and made frantic motions to stop the train. The men merely laughed at him. He did not know he had employed the favourite ruse of tramps. Goods trains were not for the accommodation of such gentry. Nor was it a supposable case that a wayfarer in the desert was unprovided with food or drink, else why should he be there?

After this his progress was very slow. On the third day he came to the end of his journey. He may have been delirious, or he may have been quite sane. A train stopped for him and took him on board. This they always do when they kill a man.

WILLIAM A. TAAFFE.

RESULT OF THE PUZZLE PICTURE COMPETITION

ANNOUNCED IN THE

Double Christmas Number of "SHORT STORIES."

The first correct solution to hand was forwarded by Robert W. Healey, 19, Clarendon Road, Middlesbrough, Yorks. Mr. Healey therefore wins the £10 prize which was offered. The following competitors have since solved the puzzle correctly. I have been very pleased to forward a bound volume of the first series of Footlight Favourites (value 7s. 6d.) to each of them as a memento of the contest: E. Bovell, Prestwood, Great Missenden, Bucks; H. S. Uhlrich, Bryntirion, Chelsfield, Kent; J. Hessell, 5, Dean Street, South Shore, Blackpool; Mr. Henderson, 2, Footfield Terrace, Templeogue, Dublin; T. Whatson Lewis, Oswald Road, Oswestry, Salop; Maurice Mungall, 9, Ruthven Street, Hillhead, Glasgow; Albert Vigor, The Stores, Hurstpierpoint, Sussex; Miss Bertie Perrett, 4, The Cedars, Clapham Common, S.W.; H. C. Latimer, Pine Road, Winton, Bournemouth.

The "key" of the original picture is reproduced below:

30	73	34	91	6	66	46	14	78
19	71	37	54	26	84	35	7	61
21	29	55	18	13	53	22	60	27
47	44	96	99	94	68	89	62	9
09	4	74	25	40	86	57	42	31
76	2	92	63	10	32	68	16	1
65	93	45	11	81	90	72	24	9
28	77	67	41	49	36	48	02	17
79	15	69	75	8	56	88	85	82
43	19	38	23	78	83	80	51	33
70	95	89	12	98	52	59	76	3

A TEN-POUND PRIZE.

(See Next Page.)

On the next page is a puzzle picture composed of 80 squares. If these squares be rearranged in a certain order they will form a real picture.

We offer a prize of £10 to the first person who sends the correct solution. In order to give readers in all parts of the United Kingdom as equal a chance as possible, the whole of the solutions received at 17, Henrietta Street in any one day will be considered together. In the very unlikely chance of two or more correct solutions being included in one day's post, the prize will be given to the sender of the neatest one. A Consolation Prize will be awarded to the sender of every correct solution who is not the winner of the £10.

If no correct solution be received on or before Tuesday, February 4th, 1896, the Ten-Pound Prize will be given to the sender of the solution then to hand which is most nearly correct.

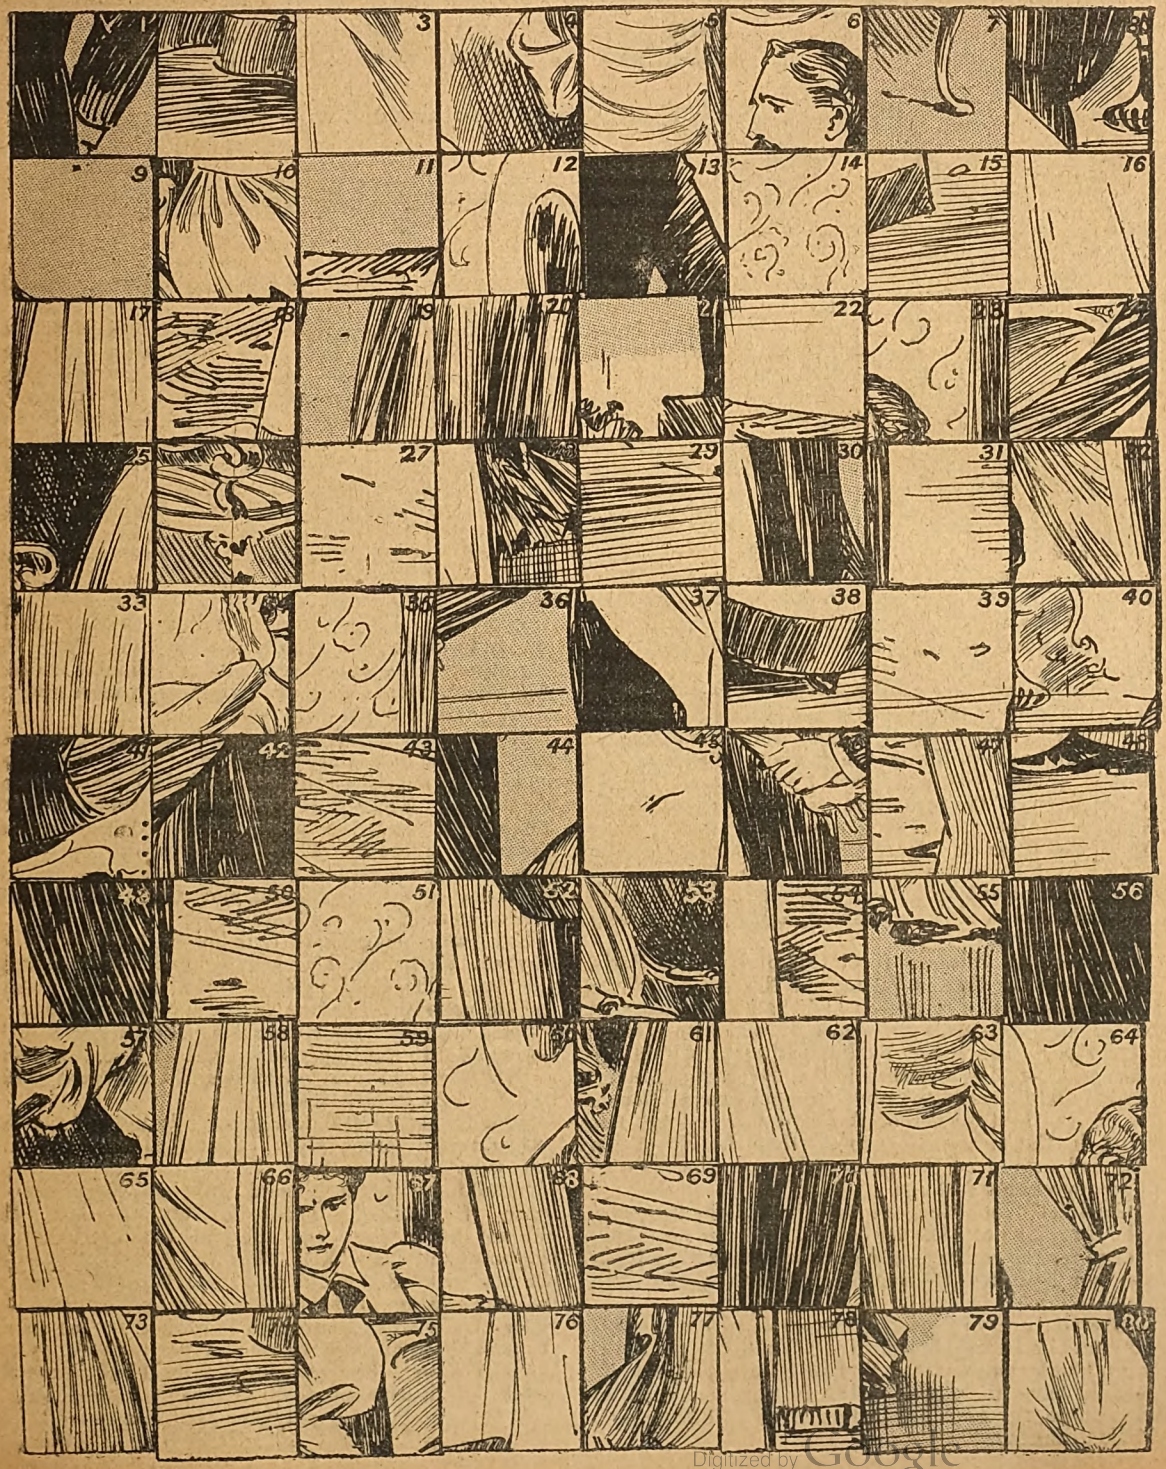
Pictures should be packed flat or folded, not rolled, and the outside wrapper must be marked "January."

N.B.—To make the puzzle more difficult some of the squares have been turned upside down.

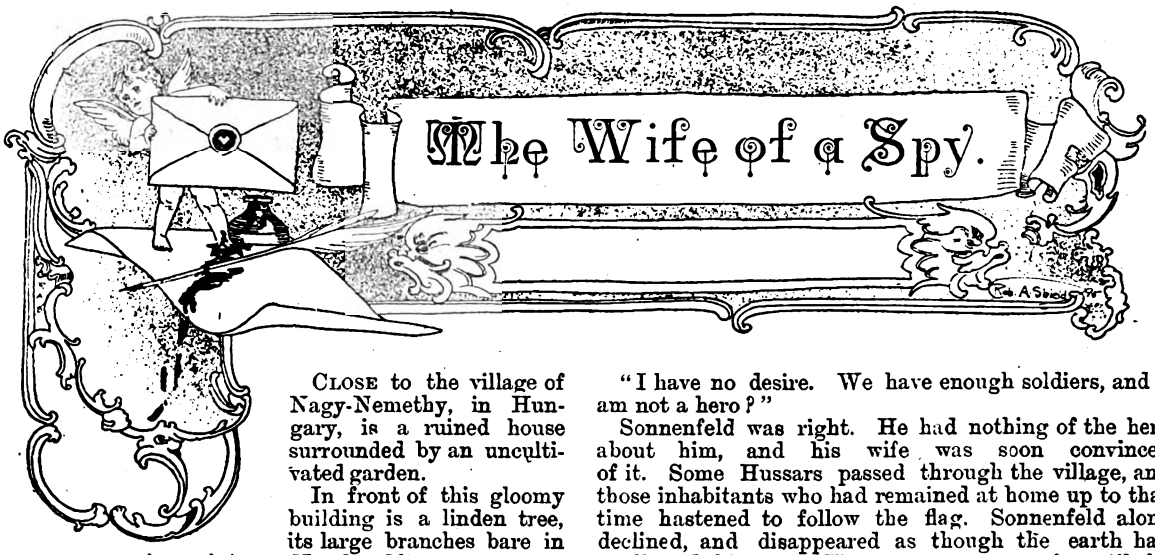
Digitized by Google

PUZZLE ✣ PICTURE.

(SEE OPPOSITE PAGE.)



Digitized by Google



The Wife of a Spy.

CLOSE to the village of Nagy-Nemethy, in Hungary, is a ruined house surrounded by an uncultivated garden.

In front of this gloomy building is a linden tree, its large branches bare in summer as in winter. Nearly fifty years ago, when people awakened on all sides and began to shake off their chains, this house was inhabited by a young Jewish family, Adolph Sonnenfeld, a grain dealer, and his wife. While Sonnenfeld by his appearance bore no special resemblance to other members of his race, being blonde, rosy, and thin, like a German, Egla was a real Jewish woman, beautiful, intelligent, and calm, with dark, passionate eyes, small mouth, and disdainful lips.

Sonnenfeld and his wife loved each other tenderly. Egla even went so far as to love her husband more than her country, which is saying a good deal, for she was an exalted and ardent Hungarian patriot. She read the Magyar poetry with a feverish interest, and rejoiced in the growth of the revolution which was spreading in Hungary. Her favourite revolutionary heroes were Petoefi and Kossuth. Believing in a better future, she inculcated in her children an affection for their country and the passion of love and independence. Restricted to the narrow limits of her household, Egla led a rigorously feminine existence.

But when the February revolution broke out in Paris, soon followed by that of Vienna and the uprising of the Hungarians, her character, which had long surpassed the ordinary in its measure of energy, soon showed itself in full force. She began by interesting herself in the debates of the Diet, and then in the threatening conflict between the Government and the populace in Vienna, and in the first scenes of the civil war. When she learnt, in the month of October, that the Hungarian army had arrived at the gates of Vienna, she could no longer repress her feelings.

"Adolph!" she cried one morning at the breakfast table, throwing down the newspaper, "everyone is taking up arms for the country—old men, women, and children have not hesitated to sacrifice themselves. Do you intend to remain behind?"

"Are you crazy?" cried Sonnenfeld, with an indignant and almost frightened air. "What does the Hungarian liberty matter to me? I am a Jew, and, even if I should have an idea of going to war, people would laugh at me, for I don't even know how to load a gun."

"You can learn."

"I have no desire. We have enough soldiers, and I am not a hero?"

Sonnenfeld was right. He had nothing of the hero about him, and his wife was soon convinced of it. Some Hussars passed through the village, and those inhabitants who had remained at home up to that time hastened to follow the flag. Sonnenfeld alone declined, and disappeared as though the earth had swallowed him up. He was not seen again until the last soldier had quitted Nagy-Nemethy.

Egla then learnt that he had concealed himself in the cellar, where the cook carried him his food. She was filled with disgust. Her first impulse was to take her two children and leave this man, whom she could no longer love; but Sonnenfeld besought her so—he poured out so many tears, and his weeping children so well pleaded his cause—that Egla remained with him. From that day onwards she treated him with a disdainful coolness that affected him much more than reproaches and frequent quarrels would have done.

Shortly after this the first detachment of light horsemen arrived at Nagy-Nemethy. They were soon followed by a brigade which established its camp near the village. Some of the soldiers were billeted on the inhabitants, and the general selected Sonnenfeld's house for himself. The Jew surpassed himself in hospitality and servile demonstrations. He cringed like a dog before the general, and was, in consequence, treated as such by the officer.

Egla (who, being timid and hostile, kept out of the way) saw the general kick her husband out of the house one day. The sight made the blood rush to her face, but she concealed her trouble and suffered in silence.

Some days later the Hungarian Hussars exchanged a few shots with the Imperialists, and at night the Hungarians advanced from all sides and threatened to surround the Austrian brigade.

Egla dressed herself hurriedly. She noticed that her husband had crept slyly out of the house, and she went down to look for him. She soon saw him, talking with the general, who smiled graciously, while Sonnenfeld bowed humbly to him. She did not know why, but the general's smile caused her more anguish than the kicking he had given her husband. She could only hear isolated phrases of the conversation, but she soon understood that the general complained because he had found no one among the population disposed to act as a spy, not even among the poor Jews. She also heard Sonnenfeld assure the general of his devotion, then the two men separated.

At sunset the Imperialists had disappeared. An aide-de-camp had brought to the general orders to abandon this position and move towards the south with his brigade.

Digitized by Google

Throughout this winter campaign in Hungary each day brought contradictory news. Egla was agitated and sorrowful. She could not sleep at night.

Business was at a standstill. Sonnenfeld alone showed any activity, a fact which greatly worried his wife. He furnished provisions of all kinds for the Imperial troops. Suspicious-looking men often came to see him, and after each visit Sonnenfeld went away from the house for some time. Egla, with heavy heart, watched him with increasing mistrust.

One winter's day some Hussars, with their carbines loaded, suddenly appeared in the village. They were loudly acclaimed, and the joy increased when they were followed by a battalion of infantry. The Hungarians halted, threw out pickets in all directions, and began to prepare their dinner. The inhabitants generously gave up all they possessed to recompense the brave Hungarian soldiers for their fatigues and sufferings. Egla, not being able to follow this example without her husband's consent, began to look for him, as he had suddenly disappeared. After she had searched in vain about the house and neighbourhood, an evil suspicion began to force itself upon her.

At night, when all the inhabitants of Nagy-Nemethy were asleep, Egla remained awake. Seated upon her bed, she listened to the slightest noise. It seemed to her that something terrible was going to happen—something which she had felt coming for a long time. She remained thus for an hour or two; then, worn out, she fell asleep.

Suddenly she was awakened by musketry shots and a confused roar. Horses thundered by at a gallop, drums beat, and officers cried out their orders. The shots sounded closer; she opened her window, and a ball struck the wall beside her. She drew back quickly and extinguished the light.

The struggle went on in the streets. The Imperial troops had returned, and in the darkness had surprised and attacked the Hungarian infantry with superior forces. A very small number of Hungarians succeeded in escaping with their flag; the rest were killed or made prisoners.

Egla, her ideas all confused, remained seated in her chamber. An hour passed; then she heard voices in the neighbouring room. One was that of her husband; the other, clear, vibrating, and foreign, evidently accustomed to command, thanked Sonnenfeld, and promised him a handsome reward.

While the Imperial troops, and her husband with them, retired towards the east, Egla muffled up her children and hastened to her parents' house. Having placed her children in security, on the third day she returned home. Her husband was still absent. During the following night he crept into his house like a thief. He was greatly agitated when he saw his wife come out of her room with a light in her hand. She placed the light upon the table, sat down, and questioned her husband as coldly and severely as a judge on the bench.

"Where have you been?"

"I have made an important transaction. I have furnished lard and bread to the general."

"You have furnished him with something else. You have betrayed your brothers!" cried the Jewess, red with anger. "You are a spy!"

"What do you mean?" cried Sonnenfeld, turning pale.

"I heard your conversation with the general."

"Well, and what then?" he said, trying to smile.

The beautiful Jewess arose and looked at him steadily. "What then?" said she; "you are a traitor and deserve death. But I have loved you, and I do not want to see the name I still bear disgraced. I do not wish to have you die on the scaffold. You shall kill yourself here in this chamber!"

"You have lost your reason!" cried Sonnenfeld, in a shaking voice.

Egla calmly took out a pistol. "You must die!" she continued; "you are so degraded that I do not dare even to think of the frightful crime you have committed. If you are too cowardly to kill yourself I will execute you in the name of the country!"

She raised her pistol and aimed at the wretch's breast. He threw himself on his knees, and implored her pardon in agonising cries. The determined woman looked at him with irrepressible scorn; then she lowered her arm. "Yes, you are right; you are not even worth the powder."

Egla returned to her room and locked the door. When she felt sure that her husband was asleep, she threw a shawl over her head, and left the house.

The day had scarcely dawned when a number of cavalrymen appeared before Sonnenfeld's abode. The door was soon broken in, and some Hungarian Hussars, guided by Egla, went up to the chamber where the Jew was calmly sleeping.

"There is the spy!" she cried haughtily; "I want to see him hanged!"

Sonnenfeld still begged her to be merciful, but she remained inexorable. The Hussars bound his hands behind his back and led him out. With an imperturbable calm, his wife saw him hanged to a branch of the linden tree in front of his house. As soon as the execution was finished, she mounted a horse that the Hussars gave to her, and started off with them on the gallop.

At the attack on Waitzen a woman, carrying the Hungarian banner, led one of the infantry battalions. It was Egla, the valiant Jewess of Nagy-Nemethy. When the Poles of the Mazuchelli regiment carried the Komorn Hill at the point of the bayonet, it was Egla who encouraged them. Already struck with two balls, she fell, pierced by a bayonet stroke, on the tattered flag, and dyed it with her blood. N. N.

The Second Number of "PEARSON'S MAGAZINE" will be published on the First of February.

Digitized by Google

That Beautiful Widow.

"Roasted quails, waiter, half-a-dozen oysters, and a bottle of your best Moselle—that will do, I think; and for dessert——"

"Yes, sir," quoth the attendant obsequiously.

"A few grapes and an ice cream. And, waiter!"

"Sir?"

"Don't forget plenty of olives."

"No, sir."

And the waiter whisked out of the room with the peculiar bustling movement that belongs to the genus, while Mr. Gustavus Lynmore quietly walked up to the bright anthracite fire, and stood stroking his moustache before the mantle mirror with a face expressive of the mildest contentment with himself and all the world besides. He was a tall, distinguished-looking man, with brilliant black eyes, hair like ripples of glossy jet, and a carefully preserved figure, and yet there was something in Mr. Lynmore's large Spanish orbs not altogether trustworthy.

"Upon my word," soliloquised Mr. Lynmore, eyeing himself complacently, "there's a good deal in—well, I won't say cheek, for it's a vulgar word—confidence is at once more elegant and more expressive. Now here I am, Gustavus Adolphus Lynmore, without ten pounds in my pocket, and without as much as that in any banking establishment, and yet I walk into the first hotel in the city, order the most expensive dinners, and insist on the most elegant rooms. And what's more I get 'em. As for the beggarly landlord wanting his bill, why, that's a future consideration. He ought to be willing to entertain a man of my style gratuitously; it gives a je ne sais quoi to the establishment, if the paltry-minded fellow only knew it. Hallo! here's a grey hair in my moustache! Gustavus Adolphus, it's time you were thinking of settling yourself. Bother grey hairs!"

Mr. Lynmore plucked out the offensive thread of silver, and strode up and down the room in some perturbation, pausing finally at the window, and looking abstractedly out upon the tide of life flowing on in the great thoroughfare below.

"By Jupiter; that's a pretty woman!"

He stopped short, transfixed by sudden admiration, as the afternoon sunshine, slanting in direct beams of murky gold into the second-storey window opposite, lighted up a bright head bending over some absorbing bit of fancy work.

"Much obliged to you, my friend, the sunshine," pondered Gustavus. "An opera-glass couldn't be better. Black dress, loops of black ribbon at the throat, fastened by a jet clasp. Aha! a young widow. And beautiful enough to drive a fellow distracted."

Beautiful she was, indeed, in the full light of that February sunset, with her glimmering golden hair, and the evanescent carnation of her round cheeks, and the royal poise of her slender, column-like throat. Gustavus Lynmore was a perfect critic of a woman—a man who had travelled all the world over, and looked at a beautiful face as dispassionately as he looked at a fine picture or a first-class statue—but even Gustavus was struck by the fair profile at the window.

"Never saw a lovelier set of features in my life," mused Lynmore, with something like an enthusiastic throb at the withered portion of anatomy that he called, by courtesy, his heart. "Upon my word, that woman wouldn't discredit the name of Mrs. Lynmore. Wonder if she's rich? She must be, though, to live in the parlour floor of the Celandine Hotel. Women can't play the confidence game as men do; they're obliged to have some sort of a base to start from.

"Oh, she must be rich; there can't be a shadow of doubt about it—rich and pretty, and a widow. Gustavus, my boy, you must see about this business, there's undoubtedly an opportunity for you. Hallo! a tow-headed little boy, as sure as I'm a living sinner, with his head on the pretty crape shoulder! Confound all incumbrances, say I. But then, perhaps it wouldn't make so much difference if there was plenty of cash in the locker. I really must take this matter into consideration. What's that, waiter? Dinner? Very well, let it be served at once. Do you hear?"

Mr. Lynmore sat down with an appetite that was enhanced by an occasional glimpse of the golden head and rosy cheeks at the window across the street.

"There, she sees me," he pondered. "She sees me, for I saw her smile behind those lovely ringlets, and now she has vanished from the casement. Hallo, waiter!"

The waiter paused from his task of clearing the table.

"Sir?"

"The fourth window on the left-hand side, parlour floor at the Celandine—I've an idea it would be a very nice room to have, in case I leave this hotel."

"Yes, sir," said the waiter, coughing doubtfully behind his hand, and secretly hoping that so very stylish a gentleman would remain at the St. Aubrey.

"I suppose you can tell me the number of the room?"

"Certainly, sir. I used to be hall-boy at the Celandine,

Digitized by Google

sir, afore I came here. Fourth window on the left-hand side, sir, parlour floor? why, it's twenty-nine."

"Twenty-nine, eh? Thank you, waiter, I'm very much obliged to you."

And the waiter withdrew, feeling as grateful to Mr. Gustavus Lynmore as if that gentleman had tossed a shilling at him, instead of a few gracious words. Such is the effect of manner in this world.

Half an hour or so afterwards, Mr. Lynmore strolled accidentally into a fashionable florist's establishment where heliotrope and azaleas gave a tropic glow to the colourless plate-glass.

"Jansen, I want a very choice bouquet."

"Certainly, Mr. Lynmore. What style?"

"Well, plenty of white flowers—you know how to express that sort of thing—humble devotion and unobtrusive admiration."

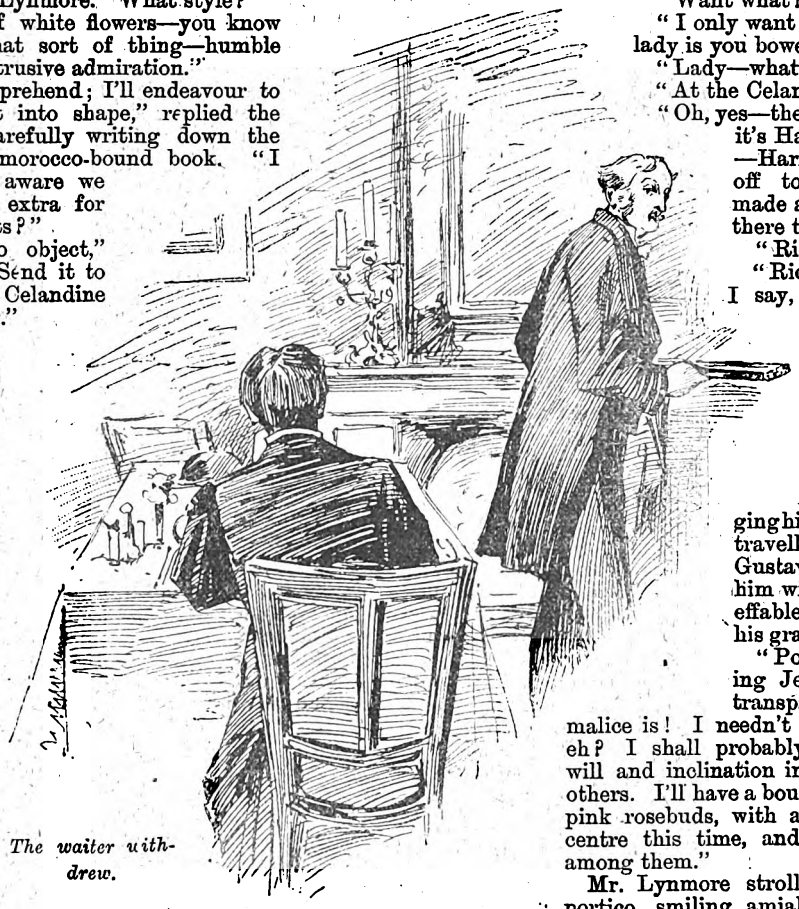
"Yes, sir, I comprehend; I'll endeavour to put the sentiment into shape," replied the æsthetic florist, carefully writing down the order in a red morocco-bound book. "I suppose you are aware we charge something extra for these ideal bouquets?"

"Expense is no object," said Lynmore. "Send it to Room number 29, Celandine Hotel, this evening."

"Mr. Lynmore, if I might venture to remind you of the little bill you left unliquidated here a year ago——"

"Bill? Oh, yes—how could I be so careless! I'll certainly attend to it immediately. Jansen; much obliged to you for reminding me of it."

The next morning Mr. Lynmore had the gratification of seeing his "ideal bouquet" in a Parisian vase between the lace draperies in the fourth window on the left side, and, moreover, of beholding the pretty widow's Grecian nose occasionally dipping daintily among the fragrant blossoms, with the bright hair falling around like a mist of gold.



The waiter withdrew.

"I must find out who she is," thought Gustavus. "She knows the bouquet was from here, for I caught her shy half-arch glance, just this minute—the very glance to shoot from a widow's cerulean eyes. But the question is, how to do it? I can't go over to the Celandine, because I boarded there six weeks last year, and came away without paying my bill."

Thus mused Mr. Gustavus Adolphus Lynmore, as he smoked his Havana by the sunshiny window of his exquisitely comfortable little private parlour.

"As I live," thought Gustavus, elevating his eyebrows, "there's Jenkisson rushing across the street like a racehorse. Now I never run; if there's anything plebeian it's haste; but Jenkisson always was eccentric. He's coming here; eh, what? lifting his hat to the divinity at the Celandine. He knows her!"

And Gustavus Lynmore, forgetting his recent sweeping condemnation of haste, ran downstairs, and clapped his old acquaintance cordially on the shoulder.

"Jenkisson, old fellow, what brings you here?"

"How d'ye do, Lynmore? Excuse me, but I'm in a hurry. Steamer sails at twelve, and it's after eleven now. Is that baggage ready, Mike?"

"Yes; but hold on just a minute. I want——"

"Want what?"

"I only want to know who that lady is you bowed to just now."

"Lady—what lady?"

"At the Celandine Hotel."

"Oh, yes—the Celandine. Why, it's Harry Burke's widow—Harry Burke that went off to California, and made a fortune, and died there two years ago."

"Rich, eh?"

"Rich as Crœsus. But I say, Gus, you needn't go making eyes at her: it's no use, for—carriage ready, eh? Well, good-bye, Gus."

So saying, Mr. Jenkisson precipitated himself into the vehicle, dragging his portmanteau and travelling rug after him, Gustavus looking after him with a smile of ineffable contempt curling his graceful lip.

"Poor, dear, blundering Jenkisson, how very transparent your shallow malice is! I needn't make eyes at her, eh? I shall probably follow my own will and inclination in this matter as in others. I'll have a bouquet all white and pink rosebuds, with a japonica in the centre this time, and slip my card in among them."

Mr. Lynmore strolled out upon the portico, smiling amiably the while, to reconnoitre the passers-by and display his unexceptionable costume.

"What a very nice little boy!" said Gustavus, stooping to pick up the hoop-stick that had rolled close to the step, and restoring it with a caress. "What's your name?"

"Harry Burke," lisped the tow-headed boy, looking very shyly at the affable stranger.

"Harry, eh? A very pretty name," pursued Gustavus, patting the tow-head. "And doesn't Harry want to go and take a walk with me?"

"No."

"Not if we go to a sweet-shop, and afterwards to a toy-shop?"

Harry Burke's seven-year-old integrity was not proof against such glittering temptations as these; he succumbed at once, and trotted off, hand-in-hand with the enticing stranger.

Digitized by Google

"A good move," thought Gustavus. "Mothers are such fools, you can reach 'em through their children without the least difficulty. I know one thing, though, I'll pack the little nuisance off to a boarding-school the first thing after we're married."

Master Harry, all unconscious of the dreadful fate awaiting him, went home to his mamma, in a high state of stickiness from various sweets, and loaded down with toys, and directly afterwards a bouquet of rosebuds arrived, containing one of Mr. Lynmore's aristocratically-engraved cards.

"Dear me, how polite!" said the lovely widow. "But, then, darling Harry wins all hearts."

Darling Harry, forsooth!

The next day Harry went to the park, and a new volume of poems in tinted paper and creamy Turkey binding was sent to Harry's mamma; the next day a pearl ring was intrusted to the youth for his mother; the next a pony was hired for Harry to ride, and that evening a diamond of the purest water, set in a narrow hoop of gold, was sent up to room No. 29, with Mr. Lynmore's compliments. Nor did the lovely widow spurn these gifts.

"That settles the matter," quoth Gustavus Adolphus decidedly. "To-morrow I'll take Harry to the menagerie, and in the evening I'll call, landlord or no landlord, and declare my sentiments. We have read each other's eyes long ago."

Harry was quite willing to be taken to the abode of savage beasts and wild birds.

"Mamma is very glad to have me go," said the artless youth. "She's engaged with company."

"Ah, indeed," said Gustavus, wincing a little, as the capering lad trod ever and anon upon his most sensitive corn, and mentally exclaiming: "You'll be packed off to a boarding-school, or I'll know the reason why!"

Mr. Lynmore endured the zoological exhibition with the utmost calmness and philosophy, and when the last serpent was safely coiled up in his iron cage, went home with the rejoicing Harry.

"For I really must wind this thing up," soliloquised Gustavus. "I've run entirely out of cash, and, what's more, I'm head and ears in debt for the bouquets and rings, and all these incidental expenses, including the brat. My darling," he said, aloud, in a honeyed voice, "will you ask your mamma if she will please favour me with a brief interview?"

Five minutes passed away—five nervous interminable minutes—while Mr. Lynmore sat in mortal dread of the landlord of the Celandine Hotel, and apprehension as to what reception might be accorded to his message. Presently, however, Master Harry came jumping down, two steps at a time.

"Mamma says, will you please to come up."

Mr. Lynmore promptly followed his small guide up the stairs, his heart thumping behind his waistcoat.

"Here he is, mamma!" bawled the boy, flinging the door wide open.

There stood the golden-haired beauty in a lustrous dress of richest white silk, with diamonds circling her throat like a tiny line of light, and flashing on her blue-veined wrists, and there, moreover, stood a tall, dashing-looking gentleman, in white gloves and a white waistcoat. Gustavus Adolphus stood rooted to the floor.

"I am so glad to meet you, Mr. Lynmore," lisped the lady, advancing, "and to introduce you to Mr. Wyndham, my husband."

"Your—husband!"

"Yes; we were married this morning; and I was so much obliged to you for taking Harry out of the way. You see, children are objectionable at such a time."

Gustavus opened his lips and shut them spasmodically, without uttering a word.

"And," went on the blue-eyed divinity, with merciless sweetness, "I have laid aside every one of your elegant presents for dear little Harry until he is old enough to appreciate them. We are going to take the sweet child to the Continent with us to-morrow, but I'm sure he'll never forget his kind friend."

Mr. Lynmore bowed mechanically, and got out of the room, he never knew exactly how. One thing connected with his retreat, however, he had disagreeable occasion to remember.

"That little bill of mine, you'll recollect, Mr. Lynmore," said a husky voice close to his ear. "If it's convenient to settle——"

"But it isn't convenient" groaned Lynmore, with a bitter recollection of the diamond ring and the hot-house flowers.

"Oh, very well. Here, Jennings?"

And Mr. Lynmore, the cosmopolitan, found himself arrested on the charge of attempting to defraud the landlord of the Celandine Hotel out of the paltry sum of £40.

So ended his courtship, and so ended, at least for the time being, his dreams of "marrying rich."

RICHARD SIBERT.

Digitized by Google

The Story of a Shameful Crime.

CHAPTER XVII.

"EUREKA!"

THE two boys had regarded Burgoyne's manifest excitement and agitation with awed perturbation. They shrank back, vaguely startled, as, after that fruitless inspection of the book cover, he fixed his eyes, snapping, eager and questioning, upon them.

"Where did you get this?" he demanded.

"Found it," blurted out one of the lads.

"Where?"

"Over yonder."

As he spoke the urchin indicated a spot relatively near to the school-house.

"Where I cast it away, or thereabouts!" murmured Burgoyne. "It must have lain there until——When did you find it?" he queried, aloud.

"Just a bit ago."

"You—you did not notice anything by the side of it, or near it?"

"What, sir?"

"A piece of paper—a folded strip?"

The boy shook his head dissentingly.

"Yes, we did find something," interpolated the other lad.

"Ah!" ejaculated Burgoyne eagerly.

"Inside of it."

"Yes, yes! go on," directed Burgoyne, quivering with anxiety.

"Just as you say, sir—a piece of paper, folded."

"It is the key!" breathed Burgoyne tumultuously. "Speak, boy! Where was it?"

"In a little pocket at the back of the cover, sir."

"It is what I am looking for," announced Burgoyne, scarcely able to control his eagerness.

"It was a piece of stiff white writing paper, and we used it for a messenger."

"To the kite?"

"Yes, sir. See! If you look sharp you can see it right up against the kite."

Adrian Burgoyne thrilled at the disclosure. He had traced the precious cipher alphabet, but how strangely! Accidentally the boys had stumbled over it. In lieu of other material, they had used it to enhance their sport of kite-flying.

He trembled as he reflected that, in setting it on the string, they might have mutilated it. He shielded his eyes from the sun, and gazed aloft. The kite was "nearly out of sight," to employ a juvenile term, and only a slight variation in shadow at its far-distant centre indicated the presence of some foreign object there—"the messenger!"

To think of it! Aloft a thousand feet or more, the sport of varying breezes, the key to a clear million in hard cash was tantalisingly in sight, but out of immediate reach. The peculiar communication unnerved Burgoyne seriously. He hurried to where the other boys were gathered. He amazed the owner of the kite by seizing the string.

The stiff breeze drew the cord taut as a straining ship's cable. In his eagerness and excitement Burgoyne began to pull it in.

"Hold on! don't do that, mister!" spoke the owner of the kite.

"But you've sent up as a messenger a paper belonging to me," explained Burgoyne, "and I want it at once!"

"Yes, sir, that's all right; only, if you don't pull in gently, you'll snap the string, and——"

"Broke loose!" interrupted an excited voice.

The very catastrophe the lad had predicted took place at just that moment.

Twang! The cord gave an ominous snap; the parted strands flitted away like the wings of a fleet bird. In dismay, Burgoyne contemplated the results of his rashness.

"Catch it! get the kite, the messenger. I'll give a handful of money to the boy who finds it first!"

The boys started away at full speed. As to Burgoyne, unused to scientific pirouettes and swift divings of the sky-sailer, he only gazed blankly at it as it bore away to the west, and disappeared over the edge of the forest.

The boys had plunged into the timber. As the school-bell rang they reappeared one by one.

"Got to get to school, mister," vouchsafed the owner of the kite. "If you can wait until after, we'll make another search for it. There was lots of string out, you see, and it's gone a long way."

Burgoyne set about tracing the missing kite himself. He penetrated the forest, he anxiously inspected the tree tops.

His heart took vivid hope as he came across a dangling string. Following this with his eyes as it ran from tree to tree, he finally came to a giant elm. Among its highest branches the white face of the kite showed. He had found it at last.

An expert climber, he soon had it out of its aerial perch. His eyes dilated with suspense as he sat down on the ground and drew it towards him.

Yes, there was "the messenger," a folded piece of worn writing paper. A small hole penetrated its centre. He removed it from the string. With trembling fingers he opened it.

Digitized by Google

"Eureka!"

One spontaneous cry broke from his lips. Into his anxious face sprang the glow of hope and triumph supreme.

The characters were intact; they were identical with those contained in the original parchment message, and with the transcription tattooed in india ink on his fore-arm.

He clasped the little fragment of paper in his hand as if it was a jewel, a pearl of value inestimable.

He had torn a strip from the newspaper front of the kite, and folded the alphabet key in it.

Pressing hurriedly forward, Adrian Burgoyne sought some sheltered, secluded spot, where, unobserved, uninterrupted, he might study out the mystic cipher—translate the signs that held hidden the secret of the hiding-place of dead Ralph Ringold's fortune.

At last, after a swift, desultory walk, he paused. He had come to an overgrown garden, and he crawled through a break in its high picket fence.

"Ah!" he ejaculated, looking round him, with a queer start. "Singular; but this is the same spot where I slept the night after I first saw Patrice."

Singular? Yes, fateful, too. It was destiny that had guided his erratic steps hither, although at that moment Adrian Burgoyne little dreamt it.

CHAPTER XVIII.

DEAD TO THE WORLD.

AT last!

Adrian Burgoyne drew a long, fervent sigh of relief and satisfaction combined, and lifted his eyes from the engrossing labour of hours.

Noon had come and gone, the sun was swinging far in the west, and yet he had pored over the scrawl in his hand, and compared it with the tattoo chronicle on his arm until every character was as familiar to him as an English letter, until he had translated coherently, unmistakably, the message that bore the dying secret of his friend, Ralph Rignold.

There could be no question as to the directions the message contained, but as Burgoyne traced their true import he realised that he was just entering a new realm of mysticism and adventure.

Translated, the cipher message read:

"In the old monastery of San Miguel, near Guayli, Mexico, lives a sect of priests of the old régime. They are under close governmental favour, which has vested in them full legal claim to the old church, the monastery, and surrounding territory.

"Near the monastery is the cave of Bureldo. Here are stored idols, relics, and antiquities of the ancient Aztecs. A wild, half-savage tribe, claiming to be direct descendants of Montezuma, dwell in the cliffs surrounding it, and guard the cave as holy ground, day and night.

"Although at religious variance, the priests and the Aztec devotees are friends, the former possessing an official domination over the fanatics.

"In this cave, two years since, I hid for a week, to escape the rigours of a provincial insurrection. My treasure, secured from the mountains, I had brought with me. Harassed by my enemies outside, fearful of discovery by the fanatics, I secreted this treasure, and managed to escape unseen.

"If anything should happen to me, my friends and the friends of my darling child, Patrice, must obtain this treasure. It will be difficult to secure entrance to the cave, so rigidly guarded, so frequently visited by the devotees. This must be done by strategy or force.

"Once accomplished, look for the idol known as The White God. It is a stone image, and is placed in a niche far back in the caves. It is known to the Aztec fanatics as the oldest idol in America.

"Within this hollowed-out block of stone I hid my treasure, and sealed it up with the natural cement the rocks of the cave afford. Break it, or dig out the cement, purchase or carry away the idol, but there is the fortune that will make my orphan daughter heiress to a million."

"The secret out!—the clue revealed at last!" breathed Adrian Burgoyne fervidly, as he completed the translation of the message. "My course is plain as to the treasure. It has escaped the knowledge of my enemies. I alone know where it is hidden. Mexico—the cave of Bureldo—the White God—the treasure—wealth for the woman I love. But what of Patrice?—where is Patrice?"

He sank his head into his hands and reflected. Soul and mind immersed in profoundest meditation, Adrian Burgoyne faced the solution of the problem of safety, happiness, security for the future.

That future spread before him in positive outline. He had a work to do, and that labour was clearly defined.

After almost incredible trouble, after rigorous hardship, torture, imprisonment, the menace of death itself, he found himself the possessor of a secret involving the possession of a fortune rivalling the ransom of a king, the dowry of a princess.

It belonged where his heart belonged—to Patrice Ringold. For her it should be secured, and it would be a welcome, self-sacrificial task to endow her with its possession. Once she was placed beyond the reach of want and poverty, vested with her legal rights, safe from the power of her enemies, would her true, womanly heart speak? Would she say: "Friend, beloved, you have worked out a noble duty; together we will share its reward?"

Then, to forget the past; to hasten to some distant clime, safe from the dread of the plots of enemies.

No! A grim, set resolve showed in the thinker's face, as he realised that not until he had unmasked Richard Sheldon and his evil-souled emissary, Colonel Lytle; not until the long score of blight, suffering, and torture he owed these two inhuman fiends was wiped out in atonement; not until they had paid that tragic debt, woe for woe, torture for torture, heart-break for heart-break, and he, Adrian Burgoyne, had been vindicated, rehabilitated, an honest, innocent victim, in the eyes of his fellow-men, would he be content.

That firm, holy resolve strengthened mind and soul to steady, tireless endeavour. He formulated his plans for the immediate future. First, a quest for Patrice—then, the treasure.

They believed him dead; those cruel enemies of his, the watch-dogs of the law, were off their guard. In his changed identity he could boldly penetrate the open streets and the police-patrolled by-ways of the city alike in safety.

A quaint conceit came to Adrian Burgoyne's mind as he sat beneath the shadow of the high bushes and reflected. He felt that with the hour a new destiny had begun; that, fully armed and equipped, he was about to start out upon a new career, like some valiant knight-errant bent on championing the cause of a fair, faithful lady-love.

He must adopt a new name—anyone would do, but he must sink all trace of Adrian Burgoyne. He was dead. Would he ever be able to write "Redivivus" above his memory? Nay. Not until the long case was ended, villainy unmasked, and innocence surely vindicated and triumphant.

From a rubbish heap of leaves, dead vines, and the trimmings of numberless rose-bushes near at hand, he drew a piece of smooth thin wood that lay there, and its new surface attracted him. With a peculiar smile he cut it to a rounding edge.

Then with his knife he dug a little trench at his side. From a pocket he next drew a small brass object. It was a metal tag, the last memento he possessed of his dreary prison career. It bore the number 407.

He placed it in the trench. Over it he heaped the dirt, until it formed a miniature grave-mound; then, with a pencil, he traced over the smooth surface of the impromptu tombstone the words:

Digitized by Google

"Sacred to the memory of Convict 407, Adrian Burgoyne. Died——," and the date followed. "Murdered by the law! Resurgam!"

Yes, he should rise again, indeed, far above the calumnies of his enemies, far beyond their power of harm or influence!

He placed the erratic chronicle at the head of the little grave. He draped it fancifully with the ends of a delicate vine that grew in profusion about the spot. Then the interment was over. He had buried himself and the past in one common grave. Convict 407 was dead, with all his woes, sufferings, and wrongs. Rest in peace! Hail the new man, strong, resolute, daring to avenge his memory in that far day when he should stand face to face with his murderers!

The conceit pleased him. He rose and left the spot, crept through the fence, and gained the cliffs overlooking the town.

Fateful hour! Criminating chronicle of the mock grave! Had he ever dreamed what familiar eyes would one day view that fanciful legend in black, he would have rended to atoms the wooden tombstone, as if its existence was sinister as the breath of a pestilence!

Hail the new life! new energies, new ambitions, new motives! Buoyant, hopeful, bent on tracing his missing love, Adrian Burgoyne selected a narrow path, and went down towards the village.

Went down to mingle once more with his fellow-creatures—went down, though he knew it not, to meet as strange, as stormy, as tragic a fate as was ever meted out to mortal man!

CHAPTER XIX.

AT HIS GATES.

"NOT a trace; not a clue! What does it mean?"

Adrian Burgoyne asked himself the question in somewhat vague bewilderment and alarm.

Five days had passed since he had left the vicinity of Lynde, and it was just the evening previous that he had once more ventured to set foot in the streets of the city where he had met his fate, and had been conquered by it in the years agone.

What little money he had left of his scanty stock was almost all expended in giving the finishing touches to a toilet in accordance with his plans of disguise.

He now resembled in attire and mien a gentleman in struggling circumstances, a village doctor, a man not yet passed the verge of well-doing in the way of business, his natural dignity of manner and expressive eyes indicating an intelligence and breeding beyond the average of the ordinary person.

From early dusk until noon of the ensuing day at intervals he had watched the home of Richard Sheldon.

So far without success, however. The house seemed to have few occupants. He had caught sight of two maid servants, and of the ostler in the stable, but all the evening previous he had watched in vain for any sign of a light in the library and drawing-rooms of the house, and all that morning he had lingered in the vicinity uselessly, for no Richard Sheldon came down the polished marble steps to go to his business office, no Colonel Lytle drove up to call upon his friend and familiar in villainy.

"I cannot make it out," cogitated Burgoyne. "I shall have to begin a cautious and systematic series of inquiries."

He strolled through the court at the rear of Sheldon's residence, and observed the man of the stables more closely. If he meditated engaging him in a conversation concerning his employer and his probable whereabouts, Burgoyne dismissed the project from his mind at a second glance at him. That surly face and irritable manner proved the ostler to be no chatterer, and Burgoyne left the vicinity with a new and cautious plan outlined in his mind.

An hour later he reappeared. He bore in his hand a small leather handbag. It contained half-a-dozen bottles of some patent preparation for polishing furniture and the like, purchased cheaply. His plan was to canvass the immediate neighbourhood, ostensibly as a pedlar, and, while descanting on his wares, engage the servant who answered his call in conversation, tending to a discussion on the recent movements of Richard Sheldon.

A hint—a mere suggestion concerning the appearance of a strange young lady at Sheldon's house of late—a mere mention of some trivial fact thus gleaned—might be the starting clue to important and speedy disclosures. Adrian Burgoyne was detective enough to comprehend that.

He started in at the end of the square, going to the area doors of the houses at which he called, and meeting with the varied chary welcome and gruff incivility of repulse usually awarded the canvasser. He had just turned from a house bearing a doctor's sign, and was coming up the area steps, when he ran almost plump against a man hastening precipitately to the very door he had just left.

"Excuse me, sir!" gasped out the man. "Do you know—Oh! sir, are you the doctor?"

Evidently his acquaintance with the physician he sought was decidedly limited, his words bespoke that. His last palpitating query, too, revealed the fact that Burgoyne's dignified manner and the little hand-bag he carried gave him quite a professional appearance, and the fact that he was just leaving the doctor's explained the excited caller's mistake in crediting him with being a physician.

"No. The doctor——"

There Adrian Burgoyne paused, for a second glance at the man caused a variety of exciting suggestions to flash through his quick mind. In a moment he recognised the other. It was Sheldon's ostler.

Some startling occurrence at that domicile had evidently started him on a speedy and excited mission, for he was scarcely coherent, so agitated was he.

Eagerly seizing Burgoyne's arm, he pleaded earnestly.

"Not the doctor? Perhaps his assistant, then? Oh, sir! I see you have your medicine case with you. It's a case of life and death. Every moment may be fatal. Please come doctor, if only for a minute. It's only a step or two."

Adrian Burgoyne was borne perforce out into the street and down the walk by his wilful companion. The latter began pouring his tale of woe into his ears, volubly and distractedly, and ere Burgoyne found an opportunity to disclaim the professional character attributed to him, he was fairly at Sheldon's door.

He thrilled to vague augury and hesitation as he realised what a strange combination of circumstances was doing for him—ushering him across the threshold of the very house whose mysteries he had so craved to explore. Should he falter or draw back? No. Confident in his disguise, certain that his visit was the initial step to possibly important discoveries, he remained mute. The ostler had insisted upon accepting him as a duly accredited physician. Well, be it so!

"What is the matter—what has happened?" asked Burgoyne, as the man ushered him into the reception room.

"The serving maid, sir. You see, it's all my fault, but she would tipple. I had a bottle of embrocation for rubbing my horses, and I happened to leave it in a little cupboard in the laundry; she found it, thought it was liquor, and—oh! if it kills her will they hang me?"

"I fancy not; we must try and give her an antidote," said Burgoyne. "Have you notified your employer?" he questioned deftly.

"Mr. Sheldon? Oh, no, sir. He ain't here—won't be here to-day, lucky for me! for I'm sure he'd discharge me for my carelessness, he hates fuss so. Get her well, doctor, so he don't hear of it, and I'll pay you half my month's wages—anything, so she don't die, and me get the blame of it!"

Digitized by Google

A gratified expression came into Adrian Burgoyne's eyes. The agitation of the household of servants, and the absence of the master, promised well for a free field and the exercise to its fullest extent of the influence his supposed professional status gave him, in a plan to learn much that he wanted to know ere he again left the house.

The ostler led the way to a little room on the main floor. Here a woman-servant was wailing and frantically wringing her hands, while groaning in pain, tossing and frightened, was the white-faced victim of the poisoning.

Adrian Burgoyne had spent one year of his sojourn behind prison bars in the hospital of the gaol, as aid to the physician in charge, and that brief training in the healing art stood him in good stead now.

He gravely felt the pulse of the sufferer, who declared that her stomach was burning up, her throat scorched to a cinder, and her lungs ablaze. At a glance he discerned that she was more frightened than hurt, but he did not say so.

He examined, smelt, and tasted the contents of the bottle from which she had drunk. It was an ordinary horse embrocation, composed of liquids far more likely to produce nausea than active poisoning, and he knew that a drastic emetic would soon relieve the woman.

"I have no medicine with me that exactly meets this case," he announced to the frightened ostler, who hung upon his words as if they comprised the stored-up wisdom of an expert. "Go to the nearest chemist's and get this put up. You need not be alarmed; I can save the patient."

"Oh, thank you, thank you, doctor!" whimpered the unnerved oster gratefully.

"Only—I will have to watch the case for any possible recurrence of unfavourable symptoms later on, so as to be on hand to check the same."

The big words settled the conviction in the ostler's mind that luck had sent a second Mackenzie to his rescue at a critical moment, and he sped away, a relieved look on his face, to secure the emetic Burgoyne had ordered—a remedy so simple that the latter knew any druggist would prepare it, even on an unsigned and unofficial pencilled order.

The ostler was not long in returning. A glance at the patient, after the administering of the medicine, convinced Burgoyne that she was relieved, and out of all possible danger. He ordered libations of warm milk and perfect quiet, and announced to the ostler that he would remain for a little time, to see that she got on all right.

"Yes, sir. This way, doctor," spoke the man, servile and awed in the presence of such rare medical skill. "You will find it very comfortable in the library here."

He led the way into Richard Sheldon's favourite lounging-room as he spoke, and wheeled the easiest of all easy-chairs into position for his guest.

Adrian Burgoyne's eyes swept the room keenly. They found a rare object of interest in the magnificent writing-desk at his hand.

"Here are books and papers, sir," spoke the ostler, wheeling a little stand to where Burgoyne sat, but the latter waved a detaining hand.

"I would prefer to do a little writing. If you would not object, might I use the desk?"

"Certainly, sir—oh, most assuredly, doctor," exclaimed the voluble ostler, anxious to oblige his visitor, and hoping his accommodating ways and respectful words would pass current for coin in settling the doctor's final bill for services now that he was recovering from his fright.

He found a bunch of keys and unlocked the desk. He threw back the flexible top, and then, saying he would watch the invalid for half an hour and then report progress to the doctor, he left Burgoyne to himself.

"What fortune!"

His eager gaze sweeping the open desk before him, Adrian Burgoyne uttered the words.

What fortune, indeed! Half an hour alone with those pigeon-holes, and drawers, and portfolios, crammed full of the private documents of the man who held his fate and that of Patrice Ringold within his cruel power!

He thrilled as he realised how circumstances had aided a consummation never dreamt of in his wildest fancies.

He scribbled a few words on a blank tablet so as to feign a semblance of writing. He kept one ear bent towards the door, to be warned of an abrupt approach of the ostler, who had unwittingly placed his master's most cherished secrets at the mercy of a resolute enemy.

Then Adrian Burgoyne delved into the mass of papers before him. He scanned books of accounts, he conned pages of correspondence. He began his task curiously, eagerly. As it proceeded, his face grew grave, startled, serious, and finally, as accumulating surprises terminated in one last discovery that completely electrified him, he sprang to his feet with a wild, incredulous cry, his face a void of doubt, astonishment, and alarm.

"Impossible!" he gasped, staring blankly at three crumpled pieces of paper in his hand, selected from the mass before him. "Impossible!—incredible!"

Footsteps sounded at the door. Lost in a maze of overwhelming emotion, Adrian Burgoyne had just wit enough to thrust the papers in his hand into his pocket, and control his agitation in a slight degree, as the ostler appeared.

The face of the latter was jubilant.

"Oh, doctor!" he exclaimed, "how can we thank you? She's better, she's well, she's at work again, lively as ever."

"Yes? I am glad—I—I had better go," stammered Burgoyne incoherently, walking to the door like a man in a dream.

The ostler stared curiously at him. A queer-acting creature, this doctor he decided.

"And your bill, doctor?" he inquired deprecatingly, as he opened the massive front door.

"Nothing," choked out Burgoyne, and was down the steps with the celerity of a man fleeing from pestilence.

He hurried along the street, looking neither to the right nor to the left. His eyes were haunted with a new dread, his face was troubled, amazed, alarmed.

He never paused until he had reached a room in the attic of a broken-down house where he had engaged lodgings the day previous.

Once there, he sank down into the one rickety chair it contained. In a state of utter collapse, he stared vaguely, dreamily, out at the little window through which the garish light of day entered charily.

Mechanically he drew the documents from his pocket that he had surreptitiously secured from Richard Sheldon's writing-desk.

"Impossible!" he muttered, gasping at them with a hopeless, despairing eye—"incredible!"

(To be continued.)

"The new serial in Pearson's Weekly, the 'Final War,' promises to be the best thing ever done in this line. The opening is exceedingly powerful, and hardened though we are by long experience against the allurements of fiction, we confess to sitting up half one night in order to read through the whole of the first instalment. Louis Tracy knows how to draw a vivid picture of war and its attendant circumstances, and in the 'Final War' the author is seen at his best."—THE NEWSAGENT.

POSTAL RATES.

SHORT STORIES will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:

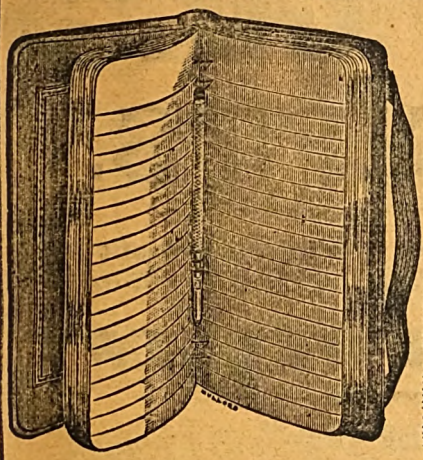
One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON, at "Pearson's Weekly" Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

COLLINS'
"AYE, READY!" NOTE-BOOK.

WITH PATENT "SELF-REGISTER."



THE HANDIEST AND THE BEST. THE SIMPLEST AND THE CHEAPEST.

As will be seen from the Illustration, this Note-Book has a hollow "rest" cut into the back into which the Pencil falls and is securely held, while by means of an ingenious contrivance called a "Self-Register," the person using the Book can at once open it where he was last writing. A reference to any page in the front, the middle, or the end is also materially assisted by the "Self-Register."

In Leather Bindings, Round Corners, Gilt Edges, from 1s. upwards, or with Re-fills from 3s. 6d. to 10s. 6d.

WM. COLLINS, SONS & CO., LIMITED,
Bridewell Place, London, E.C.;
139, Stirling Road, Glasgow.

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,

SUCH AS

Sick Headache, Constipation,
Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion,
Disordered Liver & Female Ailments.

ANNUAL SALE SIX MILLION BOXES.

In Boxes, 9½d., 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

A SIGNAL SUCCESS.

"'Tis not in mortals to command success, but we'll do more, Sempronius, we'll deserve it."

THE PEARSON POTTERY CO., HANLEY,

ARE SELLING FAST THE MOST WONDERFUL PACKAGE OF - - - CROCKERY IN THE WORLD. - - -

100 PIECES

FOR £1 1s.

A beautiful Dinner Service of 50 pieces is guaranteed Worth the Guinea alone, consequently a Charming China Tea Service, and a useful Collection of Crockery, are given FOR NOTHING.

Thousands sold all over the world. Everybody not only satisfied but amazed at the quantity and quality given.

The Secret of the Success.—The PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY are manufacturers, not middlemen, like many other advertisers. The PEARSON POTTERIES have nearly 2,000 feet frontage to the town of Hanley.

Hundreds of these packages are applied for as Wedding or Birthday Presents. And what more useful present can be given? Every item is useful.

THE THIRTY SHILLING BAZAAR PARCEL IS SELLING WELL. APPLY AT ONCE.

Send a Post Card for Particulars. You will never regret it. Freedom from breakage guaranteed. All letters to the

PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY, HANLEY.

VIOLIN MADE EASY.

The "CARRADOS TUTORETTE" (patent) saves years of practice and pounds in tutors' fees. Positions and Shifts learnt at once. Post free, nickel plated, 1s. 6d. (P.O. only). FINCH & CO., 6, Garfield Rd., London, S.W. FITS ALL VIOLINS.

RED NOSES

Caused by INDIGESTION, etc. All who suffer from this disfiguring complaint should write for DR. HOWELL'S RENOWNED REMEDY, 22, Glasshouse Street, London, W., who guarantees a cure in a few days. 2/6 a box.

TRILENE REGd TABLETS
THE ONLY CURE for STOUTNESS Registered by GOVERNMENT
Price 2/6

ALL FAT PEOPLE

Readily Reduce Weight and Cure Corpulency Permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are very agreeable, harmless, and never fail to PRESERVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of diet. Reduction begins immediately.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably." Send 2/6 to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C.

THIN BUSTS

Quickly transformed and a good figure permanently obtained by a perfectly harmless, simple, and inexpensive self-treatment. Success guaranteed. For particulars, free, send stamped envelope in confidence to "Madame B. J.," Oriental Toilet Co., 87, Strand, London.

RED NOSES

Permanently cured in a few days by a simple, inexpensive self-treatment. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope to Dr. A. M. CURTIS, York Chambers, Adelphi, London, W.C.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

"THE NIMBLE 9D."

Great Reduction in price to 9d. per lb. in order to reduce stock, but

QUALITY GOOD AS EVER.

NEARLY 100,000 BEDS ALREADY SOLD

TO THOROUGHLY SATISFIED PURCHASERS.

NEWHAM'S LINCOLNSHIRE FEATHER BEDS

THESE BEDS are warranted doubly purified, dusted, and perfected in our own extensive factory at Boston, Lincs., made in strong linen bordered tick. The quality, sweetness, and purity of every bed guaranteed. These beds ALWAYS GIVE SATISFACTION, and many thousands of purchasers have sent us flattering testimonials and other orders for beds. Note following prices, which are 25 per cent. less than our recently advertised prices.

No. 1—Single Bed, Bolster and Pillow, 6ft. 3in. by 3ft. 6in., weighing 40lbs. 30/-

No. 2—Double Bed, Bolster, and Two Pillows, 6ft. 6in. by 4ft. 6in., weighing 50lbs.... ... ... 37/6

No. 3—Double Bed, Bolster, and Two Pillows, 6ft. 6in. by 4ft. 6in., weighing 55lbs. 41/3

No. 4—Extra Size Bed, Bolster, and Two Pillows, 6ft. 6in. by 5ft., weighing 65lbs. 48/9

Any sized Bed only 9d. per lb., Carriage Paid, to any station in the United Kingdom. FEATHERS ONLY 9d. PER LB. The trade supplied. All orders must be accompanied by cheque or P.O.O. (which, as security to purchasers, may be post-dated ten days). Send for samples of Feathers and Ticks, Price Lists, etc., which will be sent Post Free and need not be returned. A great reduction on three or more Beds. Please mention this paper.

S. S. NEWHAM & CO., Boston, Lincolnshire.

MRS. JACKSON

An artist's wife, residing at Norton, near Malton, states: "I am deeply grateful to you for the good received through taking your Wind Pills. I suffered severely from

INDIGESTION, SPASMS,

and LIVER COMPLAINT. The doctors gave me up as incurable, nor did I think it possible for me to recover. I scarcely dared to eat any food, fearing suffocation. Seeing an advertisement of

Page Woodcock's Wind Pills,

I resolved to try them. After taking a few small boxes I lost all the painful symptoms, and now enjoy good health. Publish my statement as you please."

All sufferers from INDIGESTION, LIVER COMPLAINTS, WIND on the STOMACH, SICK HEADACHE, BILIOUSNESS, etc., should avail themselves of this most excellent medicine.

☛ The Wind Pills being purely Vegetable, Tasteless, and Mild, and Tonic in their action, may be taken with perfect safety by the most delicate of either sex.

Of all Medicine Vendors, at 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. Post Free for P.O. or Stamps from PAGE WOODCOCK, LINCOLN.

EPPS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

COCOA

TO THE DEAF.

A Gentleman who cured himself of Deafness and Noises in the Head after fourteen years' suffering, will gladly send full particulars of the remedy post free.—Address, H. CLIFTON, Amberley House, Norfolk Street, Strand, London, W.C.

TO TOBACCONISTS COMMENCING.

£20 See Illus. Guide and Catalogue (250 pages), 3d. "How to Open a Cigar Stores, from £20 to £2,000." TOBACCONISTS' OUTFITTING CO., 186, Euston Road, London. (Over 50 years' reputation.) Manager, H. MYERS.

S.S. S.S.

PEARSON'S

£100

COUPON.

No. 5

Feb. 1, 1896.

S.S. S.S.

HAIR DESTROYED.

A doctor's widow knows of a simple, inexpensive remedy that permanently destroys the roots, and will forward particulars free to all those afflicted sending stamped envelope. Address Mrs. B. D. WOOD, 4, DUKE STREET, VILLIERS STREET, LONDON, W.

ARE YOU LITTLE?

If so, wear the "A D" Invisible Elevators (Regd.). Will increase your height up to four inches; the only approved means; detection impossible; simple, inexpensive. Send stamped envelope for particulars to the ORIENTAL TOILET CO. (B 5 Dept.), 57, Strand, London.

DOUGLAS, HUNGERFORD, AND WILLIAMS.

PROFITS PAID DURING 1895.

Jan. 2, £8 per cent., Feb. 1, £6, Mar. 1, £5, April 1, £8, May 1, £7, June 2, £10, July 1, £9, Aug. 1, £9, Sept. 2, £8, Oct. 1, £8, Nov. 1, £7, Dec. 2, £7.

Total for 12 months £92 per cent., an average of nearly £8 PER CENT. PER MONTH.

PROFITS PAID DURING 1896.

Jan. 2 ... ... £6 per cent.

OUR NEW ILLUSTRATED MANUAL mailed free upon request, showing how these profits may be made WITHOUT SPECULATION. Cheques for profits mailed promptly 1st of each month, and for withdrawals of capital on 2nd and 16th of each month. Trial investments of £5 and upwards may be made.

We have not a dissatisfied Client.

DOUGLAS, HUNGERFORD, & WILLIAMS, 5, Copthall Avenue, London, E.C., and 11, Place de la Bourse, Paris.

BLUSHING

Permanently cured. A Pamphlet giving sound practical advice and particulars of a successful treatment for a rapid, simple, and inexpensive home-cure, forwarded free to all upon receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—Prof. B. L. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

HAIR DESTROYED

permanently and absolutely by an entirely new and harmless self-treatment, total destruction guaranteed. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope. Prof. F.T. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

TOO STOUT

Dr. Grey's FAT REDUCING Pills.

A safe, rapid, and permanent reduction and improvement in health and breathing guaranteed. A special preparation kept for stubborn cases (either sex) which have resisted other treatment.

ABDOMINAL OBESITY A SPECIALTY.

2/9 and 4/6 per box, plain wrapper, post free to all parts. Dr. O. GREY, 57, Weymouth St., Portland Pl., London, W.

TOOTH-ACHE

CURED INSTANTLY BY

BUNTER'S NERVINE

Prevents Decay. Saves Extraction. Sleepless Nights Prevented.

Neuralgic Headache and all Nerve Pains Removed by BUNTER'S NERVINE. An Chemists, 1s. 1½d.

TRILENE REAL TABLETS THE ONLY CURE for STOUTNESS Registered by GOVERNMENT Price 2/6

ALL FAT PEOPLE

Readily Reduce Weight and Cure Corpulency Permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are very agreeable, harmless, and never fail to PRESERVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of diet. Reduction begins immediately.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably." Send 2/6 to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C.

RUBBER STAMPS FREE BY POST. AGENTS WANTED. Liberal commissions.

Your MONOGRAM, 2 letters, 1/3; 3 letters or Name in full, 1/8, including Box, Pad, and Ink, for Paper or Indelible Marking Ink for linen. All kinds of stamps. Illustrated Lists free.

S. S. IRETON & CO., Ltd., 92, Gracechurch St., London, E.C.

VIOLIN STRINGS.

4 Best "E's" (samples) 9d., post free.

S. S. CARY, NEWBURY.

HAIR DESTROYED.

A lady who has permanently destroyed Superfluous Hairs on herself, will be happy to forward free, to all similarly afflicted, full particulars of a simple, inexpensive and harmless self-treatment. Send stamped addressed envelope in confidence to Mrs. "T. D." 57, Strand, London.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

Short Stories

LOVE WAR ADVENTURE ROMANCE PATHOS HUMOUR

No. 370.] For the Week ending February 1st, 1896. [One Penny.

The Secret of the Crypt.

IN the midst of a wide tract of uncultivated land in southern California stands a ruined adobe house, once the patriarchal home of the Miramontes. One hundred years ago the valley, now dry and barren, was watered by streams flowing through aqueducts, clear and cool from the mountains, and great herds of cattle and flocks of sheep grazed on the luscious herbage. Where still stands some scraggy olive trees once grew a thrifty orchard, but not even a fallen trunk remains of the noble grove of live oaks in whose shade Don Federico Miramonte, the first owner of this vast estate, built a little chapel whose crumbling adobe walls sank into shapeless mounds of earth long ago.

At a little distance from the great house lived the labourers and servants, in primitive dwellings made of tules—reeds—brought from the marshes. The dimensions of Don Federico's estate were defined by an impregnable boundary line—a hedge of prickly cacti, planted to prevent the invasions of hostile Indians from the mountains. In some places the cacti have grown to an enormous height, flourishing in the midst of drought and desolation, while the people they were planted to protect and the Indians who were their foes have vanished from the earth.

One morning, in October, 1891, two young men rode towards the old adobe and stopped to rest in its shadow. One—dark-browed and sallow-skinned, with eyes like black beads—was Arturo Miramonte, Don Federico's only living descendant. The other was a young architect from England named Severson.

Evidently the scene was new to him, for, while the Spaniard sat on his horse and smoked his cigarettes in moody silence, looking neither to right nor left, the Englishman's eager eyes took in every detail of their surroundings. Twice he was about to speak, but the sight of his friend's melancholy countenance kept him silent; he knew Miramonte well enough to understand that he did not wish to be disturbed.

"Aye!" said the Spaniard at last. "Valgame Dios! It is a dreary scene! You see, my friend, all that remains!" He spoke slowly, choosing his words with care. Arturo Miramonte detested the language. "You can form no idea of the grandness that was once here. An avenue of palms led up to the house (they were cut down by the Americans), and the placita—the court there, señor, where you see the ruins of a fountain—was planted with flowers and tropical trees. Don Federico's servants made a village of themselves! At night, they say, when the moon shone, he would sit with his young wife under the arched porch yonder and watch the people dancing to the music of guitars and castanets. But his wife ran away with an Englishman, and Don Federico became suddenly an old man, and so morose that all his people feared him. You have heard the story?"

"No," answered Severson. "Let's go inside while you tell it."

"My great-grandfather's wife was very beautiful," continued Miramonte, as they walked across the neglected court, "not beautiful like our Spanish women, but with shining red hair and a white skin and soft brown eyes. He brought her with him when he came to this country, and no one knows the land of her nativity.

"He built this house for her and filled it with beautiful things—carpets from Persia (Don Federico had been a great traveller) and pictures and curtains and furniture from everywhere. He worshipped her instead of the Virgin. There was nothing he would not do for her. They were famous for their hospitality—you have heard of the hospitality of the Miramontes?—si?—and travellers never asked shelter there in vain.

"But one day Don Federico found his wife in the arms of an Englishman, who was their guest. Why he did not kill them both I do not understand. The servant heard her screams and prayers for mercy. That night the faithless woman disappeared with her lover, and Don Federico made no search for them. He forbade the mention of her name. He became a recluse, a cynic, a miser, and for thirty years he lived alone, ruling his people like a king, hoarding his money and growing richer every year. And then, as suddenly as he had retired from the world he entered it again. It was his purpose to marry, to provide heirs to his wealth——"

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

"But—the wife?" interrupted Severson.

Miramonte rolled another cigarette. "She disappeared with her lover," he repeated, "the night after her perfidy was discovered, and they were never heard of again. Don Federico made no effort to find them. He wished to forget her. He spoke of her but once. When he asked my great-grandmother's hand in marriage he told her that he had learned from an authentic source that his first wife was dead. Fate! He could have chosen any maiden in this country, for his wealth was great, and my great-grandmother was regarded as the most fortunate of women. She, too, came of pure Castilian blood, señor," and Miramonte looked up, with a gesture of pride. "It is good that the other wife bore no children. The Miramontes are without a taint.

"But, once wedded, Don Federico again withdrew from the world. A sad life she led—my great-grandmother. She bore him sons and daughters, and they all feared him more than they feared God or the devil. He seemed to care only to get money—to hoard it and hide it away. To this day people believe that there is money hidden in these ruins. You are amused, señor? You laugh?"

"Every ruin is said to conceal a treasure, you know," said Severson sceptically.

"Vaya!" replied the Spaniard, with apparent indifference. "Believe it or not, as you will; but searches have been made and money has been found—no matter! Don Federico lived to be ninety years old, and his wife was his slave, and his children were afraid to speak aloud in his presence. He had grandchildren, too—a sturdy brood. Strange that I alone am left! He would not permit them to learn the English language or recognise one who spoke it.

"You see, señor, I speak English with much care. I learnt it of necessity a few years ago. We Miramontes are born with a hatred of the English people and tongue. Don Federico would let no stranger cross his threshold, for he had no faith in women, and my great-grandmother dared never to speak to any man but her husband and the priest. Well, he died at last, and his heirs quarrelled among themselves, and in the end the place was sold to settle the dispute. And so it happened, señor, that this immense estate, which should now be mine, passed into the possession of aliens, and this house, which was built to shelter Don Federico's descendants for centuries, now stands empty and in ruins."

Severson, with his arms behind him, paced slowly through the deserted rooms. The walls were immensely thick. Each window made an alcove. The ceiling was broken where the roof had leaked, and the heavy tiles had fallen through; and patches of sky were visible here and there.

"Of course the place is haunted?" Severson queried, with a smile; "these old houses are always tenanted by ghosts."

Miramonte smoked vehemently for a moment. "The señor does not believe in ghosts?" he asked in non-committal tones.

"Well, hardly," answered Severson emphatically; "still I'd like to. It would make life intensely interesting. Do you?"

"Who can tell?" murmured the Spaniard, shrugging his shoulders; "I could tell you of things——" and he said nothing more. Severson extended his explorations, noting with growing admiration the immense solidity of the walls. Between two of the inner rooms he found a partition seven feet thick.

"Whew!" he whistled in amazement; "the old don built for all eternity—a seven foot wall!"

He struck it admiringly with his doubled fist, and to his surprise he heard a faint sound like falling mortar.

"Queer," muttered Severson; "it can't be very substantial after all," and he began to search for the defective spot. But, though he examined it on every side, the wall presented an unbroken surface. He struck again, and again he heard the mysterious sound.

"Miramonte!" he called excitedly; "Miramonte Come here!"

"What do you want?" the Spaniard replied, indolently rising from his seat on the floor in the farther room.

"Come here!" shouted Severson; "quick! I've made a discovery. This wall is hollow!"

Miramonte leapt to join him—not indolent now—his yellow face suffused, his eyes aflame.

"The money!" were his first words. "Vive Dios! the hidden money!"

Severson nodded affirmatively, and gave the wall another blow. "Listen, Miramonte," he said; "don't your hear the mortar falling inside? I tell you this wall is hollow. How shall we make a hole?"

Miramonte stood transfixed. "I hear, I hear," he murmured, in ecstasy, as if he were listening to celestial music. "Now—now, at last it will be found. I shall be rich once more."

"Think," urged Severson impatiently, "how to get inside. We have no tools."

"The roof!" cried the Spaniard. "My knife!—with my knife I can make an opening through the roof."

Instantly the two men ran out into the placita. Severson stopped to study the roof and fix in his mind the location of the inner room; but Miramonte, carrying his unsheathed hunting knife in his hand and trembling with eagerness, began at once to clamber over the fallen and mouldering outer walls.

"Be careful," cautioned Severson, "you'll break through the roof. The tiles are heavy; the beams are old and rotten. Be careful!" But the Spaniard scarcely seemed to hear.

Kneeling now upon the uneven roof he flung the loose tiles aside, and when Severson joined him he was hacking the tiles and rending the thongs that bound them together. Severson could hear him reiterating in Spanish while he worked: "The money—at last—the money!"

Soon a hole was made two feet in diameter. Miramonte thrust in his head till his shoulders rested upon the roof. Severson saw his body shake and heard him utter a hideous oath. "It is dark! I cannot see!" he cried aloud in a fury. "We must make the hole larger!" and he fell madly to work again.

At last the opening was four feet long. Miramonte's hands were bleeding; his face was smeared with perspiration and dirt. His eyes shone like smouldering coals. The dust which had accumulated for a century on the roof swirled in a cloud about them, and it was impossible to discern anything below. But gradually the dust settled, and slowly—how slowly! the air cleared, and the two men, kneeling on the verge of the opening they had made, gazed down into the apartment beneath them.

The Spaniard's face became ashen under its grime.

Digitized by Google

His eyes were glassy and dull. "Virgin Santissima!" he whispered, slowly making the sign of the cross. "Mother of God! what do I see? Dos Esqueletos!"

Below them, in a narrow chamber—a mere cell, not four feet wide, without windows or doors—on a floor paved with square brick tiles, lay two skeletons, the skulls resting close together.

Looping his lariat round a rafter which crossed a hole in the roof, Severson lowered himself into the cell. Graven in Spanish upon a tablet in the wall, he read this legend:

"Here, shut in a living tomb, with her lover, is Don Federico Miramonte's faithless wife. Accursed be her soul."

LE VIER.

AN OYSTER SUPPER.

"WHEN I married I was a sort of Traddles; only I wasn't so heavily handicapped as Traddles, you see; for Cynthia had no sisters. My wife's a fine woman still, as you know; but when I married Cynthia, she was exceptionally pretty. It was rather a nuisance, because she was so good-looking that people used to turn round and stare at her, which always put the poor girl out of countenance. She certainly did her best not to attract attention; for we were horribly poor, and we had to be desperately economical in the matter of dress and in everything else. Why, many a time and oft has Cynthia cooked our little makeshift dinner of a couple of chops, or something equally economical, and cooked them well, too; there's no false pride about Mrs. Latitat."

Thus Latitat, Q.C., to me, as we sat in his handsome dining-room in Eaton Square. "I hate being under an obligation to a fellow," he continued; "but I've been under an obligation to a man for well-nigh twenty years. I borrowed money of him, you see," he added with a laugh, "and I wasn't able to get out of the debt till last week."

"I wonder how many times you've told me that you never borrowed a five-pound note in your life, Latitat," I said.

"Oh, I didn't borrow a five-pound note; the man obliged me under very peculiar circumstances, and from the night he came to my assistance till last week I have never set eyes upon him.

"We were living in Tarfield Court, fourth floor, and Sparkler Jones had given me two stalls for the Olympic. Poor old Sparkler! He was at the height of his success as a dramatic author. They didn't pay dramatic authors then as they do now; but he was doing very well indeed, and he admired Cynthia very much—in a respectful sort of way, of course—and gave us more seats than we knew what to do with. Cabs were a terrible item to us in those days, you know. But it wasn't a sine quâ non at that time to wear evening dress when you sat in the stalls. That's what I liked stalls for then. It enabled one to walk home.

"I took Cynthia to the Olympic, and we saw a burlesque of Jones's—The Vampire Re-vamped, I think it was called—and Glumper, the low comedian, played the Vampire, and sang a song with a chorus of 'I must have blood or I'll bust'; we both laughed till we cried. I don't suppose we should either of us laugh now at The Vampire Re-vamped — twenty years makes a wonderful difference. Well, we walked down the Strand after the play, for we were both hungry, and I had promised Cynthia an oyster supper. It was a tremendous piece of extravagance for me then; but oysters were only ninepence a dozen, and we were both desperately fond of them; so we went to R——'s in Maiden Lane, and we sat down in one of the boxes, and we ordered our oysters and our brown bread-and-butter and our stout. There was rather a flashily-dressed man supping at the box opposite to us. There he sat swallowing his oysters, with which he drank the most expensive Chablis they'd got in the place. I don't myself approve of Chablis with oysters—I prefer stout—and in those days I had to prefer stout."

"Well, we'd got through our modest four dozen, we had eaten our brown bread-and-butter, we had finished our stout. 'Waiter,' I said, 'what do we owe?'

"'Three-and-two,' replied the waiter.

"I felt in my pocket. Not a penny-piece.

"'Lend me your purse, my dear,' I said to my wife. She hadn't brought it with her.

"The waiter was a greasy and offensive-looking ruffian, and he grinned sarcastically. Of course, I had to eat humble pie.

"'I'm very sorry, waiter,' I said; 'I've left my purse at home. There is my card. I'll look round and settle in the morning, and you shall have a shilling for yourself.'

"'I knowed it,' said the waiter; 'I twigged ye when I saw ye come in. We've lots of customers like you. You'd better leave yer watch,' he added drily, 'and you can look round and settle in the morning,' he went on insolently, echoing my phrase.

"I was so angry I could have thrashed the fellow within an inch of his life; but there was nothing for it but to do as he suggested. I put my hand to my pocket; my watch was gone!

"I was dumfounded. I explained matters to the waiter. He got between me and the door at once.

"'You don't leave this place until you've settled, guv'nor,' he said brutally; he said a great deal more which I'll not repeat. I couldn't resent it, you know, and I thought my poor little Cynthia would have died of shame.

"Then the over-dressed man in the opposite box came to our assistance.

"'You infernal rascal,' he cried, addressing the waiter; 'what do you mean by insulting the gentleman?

Digitized by Google

I've half a mind to break every bone in your body;' and he looked as if he could do it too. Then he pulled out a fat pocket-book. 'Take it out of that, you scoundrel,' he said, producing a ten-pound note, 'and look alive with the change. Take my supper out of it, too; and let me tell you, you scamp, that you've lost a customer. You'll never see my face again.'

"The waiter departed, and then the over-dressed man began to sympathise, and Cynthia thanked him through her tears. I thanked him, too; and, of course, I insisted on giving him my card."

Then Mr. Latitat fumbled in his waistcoat pocket, and produced the identical card.

"At one time," said Latitat, "I did a fair amount of criminal business. I was very glad indeed when I drifted out of it and into commercial cases, which, of course paid very much better. I wasn't half so much before the general public; all you saw of me in the newspapers, as a rule, was 'with him Mr. Latitat,' whereas in my early days there would be a long account, and often a verbatim report of 'the impassioned speech for the prisoner.' But the prisoner was very seldom indeed good for more than three guineas, and the shady attorneys, who were the favourite thieves' lawyers in those days, were very bad paymasters, who generally took long credit, and often never settled at all. But there was any amount of glory; whereas in the heavy commercial cases, 'with him Mr. Latitat' generally meant a fifty-guinea brief at the very least.

"I was breakfasting the other morning, when my man came in and said a person of the name of Pouter wished to see me, and that he would take no denial. I went to my study and saw the person of the name of Pouter. I had never seen Mr. Pouter before, but directly he opened his mouth I knew that he was a fourth-rate solicitor.

"'I've called to ask you to come down to-day to the Central Criminal, sir, to defend an unfortunate client of mine. I went to your chambers first, sir—indeed I did,' said Mr. Pouter.

"I got up at once. 'My good sir,' I said, 'I don't accept briefs on the criminal side any longer; and this visit is exceedingly irregular,' I added.

"'I told him so,' replied Mr. Pouter; 'I told him it was no use, but he insisted that you would come down, and he said that I was to give you this, sir; and he told me that I was just to say, "Oysters," which, I conclude, is a sort of sign or token.'

"Then he handed me this old card of mine: Mr. John Latitat, 2, Tanfield Court, Temple. My first chambers' Oysters? Oysters?

"'My client said,' began Mr. Pouter, with an oily smile, 'that he had had the pleasure of entertaining you and Mrs. Latitat at an oyster supper.'

"Then it came back to me in an instant. 'Sit down,' I said, 'who is your client?'

"'Party of the name of Quelch, alias Wheable. Been "in trouble" before; accused of "smashing."'

"I may tell you that 'smashing' means the passing of bad money. I accepted the brief Mr. Pouter handed to me; it was a three-guinea brief. My clerk would have turned up his nose at anything marked under twenty.

"I went down to the Central Criminal Court. A friend of mine was trying the coining cases as Commissioner in the Second Court. You don't often see a Q.C. in the Second Court at the Old Bailey. I and Gasper, Q.C., who was on the Bench trying these Mint cases, were the only silk gowns present. There was a crowd of the usual hacks and 'soupmen.' They all stared at me in astonishment. I found that Waggle, who gets his living mostly as a journalist, was retained with me for form's sake; a Q.C. cannot go into Court, you know, without a learned junior.

"I had read my brief in the cab. They work off an ordinary coining case, as a rule, in about a quarter of an hour. At ten minutes to one the Queen versus Quelch was called, and my client, a dreadfully shabby old man, was put to the bar. As he entered the dock he greeted me with a grateful wink.

"I got the man off on a technical point. They found him not guilty, and my friend Gasper, from the bench, said he hoped it would be a warning to him. Mr. Quelch walked out of the dock a free man.

"As I emerged into the Old Bailey I saw the poor old creature waiting for me on the pavement.

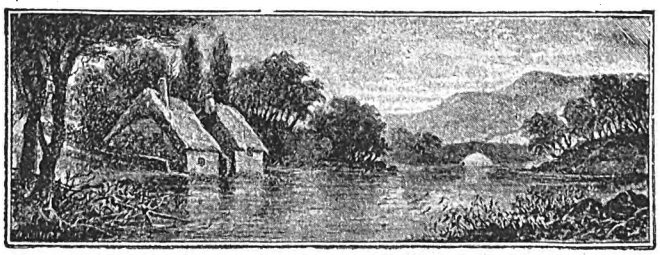
"'You did the bloomin' trick, guv'nor,' he said in a voice hoarse with gratitude and drink. 'It ain't the fust time as I have been in trouble, sir; but I hadn't got a mag to call my own to pay a counseller.'

"He was a dreadful-looking old man, aged before his time with vice and crime. I offered him a sovereign, and I thanked him for his kindness of twenty years ago. He waved the sovereign off.

"'Bless ye, guv'nor,' he said, 'I couldn't take it,' and then he winked knowingly. 'Do you know, guv'nor,' he said with a pleased air, 'that ten quid flimsy you helped me to pass at the oyster-shop was a duffer, too.'

"Then he gave me a patronising nod and disappeared into the crowd."

Ethel Dicey.



Digitized by Google

THE MUFF OF THE REGIMENT.

"The new sub's arrived."

"Ah! What kind of a sort of a Johnnie is he?"

"Delicate, very delicate, and refined, quite refined. Doesn't smoke, doesn't drink—further particulars about himself when he's reported safe arrival to his 'mater.'"

"Oh, he's that sort, is he? Poor beggar!"

"You may well say that, Chilcott. The Royal Raspers have got a pretty fair record inscribed on their ragged colours, but their pre-eminent characteristic is rowdiness, and it's generally conceded to be the roughest regiment in the line for a youngster."

Foremost among Tibbits' tormentors was a certain Trafford Daunt, the senior lieutenant of his company. Daunt never lost an opportunity of "scoring off" him at mess, on parade, or elsewhere.

"Confound it, old chap," said Chilcott, one day, "you ought not to lead that poor little chap quite such a life. You are so remarkably down on him. It's hard lines on him. You are taking it out of poor Tibbits with a vengeance. What makes me so sorry for him is that he's a good-natured little chap. When I asked him why he didn't chuck your bull terrier out of his bedroom window he said it might hurt your feelings."

"My feelings!" shrieked Daunt. "Why the pup would have eaten him—slippers and all. Well, that beats cockfighting!"

At last an event occurred which led to a temporary cessation of the sub-lieutenant's troubles. But the interest in him somewhat revived when, with the Raspers aboard, the huge "trooper" glided like a grey spectre down the Solent, for Tibbits succumbed to mal de mer before the Horseshoe and Spit Forts had been passed.

"Bad, Tibby, old man?" asked Sub-Lieutenant Chilcott, as he laid a kindly hand on the shoulder of the inert heap of pallid humanity.

"I'm dreadfully bad, Chilcott. I—I say—if anything should happen you wouldn't mind sending my gold watch home to the mater. It was—was my dad's."

"Stuff! You'll be all right directly; try a brandy and soda—or, better still, eat an apple."

"Now, is that one of those jokes?" smiled Tibbits feebly.

"No, really," said the good-natured Chilcott.

"Don't you believe Chilly," shouted Daunt, joining them. "Look here, Tib, old man, ask the steward to fry you a pork chop, or some sausages, or try a few sardines -ha, ha, ha!" for the wretched Tibbits had risen and staggered out of sight.

* * * * * * *

Great was the elation of the Royal Raspers when within three months of their landing on the bank of the Hoogly they received orders to join an expedition proceeding up country for the purpose of "restoring order" in certain villages where an indiscreet Commissioner and a fanatical priest, in their endeavours to thwart each other, had between them managed to stir up a mutiny in miniature.

And the joy of the Raspers knew no bounds when, on reaching the disturbed area they found they were not "too late for the ball," that in all probability the warmest of the work was yet to come.

At last after a series of long and arduous forced marches the brigade, of which the Raspers formed the right wing, came upon the rebel stronghold, a well-fortified camp on the edges of an arid plain.

The enemy stubbornly refused to yield to the blandishments of the brigade, and "have it out" in the open, and for a time Gatlings and Maxim Nordenfeldts plied their rattling belch in vain upon the earthworks and bastions from behind which the rebels poured a fire that compelled the attackers to keep at a distance.

At last the Brigadier determined on a ruse. Orders were given for a feigned attack, and presently a "galloper" dashed up to order the Raspers to send forward two companies in open order.

Like slipped greyhounds they leapt from their cover and dashed forward, extending as they went till at last they formed a long skirmishing line, advancing, flopping, and firing, advancing, flopping, and firing, advancing again, and so on, till they were within some four hundred yards of the earthworks.

It was then that the rebels took the old soldier's bait. Out from the entrenchments streamed a powerful sortie bent on sweeping the thin line of skirmishers off the plain. Quickly the bugle pealed out a recall, and the Raspers stubbornly retired towards their base, turning, and kneeling at every sixth pace to take shots.

Meantime, the left wing of the attacking force was wheeling into position for a flank attack, but so hotly did the rebel sortie press forward that the captains of the two companies of Raspers, drawing their swords, held them aloft, and gave the word to rally.

Instantly the skirmishers rushed back and grouped themselves with fixed bayonets around their officers, who gave the command for independent firing.

"Hullo!" cried Chilcott, looking across the plain, "Daunt's hit—he's down! Poor beggar, it'll be all up with him if we're not reinforced. Steady, lads, give it 'em hot. By Jove! who's that helping Daunt along, and hoisting him on his back? By Jove! it's Tibby! Come on, Tibby, sharp! Just in time. Ah!"

For just as the huddled ranks opened to let in Tibbits staggering under his burden, the Muff of the regiment fell prone upon his face with a bullet between his ribs.

They dragged the two wounded men within the chevaux de frise, and a great cheer went up as from the left and the rear reinforcements swept up, and the rebels, perceiving the trap, turned and scuttled like rabbits for their burrows.

An hour later the officers of the Royal Raspers gathered round a prostrate form. It was Tibbits. Daunt, his leg in splints, held one hand, Chilcott the other.

"How is it now, old chap?" asked the latter, bending over the fast paling face.

Slowly on the silence came the feeble whisper:

"It's bad—in one way, but it's all right. I'm done for."

"Oh Heavens!" groaned Daunt with the first tears in his eyes those there had ever seen. "And for me—who was such a brute to you."

"No, no." With waning strength Tibbits pressed his comrade's hand. "I always knew—it was only—fun. I loved all you fellows—Chilly, send my watch to the mater—tell her——"

* * * * * * *

Yes. When Chilcott placed in the gentle lady's hand the watch dented by her son's death bullet, he told her how the Raspers with one voice confessed that they had lost in her boy one of the noblest hearts that ever beat beneath their war-worn colours.

Henry Johnson.

Digitized by Google

When the Birds Begin to Sing

By Winifred Graham. Author of "Through the Valley," "Six First-Class Passengers," etc.

CHAPTER I.

And when Love Speaks.

She was certainly very pretty, and just then she looked prettier than usual, for the sharp run had brought a more vivid colour to the cheek, and an added sparkle to the eye. She was laughing, too—the rogue—as well she might, for had she not brought her right hand swiftly down upon his left ear when he had chased her, caught her, and deliberately and maliciously kissed her, and did he not now look red and foolish, and apparently repentant?

"Come and play wif us."

But let me start from the beginning, and tell you how it all came about.

* * * * * * *

Eleanor, the daughter of a neighbouring farmer, is as fresh and beautiful in the eyes of Philip Roche as the field flowers whose heads fall fading beneath his tread while he follows her through the long grass. He has watched her playing with the innocent school children—little more than a child herself—and then, with the calm assurance that to him is second nature, joins the merry throng unasked. The children greet him eagerly, after scrambling for a handful of silver from the stranger's pocket, for is it not the great, grand treat of all the year?

"Come and play wif us," lisps a little maiden of five summers, whom Philip tosses on to his shoulder with good-natured ease. He has a way of winning the confidence of children.

"What is the game?"

"Kiss in the ring!" cries a small boyish voice at his elbow.

The stranger's eyes twinkle as he watches the lovely unknown Eleanor arranging a circle. Placing his tiny friend again on her feet, and taking her brother's grimy hand, Philip Roche joins the hilarious pastime.

Eleanor glances across the ring well-pleasedly, guessing that her dainty figure and deep-fringed eyes have attracted him thither.

A moment later she trips lightly round the chain of children, her heart beating higher as her feet approach the man's tall figure. Shall she? Shall she? No time to consider, as the handkerchief falls from her hand upon Philip's shoulder.

Quick as lightning she flies away—faster—faster—through the buttercups, while he pursues, nearer—nearer—and then the strong arms arrest her career, and the inevitable kiss occurs.

Eleanor, her cheeks aflame, frees

Digitized by Google

Faster—faster—through the buttercups.

herself from his audacious caress, and half laughing, half indignant, walks hastily away. But after their unconventional introduction Philip is not easily to be foiled.

"You are offended," he cries penitently. "It was only the game; won't you forgive me, Miss——?"

"Grebby," raising her eyes and pausing. "Eleanor Grebby," she continues with a prim little air that is quite unnatural, then laughing spontaneously:

"You see, I was rather taken aback at first, Mr.——"

"Roche—Philip Roche, at your service."

"So now we know each other," holding out her hand.

He grasps it eagerly—such a warm little slim hand!

"It was rather a nice introduction, wasn't it?"

Philip thinks how amazingly pretty Eleanor is, as she assents with deepening colour.

"There! I knew it would come!" she cries, with a thought for her new poppy-bedizened hat.

"What?" asks Philip, still feasting his eyes on the girl's fair physique, and unobservant of the gathering darkness overhead.

"Why, the rain, of course. We shall get wet."

"Only a summer shower."

"Yes, but as disastrous in its effects as any other downpour. I shall make for that barn in the next field; the children have all mysteriously vanished."

"I am dreadfully afraid of the wet," declares Philip, pretending to shiver. "May I accompany you?"

He is still retaining her hand as they run together towards the haven of shelter.

"How nice of it to rain!" he gasps, applauding the accommodating skies. "Let me make you comfortable," heaping together a pile of hay for her to sit upon. "Now tell me all about yourself."

Eleanor sinks down on the soft couch, looking somewhat wistfully through the open door of the barn.

"I am easily explained. I live here always. My father is a farmer, and I feed the chickens, dust the house, and teach in the Sunday-school. Only fancy what an exciting life, Mr. Roche. Doesn't it take your breath away?"

At the thought of her own humdrum existence Eleanor laughs again with a return of that superabundant vitality which is hers by nature.

"Then once or perhaps twice a year I am invited to tea at the Vicarage, and I sit up straight in a high-backed chair and say 'Yes' and 'No' when I am spoken to, and answer prettily—like a schoolgirl. The vicar's wife would have a fit if I lounged like this," flinging herself back with an air of abandon on the hay. "Once she asked me to sing (I play the harmonium in church). My cousin Joe had brought me a comic song from town, and I couldn't help for the life of me getting up and giving her a verse.

"Of course it was wrong, and she looked frightfully shocked. I have certainly never been invited to tea since. Oh, how I should like to sing at concerts and halls—I mean the sort of places where you have an eyeglass, and walk round with a hat and stick!"

Her face beamed as she delivered this sentence—involuntarily the little hands clasped themselves together in excitement.

"Be thankful that such an ambition is ungratified," declares Philip, speaking seriously for the first time. "You do not know the fate that you are coveting. Rest contented, child, to remain your own sweet self. Your country life is ideal compared with—that!"

Eleanor shakes her head.

"It doesn't seem like it," she declares.

"No; I dare say not. Duty is sometimes heroism in its noblest form."

"Then are all the people wicked that go to London, and sing, act, and enjoy themselves?"

"Indeed I trust not. We should have a pretty bad time of it if they were. Yet I don't know that you're far wrong. Few are guileless. But why talk of it? Time enough to warn you of the pitfalls when you are on your road to the great city."

"What is your life?" asks Eleanor curiously, drawing the long ends of hay through her teeth with a meditative smile.

"Scarcely less monotonous than yours, Miss Grebby"—an amused look in his eyes. "Instead of feeding chickens I feed my friends—lunches, dinners, midnight suppers—all of which pall terribly after a time. Instead of dusting my

Eleanor sinks down on the soft couch.

Digitized by Google

house I leave it to accumulate dust, while I wander abroad. A home is a dull place for one man."

"You have no wife or mother?"

"No."

"But you must have lots of money. Why, only think of all the silver you threw to the children this afternoon! I do not believe they had ever seen so many shillings and sixpences before."

"Money will not buy a mother or——" He was going to say "a wife," but checked himself. Philip Roche was an accurate man.

"Poor Mr. Roche, it must be very lonely," says Eleanor, with genuine sympathy in her tone.

He smiles enigmatically. It is strange to him to be pitied by the little farmer's daughter when so many have envied his happy-go-lucky existence ere now.

"The rain clouds are dispersing," he murmurs, as a stray ray of sunlight wanders through the barn door to mingle its glory with Eleanor's hair. How gold those tender silken threads appear under its burnishing hand!

"What a pity! It has been such a refreshing shower!"

"I feel quite young again," he declares, "young enough to play with the children for hours. What do you say to kiss in the ring again?"

He presses her hand gently.

She lifts her eyes to his with a slow shake of her head.

"There is the vicar's wife to be considered."

"Good gracious!" he laughs. "You don't mean I should have to kiss her?"

Eleanor's face dimples all over in delightful smiles.

"What an absurd idea!" she gasps gleefully. "I should just like to see you!"

"I don't think it has quite stopped," murmurs Philip, holding up his hands to the sky, and pretending the drops from the barn are rain themselves.

"How silly you are!" cries Eleanor mockingly, gathering up her skirts and revealing a well-turned ankle. "But, oh, isn't the grass soaking?" as Philip takes her arm and guides her to a narrow path. "The children will ruin their boots, and all go home with colds. Look, they are tearing about like mad things. How they will sleep to-night!"

"I wonder what will become of them all in the years to follow, and why they have any existence whatsoever beneath the glimpses of the moon?"

"One will reap," replies Eleanor wisely, "and another will sow. Some may slay oxen and wring the fowls' necks, and perhaps for all we know murder each other. It is a horrible thought, isn't it? They look so thoroughly innocent, these country children. Do you see that little boy crying because he was knocked down in the three-legged steeplechase. His life race is only just beginning. His father is in gaol for theft, his mother incurable in a Samaritan infirmary, yet he is only crying because he grazed his knee and did not win a packet of bull's-eyes."

Eleanor's voice is low and expressive as her deep sapphire eyes—fascinating the man by their changeful beauty—one moment light and dancing like the sunbeams in the branches, the next overflowing with pity for a pauper child.

The little ones gather round, clinging to her skirts. She is tender and kind to all, though her gaze rests chiefly on the tall, sunburnt stranger making himself popular with the youngsters in her class.

"Look, teacher," cries the same wee maiden who is responsible for Philip's first appearance in their games. "I won 'er, 'opping along o' Margery in the big race," holding aloft a doll with great staring glass eyes and brilliantly rouged cheeks. "Ain't she beautiful?"

"What will you name her?" asks the Sunday-school teacher sweetly.

"Don't know," sighs the child perplexedly.

"Eleanor," suggests Philip.

"We 'ad a little sister named Eleanor, but she 'adn't got enough blood in her, so she died."

"Then you must call your doll by another name," says Miss Grebby decidedly.

But the small girl shakes her head, and announces with precision:

"I'll call 'er Eleanor!" and marches away well satisfied, to re-open a half-closed wound in her mother's breast.

"I hit on an unfortunate suggestion," whispers Philip, while the ever energetic Miss Grebby initiates him into the mysteries of "Nuts in May," "Poor Mary sits a-weeping," and "I have a little dog."

The soft twilight gradually creeps over this summer world, and the great red sun sinks down in its sea of fire behind the trees.

The birds chirp a good-night song, till their piping is drowned by the hearty cheers of the happy children ringing out stirringly on the still damp air.

"And now—home!" sighs Eleanor, with a little grimace, as Philip bends down to fasten a spray of wild honeysuckle in her belt.

"May I see you back?" he asks eagerly, noting the bright smile that flits across her lips at the suggestion.

"Could you walk a mile?" questions Eleanor in mock astonishment. "I thought London people always drove. The vicar's wife had some friends from South Kensington who were positively lame if they went any distance on foot. They said our country roads were a disgrace—no asphalte, no hansom cabs."

"Come along," murmurs Philip, whose long strides are not easy to keep pace with. They walk more slowly when out of sight. Oh, the delightful dawdle back through the vague shadows of evening in sweetly scented lanes! How merrily she prattles with charming ingenuousness, while he watches her expressive features, a new strange thrill at his heart.

What if on this summer holiday, among the clover and the daisies, he has discovered the one spotless soul of his life—a fresh, unsophisticated creation of Nature's noblest and purest art!

At last they are in sight of the old farmhouse which Eleanor calls home. It is a picturesque spot, and Philip stops admiringly to take in the beauty of the rural scene.

"So you live there in that quiet abode?" he said thoughtfully.

"Yes. I am sorry to-day is over. It has not only been a holiday for the children, but half the village. The labourers are to have a dinner to-night and——"

She paused. The labourers and the children are so far from her mind at this moment.

"I shall see you again," he whispers.

"Where and when?" asks Eleanor, feigning surprise.

"To-morrow in this cornfield on our left. I shall walk past."

"Like Boaz, and Ruth will be gleaning," she replies coyly.

"What will Boaz do?" he murmurs.

Eleanor lowers her eyes, and interlaces her fingers.

"I know," she replies confidently.

In the dim light Philip fancies that Eleanor is weaving some strange witchcraft. He is drawn involuntarily nearer, and snatching her hand detains it a moment in both his. She is more beautiful than ever now in the dim solitude of the deserted road. The simplicity of her daily routine in the country farmhouse appeals to this man of the world, who yearns for something different, something better in his aimless, empty life—aimless because he has no one to work for, empty because there is no one to love.

Eleanor's gentle presence in the gathering gloom quickens his imagination. A picture wonderful and hitherto undreamed rises like a sudden mirage before Philip's eyes.

He seems lost in contemplation.

"I have found her at last," he says, speaking his thoughts aloud.

"Who?" asks Eleanor under her breath.

"The Ideal Woman!" he replies.

The girl looks perplexed—she does not understand the phrase. New Women and rational costumes have not yet penetrated to the depths of Copthorne, so their counterpoising ideal is to her an unknown quantity.

Digitized by Google

Eleanor's ignorance of modernity constitutes a special charm in his eyes. How sweet a privilege to build up this Brightening the pewter dinner service.

uncultured soul, to mould her impressionable spirit! Philip is enamoured of the idea; he sees such vast possibilities stretching out before him. Eleanor differed so widely from the women of his set. Perhaps the weaker sex are made variously that the mind of desultory man, studious of change, and pleased with novelty, may be indulged.

"How long have we known each other?" he asks.

"About three hours," she answers promptly.

"How deep can one go below the surface in one hundred and eighty minutes?"

Eleanor seems bewildered; she is at a loss for words.

"Have I only been with you so short a time?" he says incredulously. "Can it be possible?"

"Does it seem long?" she asks looking down shyly. "Have I wearied you, Mr. Roche?"

His smile reassures her.

"It does not seem long, only full to the brim. To every second a fresh thought, an inch deeper into the unknown."

"I have never met anyone before," she declares frankly, "who spoke to me like that."

Then with a swift "Good-night" Eleanor breaks away and vanishes among the shadows.

"A wife," says Philip to himself, "is something between a hindrance and a help. Is this the turn of the tide?"

A nightingale broke into song. "Yes!" it cried; "yes—yes—yes!"

CHAPTER II.

"Imparadis'd in One Another's Arms."—Milton.

Eleanor is busy in the morning sunlight, brightening the pewter dinner service, the pride of the Grebby family, passed down from generation to generation, and priceless in her eyes. She can hear the preparations without for an early start to the neighbouring market. Her mother is loading a cart of vegetables, while her father "shoos" the cackling geese into wicker pens, and harnesses "Black Bess," the steady old mare, who is almost one of themselves. And Eleanor is glad that the market (a weekly centre of attraction to the whole village) will leave her in peaceful solitude.

She breaks out into a glad song, which mingles with the twittering of birds.

"There was a jolly miller once, Lived on the river Dee."

"Eleanor, Eleanor, give me a hand with these vegetables," cries her mother's voice. There is a thud, and a whole sack of potatoes fall pell-mell into the yard, still muddy from yesterday's rain.

Eleanor gathers them up, indulging the same tuneful mood.

"He worked and sang from morn till night,
No lark more blithe than he!"

She has a strong, sweet-toned voice, and "Black Bess" turns her head sleepily at the sound, whisking the tiresome flies with her tail. So often Eleanor's tread at the door of her shed has meant apples and carrots and sugar.

She wipes the potatoes clean with her apron, replacing them carefully at the back of the cart.

Mrs. Grebby takes the reins, while Mr. Grebby follows on foot, driving a few specially honoured sheep, who frequently serve him for conversation throughout an entire evening spent smoking with neighbouring farmers.

Eleanor watches them out of sight, her hand over her brow to shade the dazzling sunlight from her eyes. A group of chickens congregate around her with mute inquiry in their beaky faces. She fetches a handful of grain from the barn, flings it into their midst, and returns singing to her pewter polishing.

"And this the burden of his song
For ever used to be:

"How dull this soup tureen is, to be sure!" pausing in the verse to rub it with extra vigour.

"I care for nobody, no not I,
If no one cares for me!"

The delinquencies of the dimmed soup tureen are forgotten as these last words ring out in the quiet parlour. "Surely," thinks Eleanor, "there is hidden pathos in the Jolly Miller of Dee's reckless assertion! To care for nobody! What a horrible thought—a whole life's tragedy lies in the closing verse. If no one cares for me!"

Eleanor sighs and leans her chin on her hands, kneeling before the wooden table on which the dinner service is spread. What if nobody cared for her! How vast and miserable a wilderness this world would be! Why, even the dumb animals love her.

The little goat she called Nelly, who fell ill the week before, and gasped out its breath in her arms on a dry heap of hay, gave all the love of its disputed soul to Eleanor. Of course, it had a soul; she made up her mind long ago on this point. How can a creature with such mysteriously human eyes as Nelly possessed be less human than the great plodding, loose-mouthed ploughboy, who only gapes when he is spoken to, and contains what Mr. Grebby is pleased to call, "only half a intellec'!"

Eleanor glances at the old-fashioned clock in the corner, decorated by grotesque pottery dogs and four-legged creatures with horns, and faces resembling tigers or cats. She has been up since five, for besides market day it is churning morning, and she and her mother have worked for hours in the dairy. The rattle of traps on their way to the village with goods to sell still can be heard without. One old man cries as he goes along for the benefit of the chaise behind him:

"Greengages, penny a pound,
All the year round!"

Eleanor laughs, leans out of the window, shaking her fist at him.

"What an absurd old man!"

"Bring me ten pounds on the 1st of January," she cries. The old man grins to himself as his pony breaks into a slow trot, carrying his master out of earshot.

Then Eleanor glances again at the fleeting moments.

Digitized by Google

Glancing at her reflection in a cracked glass.

Tick! tick! tick! How slowly the hand of the clock moves round.

"It is time," she says at last, washing her small hands under the scullery tap, and reaching for a hat hanging on the kitchen dresser.

"I wish I had something pretty to wear," she sighs, glancing at her reflection in a cracked glass. "Laces and ribbons, beautiful blue ribbons with pink spots, like the Squire's nieces wore last Sunday. The tall girl was dreadfully plain, and I should have looked so well in her silk gown, with the shorter sister's chiffon fichu."

Eleanor's face brightens at the recollection of those costumes in the Manor House pew, which appeared so lovely in her eyes while she played the Magnificat. Dreams of dainty dresses are as dear to her heart as the occasional thoughts of love which steal over her at times. "If the two could be combined," she thinks, "love and wealth."

It is amazing, this new and sudden desire for something better, which all but stops the beating of Eleanor's heart.

"If he loved me," she gasps, "if—" she staggers back against the half-closed door, her fingers clenched and pressed to her temples, throbbing with intense excitement. All the thoughts that crowd to her brain are offsprings of that improbable "if," each moment growing more dazzling!

She hastens with light footsteps to an old cupboard in which her mother has treasured some hand-made lace left in her aunt's will to the Grebbys of Copthorne Farm.

She turns down her collar to reveal a shapely throat, pearly white, and hidden usually from the sun's scorching power, round which the soft folds of lace fall entrancingly.

What would Eleanor's mother say could she see her precious heirloom donned hastily on this busy market morning, to adorn her daughter's neck for a stroll through the fields! It is sacrilege surely, but the prize!

The girl closes the cupboard noiselessly, creeping away like a criminal out into the glaring day. Her eyes dance, her cheeks are flushed, and her hair escaping (as if by accident) from its neat braids, waves in dainty tendrils round her ears.

"I am beautiful," she murmurs to herself, "why not? Stranger things have happened—Eleanor Roche, the wife of a rich man—oh!"

The last is a gasp of hitherto unexpressed surprise at the audacity of her day dreams.

Philip is waiting by the barley field, watching for her. As she sees him she slackens her steps, not wishing to appear over anxious for the rendezvous. He advances eagerly, grasps her hands, and devours her with his eyes.

"So we meet again, Eleanor," he whispers. "I must call you Eleanor; you don't mind?"

A bold answer that inwardly makes her tremble enters the girl's head. Why not place herself on an equality with him at once? She nerves herself to reply:

"Not if I may call you Philip?"

A look of amused surprise flits over Mr. Roche's features. What a naïve, childlike manner Eleanor possesses!

"Of course," he replies, pulling the small hand through his arm, and turning out of the public thoroughfare.

"Come where the honeysuckle grows," he says softly, "and let us talk."

"I wonder what you think of me?" asks Eleanor unhesitatingly.

The great sparkling eyes are raised to his with genuine curiosity in their depths. She is not seeking a compliment; far from it, she really wants to know, and is waiting for the truth.

He looks from the blue eyes of the girl to the little blue bird's-eye growing on a bank of clover. She pauses while he stoops to gather the tiny flower.

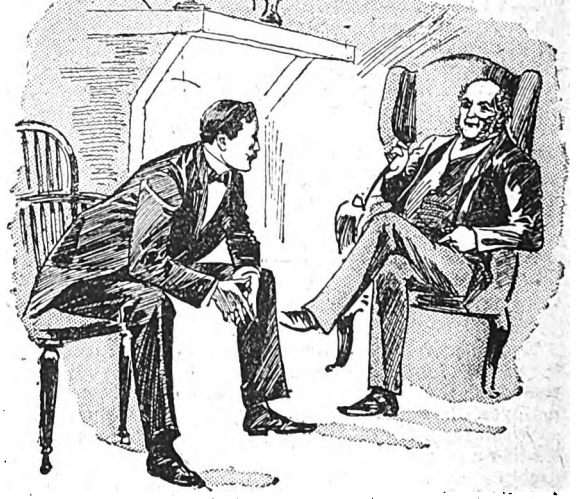
"You see this," he says.

"Yes."

"It is only a field blossom blooming unnoticed in this sweet country atmosphere, yet to me a thousand times fairer than the exotics and hot-house plants which naturally demand admiration. I love this little flower," pressing the tender blue to his lips, "because it is wild and untrained. It appeals to me. It is like you, Eleanor!"

A flush of offence rises to her cheeks.

"Wild!" "Untrained!" the words sting Miss Grebby's pride.



Discussing the crops and the weather with her father.

Digitized by Google

"I did not think you would compare me to a weed!" she retorts, tossing her head proudly.

But Philip will not see he has offended, and continues in the same strain.

"Don't despise the weeds, Eleanor, they were placed in their uncultivated beds by Nature's hand, and have as much right to be called beautiful as any other creation."

He speaks to her authoritatively, and she looks at his strong, masterful expression with a gradual sense of awe.

"I should not have thought you would care for flowers."

"Why not? Does it seem childish in your eyes to soliloquise over a wayside 'weed,' as you call it?"

His questions perplex her. She is silent.

"You do not appreciate your beautiful country," he continues, "from living in it always. Wait till you have tasted the deadly dust of the town before you curl your lip at a blue bird's-eye, or pass judgment on the unbroken quiet of sinless Copthorne. Since I came here for rest and holiday leisure I seem to have grasped the whole history and charm of the place. It contains endless interest in its Godlike simplicity to the recluse or the reader. Look what fields for the naturalist or botanist! Think, too, of an artist here for the first time—what sketches to be made at sunrise and sunset! You may call your little world dull, monotonous, uneventful, since reared in the green landscape with farmlands and woods around you are bound through custom to neglect the pleasures of imagination, and see it only without observing."

"I am glad you are so enthusiastic over Copthorne," replies Eleanor, catching at the meadow-sweet, and crumbling it between her fingers. "I suppose you have been living a very different life in London?"

"It is a great change," he replies, "from the bustle of fashion to the unbroken quiet. But I must own I didn't enjoy so completely all the beauty of this glad country scene till you came, Eleanor, happy in the rich possession of youth and lightheartedness."

Now his conversation grows interesting, the perfect smile with which she is naturally blessed creeps through her lips to her eyes, illuminating her whole countenance. In the distance the regular click of a reaping machine falls on the breeze.

"You must see more of our life," she says impetuously. "Next week all our labourers will be reaping, and our barns are ready for the first loads of harvest. Do not go till it is gathered in!"

"Shall I promise? Would it give you pleasure?"

"Yes."

A pause, during which an old horse puts his nose over the gate of an adjacent field, regarding Philip and Eleanor complacently.

"Then it's a bargain! If you will be pleased, I will stay; but not unless."

A little gasp escapes her lips.

"Can you doubt it, Philip?" she murmurs.

He is satisfied by the earnest tone, gratified by her humility and undisguised devotion.

"Would you like to see my home?" she asks, for their steps are nearing the quaint farmhouse.

"Indeed, I should."

She takes him from the sloping cornfield, topped by a windmill, to where the path joins a kitchen garden—a perfect holiday ground for bees. The vegetables seem in perfect harmony with yellow marigolds and calceolaria. The house is divided from the road by palings richly covered by virginia creepers, and as they approach Philip pauses to lean on the wicker gate and view the peaceful homestead silently. The drone of bees and busy presence of insect toil is soothing and melodious. He takes Eleanor's hand and kisses it in the full glare of the mid-day sun under the heavily laden fruit trees. Then they pass by the brilliant flower-beds to the rustic porch, through which is visible the Grebbys' twelve o'clock repast spread on a clean white linen cloth, a vase of wild flowers for simple decoration. There are bright coloured texts on the walls, and an old Family Bible under a glass case.

"My mother will be back from the market directly," says Eleanor; "would you do us the honour of stopping to dinner?"

The tone becomes a supplication, mingled with smiles.

"You are too kind," declares Philip, touched by the unostentatious hospitality of his newly found friend. "I shall be most delighted."

"Come and let us watch for the return of Black Bess," she cries, leading the way out into the garden again. Philip thinks he has never spent a more delightful morning.

To have missed it would have been to lose one of the sweetest episodes of his life. The intense restfulness of Copthorne Farm, the fragrance of the air, the softness of the carpet beneath his feet, the cattle browsing in verdant pastures, and the murmur of those winged and drowsy honey-laden workers from the meadows, make a picture which will never pass from his mind. For the moment, while basking in the harvest sun, a scene which must some day be only a faded pleasure left to recollection, is Paradise!

Then the Grebbys' return from their marketing, to welcome the stranger whom Eleanor proudly introduces. Hospitality is a creed with them, and renewing their daughter's invitation, they place the choicest their home affords before the unexpected guest. Thus it is that Philip Roche finds himself in Eleanor's family circle, discussing the crops and weather with her father, a rubicund, hale old man, whose life is centred in bucolic pursuits.

* * * * * * *

The harvest is over, the wheat and barley are garnered, but still Philip lingers, chained by that mysterious agent the world calls—Love!

He sees the embodiment of all he most admires in Eleanor, the sweet domesticated country maiden, pure as the health-laden breezes sighing through the trees. His love ennobles his being, he is surprised at this inexplicable and unfathomable passion.

"Eleanor," he says, "I am going away—I want to take you with me. Will you be my wife?"

It is more a command than a question. He cannot do without her. She must consent.

The girl's breath comes and goes swiftly; for a moment he fears she will faint.

The future dances before her swimming brain, the alluring prospect of money, position, pleasure, whisper like fiends in Eleanor's ears. Love is forgotten; she only remembers the vague unsatisfied ambitions of her young dreams. She lets him kiss her lips again and again, she is clasped in his arms, yet feels them not; her mind fixed on the dazzling picture of "what is to be!"

"Your answer, Eleanor, darling — love!" he gasps, watching the glorious colour mount to her face, the marvellous radiance fill her eyes.

"Yes, Philip, your wife always!" Her head is on his shoulder, he has gathered her hands about his neck. The brief midday hours fly as she yields to the tender wooing.

"Soon," he whispers, "autumn's fingers of decay will creep over Copthorne, while leaves must fall damp and dead in the country lanes. Marry me, Eleanor, now the summer is here."

She starts back, a deadly fear knocking at her heart. She laughs, apparently frivolous and light-hearted.

"Yes, in the summer, sometime next year."

"Next year!" his face falling. "But when? Next year has 365 long days!"

She smiles entrancingly, shrugging her shoulders.

"Oh! well—when the birds begin to sing."

"No," he cries, drawing her to him, "before they are silent, Eleanor, before the light of summer goes out of the heavens, and the blue sky fades to grey!"

Her eyes droop, her cheek is pale.

(To be continued.)

Digitized by Google

THE MARK OF THE LEPER.

"But, Boris, I know it. Thou canst not be always like this, and thou wilt return to thine own people. The white Russian girls are very beautiful, and thou art beautiful, Boris."

"Nay, Hasna, thou art wrong. The daughters of my land are indeed lovely; they are flaxen-haired, and like the sun shining full on the gold of Tillah-Karri; but thou art all to me, and their loveliness is as the autumn moon on the wonderful glories of the Gur Emir."

"Oh, Boris, thy words are sweeter than honey, but I am a woman and I fear."

"Fear not, my pearl of price. Hast thou not my word? Hast thou not all my love, all my heart? Let us cease this foolish talk, Hasna. See the evening lightning how it plays there over the black masses of the Shir-Dar. Listen to Abdoul's zither, and his song of the glories of Timour. Let us come into the garden, Hasna, and we will visit thy rose-trees and cull the sweetest blossoms to perfume thy couch to-night."

Boris Alekhin meant it all. He was indeed enchanted with the Uzbek girl, and felt the hours days when he was not listening to the accents of her fervid speech, and gazing on her lustrous beauty. He had poured out before her the wealth of his passionate nature. Cards and wine, dinners, and fine society were all relinquished that he might devote his life to the ineffable charm of this Eastern girl's presence.

His wealth and his voluptuous tastes were employed in fitting out the exquisite little bungalow outside the walls, and every luxury that he thought might fascinate her—carpets, flowers, zithers, perfumes, rare brocades from India and China. And yet Hasna would have cast all this behind her, and lived in a wretched hovel could she thereby strengthen in ever so slight a degree the love of her Russian lord.

But it came about that Alekhin's regiment, after three years' idleness in Samarkand, was ordered up the Oxus to Kirki. This was a terrible blow to Hasna, for strict orders had been given that the regiment was to be unimpeded by the company of women and children.

Alekhin felt it very keenly as well, but he was busy with the bustle of departure, and his thoughts were of military honours to be won on active service. Plunging through the deep sands of the Turkestan desert, along the desolate banks of the mighty river, overhead a pitiless sky of brass, the strong men falling out and dying by the wayside, a hot cicala from the south blowing clouds of fine sand in their faces—the regiment struggled on to Kerki.

There they had frontiers to delimit, and Afghans and wild Vakhan hillsmen to watch, and reservoirs and dams to build, and barracks to repair. Cholera was speeding along towards them from Meshad, and the black plague from Balkh, and the doctors discovered guinea worm in the water, and an unknown disease that was killing the camels and horses by inches.

It was all miserable, and the officers drank hard, and gambled hard, and two or three of the sillier and more sentimental of them dispatched themselves, after sending home long letters to their mothers, and packages containing their watches and silver cigarette-cases to their sisters.

Alekhin did nothing so foolish; he worked hard; but he often thought longingly of the shady garden inside the high walls, and of his bright Hasna in the bijou bungalow, whose speech was so musical, whose dark eyes were so wonderfully mysterious, and who loved him so. They never wrote to one another. Hasna could not write, and Boris would not put that on paper which might go through so many hands, and be seen by so many eyes before it reached her.

Alekhin's regiment sweltered fourteen months in Kerki, and then the longed for order came—they were to return to Samarkand, draggled, scorched, fever-stricken. They arrived in their old quarters. Three days was granted for an orgy, and I trust my gentle readers have no notion of how unspeakable a Russian orgy is. Alekhin had been counting the hours to the delicious meeting with Hasna, and not a moment did he lose in hastening to the well-known wicket. He gave the well-known signal, and impatiently repeated it, then incontinently kicked in the door, and was met by Abdoul, gasping, staring, and trembling. Abdoul's lips strove to say something, but they emitted no sound. He weakly sought to bar Alekhin's way.

"Out of my road, idiot! Why don't you speak? What are you mumbling about? Where's your mistress?"

"Oh, lord and master, don't go there! I intreat you in Allah's name! I will speak."

But Alekhin sprang forward. He rushed to the house and entered the well-known room. From the glare of noon-day light into the shade of the room his eyes were blinded for a moment, and he saw nothing; but he heard a sob, a stifled groan, and going forward a step he stumbled on a female figure, bowed, thickly veiled, sitting on the floor, and her right hand wrapped in a black cloth. He drew back a few steps.

"Hasna, my Hasna, what is this? Is this thy welcome of me? What did Abdoul mean?"

"Come not nearer, Boris; for the love of Allah not nearer. Nay, don't touch me!" And she shrank from him. "Canst thou not guess? Why do I not show thee my face? Why is my hand thus? Why, after all these weary moons, do I not rise and embrace thee, my lord and my king? Oh, leave me! I am unclean—unclean!"

Alekhin bent down, stupefied, and would have removed the veil; but at his touch, the girl uttered a piercing shriek, and fell prone upon the floor. Horrified, dizzy, fearing he knew not what, he turned round. Abdoul, with bent head, was standing beside him. "Master," he whispered, "Hasna is a leper! Come away!"

Alekhin never knew how he reached his club. It was to his club he went. But he joined in the dreadful orgy of his comrades, and forgot that. He sang the vilest songs, drank the strongest vodka, played wildly, made night hideous, sullied his soul; and then he quietly went home to quarters, pale, silent, ashamed.

Digitized by Google

Now, Alekhin had undoubtedly distinguished himself on the frontier. He had captured some important secret dispatches that were on their way between the potentates in Cabul and Bokhara. He had also invented a weir that turned out of great service in the construction of a dam, and his superior officer refused—mirabile dictu—to take the credit of all this, and recommended him for promotion.

And as just then they wanted a clever young man in the Ministry of War, a young man who knew all about Turkestan, it came about that Alekhin had hardly recovered from his hurricane of debauch when he was invited to proceed to St. Petersburg, to fill one of the posts most eagerly sought after by brilliant young officers with a career.

The appointment flattered him; the kind things said by the Colonel, the congratulations of his comrades soothed him. There was only one shadow, and that black, brooding, terrible. But as the days wore on, and his ambition rose, and he nourished a feeling of satisfaction with himself, he thought less of that awful veiled figure in the house in the garden.

He sent for Abdoul, and with coolness and method he explained to the old man that he was leaving for St. Petersburg, and that he wished to make handsome provision for him and his charge. The old Mussulman listened to all the arrangements, bowed a profound salaam, and vanished.

Next day Alekhin was sent away with princely honours, and his hopes rose higher and higher and took wings to themselves. The joy of travelling home filled him, and he thought of mother and sisters and of his house on the Nevsky Prospect; and once or twice, in the luxurious comfort of his first-class compartment, of girls he knew as a lad. "Wonder where they all are. Wonder if Lolya is married yet." But this reflection stung him, and he thought of Hasna. "Poor Hasna!" he sighed.

In St. Petersburg it was the best society he met. The pleasantest and nicest girls made love to the brilliant young officer from Central Asia. And once there was a delightful picnic to the Bezborodka gardens all in his honour, and his old playmate Lolya was there, still unmarried. And he and Lolya talked of old times, and wandered under the shady trees, and he told her all about Samarkand and Kerki—no, no, not everything, but enough for Lolya. Weeks went on, and at last there was a brilliant marriage in St. Isaac's, and Alekhin and Lolya went to Vienna, and after a month returned to their beautiful villa supremely happy.

But in that odorous garden outside the walls of Samarkand, Hasna was fretting out her soul, and the terrible disease was making rapid inroads. Night and day she worried Abdoul for news of Alekhin, and was told that he had gone to St. Petersburg, but would soon return. And when she knew that death was nearing, and that perhaps Boris would not be back in time, an unquenchable desire to see him again possessed her, and she gave the old man no rest until he consented to take her there where he tarried so long.

So when the time came for the merchants of Tabriz and Bokhara to set out on the road to the great fair at Nijni Novgorod, Abdoul, dressed as one of them, and with a thickly-veiled figure at his side, whom he declared was his wife, took the train across the desert to the Caspian, and the steamboat over the Caspian to Astrakhan, and another steamboat up to Volga to Novgorod, and the train again to St. Petersburg.

And veiled Hasna crouched on the decks of the steamers after the manner of Eastern women travelling, and the sailors and passengers made fun of her and of Abdoul; but they never saw her face. Had they seen that there would have been no more laughter. In St. Petersburg they took refuge in a low, waterside lodging-house, and Abdoul soon heard all about Alekhin, all about Lolya and the lovely villa, and the brilliant company they were entertaining on their return from their honeymoon. But he only told Hasna that he had discovered where Alekhin lived, and that he would take her there that evening, when she would see him.

When it grew dark Abdoul and Hasna stole from their wretched lodging and wandered out to the fashionable suburb. It was a lovely night, and the fresh, cool scent of northern flowers was in the air, and blackbirds sang in the trees. It was midsummer, casements were flung open, and Hasna saw men and beautiful women in luxurious apartments, and heard music and laughter and the merry voices of children. Opposite a charming villa Abdoul stopped. It was a few yards back from the road, and jasmine and roses covered it. The rooms were all lighted up, and the long French windows were open. A crowd of ladies and gentlemen filled the spacious apartments; the band was playing a waltz, and every one was dancing.

"There he is," whispered Hasna. "Oh, how beautiful he is! Oh, my Boris, my Boris!"

"Come away, Hasna; thou hast seen him."

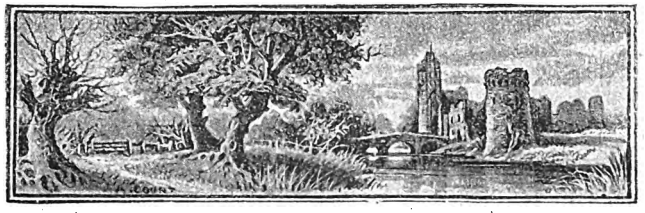
"Nay, a moment longer. Who is that in his arms? Ah, how lovely she is! She loves him. See her eyes. Who is she?"

"His wife."

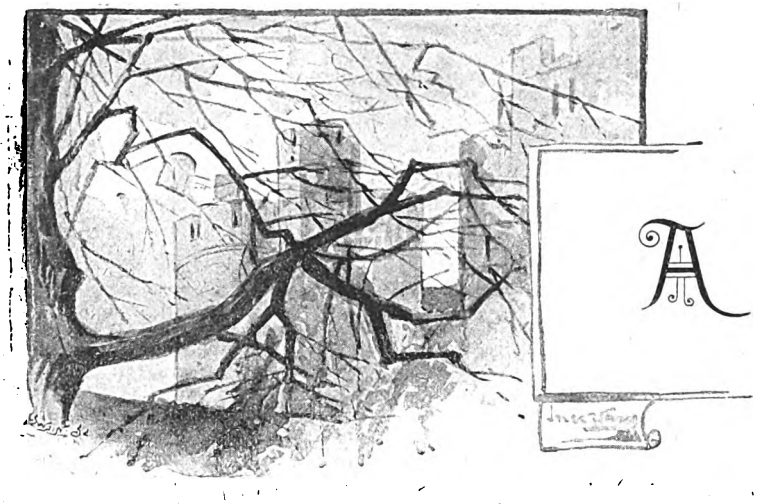
The frail girl let her head droop down on the low stone wall that surrounded Alekhin's grounds, but she said nothing. Her veil slipped to one side, and a passer-by got a glimpse of the stricken silver-grey face, and will never forget it.

Abdoul led Hasna away, and they returned to their people.

Capel Chernilo.



Digitized by Google



A Mirage of Midnight.

IT was nearly midnight; the ironing was done, and the clothes lay heaped on the table in snowy piles still hot from the iron. Ann Quinn drew a chair up to the little kitchen window that overlooked the river, and sat down with a sigh of pain, for her back ached. She rested her chin in her hand, and stared through the faint tracery of familiar objects on the glass to the water beyond, lying dark and glossy under the stars.

"I wonder if Miss Niles wants that minced meat for breakfast?" thought Ann Quinn, for she was both a cook and a laundress. "Perhaps I'd better fry them cold potatoes left from dinner, too," she continued, her eyes resting on a far-away cluster of electric lights that trembled like a diamond pendant.

Presently, as she sat there, the red rim of the moon pushed itself up behind some trees on the opposite shore. Ann Quinn watched it rising with a meditative look. "It's terrible red; them little branches looks like they were drawn on it with a pen. I wonder what that black thing in the water is?" she broke off, as a feeler of moonlight slipped across the river to where something black and long bobbed stiffly in the current.

She shaded her eyes from the lamp, and pressed her face close to the glass. "Looks like a man," she muttered. As she spoke, the thing wheeled about and began drifting in towards the stone breakwater beneath the window. Slowly it drew near, the little moon-sparks dancing in its wake. It floated into the shadow, and she strained her eyes in vain to follow it.

"Think I'll go to bed," she said, giving one more look into the darkness. She did not go though, for suddenly she saw a lean hand thrust over the breakwater, then another, and the next moment the figure of a man crawled out on to the stone below her.

Ann Quinn started back, her heart pumping like a steam-dredger, for she heard the thick splash of wet feet coming up the steps, and she saw a face pressed against the window that she had just quitted—a drawn face, yellow—pale as the handkerchief knotted about its throat.

"Let me in, Ann Quinn," said the lips, though she heard no voice. "Let me in."

She stood staring, her broad cheeks whiter than the plates on the dresser behind her, but she did not move. The man waited a moment, then he pushed the latch and swung himself into the room.

The lamp blinked and guttered in the draught, and a door slammed. Ann Quinn quivered from head to foot. The man stood staring at her with famished eyes.

"A lifetime, a whole lifetime," he whispered at last, and his voice sounded cold and empty as the echo in a vault.

"Go away," cried Ann Quinn, "and take your wet hand off my ironing."

The man moved, and stared at the piles of clothes on the table.

"Did you do that?" he asked in a low voice, "and are you tired?"

"Yes, I did, an' I am tired," she replied, stealing her way stealthily towards the door.

As she moved her terror lent a new, cat-like grace to her awkward body; she looked almost like another woman in the swaying light—a woman with narrow, wicked eyes and lithe motions. The man stepped quickly before the door and stood there, his clothes flooding the black river water on her clean floor.

"And all this time you have worked, while I have had more, a thousand times more, than I could use; and we have lived near each other, here in the same town, and never knew it!" He covered his face with his hands and groaned. Then he moved towards her, his arms outstretched: "My love, my lost love! give me one kiss, my first since the other grave closed over us!"

Ann Quinn gulped, and her anger was aroused. "If you touch me I'll kill you," she said hoarsely, catching a knife up from the shelf behind her. The man seemed not to hear her; he grasped her in his arms, and crushed his mouth on hers, and his lips were wet and cold.

Ann Quinn leapt away from him and buried the great knife in his heart. He looked into her terrified eyes, and a shadow fell on his face.

"See," he said mournfully, "you have stabbed me again, but this time it is too late."

She looked, and there was no blood gushing from the great slash, only the drip, drip, of the thick water. Then she covered her face and prayed, for she saw that the man was dead.

Digitized by Google

There was a long silence, broken by the chime of a clock in the house behind them. The man shivered. "An hour more, dear God, only an hour more!" he pleaded, and he wrung his hands, crying hurriedly: "How can I say it all! how can I make her understand!" He seized Ann Quinn's arm and shook her fiercely.

"Remember, woman! Try to remember! Have I forgotten? Have I not lived alone—waiting—and you never came?"

She brushed her rough hand over her eyes; something stirred in her torpid brain. As the summer lightning, threading the sky, will show a sudden pearly perspective of unseen cloud-mass, then flash out, leaving the same blind night it found, so the soul of Ann Quinn opened for an instant, beyond her wretched work-ridden world, only to close again as quickly. The man caught her look, and asked, his voice tense and quivering:

"Those faded lilies-of-the-valley, there in that cup, why did you keep them only from the flowers you threw away this morning?"

"They—they—smelled good," answered the woman, troubled, bewildered.

"Only that?"

"Yes, only that."

"Have you never dreamed of some one you loved, some one apart from this miserable squalor I find you in?"

The blood flooded into her sallow face.

"What business is that of yours? Go away, I say!" she added weakly, giving him a push, and catching at the table to save herself from falling.

"Tell me," he pleaded, "have you never missed me, who was more to you those few short years ago than life?"

Ann Quinn looked into his eyes and laughed. There was no mirth in that laugh, though, and he shielded himself as though she had struck at him. Then he spoke again.

"Listen," he said. "To-night in a far land my soul will be born anew—until then the veil is lifted. But we will cheat God and Love and Law! You and I—together. Soon my eyes will be blinded and I shall not know you, except by this—take it and keep it always over your heart, and though you be old and bent, and though you be a little child, still I shall know you."

He thrust his hand into his breast and drew out a leather case. He opened it and pushed something towards her. She looked; it was a faded spray of lily-of-the-valley. Then he reached into his pocket and threw a canvas bag down on the table. "Take these," he said; "there is enough here to keep you from this drudgery," he pointed to the ironing; "and now I must be gone—the river calls me."

They stood looking at each other in silence. The light swam before Ann Quinn's eyes, and everything blurred but that white face staring into hers; nearer it came, ever nearer, and she felt her muscles quiver in resistance, then grow lax; there was a pause, a gasping breath, and she had thrown herself into his arms. The cold ooze from his wet hair trailed on her neck; closer and closer they swayed together, locked in each other's arms; then, with a strange thin cry, like the wail of a new-born child, the man tore himself away, and leapt from the window into the night beyond. There was a heavy splash, and silence.

The wind had blown out the lamp. Ann Quinn groped her way to the table, dazed and stupid. She struck a match; it sputtered and went out. Then she crawled away into a corner, her wide eyes fixed on the open window. The moon swam high, and the river ran molten silver beneath it. The little stars set, and the grey scroll of morning unrolled across the night. Still she sat there, her eyes fixed on the empty window-space.

Suddenly she stood up, and she felt old, and dizzy, and lame. She reached out and picked up the canvas bag the man had given her. She shook it, and there rolled out on the table a great handful of unset rubies. Ann Quinn stood staring at them until the first sunbeam came sifting through the darkness, lighting them into a thousand crimson sparkles.

There was a rap at the door, and she thrust the jewels from sight. It was only the milkman, and he looked at the woman's face in disappointment. "So you've heard the news already?" he asked.

"What news?"

"Why, didn't you know they've found the body of Ellis Price, the millionaire, drowned not a hundred yards from this very spot."

"No," said Ann Quinn.

"Yes, and they think he must have been murdered. He left home to go to the bank with some rubies he had for his niece's wedding, and they weren't on the body anywhere."

"Murdered—murdered? What would they do if they found someone with them rubies?" Ann Quinn asked thickly.

"Why, hang him high as he'd swing," answered the milkman.

Ten minutes later Ann Quinn stole down to the river-side. She reached over and dropped a handful of stones into the water—a handful of stones that shone like blood-drops. Down they sank into the grey river slime. But on the ripples above them hung something too light to sink, for it was only a dried stem of lilies-of-the-valley.

Ann Quinn watched it drift out of sight, then she turned back to the house to get breakfast.

Julie Kenly.

Digitized by Google

I.

The Biddlestone Distillery was an old-established concern, founded by Herbert Carson's grandfather, who made a fortune, which his son spent. Dying, John Carson bequeathed the business, all he had to leave, to Herbert, who very soon discovered that it was necessary to take stock and place the books in the hands of a firm of accountants. He received their report, and at once called on his cousin, Kate Hemming, to whom he was engaged.

"I've got it," he said, as soon as the couple were alone. "The business is fifteen thousand to the bad. Drake and Smith tell me I must find capital to clear off the liabilities, or wind up—that is, break, smash, come to grief. They suggest a partner, but can't conscientiously recommend the concern to any client of theirs. A nice outlook, isn't it?"

Kate sighed. She was a very pretty girl, a brunette of the dashing type, and being particularly fond of "Handsome Bertie," as young Carson was popularly called, her sympathy could be counted upon.

"It is a very miserable one," she said mournfully. "Do you think you could induce anyone to invest?"

"I'm afraid it's impossible," he answered. "You see I've been going the pace almost as fast as the governor did. It's no use my saying I didn't know the distillery was in Queer Street, and promising to amend—selling my hunters and that sort of thing. It's true enough; but who would believe it?"

"A stranger might."

"A stranger with fifteen thousand to invest would employ a sharp solicitor to make inquiries. No. I've looked at it all round. It's a hopeless case."

"I am afraid it is," said Kate, after a thoughtful pause, "unless you can marry money quickly. If I had fifteen thousand, or fifteen hundred, you should have it. As I haven't, you'll have to marry money, Bertie." And she sighed again, very deeply.

"What do you mean?" he cried. "What about you?"

"Oh, I shouldn't die of a broken heart," she answered, with a dismal little laugh. "I'm very fond of you, Bertie, but I couldn't do that if I wanted to. It's plain we can't marry, so you had better try somewhere else before the crash comes."

He looked at her suspiciously. Having a very good opinion of himself, her apparently careless surrender of her own claims was not soothing to his amour propre.

"You are heartless!" he exclaimed rather angrily. "I don't understand you at all. What are you driving at?"

"I am not heartless," she answered, and her quivering eyelids and lips proved the assertion. "I should be glad to marry you to-morrow if either of us had any prospects. But if I did so under the present circumstances I should ruin you, and I won't do that if you fall on your knees. This is what I am driving at: Clara Lorimer has loved you in secret ever since she was a school-girl with confidants by the half-dozen. She has heaps of money. Go and try your luck."

Digitized by Google

It was news—amazing news. Herbert Carson immediately saw the way out of his difficulties. Miss Lorimer and he were very old friends. Recollections of tender glances and sighs, and words whose meaning was scarcely hidden, flashed to mind. Remembering, he knew that Kate was not deceiving him; but he loved his cousin as well as it was possible for such a man to love anyone, and although to save himself he would have sacrificed much, it was unnecessary to lose her good opinion by adopting her suggestion too eagerly.

"I can't do that," he rejoined in a half-hearted manner. "What would you think of me?"

"I," she answered with another mirthless laugh. "Oh, I should think you were a wiser man than your father."

John Carson had married for his second wife a penniless beauty whose extravagance had helped to wreck the family ship.

"But your own feelings?" Herbert went on.

"Oh, I should soon get over it. Don't think of me."

"I can't do it?" he repeated.

"Then," she rejoined, "you force me to set you free. I dare not marry you, Bertie. I should ruin a poor man in a month. Here is your ring." She took the jewelled circlet from her finger, and placed it in his hand. "Think what you like of me, but go and ask Clara Lorimer to marry you, and when you have got her and her money treat her well. It would break my heart to see you down at heel, hard up, living on your friends, Bertie, and I powerless to assist you. This is the only way I can help you. Now go—there's a good fellow."

He protested vehemently. Nevertheless, he went, conscious that he had played the martyr very well.

As soon as the door had closed behind him, Kate sat down and cried for ten minutes. Then she wiped away her tears with a dainty, lace-bordered handkerchief, effaced their traces with some mysterious preparation, and put her love-disappointment resolutely aside.

II.

Herbert Carson found Miss Lorimer at home, a plain-featured, rather dowdy girl of twenty-eight, no more like his brilliant cousin than a brown moth is like a "peacock" butterfly. But drowning men do not examine the lifebuoy thrown to their aid with a nice eye. Certainly he had no scruples strong enough to induce hesitation. More or less a flirt since his boyhood, Kate's beauty and sprightliness had kept him pretty constant at heart, but words meant little, and there were few girls of any standing in Biddlestone with whom "Handsome Bertie" had not, at one time or another, bandied soft nothings. With Clara Lorimer he was scarcely on less familiar terms than with Kate, his late fiancée, herself.

"Kate has thrown me over, Clara," he suddenly exclaimed, after a few commonplaces.

Surprised, Miss Lorimer rose from her chair, then sat down and tried to look regretful, in which she did not quite succeed. Herbert Carson, who was watching her narrowly, saw that he had only to speak.

"Yes," he went on, "it's a question of money. The governor has died poor, and the business is in a queer way. I shall have as much as I can do to keep going. I shall have to leave Oakvale, sell my horses, and climb down pretty considerably. I told Kate just how matters stood. You know the result."

He paused for a reply, which was not forthcoming immediately. Miss Lorimer was never quick at putting her thoughts into words.

"I am very sorry that you are in difficulties," she said at length, not, however, in a sorrowful tone. "I shouldn't grieve about Kate, though, if I were you. You ought to be glad that she has shown herself in her true colours. I should forget her and look for someone more worthy—more faithful," she added as an after reflection.

"I'm not going to grieve about her," he rejoined. "Judging by my feelings, I don't think I could have cared for her in the right way. But as for looking for someone else, how can a poor fellow on the verge of bankruptcy do that? What would you answer, for instance, if I came to you and said: 'Clara, I've been fond of you for years, but didn't know my own mind. I'm poor now, and in need of financial assistance. Will you marry me and help me?' That is the plain English of it," he went on, "and a nice cad I should feel if I did it."

Miss Lorimer blushed deeply. But it did not seem to strike her that Herbert Carson's artful speech was in fact a direct proposal.

"I shouldn't think it was caddish," she answered, hesitated a moment, then went on: "I know someone who would be only too glad to help you."

He knew perfectly well to whom she was alluding, but he was too cunning to show his cards at once.

"I wish I did," he rejoined, passing a white hand over his forehead. "I should be very grateful. Is it anyone I'm acquainted with? Is it a lady?"

"Yes; and you know her very well."

He sighed. And Miss Lorimer sighed in sympathy.

"That's just the difficulty," he went on. "A man can't accept assistance from a lady, unless he happens to love her, and she is willing to marry him. Ah! if it were only you, Clara, and you would marry me—but there's no such luck likely to come my way." Pausing, he allowed his hand to fall over and conceal his eyes.

Miss Lorimer blushed again, more deeply still.

"It is me!" she cried impulsively. "It isn't wrong to say so, is it?"

When, half an hour afterwards, Herbert Carson departed from Miss Lorimer's residence, he was once more an engaged man. And his fiancée was worth £25,000. He did not feel particularly jubilant about it. Clara was not Kate by a long shot. But he was satisfied that he had done a big day's work.

III.

The sudden transfer of "Handsome Bertie's" affections caused considerable talk in Biddlestone. As his financial straits forbade delay, the wedding was arranged to take place almost immediately. There was no difficulty with the creditors, however, after they were informed that the distillery would at once be put on a sound footing. Miss Lorimer had agreed to defray all existing liabilities. Consequently, Herbert Carson's mind was easy on that score; but he was not happy. Indeed, for the greater part of a day he was more than half inclined to cry off. It was after a visit from Dr. Bayntun, an old friend of his father's, who had been the Lorimer's medical attendant before Clara was born.

"So you are going to marry money, Bertie," he said. "I would congratulate you if I dared."

"What's the row?" was the natural, if slangy question.

"No row, my boy, but just a word of warning," rejoined the old doctor, who, as he had retired from

Digitized by Google

Lying on the floor beside a broken decanter.

practice, could afford to be more out-spoken than the majority of medical men consider it expedient to be. "Drinking was never your father's failing," he went on, "nor is it yours. But I know your wine-cellar is pretty well stocked."

"Yes, it is," said Carson, wondering what was coming next.

"Well, keep it locked, and carry the key in your pocket—when you have taken your wife home."

Carson stared in amazement at the Doctor. "Good Heavens!" he cried. "Do you mean to say that Miss Lorimer drinks?"

But Dr. Bayntun had not quite forgotten the circumspection essential to success in his calling. He smiled blandly, but enigmatically.

"I have warned you. Her mother and her grandmother died of too much brandy, though it didn't appear in the death certificates. It's in the blood. Don't let it break out."

Having done what he considered to be his duty to his old friend's son, Dr. Bayntun went his way. But it would have required a much stronger warning to defer that hasty marriage, not to mention breaking it off altogether.

At the hour fixed the ceremony took place.

Among the numerous presents was a handsome one from Kate, a gold-mounted inkstand in the shape of an owl, doubtless typical of her old lover's wise and prudent conduct.

Mrs. Carson not only paid all the creditors, she provided capital to work the distillery with profit. Gratitude would have induced some men to simulate affection, even though they did not feel it; but Herbert Carson was not one of them. He was deeply aggrieved because, six months after his own marriage, Kate took it into her head to wed Mr. Lyons, a wealthy brewer, forty years her senior.

Then, when it was too late, he speedily discovered that Dr. Bayntun's warning was well grounded. Clara exhibited such a marked fondness for stimulants, that various kind friends declared she must have had the distillery in mind when she engaged herself to Herbert Carson. He locked up the wine cellar, as advised, and also put the cellarettes under lock and key, but whenever they quarrelled, which was not seldom, she contrived to obtain spirituous consolation.

One day, about eight months after their marriage, he found her intoxicated. In his rage he threw prudence overboard—declared that he did not care a straw for her and never had done; he had married her for her money, and the sooner she drank herself to death the better he would be pleased; the natural result of such treatment being that she gave way entirely to her inherited craving. What little good looks she had ever possessed speedily disappeared. Before she had been a wife a year she had become a slattern and a shrew. One after another her friends ceased to call. Her degradation was known to every soul in Biddlestone.

Her husband made no attempt to reclaim her. He was seldom at home. In horse-racing and other forms of gambling, Stock Exchange speculation, and the like, he sought and found consolation—losing heavily as a matter of course. His capital melted away. Debts accumulated. Two years after his marriage his financial position was almost as bad as when Kate suggested that means of escape.

At this juncture Mr. Lyons died after a brief illness, leaving the brewery and the bulk of his wealth to his widow. Carson's dealings with the deceased brewer had been very large, and he owed the estate a considerable sum of money. The executors pressed for payment. Unable to liquidate the debt, he wrote to his old flame, asking for time. Since her marriage he had scarcely seen her. By return of post he received an invitation to call. He went, of course.

The two years which had elapsed since their engagement was broken off had in no way dimmed Kate's beauty. If anything, she was more handsome. Widow's weeds suited her style. She handed Carson his account—receipted.

"I owe it to you," she said. "My conscience has reproached me terribly for sending you to Clara. But I didn't know she drank until Dr. Bayntun told me. How should I? Poor fellow! I can see how wretched you are, and I pity you. But I have often, since my marriage, pitied myself as well. What a coward I was! If I could live my life over again, Bertie, I would act differently. Why wasn't I brave enough to marry you and bear poverty with you? It was my plain duty, and I failed. But I have regretted it, Bertie; I regret it every day of my life. Why can't we have our chances twice?" There were tears in Kate's beautiful eyes; her words came with a sob.

Carson was deeply moved, but Kate little knew the awful thought which caused his agitation. He tore himself away, fearful lest he should betray his Satan-suggested desire.

"If I were free," he muttered, as he returned to his office at the distillery, "Kate would marry me. I should be the richest man in Biddlestone. If I were free! If I were free!" And then his thoughts took a more defined shape. "Be free? It's easy enough; the means lie ready to your hand."

Arrived at the distillery, he secretly filled a handbag with bottles of over-proof spirit. Then, having informed his head clerk that he must go to London that evening, he went home, carrying the bag. Watching for his opportunity, and finding it, he filled up the decanters in the cellarettes from the bottles he had brought from the distillery, and left them on the sideboard where his wife could not fail to see them. This done, he sought the wretched woman, and, deliberately picking a quarrel, abused her as never before. When even his ingenuity was exhausted, and he could find no more taunts to shower upon her, he struck her, and rushed away to catch the London express.

Digitized by Google

Early next morning a telegram from his head clerk arrived at his hotel.

"Your wife is dangerously ill. Can you return at once?"

Of course he could return, having no business to transact. When he reached Biddlestone his wife was dead. She had been found insensible in her room, lying on the floor beside a broken decanter—one of those which her husband had filled with over-proof spirit.

He insisted that an inquest should be held, notwithstanding that the murdered woman's medical attendant expressed his willingness to give a certificate. The jury found a verdict of death from "alcohol poisoning." No imputation rested upon the murderer. On the contrary the Coroner and the jurymen united in condoling with him. He had done everything he could to save the miserable woman he had been so unfortunate to marry. The testimony of the servants proved that wines and spirits had always been kept under lock and key, except on this unlucky occasion, when, having to leave hurriedly to catch a train, he had omitted to put the cellarettes where the deceased could not get at them.

Her relationship permitted Kate to call upon the widower.

Her relationship permitted Kate to call upon the widower before the funeral. She considered it her duty to do so, no suspicion that he had contributed even to Clara's death having entered her head. It is scarcely necessary to say that he did not so much as hint at his hopes. Indeed three months had passed before he ventured to do so.

"I shall be glad to marry you and try to make you happy," she answered. "I loved you when I sent you away, and I have never ceased to love you. But there must be no scandal. We must let a year go by before our engagement is announced. In the meantime we mustn't see much of each other."

He did not demur. The period of probation soon passed. Then the engagement was declared, and the marriage arranged to take place ten days before Christmas.

IV.

It was the eve of the wedding. Carson was working late at the distillery. There was a press of orders always at that season, and he wished to leave everything straight, so that he might enjoy his honeymoon free of business worries and communications.

All goods ordered were packed on the second floor, which was reached from the office and store-room by a steep flight of stairs, lit by an unprotected gas-jet near the bottom. The office-door opened into a kind of well, gained by two steps down, whence the stairs to the packing-room sprang.

Having occasion to visit the second floor, Carson followed a porter up the staircase. The man was carrying on his shoulder a six-gallon jar of brandy. He had nearly reached the top, his master being only a few steps behind, when the jar slipped and fell from his shoulder. It struck Carson, who reeled and fell with it. In the well at the foot of the stairs he lay insensible, with the fragments of the shattered jar, and the spirit, which, unable to run further, had formed a pool about him. But his insensibility could not have been of more than a moment's duration. In an instant the staircase was a roaring furnace. The gas had set the brandy alight. There was no escape. The clerks in the office heard the crash, but they were unable to open the door, for the wretched man's body lay against it. Unable to rise, he could only shriek and pray, while the brandy blazed around him.

His agonised cries brought the packing staff to the head of the stairs. They looked, but the sight was too horrible. The fire, which had caught the woodwork, beat them back. Shrieking louder than the doomed man below, they fled to save their own lives, for in that building, stored with inflammable spirit, a moment's delay might mean death. Carson was left to his awful fate. His cries soon ceased, but the brandy flamed until almost every vestige of the miserable man had been consumed.

The distillery was burned to the ground. A few calcined bones were all that was recovered of its late owner.

At the inquest which followed, the jury, with true, if unwitting prescience, declared that Herbert Carson died "by the Hand of God."

Kate's mourning was as rich and deep as her grief was sincere.

Ashmore Russan.

Digitized by Google

THE WHITE HART.

I WAS born with the instincts of a true sportsman.

For a long time I was at a loss to know from what source had come my passion for guns and gunning. My father was anything but a connoisseur of deadly weapons, and my mother never knew the butt from the muzzle of a gun, and was equally afraid of each.

While I was a child, it amused my brothers to hear me discuss the merits of choke-bore shot guns and breechloading rifles; but when I grew to woman's estate this highly unfeminine taste displeased and even alarmed them. They were very proper young men, and did not relish the idea of a young lady sister who could take a snipe on the wing, or pierce the bull's-eye with a revolver at sixty paces. Dear boys, they feared, too, that such a propensity might seriously endanger my being settled in life.

They remonstrated, they scolded; they brought me the accounts of all the dreadful accidents that resulted from the use of firearms, and tried to extort from me a promise that I would never touch a gun again. I might have yielded had not an unfortunate circumstance occurred that made me deaf to all intreaties.

An uncle who had heard of my skill, and was queer and old-fashioned enough to admire it, sent me on my eighteenth birthday a handsome Winchester rifle which he had ordered to be made for me. From that day I ceased to struggle against fate. I felt that my life would never be complete until I had hunted the deer or tracked the grizzly in his mountain home.

The opportunity came. Some friends invited me to spend a few weeks at their home in the Sierra. They had a little house among the pines in one of the most romantic regions of the range.

A hunting party was formed for my especial entertainment, and the night before as a prelude to the morrow's excitement we listened around the fire to the wild stories of the mountaineers.

* * * * *

"Old Clubfoot," a grizzly who had been known in the region for fifteen or twenty years, was a favourite topic. No one had had the hardihood to attack him since he had pursued a hunter a long distance and killed him with a stroke of his gigantic paw. An enormous trap had once been set for him and he had caught his foot in it, but with wonderful intelligence he had gone to the nearest rock and beaten it off. He was seen occasionally in the passing years, and now and then he helped himself to a sheep or calf unmolested.

There was also a white doe among the neighbouring mountains which seemed to bear a charmed life, for many hunters had shot at it and always missed. A superstition had naturally grown up about it, and the mountaineers held that some great calamity would attend the person who killed the white deer.

These stories aroused my imagination so that I could scarcely wait for the dawn of day, and I lay awake long after the house was silent, but was the first one stirring in the morning.

An old hunter, whom we called Uncle John, was the leader of the party, and to his care I was assigned. He had always wished to see a woman shoot, he said, and I should have a grand chance to show what I could do.

"Don't kill the white deer," some one called after us.

"No, no," I laughed back; "we'll take the greatest care."

We rode in silence till we reached the crown of a little hill where there was an open, grassy spot. I was close beside Uncle John when I saw him gaze fixedly ahead for a moment. Then without turning his head he said in a whisper:

"Get down quick! Here's your chance! As fine a shot as ever I see."

I was down before he had fairly begun to speak, but trembling all over, and my teeth chattered in a most unaccountable way.

"Slip up behind that sugar pine an' blaze away," was the whispered order; and hugging my rifle I obeyed, all the time with that dreadful shaking. It was "buck ague," as I afterwards learnt, a nervous affection experienced by young hunters during their first shot at a deer, and even old hunters have suffered from it.

The beautiful creature, a two-year old buck, stood quietly feeding, outlined against the sky. I levelled my rifle, never noticing that I had not raised the hammer, and pulled with all my strength. It did not "go off." At last, discovering the reason, I righted the hammer with a click. The deer raised his lordly head, snuffed the air, and was gone in a series of magnificent leaps.

"How beautiful!" I cried, forgetting in the novelty of the sight my own stupidity, of which however I was not long to remain unmindful. The look of contempt that greeted me as I turned to Uncle John withered me.

"You'll never kill a deer! Never see such a chance since I was born; not ten yards off. Pooh!" And the irate old hunter rode off, leaving me to follow or go back as I chose.

I have been mortified several times in my recollection; have been "spelled down" as a child in school; have missed the target in archery tournaments, and have been snubbed by a prospective mother-in-law; but never do I remember that my pride was so lacerated as now. The sunshine suddenly lost its brightness, the fresh, fragrant stillness was no longer a delight, and desperate thoughts flashed through my brain of putting an end to my wretched existence.

Digitized by Google

At last I determined that instead of returning home to brood over my sorrow I would strike off by myself into the woods and redeem my reputation by taking home at night some trophy of my skill.

The soothing sunshine and delicious air by degrees restored my equanimity, and hope was high in my bosom. I scanned all the ravines closely, and looked wisely on the ground for tracks of beasts. I rode long and far, and when the sun was high threw myself beside a little spring that bubbled from the rocks and ate my luncheon, allowing my horse to graze near me. On my right was a small patch of green herbage across which the tall pines cast a sombre shadow. I was too high for birds; they were below in the valleys, though now and then a vulture sailed majestically around some distant peak. The loneliness and silence of the place began to be oppressive.

Suddenly there was a rustle in the tall grass under the pines. Looking up I saw the head of a deer. I seized my rifle, and, levelling it, fired with a steady hand. A deafening report crashed through the stillness and there leapt into the air a white deer! I sprang to the place. In the bloodstained grass lay the noble animal struggling with death.

I felt a thrill of superstitious horror; something as an old Egyptian must have felt had he killed unwittingly the sacred ibis, or the Ancient Mariner when he slew the albatross. I tried to stanch the blood, but the murderous ball had done its work too well. Hardly knowing what I did I took the head of the dying creature in my lap. In the large soft eyes were reflected the rocks and the swaying pines. As the breath grew fainter the head turned with a convulsive movement and the fast glazing eyes looked into mine with a gaze so human in its intelligence that I was almost crazed with grief and terror. I hurried from the spot only to find that my horse, probably frightened by the rifle-shot, had disappeared. I was alone and miles from home.

I discovered, too, that I lacked one of the most necessary requisites of the true hunter—ability to find my way under all circumstances.

It was already afternoon. I started to go back on foot the way I had come as nearly as I could remember it. When I reached a point high enough to command a view I did not feel reassured, for the mountains looked all alike and range after range stretched away on every side silent and relentless as the tomb. There was not a living thing in sight but a buzzard circling about a far-off peak.

At last I set off in a direction where I thought I recognised familar rocks. The killing of the white hart weighed heavily upon my spirits and filled me with vague fears. The stories of the night before added to my uneasiness. There was the danger that I might meet a bear. I had my rifle and three dozen cartridges in my belt, but Uncle John had said: "Give grizzlies a wide berth."

What could I do if I met one?

The way grew more and more intricate. Now I had to climb over boulders, and now force my way through tangled undergrowth, from which I emerged into the shadow of pines so gloomy that twilight seemed suddenly to have fallen.

There was a crashing of bushes as of some heavy body pushing itself through. I tried to run, but the roughness of the ground made me stumble at every step.

The noise came nearer. I knew that it could be nothing but a bear, and every other anxiety was swallowed up in present terror. I remembered that grizzlies do not climb unless the tree is neither too large nor too small. Ten yards to the left stood a slender tree with trunk clear for fifteen feet.

I sprang towards it, and although I had never been able to climb a tree before I climbed now without a moment of hesitation and scrambled to a seat among the branches. I shook so violently that I had to hold on by main force to keep from falling. I had been there probably thirty seconds when there shuffled from the bushes with awkward but impressive gait a monstrous grizzly bear.

I had dropped my gun in the excitement, and even had I kept it I should not have dared to fire. As the great beast shambled along I saw that he was lame. It was old Clubfoot, the terror and autocrat of the mountains. He was heading directly for my tree. My blood curdled and my breath stopped. I have no distinct recollections of the next few seconds. He approached within ten feet of my hiding-place, rolling his heavy head from side to side as if aware of an unseen foe. Then he passed on and was lost among the trees.

I remained motionless for nearly an hour, fearing to descend. Then I crept noiselessly in the direction whence old Clubfoot had come. My rifle, which must have fallen against the prostrate trunk by which I found it, was broken off short at the breech, the bear having struck it with his paw in passing.

Imagine my surprise when I emerged from among the trees to find the same little grass plot where I had killed the deer. At first I could not believe it, but there was the spring with the rock by which I had sat, and the remains of my luncheon lay scattered on the ground. I was tired as well as weak and nervous after the fright the bear had given me. But it was becoming a question of life and death, and I was not willing to die. Carefully gathering the scraps of bread and meat that I had thrown away, I resolved to follow the nearest cañon down to its mouth, which I was sure would lead me out into the open country somewhere.

The sides were so steep that I had to let myself down by clinging to roots and overhanging branches. I plodded on doggedly. In the heart of the cañons unnumbered horrors lurked and the rocky walls rose on each side of me toweringly insurmountable. I began to wonder if I had better go back when I was startled to see open before me what seemed almost a bottomless pit. The declivity was probably not more than fifteen feet, but it looked very terrible to me. I could not leap that distance nor could I climb round the steep and slippery sides. A tall tree grew from the lower level, however, and by leaning far out I caught a branch and thus climbed down.

I felt certain that now I must be very near the valley floor. Behind me in the hollows of the cañon the shadows of evening were already lying. I had sprained my ankle in the descent—an injury that at any time would have disabled me, but now could not be allowed to impede my progress. I limped along, hoping and fully expecting to see at a turning not far off the valley before me, the green fields, and the dwellings of men.

How were my hopes mocked when I found instead a precipice fully sixty feet deep. With a cry of horror I drew back and wrung my hands in despair.

Had I been saved from the jaws of a savage beast only to die more terribly by starvation or to be dashed to pieces in a rocky chasm?

Nature had never seemed to me more pitiless.

Digitized by Google

The stony walls had looked down to me in awful silence. The yawning precipice at my feet seemed waiting with a sickening expectancy.

Before this I had been afraid to speak aloud for fear of rousing some wild animal; but now I felt that I should be glad to hear or see anything with life even if it were a savage. I shouted myself hoarse, but only strange echoes answered me from the frowning woods.

The shadows grew deeper. I must do something—anything.

It occurred to me to make a rope of some of my clothing, and thus descend. It was the work of but a moment to take off my long stockings and tie them together, and then to add my scarf. All this made only four or five yards in length. I tore the skirt of my stout waterproof suit in strips, which I tied together, until I had what seemed enough. Then, fastening a stone to one end I crept to the edge and let the rope down to measure the distance. It still lacked a little. The deficiency was soon supplied from the sleeves of the jacket. The root of a pine afforded a convenient place for attaching the rope; and, having first tested every foot of it to make sure that it would bear my weight, I was ready to swing off.

Several times I looked over and my head grew dizzy. I decided to go backward to obviate that difficulty. Fearing my shoes would be an hindrance in my clinging to the rope, I pushed them over, together with my cartridge belt. Another instant of hesitation and heart-sinking and I was fairly off.

I reached the bottom sore and breathless, but safe. Another trial awaited me. In the gathering gloom I could not find my shoes, and the sharp stones cut my tender feet at every step. Moreover, I dreaded rattlesnakes, and listened with painful acuteness for the warning rattle. I did not hear anything, and soon lost that fear in my overpowering anxiety to reach some human habitation.

It grew dark so rapidly that I had to use my stick at every step, as a blind man does, to feel the way before me. Before I groped along many rods my guide gave me timely warning of a chasm. Feeling for a stone, I hurled it forward, and heard it strike far down below.

I could go no further—at least until daylight—so, drawing back a few feet, I sat down to wait. I was so weary that I fell immediately asleep. I was awakened by a rifle-shot, followed quickly by a second report, but they sounded a long way off.

I started up and tried to shout an answer, but my over-strained throat could make no noise except a hoarse croaking like a child with croup. I was sure the shots came from my friends searching for me.

In the pocket of my jacket were some matches that I had not before remembered. It was not a moment before I had scraped some dry leaves together and set fire to them. A number of cones had fallen from the pines above, and there was a mass of dry chaparral, so that I had no lack of fuel.

By the blaze I could see the nature of the place about me. I was standing on a platform much like the one I had descended. On one side was the sheer wall, on the other the precipice. I was hemmed in by prison walls.

I heaped on branches till the flames ran high and made a roaring sound. The whole cañon was illuminated, and the tall pines shook like spectres in the fantastic light.

A crackling noise at a little distance drew my attention; chaparral cones, the pines themselves were ablaze. I had set the cañon on fire. Dismay succeeded my short-lived gleam of hope. In front was the chasm, behind the fire. I was about two rods from the ledge, and the flames crept towards me. I moved forward.

This sudden and awful danger gave me a voice. I screamed wildly as the fire reached out long, adder-like tongues for me.

A voice above shouted to me.

"Quick, quick!" I cried, "or it's too late!"

The fire had driven me so near the edge that a step would have hurled me over. I felt the terrible calm that comes to one when hope is dead. I saw two snakes leap upward in the blaze and writhe about each other in agony.

"Catch this, and tie it under your arms," shouted a voice, and a rope fell at my feet.

I was saved; but never since have I cared for hunting. I was cured by the dying look of the white deer.

Richard Sibert.

An Idyll of the Slums.

Lummin Street is an unsavoury bye-way in the north of London. The people who exist in Lummin Street do unmentionable things and use untranslatable language. They are ugly and unclean, and there is no variety in their repulsiveness. They have not even grace enough to be picturesque in their squalor.

But romance is a hardy flower, ungrudging of its perfume. It grows oftenest near to toil-worn hands, and, when plucked, lives longest under greasy bodices; rarely dying, indeed, until the hearts on which it feeds, are cold. High above the weedy undergrowth of petty cares and sordid aims that clog the bosoms of the dwellers in the world's dark places it flourishes, tracing on the dull grey background of inconsequent lives golden schemes of colour, or healing with its balm of fragrance the scars that unkind memories have left; so that every heart is lighter for its burden.

Even the bruised heart of Mary-Mary was lighter; though the scarce unfolded bud of romance that made its home there in the days of her youth drooped often under the heavy sadness of her tears.

She was called "Mary-Mary" because her moral nature was akin to that of the heroine of a popular nursery rhyme. She was a heavy-jawed, dull-eyed girl with no graces of form or manner to recommend her to the notice of any man. Yet a man fell in love with her. She knew that he was in love with her because he passed her door so often and always said: "'Ullo, Mary-Mary" so shamefacedly.

Digitized by Google

He was a costermonger, young and prosperous. His name was Wall Masters. And there was that in his eyes which Mary-Mary could never see without thrilling and blushing. She knew that he was hers as well as she knew that she was his when he cared to claim her. But there was a great wall of diffidence between them.

One day Mary-Mary made a friend. The friend's name was Liz, and she was a cripple. She was a newcomer to the neighbourhood, and lived at the extreme top and back of the house adjoining that in which Mary-Mary lived. The two girls first met on the crazy "leads" abutting on the rear of the houses, under their windows. Thither they went every day to enjoy the smoky evening breezes. They would sit there and chat until it was dark.

Their friendship was a week old, when one night Mary-Mary took Liz into her confidence and told her all about Wall Masters. From motives that she could not have defined to herself, she suppressed his name. Liz listened eagerly.

"I'm so glad it's like that wi' you, too," she said.

Mary-Mary started. She was sitting in the shadow, against a great black stack of chimneys.

"I s'pose you think," said Liz, "thet a pore, crippled thing like me ain't no right to 'ave anyfink ter do wi' love?"

"No, Liz! I reckon you oughter be loved mor'n most gels, on 'count o' yer affliction, y' know," said Mary-Mary awkwardly.

"Ah!" said Liz wistfully. "But all the same you can't imagine a bloke carin' for me, can yer?"

"Yuss, I can. You've got sech a sweet face—so kind an' nice. I'm sure any feller might go a long way further and find a sight wus gel 'n you."

Liz smiled. "That's on'y wot yer say. But it's good o' yer to say it."

"Tell me abart 'im," said Mary-Mary.

"E's the nicest, str'ightest bloke in the world!"

"O' course."

"But 'e really is!"

"So's mine."

'Then there must be two on 'em, that's all."

'Wot's 'is name?"

"Wall Masters."

"W—what?"

"Wall Masters. Least, thet's wot 'e's called. 'Is real name's Walter."

"Walter!"

"Wot's your bloke's name? You never towld me."

"Never mind abart 'im. Tell me abart Wall fust. 'Is 'e—do 'e love yer much?"

Liz blinked her eyes and sniffed. "'E useter," she said. "But—but 'e's cooled off a bit lately. I arst 'im abart it a day or two ago, and 'e told me 'e's got 'is eye on another gel. I don't know who she is, but I'd like to limb 'er, I would. I towld 'im so, an' 'e seemed put out. 'P'r'aps she won't 'ave me,' 'e sez. 'I ain't arst 'er yet,' 'e sez. 'Wot'll yer do if she won't 'ave yer?' I sez. 'I'll marry you,' 'e sez."

"An' would yer 'ave 'im arter thet?"

"O' course I would! I'd do anyfink to get 'im. It's 'ard ter be made a makeshift of, but I don't care s'long as 'e don't gimme the chuck."

"I wouldn't put up with it," said Mary-Mary hoarsely.

"You're different," said Liz. "There's plenty o' chances fer you. An' p'r'aps yer ain't so gorn on yer bloke as I am on mine." She wiped her eyes. "It do seem 'ard," she whimpered. "I ain't got much ter make me 'appy, Gawd knows, an' nar it seems as if I'm ter lose 'im. I dunno wot I shall do. She's sure ter 'ave 'im. Nobody couldn't 'elp likin' Wall. I alw's knoo 'e was too good fer me."

She bowed her face on her hands and wept. Mary-Mary, with her fingers interlaced in her lap, sat motionless in the shadow of the stack. Presently Liz looked up.

"You wouldn't b'lieve 'ow I've cried abart it," she said. "Every night I lay athinking of 'im. I on'y some ter live 'ere so as ter be nearer 'im. But 'e's on'y been to see me once since I came. An' 'e useter come every day!"

Mary-Mary shifted restlessly on her seat.

"I shouldn't worry abart it if I was you," she said.

"I can't 'elp it. You don't know wot 'e is ter me. O' it do seem 'ard!"

Mary-Mary rose unsteadily and went and laid her hand on Liz's head.

"I'm goin' in nar," she said.

"Goin' in!"

"Yuss."

"Wot for?"

"I've got a bit of a 'eadache."

"But it's cooler out 'ere. It'll git wuss if you go indoors. An' yer ain't told me abart your bloke yet."

"I'll tell yer some other night, not nar."

She kissed Liz on the forehead and climbed into her room and pulled down the window. She dropped on her bed and lay looking at the dirty ceiling with wide eyes. Her hand was pressed hard on her bosom and she breathed heavily.

For more than an hour she lay there. Then she rose and dressed her hair and put on her best frock. She went down to the street door and stood there waiting. She knew that Wall would pass by soon, and she wanted to see him.

He came at last. "'Ullo, Mary-Mary," he said. "'Ow goes it?"

She tossed her head. "Never you mind, Mister Masters," she said. "Yer a sight too free, it seems ter me."

He stared at her blankly.

"Wot's up?" he cried. "I ain't done nothink, 'ave I?"

"P'raps not. But my—my bloke——"

"Your bloke, I didn't know you'd got a bloke."

"Didn't yer! Well, I 'ave. An' 'e sez if yer come prowling around me any more 'e'll put the kybosh on yer quick. So you'd better chuck it."

And she went in and shut the door on him.

Edwin Pugh.

Digitized by Google

Legends of Wolfville.

By "Dan Quinn."

Wolfville is a Cattleman's Settlement in Arizona, and the Characters in these Legends are Cowboys.

No. 6.—Why Navajo Joe was Set Free.

Navajo Joe was out of luck. Ordinarily his vagaries are not regarded in Wolfville. His frequent appearance in its single street in a voluntary of nice feats of horsemanship, coupled with an exhibition of pistol shooting in which old tomato cans and beer bottles perform as targets, has hitherto cited no more baleful sentiment in the Wolfville bosom than disgust.

"Shootin' up the town a whole lot" is the name for this singular pastime as given by Navajo Joe, and up to date the exercise has passed unchallenged.

But to-day it is different. Camps, like individuals, have moods—now light, now dark—and so it is with Wolfville. At this time Wolfville is experiencing a wave of virtue. This may have come spontaneously from those seeds of order which, after all, dwell sturdily in the Wolfville breast. It may have been excited by the presence of a pale party of Eastern tourists just now abiding at the O.K. Hotel; gentlemen whom the rather sanguine sentiment of Wolfville credits with meditating an investment of treasure in her rocks and rills. But whatever the reason Wolfville virtue is certainly aroused—a condition of the public mind which makes it a bad day for Navajo Joe.

The angry sun smites hotly in the deserted causeway of Wolfville. The public is within doors. The Red Light saloon is thriving mightily. Those games known to the world as monte, high ball and faro, and which generally engross public thought, are drowsy and dull enough; but the counter whereat the citizen of Wolfville gathers with his peers in absorption of the incautious compounds of the place is fairly sloppy from excess of trade. Notwithstanding the torrid heat this need not sound strangely; Wolfville learning is strongly homeopathic. Wolfville, when it is blazing hot, drinks whiskey.

But to-day there is further reason for this consumption. Wolfville is excited, and this provokes a thirst. Navajo Joe rendering himself prisoner to Jack Moore, rescue or no rescue, has by order of that sagacious body been conveyed by his captor before the Vigilance Committee and is to be tried for his life.

What was Navajo Joe's immediate crime? Certainly not a grave one. Ten days before it would hardly have earned a comment; but to-day, in its spasm of virtue, and sensitive in its memories of the erratic courses of Navajo Joe aforetime, Wolfville has gravely and grimly taken possession of that volatile gentleman for punishment. He has killed a Chinaman. It happened thus:

"Yere comes that prairie dog, Navajo Joe, all spraddled out," says Dave Tutt. He is peering from the window of the Red Light, to which he has been drawn by the noise of hoofs. There is a sense of injury disclosed in the tone born of the awakened virtue of Wolfville.

"It looks like this camp can assoom no airs," remarks Cherokee Hall in a distempered way, "but this yere miser'ble Joe comes chargin' up to queer it."

As he spoke that offending personage, unconscious of the great change in Wolfville morals, sweeps up the street, expressing gladsome and ecstatic whoops and whirling his pistol on his forefinger like a wheel of light. One of the tourists stands in the door of the hotel, smoking a pipe in short, brief puffs of astonishment, and reviews the amazing performance. Navajo Joe at once and abruptly halts. Gazing for a disgruntled moment on the man from the East, he takes the pipe from its owner's horrified mouth and places it in his own.

"Smokin' of pipes," he vouchsafes in condemnatory explanation, "is unelegant and degradin', an' don't you do it no more in my presence. I'm mighty sensitive that way about pipes, an' I don't aim to tolerate 'em none whatever."

This solution of his motives seems entirely satisfactory to Navajo Joe. He sits puffing and gazing at the tourist, while the latter stands dumbly staring, with a morsel of the ravished meerschaum still between his lips. What further might have followed in the way of oratory or over-acts may not be stated, for the thoughts of the guileless Joe suddenly receive a new direction. A Chinaman voluminously robed emerges from the New York Store whither he has been taken by dint of soap.

"Whatever is this Mogul doin' in camp, I'd like to know?" inquires Navajo Joe disdainfully. "I shore leaves orders when I'm here last for the immejit removal of all sech. I wouldn't mind it, but with strangers visitin' us this way it plumb mortifies me to death."

"Oh, well," he continues in tones of weary and bitter reflection, "I'm the only public-sperited man in this yere outfit so all reforms falls nacheral to me. Still, I plays my hand. I'm simply a pore, lone white man; but jest the same I makes an example of this specimen to let 'em know whatever a white man is, anyhow."

Then comes the short, emphatic utterance of a six-shooter. A puff of smoke vanishes quickly in the hot air, and the next census will be short one Asiatic.

In a moment arrives a brief order from Enright, the chief of the Vigilance Committee, to Jack Moore. That gentleman proffers a Winchester and a request to surrender simultaneously, and Navajo Joe, realising his fate, at once accedes.

Digitized by Google

"Of course, gents," says Enright apologetically, as he convenes the committee in the New York Store, "I don't say that Joe is held for beefing the Chinaman sole and alone. The fact is he's been having a mighty sight too gay a time of late, an' so I thinks it's a good, safe play, bein' as it's a hot day an' we has the time, to sorter call the committee together an' ask it's views, whether we better hang this yere Navajo Joe yet or not?"

"Mr. President," responds Dave Tutt, "if I'm in order an' to get the sense of the meetin' to flowin' easy and smooth, I moves we takes this Navajo Joe an' proceeds to stretch his neck. I ain't basin' this yere on no defunct Chinaman, nor nothin' in partic'lar, but lettin' her slide under the general head of being adapted to public good."

"Do I hear any remarks?" asks Enright, "if not I takes Mr. Tutt's very excellent motion as the census of this meetin', and it's hang she is."

"Not intendin' of no interruptin'," remarks Texas Thompson, "I wants to say this: I'm a quiet man myse'f, an' nacheral aims to keep Wolfville a quiet place likewise. For which all I shorely favours a-hangin' of Joe. He's given us a heap of trouble. Like Tutt, I don't make no pint on the Chinaman; we spares him too easy. But this Joe is allers a-ridin' an' a-yellin' an' a-shootin' up the camp till I'm plumb tired out. So I says, let's hang him, an' suggest as a eligible nook thar for the windmill back of the dance hall."

"Yes," says Enright, "the windmill is upholstered for sech plays, an' as delays is aggravatin', the committee might as well canter over right now an' get this off its mind."

"See yere, Mr. President," interrupts Navajo Joe in a tone of one ill-used, "what for a deal is this, I rises to ask, anyhow?"

"You can gamble this as a square American deal," replies Enright confidently. "You're entitled to your say when the committee is done. Jest figure out what cards you needs an' we deals to you in a minute."

"I solely wants to know if I'm in on this ye're play, that's all," retorts Navajo Joe.

"Gents," said Doc Peets, who has sat silently listening, "I'm with you on this hanging. These Eastern sharps is here in our midst. It'll impress 'em that Wolfville means business, an' is a good, safe, quiet place. They'll carry reports East as will do us credit, an' thar you be. As to the propriety of stringin' Joe, little need be said. If the Chinaman ain't good enough, if assaultin' of a innocent tenderfoot ain't enough, you can bet he's done plenty besides as merits a lariat. He wouldn't deny it himse'f if you asks him."

There is a silence succeeding the rather spirited address of Doc Peets, on whose judgment Wolfville has been taught to lean. At last Enright breaks it by inquiring of Navajo Joe if he has anything to offer.

"I reckon it's your play now, Navajo," he says, "so come a-runnin'."

"Why," urges Navajo Joe disgustedly, "these proceedin's make me sick. I shore objects to this hangin'; an' all for a measly Chinaman, too. This yere Wolfville outfit is gettin' a mighty sight too stylish for me. It's growin' that perdadbinged tic'lor it can't take its reg'ler drinks, an'——"

"Stop right thar," says Enright with dignity, rapping a shoebox with his sixshooter. "Don't you cuss the Chair none, 'cause the Chair won't have it. It's parliamentary law if anyone cusses the Chair he's out of order, same as it's law that all chips on the floor goes to the house. When a man's out of order once, that settles it, he can't talk no more that meetin'. Seein' we're aimin' to hang you, we won't claim nothin' on you this time, but be careful how you comes trackin' 'round agin, an' don't fret us. You sabe? Don't go an' fret us none."

"I won't fret you," retorts Navajo Joe. "I don't have to fret you. What I says is this: I s'pose I sees fifty men stretched by committees between yere and The Dallas, an' I never knows a man who's roped yet on account of no Chinaman. An' I offers a side bet of a hundred even it ain't law to hang people on account of downin' no Chinaman. But you all seems sot on this, an' so I tells you what I'll do. I'm a plain man, an' there's no filigree work on me, an' if it's all congenial to the gents here assembled—r.ot puttin' it on the grounds of no miserable author of a laundry, but jest to meet public sentiment half way—I'll gamble my life, hang or no hang, on the first ace turned from the box, Cherokee deal. Does it go?"

Wolfville tastes are bizarre. A proposition original and new finds in its very novelty an argument for Wolfville favour. It befalls, therefore, that the unusual offer of Navajo Joe to stake his life on a turn at faro is approvingly criticised. The general disposition agrees to it, and even the resolute Enright sees no good reason to object.

"Navajo Joe," says Enright, "we don't have to take this chance, an' it's a-makin' of a bad precedent as may tangle us hereafter, but Wolfville goes you this time. Cherokee, turn the cards for the ace."

"Turn square," remarks Navajo Joe, with an air of interest. "You wouldn't go to sand no deck nor deal thick an' thin agin perishin' flesh an' blood, would you?"

"I should shore say no," replies Cherokee. "I wouldn't do it for money, an' you can bet I don't do it none when the epeesode comes under the head of relaxation."

"Which, the same bein' satisfactory," says Navajo Joe, "roll your game. I plays it open."

"I dunno," observes Dan Boggs, meditatively caressing his chin, "but I'm thinkin' I'd a-coppered."

The turn proceeded in silence, and, as may readily happen in that interesting device called faro, a split falls out. Two aces come together.

"Ace lose, ace win," says Cherokee, pausing. "Whatever be we goin' to do now, I'd like to know?"

"Gents," announces Enright with dignity, "a split like this yere creates a doubt, an' it's law that doubts goes to the prisoner, same as a bull goes to the first man as ties it down an' runs his brand on to it. This camp of Wolfville abides by the law, and Navajo Joe goes free. However, he should remember this little graze and restrain his methods hereafter. Some of them ways of his is sooicidal, to say the least, an' if he's wise he alters his system from now on."

"So the camp really lose, and this yere person, Joe, goes free?" says Jack Moore dejectedly. "I allers was agin faro as a game; where we all misses it agregrious is, we don't play him freeze-out."

"Do you know, Cherokee," whispers Faro Nell, as her eyes turn softly to that personage of the deal box, "I'd sooner he goes loose than have two bonnets from Tucson." And Cherokee Hall pinches her cheek with a delicate accuracy born of his profession and smiles approval.

Digitized by Google

A WHEEL TRAGEDY

"Are you tired?"

"No."

The bright flush on her cheek glowed rosily; there were no signs of fatigue in her eye.

"Glorious spot this," panted the man, as they reached the summit of a hill, "but hard work up the incline."

He was just behind her.

"Halt!" she cried merrily, springing off her bicycle as she held up a warning hand.

"This is too beautiful to pass, we must stop and gaze down on to the world below."

She leant against her machine and surveyed the scene.

He laid his iron steed gently on the soft grass and came close beside her.

"What do you see?" he asked.

"A beautiful earth," she replied, "all peace and plenty."

"Deceptive as everything; nothing is what it appears! Poor earth! what tales you could tell!"

He pointed to the distant villages with a scornful shrug of his manly shoulders.

"What a wonderfully smooth path that is—straight down the hill into the blue lake beneath," she said, her strange eyes following its descent. "We might walk down and dip our hands into the cool water, but it would be such a long way up again."

"The lake is very deep just there. I have read of this place in guide-books, it is called 'The Right Road to Death.'"

"If you ran in the darkness—yes."

The flush died from her face.

"It was not a bad idea of mine," he said, "a honeymoon on 'wheels.'"

"No, indeed."

"A three weeks' spin."

"Only so long? I think a month."

"No, count back. We were married on the——"

She wheeled her machine to a bank with an indifferent shrug of her shoulders, touching the metal lovingly.

"A good compensation for a honeymoon!" she whispered to the unanswering machine.

He followed, and sat beside her on the green slope.

"It is three weeks and two days."

"Really?"

"Yes, why that indifferent tone?'

"Oh! I am so stiff."

"Yet you flew along apparently without an effort! No, things are not what they seem."

"Have you ever heard of the beautiful, bright sulphur-coloured rose?" she asked.

"No."

"It grows in Australia. A lovely flower, but when you pick it to feast on its delights, lo! and behold, a dreadful odour as of decayed fruit."

"We have been married some time," said the man; "our honeymoon is nearly over. Don't you think it is time we discovered our decayed fruit? You spoke once of confessions being made with safety after the fatal knot is tied. If I show up my weak side, will you uncloak yours?"

"Why take it for granted I have one?"

"You are a woman," he replied.

A sudden light flashed in her eyes.

"You are right, it is a compact!"

"To begin with," he said, staring into space, "ideals are all humbug. There is nothing really beautiful in life. It only appears so."

Digitized by Google

"Yes," from the woman doubtfully.

"Marriage is only a prosaic routine, after—after three weeks."

"Y—es."

"You think I am a very rising clever man, but it's all nonsense. I talk big because it pays. I stuff the people up, don't you know; they swallow it easily, a crowd always gapes. You can put anything into open mouths."

"I gaped," she vouchsafed thoughtfully.

"You did," laughing.

"Don't; it hurts."

Pain is greatly imagination—that sort of pain."

I told you my father was a country squire."

She nodded aimlessly.

"Well, he wasn't. He failed as a tradesman, and died two years ago in gaol."

She bit her lips,

"You lied to me, then."

"I often do," speaking lightly; "don't you ever?"

"Yes," sitting upright, and drawing away from him.

"I say—really—do you mean that?"

She pushed her hat off her rich red hair. He did not like the weird new glitter in her eyes.

"Yes, did you ever wonder why I ran away with you when I had a big house and money?"

"I thought—you—loved me!" he stammered.

"You—you were mistaken, who believe in nothing. What of ideals?"

He bit his lip.

"Go on," he hissed.

"I married for freedom—I escaped my tormentors!"

"Your people were kindness itself."

"You saw them at a distance. But the secret that we bury in the bosom of our home is kept from the world, which is not, you see, what it appears! There is a hereditary curse upon us, and I—it is believed—am tainted! The germs are in me, so they say," rising with a mocking laugh. "In a year it may break out, or at any moment," her voice rising with excitement. "I was to be sent to a big white house with iron bars before the windows. Think of it," clutching the handles of her machine, "but this has saved me—this wheel and a man. What a strange combination?" showing her white teeth.

The man looked at her, his face horribly changed.

"Is this a ghastly joke?"

She shook her head.

"Madness!" he muttered under his breath.

The woman started back with a shrill cry. She put her hand to her forehead as if trying to collect her scattered thoughts, and remember what she had said.

"I told you that?"

Her voice sent an icy chill through his veins.

"Not exactly. But the curse—tell me for mercy's sake—what is the curse?"

"If it were madness?" she cried, "what then?"

"You had better be at the bottom of the lake," said he.

The sight of the gradually sloping path—growing steeper at the foot—met her fevered gaze.

The wheels were spinning round, she was whirling away towards "The Right Road to Death."

A shout from the man—a wild, triumphant laugh from the woman—ringing with mad mirth!

Then the dizzy sight of the flying red hair, afloat on the wind, the bicycle going at break-neck speed down that dizzy descent, on—on—like a hideous dream, with the blue water ever before her bloodshot eyes, the rushing air on her face, and confused thought in her brain.

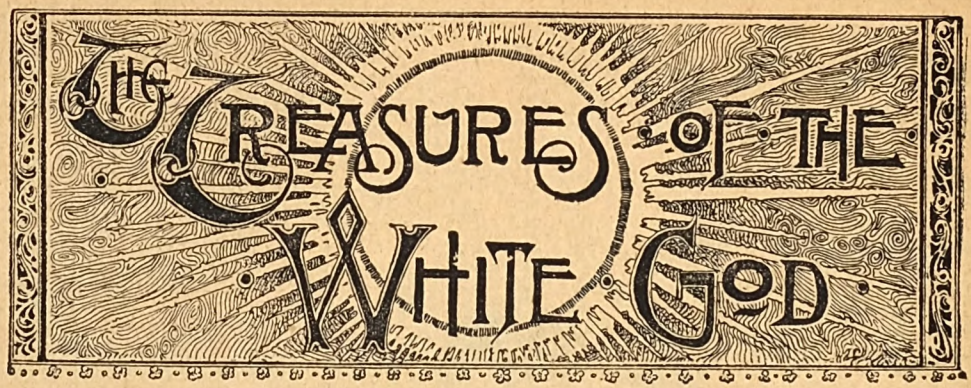
Nearer the calm, sweet lake that fearful vision sped, till the terrible climax was reached: a sudden opening of the water, then stillness and peace, the singing of birds, and sound of distant sheep bells.

The lake lay like a sleeping child at the foot of the hill. Could any ghastly secret disturb its endless rest?

W. G.

"Madness!" he muttered, under his breath.

Digitized by Google



The Story of a Shameful Crime.

CHAPTER XX.

What the Letters Told.

"Impossible! incredible!"—what?

So crushed and depressed was the author of that mystifying sentiment, that it is doubtful if he could have coherently answered the proposition at that moment of intense emotion.

But the papers told. Yes, the documents in his faltering grasp were the cause of all Adrian Burgoyne's strange perturbation, and they could reveal the marvellous discovery his visit to the merchant's house had brought about.

They were three in number—two letters and a newspaper clipping. From the mass of documents littering the desk of Richard Sheldon the pretended physician had selected these, as most closely and vitally bearing upon the case in hand.

Like augmentative disclosures, they had been brought to light consecutively, and in their true, systematic order, and they comprised revelations beginning with a hint, interlarded with a startling, tangible announcement, and terminating in a climax that might well thrill the astounded Burgoyne to mingled wonder, dread and alarm.

They told a story plainly, coherently; they comprised a chronicle, intelligible, illuminating. They may repeat it here far more tangible and clearly than detailed description.

The first of the documents was a hurried scrawl.

It was addressed to Richard Sheldon, and it was signed by Colonel Lytle, two weeks back:

"You have insisted that the girl, Beatrice Ringold, is as innocent and ignorant of our schemes of the cipher alphabet as she pretends to be. I believe so, too, now.

"I have carried out your directions regarding her. She can never injure or unmask us. Why should we injure her? So I have found a new guardian for her, a lady living in the suburbs who operates an asylum for the mildly insane, on a small scale, and in a private way. Here she will be well practically under close surveillance, so that she cannot escape or write to a lover or friends if she would. Here she will remain until our scheme has been carried through—say, in the next two months. Then, I agree with you, that the graceful, generous thing to do with her is to set her adrift, with a couple of thousand, and enjoy the fortune we shall surely soon secure, with no fear of any future trouble from her.

"For the fortune is surely ours! This very day I have found a man, a master of fencing and the fistic art, formerly a native of Mexico. He informs me that the symbols contained in the parchment message that Detective Dean found in Burgoyne's bed are part of a system of sign-writing quite common in Mexico. It is now in his hands. I expect a translation of the same to-morrow."

The parchment message found in Burgoyne's bed! Ah! how that announcement unnerved the pretended doctor! How readily it explained the motive of Colonel Lytle in visiting Patrice—his frantic anxiety for the possession of the cipher alphabet key contained in the Bible cover! She had been right—they had found the lost parchment message, and the startled and appalled Burgoyne could now readily see how.

Patrice was safe. Virtually a prisoner, she would still be treated kindly. The relief experienced by Burgoyne at this discovery allowed his mind to dwell solely upon the other issues of the case in hand.

The second letter was also from Lytle, but it was dated a week later.

"The fortune is ours!" it announced jubilantly.

"To-morrow I will see you personally, and give details, and only write to assuage your natural anxiety. My main trouble has been to blind the Mexican fencing-master so he would get no inkling of the true value of the treasure, or a hint of our plans, and I have given him the parchment message in sections, and blindfolded and hoodwinked him into translating a character at a time, so that by no possibility can he patch it up in its entirety for his own enlightenment or use.

"Here is the entire translation, verbatim."

And here followed, word for word, line for line, sentence for sentence, the exact, the identical translation that Adrian Burgoyne had made of Ralph Ringold's secret, two weeks previous.

"From this you will readily discern," went on Lytle's letter, "that I must go at once to Mexico, to Guayli, to the cave of Bureldo. I have made definite inquiries regarding the place. It is only accessible through petty provinces, torn and distracted with internecine strife. Riot, insurrection, and bloodshed are rife. It is worth a man's life to venture alone in the district.

"Worse than that; once I arrive, the Aztec devotees will resist any encroachment on their territory, and will certainly baffle any attempt to remove their most honoured shrine of worship, the oldest idol in Mexico—the ancient, revered object of their superstitious regard—the White God.

Digitized by Google

"After learning all this, I formulated a prompt plan of procedure. Strategy must be called to our aid. Money and influence must abet our scheme. Observe how finely I work it!

"You must go to the officials of the great Columbian Exposition—the World's Fair. You must represent to them that, as a public-spirited citizen and a lover of the fine arts, you wish to contribute an unique and valuable addition to their exhibits.

"What you propose to do is to send a trusty agent, myself, to Mexico, to gather curiosities and rare paintings. Further than that, I am to make photographs of the relics contained in the great cave of Bureldo, and, if possible, purchase the famous White God, or secure its use for exhibition at the Exposition. They sanction this arrangement, they provide you with letters to the Mexican authorities that will insure me a safe journey through governmental territory. From the Mexican consul in Chicago you also get a strong letter to the monks of the San Miguel Monastery; they will aid me in my plans; their friendly influence will enable me to visit the Aztec cave. I will photograph the idols, and, some fine night, the famous White God is missing. Presto—change! We scurry away with it, we rip it open. Treasure, fortune—a million! The great philanthropist and art collector, Richard Sheldon, Esq., donates a wonderful curio to humanity, and we have scored a triumph, under the guise of a public-spirited generosity.

"This is my plan. You provide the letters, the sanction of the World's Fair, so as to give glamour, a motive and security, to my visit to Mexico. You furnish the influence and the cash; I will hire my assistants, and I pledge you that I will, within two months from date, place in your possession Ralph Ringold's hidden fortune and the famous White God."

What a scheme! what bold plotting! Adrian Burgoyne's brain reeled as he read the letter.

But it was the third discovery he had made in Richard Sheldon's desk that set the coping-stone to the entire structure of fraud.

This was a fresh newspaper clipping, a day or two old, and it read:

A Valuable Contribution.—Richard Sheldon, Esq., a public-spirited merchant of Manchester, has dispatched to Mexico a commission authorised to secure a complete collection of Aztec curiosities. No pains or expense will be spared to secure for the great World's Fair the rarest treasures of a country rich in mementoes of legendary lore. Colonel Lytle, Mr. Sheldon's authorised agent in the enterprise, left for his tour of exploration on the Southern express last evening.

That was the chronicle complete! No need of further detail—no deed to ascertain if Richard Sheldon had gone with his ally and accomplice a part of the way, or, at some fashionable resort, was resting, and awaiting the materialisation of his fond hopes. No time trying to seek Patrice! No use unmasking these plotters to the public!

No; everything—all motives, all energies—must centre on one theme, vital, essential, important——

THE WHITE GOD!

Within its lifeless embrace, behind its baleful mask of stone, reposed the hidden fortune of dead Ralph Ringold.

Once possessed by the schemers, divided, dissipated, Patrice was a beggar.

Lytle had gone for it. Lytle, backed by money and influence, would find priest, fanatic and people ready to give him a warm welcome.

He, Adrian Burgoyne, poor, obscure, a week in the rear, had just eight shillings in cash to pit against the thousands of his rivals in the quest.

Two men sought the treasure! two men knew the secret of its hiding-place.

It was only a question of who could reach it first.

The shock of defeat, dread and dismay began to fade from Burgoyne's face as he reflected over all this.

He sprang to his feet suddenly; his eyes flashed resolutely.

"Somewhere," he spoke solemnly, "Patrice Ringold is thinking of me, praying for me; somewhere along the long road of fraud, cruelty and wrong, a pitfall lies in wait for these iniquitous plotters; somehow I shall yet succeed in my single-handed fight against evil and duplicity. Heaven give me strength in my hour of need! For, failure or triumph, life or death, I start for Mexico and the White God this very hour!"

CHAPTER XXI.

On the Trail.

A tempest of autumn rain was sweeping the street as a lone form sped from the rear of one of the great termini of the Garden City, and made his way rapidly down the bewildering net-work of railway lines, and along the sheltering avenues formed by long lines of trucks.

It was nearly midnight—midnight of the fateful day when Adrian Burgoyne had so fortuitously discovered the plans of his enemies, and it was Adrian Burgoyne himself who now threaded the maze of the station yards, taking the initial step in an enterprise, having its motive the baffling of Colonel Lytle's subtle plans.

"That is it," he murmured, pausing suddenly, and he halted near a luggage car, about the centre of a long train, with engine and red-lantern attached, all ready to start forth on its midnight journey.

Inquiry and investigation had led to his fixing upon this train an hour previous. The discovery that it was ticketed for a point in Texas at the very terminus of a line running nearly to the Mexican border, settled in Adrian Burgoyne's mind the question of transportation. He had determined to get to Mexico, to Guayli, as soon as possible. Without money to purchase a ticket, with no means of readily earning the same, realising that every passing hour was bringing his enemy, Colonel Lytle, nearer and nearer to the cave of Bureldo, to the White God and the precious treasure held within its keeping, he decided to improve the first opportunity that offered to help him on the course pursued by Lytle.

He had been over the route twice before, and was familiar with it. Once arrived at the Mexican border, the rest was simple. Acquainted with the language and ways of the people knowing the topography of the country thoroughly, he would possess a decided advantage over a man entering a strange district for the first time.

Lytle would proceed leisurely and with caution. His semi-official character, as an agent of the World's Fair, would involve considerable red tape; he would waste time cajoling the authorities, making friends with the priests at the San Miguel monastery. Burgoyne planned more speedy progress for himself, once safe on the Mexican soil.

In five days, a week at the most, he had calculated the train would reach the terminus of the line. He had now a little package which represented the last penny he possessed in the world, and it contained food for his journey. The side doors of the vans were doubly locked and sealed, but at one end a little window stood open, and through this, with difficulty he climbed.

Half-way, he started and hurried his progress, for approaching voices warned him. It would not do to be discovered by any of the employés. That would mean a prompt eviction, a further delay. He struggled through the aperture, but in his precipitation the parcel of food slipped from under his coat, where he had stowed it, struck the footboard, and fell between the lines.

The voices were now directly at the side of the truck. Concealment was imperative. He dropped inside on his hands, landed on a heap of boxes, and crouched, gasping for breath after his rapid exercise, and listened intently.

Digitized by Google

"When they pass on, I can recover the parcel," he planned.

Alas! the outsiders had halted. He heard the padlock on the door jangle as one of the intruders tried it.

"All safe?" queried a sharp voice.

"O K."

"Through?"

"Yes."

"See if the ventilating window at the end is all right."

Burgoyne thrilled as a form jumped to the footboard, and a dim outline was revealed against the very aperture he had just penetrated.

"Open," was the terse report.

"Shut and lock it."

Slam—snap! The watcher's heart stood still. A barred wooden grating was dragged across the only avenue of exit from the truck hitherto open to him. He was a prisoner. He could not now reach the lost bundle of food. To all intents and purposes, Adrian Burgoyne was shut in perforce to a long, gloomy journey, with the boxes and bales about him, unless he promptly revealed the fact that he was a stowaway, and missed this extraordinarily fortunate chance of reaching Mexico.

Signals were shouted outside a minute later, followed by shrill whistling.

The wheels began to grind along the lines, then they began to clatter, and the train was fairly started on its southern journey.

Burgoyne had never dreamed that the window at the end of the van would be closed. He had counted on passing through it numberless times at night during the trip, to secure water, when the train stopped. As he grasped the strong iron bars now, as he tried the double-locked doors, he uttered an exclamation of dismayed alarm. It would be difficult to force his way to liberty, unless he chose to call out to the men during a stop. He must remain a prisoner until the train reached its destination.

"I'll try and stand the hunger and thirst until the very last moment," he decided heroically. "It will be just so many miles covered on the route to Mexico. There I must get, and this was the quickest, the only way for me."

He made a pillow of a bale containing carpets or rugs; and, thinking of Patrice, sunk into a profound slumber.

Only the realisation that every hour of progress meant twenty miles accomplished of his journey, sustained the prisoner and enabled him to uncomplainingly endure the monotony, the hunger and the thirst that assailed him all through the next day. He lay down at dark again, with his throat so parched, and the cravings of hunger so intense, that he could not sleep, and at early dawn, the third day of his journey, decided that he had better seek an escape ere he became too weak and overcome to help himself or make himself heard.

He approached the little window and, seizing the bars, set himself to the task of endeavouring to unloosen it. Vain hope, however, and when the train stopped at stations the particular truck he was in halted so far from the station that twice, when he shouted vigorously for deliverance, no one appeared to hear him.

"I must get out of this! My throat seems on fire. Water! water! I cannot live without it!" he gasped, almost delirously.

He kicked at a heavy box on the floor of the van, intent on loosening one of its boards, so as to secure an implement to pry the iron bars of the window out of place. He got a long split piece loose finally, but, as he did so, the breakage released a whole row of parcels packed in the box.

With some curiosity, and not a little hope, as a slight savoury aroma pervaded the air, suggestive of food, he took up and inspected one of the packages, tearing off its coverings.

"Food!" he ejaculated, with brightening eyes, as he read on the outside of a light tin box the record of its contents.

The packet and its companion parcels represented a consignment of potted meats. His knife-blade soon had the cover loose. The juicy, palatable morsels glided down his parched throat like nectar.

Ah! that was refreshing, rejuvenating. What new strength the food infused into frame and mind. If he only had water now!

As if in direct and immediate answer to his present wish, a swift patter on the top of the van sounded even above the roaring, monotonous grind of the wheels. He ran to the window. The shower grew to a torrent, He emptied the meat out of the can, and extended this latter as far out of the window as he could reach. It caught as well the drippings of the roof. He caught a pint of the precious fluid; he assuaged his burning thirst feverishly, ravenously. Then filling the can to the brim, emptying a second one of its contents, and filling that as well, he placed both in a safe corner of the truck, and sat down, content, hopeful, certain of food and water in abundance for the residue of his journey.

Five days later the agent at the terminus of the line unlocked the door of the van, drew it open, and passed on to the next one.

When he came back to inspect the contents of the trucks in turn, he found the blue van interior a scene of some disorder, with one broken package, and two cases of meat missing.

"A tramp, a stowaway," he soliloquised. "He must have had a dull ride of it, clear from Chicago. More decent than the average run, too. He's only used what he needed to sustain life, and didn't rip open and steal the balance."

The tramp, the stowaway, Adrian Burgoyne, had slipped from the van unperceived. A decent passenger was he, indeed, for, if any one mental resolve in his mind was powerful and earnest, it was a determination, at the very first opportunity, to remit to the shippers of the case of meat that had sustained his life during his rigorous journey, ten times the value of the rifled cans.

With a light heart and a hopeful eye, at eventide that same day, Adrian Burgoyne stood at the banks of a broad river, and scanned its opposite shores.

He had arrived at the Rio Grande. Beyond lay the promised land, the treasure, the White God—Mexico!

CHAPTER XXII.

In the Quicksands.

"Help!"

The cry rang out in accents of weakness and alarm, and echoed ominously through the rocky fastnesses of a deep gorge situated in the wildest portion of the Guayli district.

It was an involuntary, a hopeless appeal it seemed, and the person who uttered it realised the fact fully.

Through serpent-hunted brake, past forests of bewildering extent and luxuriance adown mighty cañons and across sun-baked plateaus, the daring, intrepid Adrian Burgoyne had forced his way for over three weeks.

Perils by land, perils by water, perils aerial, even, had menaced every foot of his path. The deep streams he was compelled to swim abounded in treacherous quicksands; every thicket seemed to hold a beast of prey; snakes menaced, bearing death inevitable in the blighting tips of their forked tongues; an oppressive air, dense with miasma, or breeding cyclonic disturbances that, later, nearly swept him to destruction, seemed ever present. The last few days of his arduous journey towards Guayli had been rife with terrors that turn the hair grey, and prepare men to face the ordinary dangers of existence with reckless indifference.

Digitized by Google

Twice had he fallen into an ambush of the rival armies. Once, captured, he was condemned to be shot as a spy, escaping by a daring dash for liberty, that was accompanied by the sharp tattoo of half a hundred rifle balls, as they ricocheted among the rocks in a grim dance for his life, and now, fairly in sight of Guayli, with less than thirty miles between himself and the cave of Bureldo, the intrepid Englishman had stumbled into a trap in which it seemed the leagued forces of Nature were bent on dragging him down to destruction, with no trace left to tell how he had died.

It was nearly evening, and, coming to the banks of a bright, sparkling stream, he decided to cross it, and investigate the source of a thin, curling pillar of smoke among the timber, which apparently marked a camp or a habitation, on the opposite shore. He forded and swam the stream in safety, and with little difficulty. He started across a sandy waste to gain the thicket lining the river. Then, of a sudden, he paused, glanced down at his feet, and as suddenly sprang forward, as if a thousand serpents were grouped about the spot.

In vain! More deadly, menacing and certain than the swiftest "rattler," snakes of sand, ominous, grasping, deluding, had began to encircle his feet. He sank a foot, dragged himself free, stumbled, fell, sank deeper, and then, with a cry of horror, wavered ankle-deep in the meshes of a monster that shifted, rolled, enveloped him, with the sickening, deadly motion of a devil-fish.

"The quicksands!"

He gasped the words, a cold void of horror chilling heart and brain. He essayed to drag one foot free. An inch of upward progress attained, the disturbed particles only formed a new and stronger suction. He was knee-deep now.

Sinking—sinking—sinking! His breathing grew husky, his eyes terrified.

Waist-deep! He had ceased to struggle. Effort was in vain. In frenzied appeal, one shrill shriek rang from his bloodless lips.

"Help!"

The echoes of his voice rang adown the cañon, clear and resonant, and then came back to him mocking, tantalising, unanswered.

Adrian Burgoyne gave himself up for lost. He cast one last, lingering look at the fair sunlit scene, his soul reached out in memory for one final thought of the woman he so devotedly loved.

Then he closed his eyes. The deadly quicksands were heart-high now. In fancy, the tickling particles answered the wild throbbings of the excited life-pulse.

"Caramba—the sands!" Burgoyne opened his eyes with a shock; a faint soul of hope illumined his stricken face.

Peering from a rock was a man, Mexican in garb, harsh, repellant of feature, cunning, cruel of eye.

In Spanish he had jerked forth the startled hail; in Spanish, tumultuous, incoherent, Adrian Burgoyne replied:

"Help! It is the quicksands! A rope—a chain!"

"No, this!"

The Mexican disappeared behind the rock, but only for a moment. When he reappeared in view he was staggering under the weight of a great log, part of the dead trunk of a tree.

He poised it across the rock. Then, apparently, regardless of the consequences, so long as the end desired was gained, he gave it a violent push.

It shot forward, barely missing the head of the uncomprehending Burgoyne. It fell directly in front of him.

"Catch to it—hold firm!" shouted the Mexican.

"Ah!" panted Burgoyne hopefully, "I understand now."

He threw both arms about the log. There he clung tenaciously.

He could feel the shifting sands about his form, but they dragged him down no longer. The resistance offered by the log, with either end lying outside the unstable circle of quicksand, was an anchor of security.

The Mexican again disappeared. This time he was absent for fully an hour.

"He surely cannot mean to desert me!" soliloquised Burgoyne anxiously.

No, he reappeared at last. A man as villainous looking as himself was with him. They bore a stout rope, and within ten minutes, with the strong cable tied under his arms, Burgoyne was dragged to terra firma in safety.

Inert, exhausted, he lay on the greensward for some time unable to move, bestowing grateful glances upon his rescuers. They were men, judging from their looks, whom he would not have cared to meet in a lonely mountain path, but they had saved his life, and his heart went out to them thankfully.

As soon as he was able to walk, the Mexican assisted him through the timber, arriving finally at the source of the smoke that had attracted Burgoyne's attention—a rude hut. Near by, half-a-dozen dispirited looking half-breeds were digging and sluicing near a mine opening, a great hulking ruffian of a fellow directing their labour with the aid of a cowhide whip.

The Mexican treated Burgoyne as if he was some regal guest, providing him with an ample supper, a comfortable bed, and an appetising breakfast in the morning.

From subtle, guarded inquiries, Burgoyne ascertained the exact position of the monastery and the cave.

The Mexican and the companion who had helped to rescue Burgoyne listened politely to all the latter had to say, and as politely replied to all his questions, but there was a latent secretiveness, a sinister, watchful token in their manner, as Burgoyne started to leave them with renewed expressions of his gratitude and full appreciation of their kindly offices.

"I will say adieu," he remarked, taking each warmly by the hand; "but some day I shall return, to thank you more substantially for your great goodness to me. Adieu, señores."

"One moment!" spoke the owner of the hut, stepping forward and blocking Burgoyne's exit.

"Ay, you go not this way, surely," interpolated his companion, lounging against the open doorway, so as to completely block the exit.

"Eh? why! what is the matter?" queried the bewildered Burgoyne.

"The señor is a just man, I hope?" insinuated the Mexican gravely.

"I hope so, too."

"And yet he leaves us with only hollow thanks!"

"They are sincere, believe me!"

"They count for little, where bread is scarce and money precious."

"Oh!" exclaimed Burgoyne, with an ingenuous smile—"the señor wishes pay for his services?"

"Was it not earned?"

"Truly, doubly."

"Then?——"

"I am sorry to say I am penniless. I have not a single coin."

The Mexican scrowled darkly.

"And yet the stranger partook of our scanty stock freely?" he said.

"In our country—" began Burgoyne.

"I care not for your country!" interrupted the Mexican hotly. "I must have my pay!"

"At some future time."

"No! Now!"

Burgoyne was amazed at the sudden change in his host. From the smiling, open-faced friend he had become transformed abruptly into the sordid, scheming tyrant.

"It is useless to speak of recompense to a pauper!"

"I must be paid!" affirmed the Mexican decidedly.

Digitized by Google

"Then allow me to return in a week—in a month. I shall have ample means."

"No! Now!"

"Yes, now, by all and every means!" piped in the Mexican's companion.

"Impossible!"

"Not at all."

"But, if I have no money——"

"There is still a way!"

The Mexican had taken out his knife, and, a sinister expression on his swarthy face, he toyed with it menacingly.

"What is the way, may I ask?" queried Burgoyne.

"The señor must remain!"

"What good will my detention do you?"

"The señor must work."

Burgoyne gave a vivid start.

"In other words," proceeded the Mexican craftily, "according to the law of Mexico, a debtor must pay his obligations in labour when he has no money with which he may liquidate the indebtedness. The peon law holds good in this case. The señor must remain. He shall work in the mine under the overseer. He becomes my property—my slave!"

(To be continued.)

£100

Will be given to the person who collects the greatest number of Coupons from

SHORT STORIES, PEARSON'S WEEKLY, AND THE STORY TELLER.

Short Stories Coupon is on the second page of cover. All Coupons are to be kept until the end of the year, and then forwarded to the offices of S.S.

A delightful Serial Story by JOAN BARRETT, entitled,

"A PLAYTHING OF FATE,"

Has just commenced in THE STORY TELLER.

PUBLISHED EVERY WEDNESDAY. PRICE 1D.

POSTAL RATES.

SHORT STORIES will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Pearson's Magazine.

NO. II. PUBLISHED FEBRUARY 1, 1896.

CONTENTS:

Artists and their Work.
Brief Notes on Prominent Painters: with Representative Examples of their Work—Pictures and their Prices—Some Royal Artists.

Glimpses of Paradise.
Ideal Illustrations by Holland Tringham.

One of the Bravest Deeds I Ever Saw.
CAPTAIN RONALD CAMPBELL'S HEROISM IN THE TRANSVAAL.
Illustrated by R. Caton Woodville, R.I.
Lt.-Gen. Sir Evelyn Wood, V.C.

Billiam.
Illustrated by W. F. Calderon.
S. R. Crockett.

A Morning on The Stock Exchange.
Illustrated by Photographs, and Drawings by G. Ashton.
W. Arthur Woodward.

The Queen's Pets.
Illustrated from Photographs by the Author.
Gambier Bolton, F.Z.S.

Fleeting.
Clarence Hope.

In the Public Eye.
Illustrated by Photographs.

Secrets of the Courts of Europe.
No. II.—THE HONOUR OF AN EMPRESS.
Illustrated by Hal Hurst.
Allen Upward.

Wisdom Let Loose.
Illustrated by Charles May.
W. L. Alden.

London's Danger.
Illustrated by Warwick Goble.
Cutcliffe Hyne.

Pictures in the Fire.
Illustrated by G. G. Manton.
May Kendall.

War on the Water.
Illustrated by F. T. Jane.
George Griffith.

The Ban.
Illustrated by G. Montbard.
John Bloundelle Burton.

The Great Water Joke.
Written and Illustrated by
J. F. Sullivan.

The Charm.
Illustrated by Chris Hammond.
Sir Walter Besant and W. H. Pollock.

A Page of Verse.

Editorial Mind.

PRICE SIXPENCE.

Printed and Published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON, at "Pearson's Weekly" Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

THE JOHN NOBLE
HALF-GUINEA COSTUMES

Direct from the Largest Firm of Costume Manufacturers in the world, have secured beyond a doubt the ADMIRATION OF THE WORLD. Being Absolutely Without an Equal Anywhere for Stylish Appearance, Durability, and Actual Money Value. 10/6

TWO GOLD MEDALS AWARDED.

These Costumes have received the highest praise from the leading journals of the day, and are justly regarded by all purchasers as Even Better than Advertised.

Each Costume scientifically cut, tailor-made, and beautifully finished in an exceedingly smart mode, as illustration. The design consists of full wide Godet skirt with belt, also very neat bodice with full front and broad box-pleat down centre, trimmed bold silk cord and three large buttons. Collar and cuffs outlined silk cord; saddle and sleeves lined.

Price complete only 10/6, packed in box and sent carriage paid for 9d. extra.

Sizes in stock fit any figure up to 38ins. round bust under arms, skirts being 38, 40, and 42ins. long in front; larger or special sizes made to measure, 1/6 extra.

THE JOHN NOBLE COSTUMES FOR YOUNG MISSES

are made in the John Noble Cheviot Serge, and trimmed military braid as illustration. A large box-pleat down the centre of the lined bodice, and a fancy pocket at each side of the skirt, complete a charming design at these prices: FROM 8/6

Lengths	35	38	42	46	50 inches.
Prices	8/6	9/6	10/9	12/-	13/6 each.

Each costume packed in box and sent carriage paid for 9d. extra.

KNOCKABOUT FROCKS FOR GIRLS are also supplied in the John Noble Cheviot Serge, with saddle top, long full sleeves, and pocket, at following prices: FROM 1/6

Lengths	21	24	27	30	33	36	39	42	45 ins.
Prices	1/6	2/-	2/6	3/-	3/6	4/-	4/6	5/-	5/6 ea.

Postage 1½d. extra. Lengths stated above are from top of neckband to bottom of skirt in front.

COLOURS: Any of the above garments can be supplied in Black, Navy, Brown, Myrtle, Bronze Green, Electric Blue, Ruby, Dark Cinnamon, Fawn, or Grey

The JOHN NOBLE CHEVIOT SERGE in which the above garments are made is a fabric of world-wide fame and durability, measuring 52ins. wide. The full Dress Length of Six Yards can be supplied for 7/6, or any length at 1/6 the yard. Colours as above. 7/6

PATTERNS, also "THE BOOK OF THE SERGE," and FASHION SHEETS of numerous other designs in Ladies' and Children's Costumes, etc., sent Post Free on application. Please mention "Short Stories" when ordering.

JOHN NOBLE LTD., Brook St. Mills, MANCHESTER.

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,

SUCH AS

Sick Headache, Constipation,

Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion,

Disordered Liver & Female Ailments.

ANNUAL SALE SIX MILLION BOXES.

In Boxes, 9½d., 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

A SIGNAL SUCCESS.

"'Tis not in mortals to command success, but we'll do more, Sempronius, we'll deserve it."

THE PEARSON POTTERY CO., HANLEY,

ARE SELLING FAST THE MOST WONDERFUL PACKAGE OF - - - CROCKERY IN THE WORLD. - - -

100 PIECES

FOR £1 1s.

A beautiful Dinner Service of 50 pieces is guaranteed Worth the Guinea alone, consequently a Charming China Tea Service, and a useful Collection of Crockery, are given FOR NOTHING.

Thousands sold all over the world. Everybody not only satisfied but amazed at the quantity and quality given.

The Secret of the Success.—The PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY are manufacturers, not middlemen, like many other advertisers. The PEARSON POTTERIES have nearly 2,000 feet frontage to the town of Hanley.

Hundreds of these packages are applied for as Wedding or Birthday Presents. And what more useful present can be given? Every item is useful.

THE THIRTY SHILLING BAZAAR PARCEL IS SELLING WELL. APPLY AT ONCE.

Send a Post Card for Particulars. You will never regret it. Freedom from breakage guaranteed. All letters to the

PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY, HANLEY.

VIOLIN MADE EASY.

The "CARRADUS TUTORETTE" (patent) saves years of practice and pounds in tutors' fees. Positions and Shifts learnt at once. Post free, nickel plated, 1s. 6d. (P.O. only). FINCH & CO., 6, Garfield Rd., London, S.W. FITS ALL VIOLINS.

RED NOSES

Caused by INDIGESTION, etc. All who suffer from this disfiguring complaint should write for DR. HOWELL'S RENOWNED REMEDY, 22, Glasshouse Street, London, W., who guarantees a cure in a few days. 2/6 a box.

Established 1886.

24 PORTRAITS Stamp size, for 1s. 6d.; 100 for 3s. 3d. Twelve Carte Portraits, 2s. 6d.; six for 1s. 6d. Twelve Cabinet Portraits, 5s. 6d.; six for 3s.; three for 2s. Enlargements, 5in. 3s.; 12in., 7s. 6d.; 15in., 10s. 6d. Send Carte or Cabinet and P.O., and you will receive highly finished Copies with Original.

FRANCIS & CO., 29, Ludgate Hill, London.

THIN BUSTS

Quickly transformed and a good figure permanently obtained by a perfectly harmless, simple, and inexpensive self-treatment. Success guaranteed. For particulars, free, send stamped envelope in confidence to "Madame B. J.," Oriental Toilet Co., 87, Strand, London.

RED NOSES

Permanently cured in a few days by a simple, inexpensive self-treatment. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope to Dr. A. M. CURTIS, York Chambers, Adelphi, London, W.C.

WHICH SHOULD YOU CHOOSE?

Now let me see how plain I can make what I have to say, for it's no use writing things unless they are understood.

Here is a house five storeys high—of course, not counting the cellar. Suppose the owner offered you the privilege of living, rent free, either in the cellar or on the topmost floor, and nowhere else, which of the two places would you choose? Is your answer ready? "Yes, all right," you say. Well, keep it between your teeth a minute while we run over this short letter from Mr. Simpson.

"In the spring of 1891," he says, "I began to feel weak and out of sorts, and could not imagine what had overtaken me. I was tired, weary, and heavy. All the snap, life, and energy seemed to be gone out of me. My head felt dull and thick, and ached a good deal; there was a foul, bitter taste in my mouth, and I was constantly spitting up a tough, slimy phlegm that gathered in my throat.

"My appetite fell off, and the little food I took punished me terribly, and I was never easy until I had vomited it up, and after doing so I felt weak from the want of nourishment and the strain of vomiting. As the malady obtained a firmer hold upon me I began to be troubled with palpitation of the heart. It throbbed and thumped until I could scarcely get my breath.

"Then a short, dry cough fixed upon me, which shook me greatly, and made me sweat until beads of perspiration stood upon my face. At night my sleep was broken by frightful dreams, and I arose in the morning unrefreshed, and even more exhausted than after a day's hard work.

"After two or three months of this kind of suffering I became dreadfully nervous and excitable. Noises and sounds which in a state of health I should not have noticed were now unbearable. I was strangely apprehensive of evil without any cause that could be reasoned out or defined. I had no desire for company, I wanted to remain in silence by myself. I was now so weak I could barely crawl about, and if I walked out a little way I was obliged to stop and rest here and there.

"My eyes were sunken, and I was so worn down and emaciated that I lost all hope of ever getting back my flesh and strength. In very truth I grew so low-spirited that I often wished myself dead.

"In this low and wretched condition I continued for nine months, during the whole of which time I was away from my work. I had a doctor attending me, but his medicine had no effect.

"In December (1891) I determined to use a remedy which had cured my wife of indigestion and weakness five years before—namely, Mother Seigel's Syrup. I got a supply from the Co-operative Stores, Crosby, and began taking it. In a week's time I found great relief. My appetite revived, and what I ate agreed with me and gave me strength. Continuing to take the Syrup I grew better and better. Gradually, but certainly, all the pain and nervousness wore away, and I got back to my work as strong as ever. And the fact that I have not lost a day's work through sickness since that time shows how radical the cure was. (Signed) William Simpson, Crosby, near Maryport, Cumberland, October 10th, 1894."

Now we are ready for your answer. As between the cellar and the topmost floor you choose the latter, of course. Well, the human body is a house of many storeys, and the topmost is the best. When we are in good health we live up there. When indigestion and dyspepsia (as in Mr. Simpson's case) seize us, we move down into the cellar. We are low in spirits when we are ill in body. Then, when Mother Seigel's Syrup has cured the disease, we move up again. You appreciate the illustration. All right. The moral? Very plain. Prevent the disease by a timely use of the remedy, and you will always live where there is daylight and fresh air.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

NEW SERIAL JUST COMMENCED, PROFUSELY ILLUSTRATED.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 371. FOR WEEK ENDING FEBRUARY 8TH, 1896. [ONE PENNY.

100 YEARS' WORLD-WIDE RECORD OF SUCCESS.

NORTON'S CAMOMILE PILLS

INDIGESTION BILIOUSNESS HEADACHE
STOMACH & LIVER COMPLAINTS DEBILITY

THE BEST OF ALL TONICS and a GENTLE APERIENT. Mild in Operation, Perfectly Safe, and Free from Injurious Drugs. Sold Everywhere in Bottles at 1/1½, 2/9, and 11/- each.

Ask for "NORTON'S CAMOMILE PILLS," and do not be persuaded to purchase an imitation.

Prepared by NORTON'S, Limited.

Trade Mark—One Little Bottle.

21, Spital Square, London, E.

"STRONGEST AND BEST."—Health.

FRY'S Pure Concentrated COCOA

Awarded Highest Honours. | Over 130 Gold Medals and Diplomas.

Purchasers should ask specially for FRY'S PURE CONCENTRATED COCOA to distinguish it from other varieties manufactured by the Firm.

1896 PROCLAMATION.

Grand Pioneer Reduction Sale

By Messrs. F. HODGSON & SON, The Well-known Carpet Manufacturers of the City of Leeds, will take effect on sight of this advertisement.

OUR NEW VENTURE! Yes, Two Different Pattern Hearthrugs or Carpets for the Price of One! (Copyright).

Whereas, in launching forth our New Production, THE "PRUDENTIAL" CARPETS AND HEARTHRUGS, we beg to state they will have a Rich Turkish and Persian Design on one side, and on the reverse the elegant and costly designs of Wilton make. The advantage thus gained is great, as they can be utilised in various rooms at one cost. This is a valuable step in economy.

PRODIGIOUS SALE OF THE

"PRUDENTIAL" Reversible CARPETS

(Registered.)

Reversible, with a different pattern on both sides, woven throughout with handsome border to correspond; richly blended in several colours to suit any furniture. Made in 10 sizes only. These carpets are the production of much care, labour, and forethought, and are made in handsome and elaborate patterns (which are protected by registration). They combine the rich blended colours of the Turkish and Persian with the elegant designs of the Wilton. These goods cannot be distinguished from real Brussels when laid down, and cannot be excelled in durability.

		Each.			Each.
6ft. by 9ft.,	Reduced Sale Price	4/9	9ft. by 15ft.,	Reduced Sale Price	12/6
7½ft. by 9ft.	" " "	5/11	12ft. by 12ft.,	" " "	12/9
9ft. by 9ft.	" " "	7/6	12ft. by 13½ft.,	" " "	14/6
9ft. by 10½ft.,	" " "	8/6	12ft. by 15ft.,	" " "	15/9
9ft. by 12ft.,	" " "	9/6	12ft. by 18ft.,	" " "	19 6
10½ft. by 12ft.,	" " "	11/6	12ft. by 21ft.,	" " "	22/6

When ordering please mention if for Bed, Dining, Drawing, or Sitting Room, and any particular colour preferred.

"Neal Lodge, Upper Norwood, S.E., January 13th, 1896.

The Dowr. Lady Abercromby is pleased with the 'Prudential' Carpet she ordered."

Blairquhan, Maybole, N.B., August 3rd.

Lady Hunter Blair writes: "Will Messrs. F. Hodgson & Son send her another 'Prudential' Carpet, same as before, crimson and gold, dimensions, 9ft. by 10½ft. Cheque inclosed."

A Reversible "Prudential" Hearthrug (Reg)., to match above Carpets, sent for 1s. 6d. extra, size 2 yards long, and 1 yard wide.

SPECIAL OFFER.—3 Hearthrugs for 4s. 3d.; or 6 for 8s.; or 12 for 15s. 6d.

EXTRAORDINARY REDUCTIONS.

100,000 "ALARM" CARPETS

(Registered). GUARANTEED GENUINE BARGAINS.

Sale Price 2/11 EACH.

This Gigantic Offer is a Special Contract, made with readers of Short Stories only. We will forward direct from the looms to any address on receipt of amount, A GENUINE WOVEN, SEAMLESS, REVERSIBLE CARPET, the largest ever sold at the Price.

Suitable for Sitting-room or Bedroom, Bordered and Woven in Art Colours, large enough to cover any ordinary-sized room, as an advertisement for our goods, thus saving any Middle Profits. Remember these are Woven, not printed, and are made of a material almost equal to Wool. Thousands of these Carpets and Rugs have already been sold at almost double above prices. A Rug sent with Carpet 10d. extra.

SPECIAL OFFER. 2 Carpets and 2 Rugs ... ... 7s. 6d.

Value unequalled in the Annals of Advertising. As a favour, kindly Examine and Compare these Carpets.

"SHORT STORIES" CARPET COUPON, 8/2/96.

On receipt of this Coupon and P.O.O. or Stamps for amount, we guarantee to send goods as above to your address in any part of the United Kingdom. Cash returned in full if not satisfied.

(Signed) F. HODGSON & SON.

All orders dispatched same day in rotation as they arrive by post. Cheques and P.O.'s payable to

F. HODGSON AND SON,

Manufacturers, Importers, and Merchants,

WOODSLEY ROAD, LEEDS.

Telegraphic Address—"Eclipse, Leeds." Telephone No. 948.

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

Bilious & Nervous Disorders,

SUCH AS

Sick Headache, Constipation, Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion, Disordered Liver & Female Ailments.

ANNUAL SALE SIX MILLION BOXES.

In Boxes, 9½d., 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

MRS. JACKSON

An artist's wife, residing at Norton, near Malton, states: "I am deeply grateful to you for the good received through taking your Wind Pills. I suffered severely from

INDIGESTION, SPASMS,

and LIVER COMPLAINT. The doctors gave me up as incurable, nor did I think it possible for me to recover. I scarcely dared to eat any food, fearing suffocation. Seeing an advertisement of

Page Woodcock's Wind Pills,

I resolved to try them. After taking a few small boxes I lost all the painful symptoms, and now enjoy good health. Publish my statement as you please."

All sufferers from INDIGESTION, LIVER COMPLAINTS, WIND on the STOMACH, SICK HEADACHE, BILIOUSNESS, etc., should avail themselves of this most excellent medicine.

☛ The Wind Pills being purely Vegetable, Tasteless, and Mild, and Tonic in their action, may be taken with perfect safety by the most delicate of either sex.

Of all Medicine Vendors, at 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. Post Free for P.O. or Stamps from PAGE WOODCOCK, LINCOLN.

EPPS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

COCOA

TO THE DEAF.

A Gentleman who cured himself of Deafness and Noises in the Head after fourteen years' suffering, will gladly send full particulars of the remedy post free.—Address, H. Clifton, Amberley House, Norfolk Street, Strand, London, W.C.

TO TOBACCONISTS COMMENCING.

£20 See Illus. Guide and Catalogue (259 pages), 3d. "How to Open a Cigar Stores, from £20 to £2,000." TOBACCONISTS' OUTFITTING CO., 186, Euston Road, London. (Over 50 years' reputation.) Manager, H. MYERS.

S.S. S.S.
PEARSON'S
£100
COUPON.
No. 6
Feb. 8, 1896.
S.S. S.S.

HAIR DESTROYED.

A doctor's widow knows of a simple, inexpensive remedy that permanently destroys the roots, and will forward particulars free to all those afflicted sending stamped envelope. Address Mrs. B. D. WOOD, 4, DUKE STREET, VILLIERS STREET, LONDON, W.

ARE YOU LITTLE?

If so, wear the "A D" Invisible Elevators (Regd.). Will increase your height up to four inches; the only approved means; detection impossible; simple, inexpensive. Send stamped envelope for particulars to the ORIENTAL TOILET CO. (B 5 Dept.), 87, Strand, London.

DOUGLAS, HUNGERFORD, AND WILLIAMS.

PROFITS PAID DURING 1895.

Jan. 2, £8 per cent., Feb. 1, £6, Mar. 1, £5, April 1, £8, May 1, £7, June 2, £10, July 1, £9, Aug. 1, £9, Sept. 2, £8, Oct. 1, £8, Nov. 1, £7, Dec. 2, £7.

Total for 12 months £92 per cent., an average of nearly £8 PER CENT. PER MONTH.

PROFITS PAID DURING 1896.

Jan. 2 ... ... £6 per cent.

OUR NEW ILLUSTRATED MANUAL mailed free upon request, showing how these profits may be made WITHOUT SPECULATION. Cheques for profits mailed promptly 1st of each month, and for withdrawals of capital on 2nd and 16th of each month. Trial investments of £5 and upwards may be made.

We have not a dissatisfied Client.

DOUGLAS, HUNGERFORD, & WILLIAMS, 5, Copthall Avenue, London, E.C., and 11, Place de la Bourse, Paris.

SULPHOLINE LOTION,

For clearing the skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness, giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance.

SHILLING BOTTLES.

HAIR DESTROYED

permanently and absolutely by an entirely new and harmless self-treatment, total destruction guaranteed. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope. Prof. F. T. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

BLUSHING

Permanently cured. A Pamphlet giving sound practical advice and particulars of a successful treatment for a rapid, simple, and inexpensive home-cure, forwarded free to all upon receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—Prof. B. L. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

TOO STOUT

Dr. Grey's FAT REDUCING Pills.

A safe, rapid, and permanent reduction and improvement in health and breathing guaranteed. A special preparation kept for stubborn cases (either sex) which have resisted other treatment.

ABDOMINAL OBESITY A SPECIALTY.

2/9 and 4/6 per box, plain wrapper, post free to all parts. Dr. O. GREY, 57, Weymouth St., Portland Pl., London, W.

VIOLIN STRINGS.

4 Best "E's" (samples) 9d., post free.

S. S. CARY, NEWBURY.

TOOTH-ACHE

CURED INSTANTLY BY

BUNTER'S NERVINE

Prevents Decay. Saves Extraction. Sleepless Nights Prevented. Neuralgic Headache and all Nerve Pains Removed by BUNTER'S NERVINE. All Chemists, 1s. 1½d.

KNOW THYSELF!

YOUR CHARACTER, APTITUDES, and CAREER marvellously described from Handwriting by distinguished Graphologist. Business Guidance. Success ensured. Fee 2s.

Professor CARONA, F.B.I.M.S., 126, Ledbury Road, Bayswater, W.

HAIR DESTROYED.

A lady who has permanently destroyed Superfluous Hairs on herself, will be happy to forward free, to all similarly afflicted, full particulars of a simple, inexpensive and harmless self-treatment. Send stamped addressed envelope in confidence to Mrs. "T. D.," 87, Strand, London.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

ONE PENNY

SHORT STORIES.

EDITED BY

C. ARTHUR PEARSON.

No. 371.] [ONE PENNY

For the Week ending February 8th, 1896

A FAIRY TALE OF MODERN DAYS.

SAT looking at Ruth, more and more puzzled each moment.

At school she had been noted for her hair, which was a mass of bronze-brown that caught the light like burnished copper; but, although her eyes were dark and her features were good, yet we were often led to exclaim: "Why is it that Ruth is not a beauty?" We finally agreed that it must be her lack of manner, for she was diffident to an extreme, and even dull at times. But for some strange reason she always held a strong attraction for me, I could never tell why, and I felt sorry a few years later when I heard she had married a young mechanic, and begun life in a very small way.

Seven years had elapsed before we were thrown together again, and I was utterly unprepared for the superbly beautiful woman who met me so charmingly, and renewed our acquaintance with such native grace. Her features were clear cut and refined, her complexion divinely fair, her hair more bronze and coppery than ever, her carriage erect and queenly, but her eyes—there was something there which fascinated me. I can call it nothing but the gleam of conscious power.

She seemed utterly out of place in her little cottage home, dressed in a simple cashmere, guiltless of ornament, with only a linen collar about her neck. To me she seemed many degrees above the husband, who but lately had become a master mechanic, and was now in possession of a fairly good salary. He was a determined sort of a man, and owned the little home in which they lived—one of the kind of men who are more regardful of the future than the present, all of which was very prudent and proper, of course, but I looked at Ruth and wondered and wondered. It seemed so strange, so remarkable that she should have developed in such a marvellous fashion in such a narrow place in life. I am possessed of an intense penetration, and divined that it was some unseen, unknown influence that had changed her from the diffident girl to the beautiful woman.

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

Perhaps it was a little wicked of me, but I could not resist saying: "Ruth, how can you possibly be content with what fate has brought you? Don't you ever long for riches, and power, and station, for gems and jewels, for silks and velvets, wealthy neighbours who live so near you? Why, Ruth, you are fitted to shine in society; it is a crime that you are not in your rightful place."

A strange expression sprang into her eyes. She smiled with a meaning I could not fathom. I resolved to strike fire if there was any in her. "Your husband is a good man, of course, but he is not your mate. A woman as beautiful and accomplished as you should have married a prince and have lived in a palace."

"Perhaps I have," she said curiously.

It was my turn to be taken by surprise.

"No; you need not think to fill me with discontent, my friend. I have no regret at what fate has brought me. I am happier by far in this little cottage than most women in their palaces of splendour. Shall I tell you why? Because I have had a terrible experience. I once allowed myself to be covetous and discontented, and—I wonder if you could understand if I told you the story?" A bright rose colour spread over her cheek, a little flame burnt in her eyes. "Go on, go on!" I cried. "I knew you had a secret."

"I shall never forget the day that came near wrecking my life. It was two years ago, and grand receptions were given by two of the wealthy neighbours who live so near me. Awnings were stretched down to the street, and beautifully-dressed women slipped from their carriage doors and floated in like fairies rather than mortals. The strains of dance-music came tantalisingly to my ears and stirred all the evil there was in me, latent and unknown before.

"The next day, I remember, I was so discontented with my lot that I fairly despised the clothes I wore and the walls that encompassed me. Philip was trying hard to make the first payment on our home, but I remember that on that particular day I even regretted having married him and wished I were free to choose again, and I would wed riches and live in splendour, like my wealthy neighbours. I was so tired of being poor and working hard without any little pleasures to lighten my burdens. I knew it was wicked, but I was so tired mentally and physically that I didn't even care. I put the baby to sleep that night completely out of humour, wondering why I never had any of the delights of life, but only the shadows and clouds. A woman cannot indulge in such emotions without punishment, and you shall see what I had to suffer in consequence.

"Now I cannot explain; you will have to let me tell it all just as it happened, without any explanation, for there is none. I had hardly closed my eyes in sleep when I felt a strange lightness of spirit take possession of me, and a peculiar attraction drawing me fairly out of my body—if you can conceive of it—and taking me on and on through space, till I came to a brilliantly-lighted palace. In a moment I was led to an apartment by a number of richly-dressed women, who seemed waiting for me, saying: 'Here is your wardrobe; chose what you will wear.'

"Dazzled by the brilliancy of everything about me, such as I had never dreamed of in my life, I could scarcely tell what I wanted; but they said: 'Hurry off that common brown dress; the prince will be scandalised.' And they loosed my poor gown, and it dropped on the floor, while they arrayed me in something shiny and silvery, and all floating around me in silken billows, and they put a filmy silvery veil upon my head, and wound diamonds about my throat and waist as carelessly as if they had been garlands. In a moment I was in the midst of music, and arm-in-arm with a magnificent-looking man with a royal pride upon his face. Before I knew what I was doing, we were standing before a patriarchal priest, and married by a kind of ceremony, I know not what. Delicious music filled the air, a banquet was waiting, and then feats of magic and marvellous dancing passed before us, as we sat on our chairs of state, like king and queen.

"I was in a joyous exultation. I felt as if at last I had reached the place intended for me—such is the extent of human pride—and when at last the vision faded, and I sought for my cotton dress to go home in, and woke to find myself in the humble place I had left a few hours before, I exclaimed: 'Oh, what a beautiful dream!'

"Just wait a moment. Don't laugh and say 'It was a dream,' for you will discover differently. All day I was in an excited state, and when at night I closed my eyes I hoped I would dream the same dream over again. In a moment I felt the same lightness of spirit and the same attraction, and soon found my way back into the realm of the night before, but with the difference that 'the prince'—as they called him—himself escorted me to the dressing-room, and waited for me to put off my common dress, and array myself in some of the splendid garments at my command. I chose a royal robe of something deliciously like an Arabian Nights' story—a blending of all colours woven with gold—and advanced to meet him. He led me into a great reception-hall, and there were renewed the delights of the night before, which finished in much the same manner.

"Now, the next day I was in a feverish state of excitement, and entirely forgot the humble walls about me, or the tired husband working for our daily bread. I went through my various duties in a mechanical way, thinking of the delights of the night before, and wondering whether I should ever see my prince again. No thought of wrong or culpability had entered my head. I was like a child playing a game.

"I may as well say that this was but the beginning of my peculiar existence, for each night I sought the wonderful realm, and spent the night in the midst of luxury and splendour, getting through the day like one in a daze, believing the real to be the dream, and the dream to be the real life. I came to know the people in this new world much better than my neighbours around me. The patriarchal priest proved to be the tutor of the prince, and as time went by I woke up from my mistaken idea that this was merely dreaming, as I had so innocently supposed.

"One night, as the prince kissed me good-night, I said, suddenly remembering my other life: 'But it seems to me that my husband has blue eyes, while yours are as black as night. How strange it would be if this were all a mistake.' And I woke up instantly.

"Sitting up and looking around me, I realised that I was under a spell of some kind, and all day felt a sense of responsibility stealing over me. I knew it was my duty to resist this glamour, but was so under its mastery that I could not. I tried to tell Philip, but he only laughed at me, and I found I was doomed to a dual existence.

"I can only remember it now in snatches—little bits here and there. I remember the tutor had a wicked, keen eye, and that he and the prince always seemed acting in unison. Up to a certain time I had been very much as I was in my little home—rather dull (that is outside of my sense of luxurious enjoyment)—and drinking in rather than expressing any thought upon the strange things around me. But all at once this changed, as I became possessed of a desire to comprehend the spell under which I found myself. I remember the tutor—his name was Michael Velitski—glancing at me curiously when I asked:

Digitized by Google

"'What do you do when you leave here?'

"'We are travelling—the prince and I.'

"'How delightful! Tell me what you have seen. How I would love to travel.'

"And then he would tell me the most wonderful tales of Eastern lands, and I would drink them in, and ask for more.

"'You will make a good pupil,' he said. Then turning to the prince: 'We have not made a mistake this time.'

"Now this puzzled me very much, and I resolved not to rest until I had found out what it meant. My every faculty became on the alert, every thought day and night bent upon comprehending the strange world in which I found myself. Nothing escaped my notice, and I devoted myself to books and studies, and the many occult mysteries around us, filling the very atmosphere we breathed.

"All at once, suddenly, a revulsion of feeling took possession of me. I grew weary of the high pressure state of living, the intense excitement, even the splendour and magnificence palled upon me, and I grew to hate the prince and his tutor, and the people they had around them. I began to think my humble little home the most beautiful spot in the world, and my chubby little boy, and my noble, hard-working husband, as the chief joys of my life. I loved them as never before, but this horrid spell was upon me—one that could not be broken by ordinary methods. I became as one possessed, resolved to escape if possible, as the horrors of my situation dawned upon me. So lightly and so gradually had the chain been forged upon me that I had not realised it until I was bound fast.

"Wrath and resentment began to burn in my breast, and at last one night I said: 'Why do you call me here night after night? I am tired of it all, and wish to be released.' But they laughed at me, and the tutor looked positively satanic. 'I tell you I am tired of this unreal world, and I demand that you release me.'

"'We are married,' said the prince, with an evil smile; 'there is no escape till death.'

"'Then let death free us now!' I cried. And, seizing a jewelled dagger lying near, I plunged it into his heart. They both laughed at me as the prince took it out and handed it to me with a mocking smile.

"I was astonished. Here was a law different from the other life.

"'Can there be no death here?' I cried.

"'Calm yourself,' said the tutor, 'and begin your studies afresh. For fifty years have I studied the laws of the occult world, and never yet have I seen a death in the occult state. If we could be easily killed while in this condition we should scarcely dare to meet so freely, or we should be at each other's mercy, indeed. No, begin your studies afresh and you will find that death can result only from injury inflicted by mortal hand upon the mortal body.'

"Finding that it was only by understanding the laws of the world that I was in that I could hope to escape, I devoted myself to the most diligent study, and soon persuaded the tutor that I was in perfect harmony with the plans of himself and the prince. Ah, I needed all the cunning of the fox and all the wisdom of the serpent to carry me through the trial, for each day I was becoming more frantic.

"'How you have changed, Ruth?' said my husband to me; 'your eyes have a gleam in them which is positively murderous at times. What does it mean?' But what was the use of telling him? He could not help me. He would not believe.

"'So neither dagger, poison, or bullet can kill an astral body?' I asked the tutor one night, trying to find out all I could.

"'No; only the mortal body can be injured. Each astral body is connected with its mortal envelope by a luminous thread, ten million times finer than that of a spider, and death can ensue only by severing this thread, which may be done only by a shock to the earthly or mortal body. So you may amuse yourself by every kind of injury to the prince's astral body that you choose. He is perfectly safe.'

"All this time it was kept concealed from me where or in what land the prince and his tutor really were: and I discovered that even astral bodies had their limitations, and could not go in quest of each other against his or her will. We were held in a kind of thrall at the prince's bidding; and yet, in spite of his power, he had his limitations as well as we. Much as he desired to follow me to my home, I found that by a tremendous opposition I could prevent his doing so. Another thing I discovered was that even he could not remain in the occult state, and out of his mortal body, beyond a limited time, and many more things which I will not stop to tell. Enough to say that, bit by bit, I unravelled the mystery of the spell placed upon me.

"The tutor was an old man of seventy, who had devoted his entire life to the study of what is now termed occultism; the prince, who was of Russian birth, had been placed under his tuition in extreme youth, and was drawn into its meshes successfully. At last they discovered the power of freeing the astral body from the earthly body, and, by united effort, drew to themselves others of a similar nature as companions. They had built this realm of pleasure by pure will-power, and by the same means drew to themselves from all over the world new elements to sustain it.

"Their theory was that every object in Nature or art had an astral form as well as a real one, and these they drew together and combined to make up the magnificence around us. In their travels they ceaselessly gathered astral shapes of every treasure, every splendour for their occult palace and wonderful realm. They had discovered, however, the need of a woman's nature to unravel some of the intricacies for them—a woman who would be pliable, and yet possess sufficient will to add to their power.

"The day that I had allowed myself to become so discontented they had exercised a tremendous spell of attraction for just such a woman as I, and so I fell into the snare. They now had new and wonderful experiments they wished to make, and it was expected that I would lend them my powers of will, and strength, and acumen, to accomplish the grand purpose, now that I had discovered that resistance was useless. But my every sense was on the alert, and I was most keen in trying to find a loophole of escape, for daily I hated them more and more.

"I often noticed a strange look of pity on the women's faces around me, but could get no answer from them. They were silent on the only theme on which I cared to talk.

Digitized by Google

"'Why will you not tell me what this dreadful spell means?' I would say to them; 'can you not help me to escape?'

"'We dare not,' said one, who was called Nerissa; 'the prince's will is absolute.'

"'But tell me.' I intreated, 'how did you all happen to come here first?'

"'The same way that you did,' said Nerissa sadly.

"'Were you married to the prince?' I asked quickly

"Every eye was averted, every head hung in tacit admission. In an instant I understood that this was the meaning of Michael Velitski when he said: 'We have not made a mistake this time.' But why had each been dethroned in turn, and reduced to this subjection. A new horror began to steal over me.

"By this time I had learned many things of occult influence, and, by a certain extent of absolute opposition to the prince, I bent Nerissa to my will. Through her I should learn the extent of my bondage. I had only a moment at a time, but by constant effort I finally gained the truth.

"Each of these women in her earthly form had been discontented with her lot, and in this state of mind had been subject to the mighty influence exerted by the prince and Velitski coming at their bidding. Each in turn had been wedded to the prince, and each in turn had fallen in love with him so deeply, and so absolutely, that she had lost all power of will, and thus was no further use to him. Each in turn had been reduced to the position of a dependent, and held there absolutely. They displayed no jealousy of me as a rival—they were scarcely more than automatons. I felt sure that there was no danger of my being reduced to their sad plight. I was too self-willed and positive, and, moreover, I hated the prince. But, instead of this comforting me, it made me only the more frantic in my desire to escape.

"At last—one night—they were more than usually confident, and I heard them speak inadvertently of 'the ship.' 'That means that they are on the ocean somewhere,' I said to myself.

"'What part of the world are you in now?' I asked boldly.

"The prince laughed. 'You wouldn't believe me, would you, if I should tell you that at this moment we are living on the morning star?'

"It was useless, I thought, to hope to catch him off his guard, yet I feigned to laugh, as if I enjoyed his reply as being very witty indeed.

"The next morning, with aching head and throbbing brow, I bemoaned my fate, feeling that I was perhaps doomed to this awful existence for the remainder of my life. I picked up the morning paper absently, and the first thing my eye fell upon was an item regarding the ship Morning Star, which was due on a certain date in the Thames.

"In a moment I was roused, every pulse in my body on fire. This ship was on its way to the Thames, bringing the hated prince and his tutor directly across my path. They were dangerous enough in the occult world, what would they be in the real? Should I become mesmerised and controlled by them body as well as soul? I knew not what powers they might possess over me—I might be induced to commit crimes. Surely I had reason to despair.

"Then all at once a revelation came to me—all at once I saw a gleam of hope, a method of escape. I had not studied the occult sciences in vain. All at once I saw a flaw, a weak spot, in the vital part of the whole structure.

"A tremendous resolve took possession of me; I prepared myself for the fantastic revel of the night as never before. I would lend myself to every device that should deceive them, and when the summons came I went eagerly—I had a purpose. So well did I simulate harmony with their plans, and so great was my strength of will in aiding them, that they fell into a rapture of delight.

"'My sweet Ruth, what should we do without you?' said the prince. 'I wonder if you are half as bright and clever in your earthly form as you are in your astral body?' and he gave me a strange glance.

"'Why don't you come and see?' I asked carelessly.

"'Perhaps I shall,' he replied.

"'Are you not afraid I shall plunge a real knife into your real heart?'

"'Not at all. I shall hold you there by a stronger power than I do here.' It seemed as if two fires burnt in his eyes.

"'Do you have this power over Nerissa in her earthly form, that she is so weak and subjective?' I asked carelessly, trying to conceal my intentness, 'because I should not like that.'

"He gave an impatient, scornful exclamation. 'Nerissa? Bah! Her mortal body is in a madhouse.'

"Something in my brain gave way in spite of my tremendous effort at self-control. But resolutely I steadied myself. The moment had come. This occult palace, with all its people, was but the construction of man. Even here there were limitations. This world of splendour and mysteries was built upon a foundation as light and insecure as the clouds themselves. It had no God. This, my woman's nature, had felt from the first. This was the grand plan, and by means of it I would topple this occult kingdom from its place and cast it to the winds of heaven. I had resolved to use my counter-force of will to keep them in the occult state far beyond the limited time until they were weakened, and thus my power should be greater for the purpose I had planned.

"I steadied myself. I felt a mighty power growing within me, but born of desperation and desire.

"They were ready to go. The prince kissed me good-night, as usual, and said: 'I have a surprise in store for you——'

"'And I for you,' I said intently. 'To-night is the last time that we shall meet.'

"The prince laughed mockingly, but the keen eyes of Velitski showed a new expression—a vague sense of distrust. Too late he realised that I could be dangerous without any weapons but my wits and the intuitions of a woman's nature. Each moment I detained them placed them more at my mercy, for they had overstayed their time, and I, coming so much later at their summons, was still strong and vigorous.

"'Please God, this is the last time you shall ever bring me here,' I said solemnly. 'You have wonderful powers, but you are only men after all. In your might and pride you have built this world, and brought us here against our wills, but you have forgotten there is a God,' and I fell upon my knees and clasped my hands in prayer. I felt that my powers of importuning that moment would carry my prayer straight to Deity, and regardless of the mocking laughter of the prince, I implored that supernatural agency of some kind might be sent to destroy the power of these fiendish men who held our souls in thrall.

Digitized by Google

"'We must go!' cried the tutor. 'She will kill us if she keeps us here. It is already beyond our time.' But I had them bound by the very power they held over me; at last my will was the stronger, and they could not go.

"Meanwhile I still prayed unceasingly, feeling intuitively that I was heard. I made my vow then and there, that if I could but once be released I would never again cherish a discontented thought in my breast as long as I should live. The prince still mocked, but the uncanny old man stood trembling, while Nerissa and the others gathered round in wonder.

"All at once Velitski cried out in agony: 'Something has happened!' and he fell prone upon the floor. 'My God! death is coming! The ship is on fire!'

"And the prince gave a scream—such a scream as the tiger gives when he is shot to the heart. And then I saw a gleam of faintly luminous thread, and it was broken. The struggle of death was not long, and, like vapour, the astral bodies of the prince and Velitski floated upon the air, and, amid wondering exclamations, the palace of wonder faded into nothingness.

"By my side was Nerissa, trembling with a new-found clearness of mind, yet scarcely knowing herself. 'You are free, Nerissa!' I cried; 'you are free! We have escaped this thraldom worse than death. Thank Him who is above all!' And then I knew no more.

"When I awoke I was surprised to find Philip leaning over me with tears in his eyes, and to this day I have not recovered from the shock of learning that three weeks had elapsed between that awful night and the morning I awoke—three weeks utterly lost from my reckoning. I made a complete confession to my husband, but he treated the whole thing as a chimera of my brain, and thought I was lightheaded whenever I spoke of it, so that I have ceased to mention the matter. But from that day I have been only too glad to lead my simple life with what fate has brought me. I think my little home the loveliest in the world, and I actually glory in my plain woollen gown."

"But, Ruth, dear," I said, "it is very evident that the whole thing was a chimera of your brain, and a fantastic one, too."

"How about the education I received, and the ideas on occultism which I never heard of, even, until then; and the powers which I developed, and have since been trying to lose in order to become an ordinary human being?" said she, calmly looking me straight in the eye.

"Well, that is very wonderful, of course."

"How about the ship, Morning Star, which was burned at sea on its way to this port that very night, and whose crew and passengers all escaped, save two—an old man and a young man—both Russians, who could not be wakened in spite of all efforts to arouse them?"

"Ruth, you don't mean to say that such is the fact?"

She gave me a triumphant smile. "If the captain of the Morning Star told the truth, it is; and this was the story he told on his arrival in London."

"Almost thou persuadest me to believe," said I musingly, looking into the wondrous depths of her eyes, fascinated by that singular gleam of conscious power.

And then Philip came in, and I saw that she greeted him with a most radiant smile and brightening eyes. Still, as I glanced from the simple surroundings to Philip's mean attire and horny hands to the beautiful woman, with her bronze-tinted hair and queenly carriage, I thought to myself:

"I wonder if she never really regrets her lost palace and her wonderful prince?"

Ella Sterling Cummins.

Digitized by Google

BY WINIFRED GRAHAM. Author of "Through the Valley," "Six First-Class Passengers," etc.

SUMMARY.

Philip Roche marries Eleanor Grebby, daughter of a farmer, and they spend their honeymoon on the Continent.

CHAPTER III.

God made the woman for the man.—Tennyson.

"OH, do stop and take me to tea in that lovely confectioner's shop!" cries a pleading voice, while an eager hand flourishes a parasol which pokes the driver in the back. "Oh, I wish I could speak the horrid language."

"But, my dear," replies the man at her side, "you have only just had your coffee and unlimited bon-bons. I want to show you Brussels thoroughly. It is a most interesting town."

Eleanor Roche sighs. To her uncultivated mind the magnificent Hotel de Ville, the Roman Catholic Churches, galleries, picturesque towers, gables, and doorways of ancient buildings, hold but little charm.

She is madly excited about the bonnet and boot shops, the lace fans and collars, chocolates, and ice creams.

Philip is bent on enlarging his wife's mind, and hopes to awake in her his fervent love for art. Surely in time she will learn to appreciate it. At present she is decidedly slow of comprehension. Though looking lovelier than ever in her new Parisian toilettes, Eleanor disappoints him. She talks perpetually of her appearance, dresses three or four times a day, revels in admiring glances from male tourists, and displays strange apathy when sight-seeing.

"How ugly the foreign women are!" exclaims Eleanor, "so short, plump, and round. Why, even our miller's daughters could lick them into fits."

Her slang jars on him, but Eleanor is so sublimely unconscious of offence and childishly contented with herself that he has not the heart to murmur.

Besides, even the touch of her small hand thrills him with the old pleasure.

She surveys her feet admiringly.

"Did you ever see such lovely shoes? The points are like needles. It would be wicked to walk in them. Oh, dear, where are we stopping now?"

"At the Church of St. Gudule. You must see it before we go. The pulpit is wonderful."

Eleanor gathers up her silken skirts and steps lightly to the pavement.

She thinks this part of the honeymoon very dry, when there are cafés, music, and shops at hand.

"Isn't the carving beautiful?" murmurs her husband, examining the pulpit with fresh interest, from the fact that Eleanor is visiting his favourite places.

"You see, dear," taking her arm, "it is supported on the Tree of Knowledge, and of Life. Adam and Eve are being driven out of Paradise on one side by the Angel, while Death is gliding round with his dart."

"Ugh!" says Eleanor, shivering slightly, "what a nasty subject to choose. If you had been Adam at Copthorne, and thought you would gain anything by eating our apples, wouldn't you have devoured the lot?—that is to say, if I, as Eve, had been unselfish enough to leave any!"

She laughs at her own humour.

"It is scarcely a subject to jest upon," whispers Philip.

Eleanor's bright eyes sadden instinctively.

How has she displeased him?

"It is a marvellous piece of workmanship," he murmurs, as they move away.

He wonders if Eleanor, who has never even heard of "Rubens," feels her ignorance; but his thought is unconsciously answered by her careless, yet happy, air when he imparts his wisdom. Her great, expressive eyes seem to say: "I have no doubt it is very interesting to you, but I have so much else to think of."

Having escaped from the bewildering pulpit out into the fresh air, her spirits rise, while her fancy turns to the tempting pastry in the shop windows.

She catches sight of her face and form in a mirror as they pass to one of the small round tables, ordering coffee and cakes. Her heart kindles with love for her own beautiful being. It is not actual conceit, but genuine, unbiassed admiration for Mother Nature's handiwork.

A young Englishman of insipid appearance is seated opposite, enjoying the mild pleasure of an ice à la panache. He puts up his eyeglass and stares at Eleanor. She returns the look frankly, taking in his narrow forehead, ginger hair, and elongated neck.

"Newly married," thinks the man, noting the fresh lustre of her jewellery.

"English," mentally ejaculates Eleanor, eyeing his scrupulously clean linen.

"A woman to be loved and hated in the same breath," so runs his masculine meditation. "Tantalising open eyes, without a blush in them, and a face like the bust of Clytie."

"What is engrossing your attention, dearest?" whispers Philip, seeing her pre-occupied.

"I am wondering if that young man's mother ever thought him handsome. The nose might have been promising once, before the last half inch grew, and his hair was gold when she first cut his ringlets."

Philip looks at the stranger's dissipated eyes, and despite the apparent innocence which the hallowing presence of a guileless ice-cream will temporarily shed over Lothario himself, sees the general demoralisation that has set in.

Digitized by Google

Kneels at her feet to repair the damage.

"He is young to be blunted and coarsened," thinks Philip. Annoyed by the the impudent stare which possibly amuses rather than displeases his wife, he tells Eleanor she has had enough, and rises to signify departure. Lothario is still covering Clytie with his gaze. She pauses to caress a lean black cat with hungry eyes, that has crept in unobserved from the street. Hurriedly emptying a jug of cream in her saucer, Eleanor is about to present it to the plaintive stranger. Tom, however, scents the cream, springs on his hind legs, and upsets the liquid over her Parisian skirt.

The insipid young man starts forward, for Philip is paying at the counter, and kneels at her feet to repair the damage with his handkerchief.

Mrs. Roche stands watching helplessly, her lips curving into smiles.

"You are very kind," she murmurs, as his eyeglass falls amongst her chiffons. "The cat was hungry, and now he won't get anything. Philip will not stay and ——"

She breaks off shortly, for her husband has turned and discovered the youth on his knees before Eleanor, who, as he rises, slips his card into her hand.

"I will see the cat's fed," he whispers.

She gives him a grateful glance, and explaining the incident to Philip, hurries away, with the stranger's card hidden in her pale kid glove.

When she is back in the hotel, Eleanor looks at the name.

Herbert Dallison,

Junior Conservative Club.

"I don't suppose we shall ever meet again," she says to herself reflectively. "But he must be kindhearted, or he wouldn't have troubled about my dress or the cat."

Though Eleanor Roche is so in love with her own lustrous eyes, she does not yet realise how much goodwill they can win her. She has yet to learn that the dangerous gift of a subtle charm may make or mar its owner's life.

"We have only one more day here," says Philip, who had mapped out their tour, "and I want you to see 'Waterloo,' dearest."

"Is it amusing?" asks Eleanor.

"Well, interesting is more the word."

"Then I probably shall not care for it. The places you call interesting are so dull!"

Digitized by Google

However, Philip carries out his plan, and takes her to the little straggling village of Braue l'Alleud. The churchyard full of English graves and monuments quite distresses Eleanor.

"To think of all these brave men dying nobly for their country, and then being buried in this out-of-the-way place," she exclaims.

"I suppose it is all the same to them," replies Philip.

Herbert Dallison stands beside her.

"But I don't like the idea, nor am I fond of the sight of graves, and the thought of death. Oh, Philip! what is that fat old man saying to you?"

"He wants to show us a grave over the Marquis of Anglesea's leg, and is the proud possessor of the house where it was amputated. It was buried in a polished coffin, and has a monument erected to its memory. But who are you eyeing so intently, Eleanor?" turning as he speaks. "Why! If it isn't that impudent young puppy again, who mopped up the milk!"

"Cream, Philip, cream."

"Well! don't look at him, darling," putting his arm through hers to draw her gently away. "We will escape from the voluble Belgian with the leg story. He wants to show us the boot that once cased the foot. Such a fuss about nothing!"

Eleanor returns to the carriage, but as they drive to the huge mound with the Belgic Lion on the summit, she is conscious that Herbert Dallison is following.

For the rest of the day he always seems only a yard from her, as they examine the red walls pitted by bullets, and wander round the Museum. He has a party of friends with him—Eleanor can hear them chaffing the guide, and ridiculing everything. Their absurd remarks amuse her, from time to time she laughs for no apparent reason.

At last she owns to fatigue, and Philip leaves her, while he goes in search of their carriage.

"Would you like some relics?" says a voice at her elbow.

Eleanor knows who is speaking before she looks round. Herbert Dallison stands beside her, holding out a French forage cap, a bullet, and a rusty sword broken off in the middle.

She seizes them delightedly.

"Thank you, thank you; but please go away," as Philip's figure looms in sight.

She does not need to ask twice. Herbert Dallison seems to vanish into thin air.

"You silly child!" cries Philip laughingly, "to spend your money on those so-called 'relics' manufactured at Birmingham or Brussels to beguile innocent tourists. A fresh crop of bullets and swords, I'm told, is sown every year, that you may have the pleasure of seeing them turned up yourself."

Eleanor smiles a little nervously. She is beginning to wish she had not taken the presents. What would Philip say if he knew?

He helps her into the carriage with her spoil, the giver following with his party in the rear.

Eleanor becomes momentarily more conscience-stricken; the sight of the "relics" are hateful to her.

"I want to throw all this rubbish away," she cries at last. "It will only be a worry to me."

"Very true," replies her husband.

"I know," a mischievous twinkle in her eyes. "Let me shy them out on the road, and someone will think they have discovered real curiosities."

She stands up in childish glee, casting back a mocking smile at Herbert Dallison. One by one she flings his gifts from her, with an expressive look signifying second thoughts are best. He has taken his friends into his confidence, and is horrified at the hilarious laughter which breaks from them at Eleanor's act.

"Hang it all," he mutters, "it's beastly ungrateful; can't buy that sort of rot for nothing."

But he is too proud to stop and recover his property, so a bullet, a cap, and a sword are left by the wayside like the seed that was not good, to pass into strange hands.

"Moral," cries Bertie's pal, slapping him on the back, "don't interfere with honeymoon couples, they're abominably slow. Stick to widows, old man, for the future."

At the word "widow" Bertie actually blushes. There is more sting in this light chaff than his comrades suppose, for the vision of a villa at Richmond with its dark-haired divinity rises between the dust of the two carriages, soothing his ruffled feelings and drowning Eleanor's fair form in the seas of forgetfulness.

The honeymoon slips by pleasantly.

Mrs. Roche enjoys the long railway journeys above everything, which astonishes Philip, who thinks them the worst part of the trip.

"You see I so seldom go in trains," Eleanor says when he expresses surprise. "I love to listen to the whizz of the engine, and see the rushing, panting people on the stations worrying the grand officials in their smart uniforms. Then it is so nice to be first-class, and lean back on the cushions and cock up your feet if you wish. Besides, it is awfully jolly just to look out of the window and think."

"What do you think of?" asks her husband.

"All the beautiful presents you have given me, and the house on the lovely terrace at Richmond where I am to live."

The pleasure she takes in little things is a daily marvel to Philip. In the train, for instance, every moment she opens her dressing-bag, to shake scent from a silver bottle over her hands or peep in a dainty glass at her complexion. Each time they stop something fresh must be bought—a bunch of grapes, a bag of red plums, flowers, and unwholesome-looking tarts.

She actually purchases a tumbler of lager beer, drinking it with relish, declaring it is quite home-like and jolly.

Digitized by Google

Eleanor never worries about anything. Should the train be missed or the luggage stray, it is all the same to her. An hour's wait on a dull little platform is never grumbled at. "We'll just have to sit and whistle," she declares, and amuses herself mimicking the porters, which she succeeds in doing wonderfully well, while Philip, in spite of numerous eccentricities, forgives her everything, and worships her devotedly.

"Alas! that we have to return," he sighs, as they glide in a small boat on the Lake of Geneva. "I must be back in the city this week."

"And you will make me lots of money?" expanding her eyes and showing her beautiful teeth.

"Won't you be contented with a little?"

"Oh, no. I want to entertain. You must bring your friends from London, and the house you have so long neglected shall be packed with guests."

"We'll see about that," says Philip, not liking to damp her ardour. "You must remember, though, that I am not a walking gold mine, little wife."

"Can the boatman understand what we say?"

"He only knows a smattering of English. What a strong, steady stroke he pulls!" Eleanor leans over the side, gazing down the clear depths.

"I never saw such wonderful water; you can see ever so far below. How amusing it would be to drop pebbles in and watch them sink."

"Here is a stray one on the seat," said Philip, throwing it overboard. Eleanor watches the descent with sparkling eyes.

"It is still in sight," she cries, "whirling through the water! My word! how clear the lake is. I must see it again."

She glances round, but there are no more stones.

Before Philip has time to stop her she opens her purse and drops a coin over the side of the boat.

"Look!' there it goes," laughing lightly. "Isn't it fascinating?"

The rower has stopped, and with eager, covetous eyes watches the wilful waste. Those coins would mean bread to him and his children, while she throws them to feed the deep! Another and yet another fall from her slim hands.

"Stop, Eleanor!" he says sternly.

Philip has turned quite pale with anger.

"Stop! Eleanor," he says sternly, "you do not realise what you are doing. It is wicked."

But she shrugs her shoulders and drops another.

"Do you hear what I say," he mutters, grasping her wrist. "I'll have no more of this. Look at that poor fellow's eyes; why, he would like to murder you. It is enough to call down the judgment of Heaven upon us."

"Just one more, only five centimes, Philip, and the man shall have all that is left in my purse."

"No," he replies, still retaining her arm in an iron grip.

"Don't; you hurt me."

He removes his hand, and with a defiant look Eleanor

She is standing gazing on them joyfully.

flings the coin into the lake, watching it whirl below with redoubled interest.

"Gott!" mutters the boatman under his breath, "what tevilry."

Then, without a sign of shame, Eleanor passes a handful of money to the sunburnt fellow, casting a smile of ineffable sweetness upon him.

"For the little ones," she says.

But Philip's brow is still black.

"It was wicked," he repeats.

Eleanor only laughs.

"You deserve to want in the future."

"The future," she replies lightly, "who thinks of the future? It may be dark enough to frighten the very life out of you—a thing to make you scream——"

Philip shudders. Storm clouds are gathering overhead. This is the last day of his honeymoon.

CHAPTER IV.

Life is a Jest.

A great red sun that is warm and kind sinks behind the golden trees, rich with autumnal tints, as Philip and Eleanor drive up to "Lyndhurst," on Richmond Terrace.

"So this is your home—my home?" she cries, her eyes sparkling with delight as they rest on her new abode. "Ring very loud and long, Philip; I am dying to be in!"

The door is almost immediately opened by a buxom maiden with rosy cheeks and a lenient smile, which alights on the youthful mistress. Eleanor bounds into the hall, and waves a feather boa joyfully over her head.

"Hurrah! Ancestors," she cries, saluting the old pictures on the wall with mock courtesy. "Real dead ancestors in wigs, and you never told me, Philip!"

She is standing, gazing on them joyfully as the luggage is brought in, pointing with her umbrella at a wrinkled judge.

Her husband smiles, and takes the umbrella from her.

"They have seldom received such admiration," he says gently. "Poor old things, they disfigure the walls sadly with their grim faces."

Digitized by Google

"The lady on the left is simpering; and, oh! here is a tiger rug," stumbling over a head on the ground. "I caught my heel on his nose," as Philip prevents her falling by seizing her elbow.

"Show me which is my room. I am longing to see it," she continues, taking two steps at a time in her eager ascent. "Sarah," calling to her maid, "bring those three hat boxes and my cloak, there's a good soul! Come on, Philip, I'll race you to the top."

He feels as if he is playing with a child, as he rushes over the house after Eleanor. The day of the school treat returns to his mind, he fancies he sees her still, running through the long grass.

"Everything is beautiful," she gasps, clasping her hands. "There's a room to be frivolous and lazy in, a study for book learning (I'm going to read no end) and, oh! if you want to sing——"

She draws a deep breath at the remembrance of the grand piano in the drawing-room. "It is ever so much bigger than the one at the vicarage, which was always out of tune. I'll get my cousin Joe to send me a list of songs, and we will buy a harmonium, too, Philip. I can play the harmonium splendidly."

"I am glad you are pleased, Eleanor," he replies, kissing her upturned face.

"And now, I am going to dress, for I feel horrible after my journey. May I ring for Sarah?"

"Of course. What a question! Do exactly as you like with your own servants."

She finds Sarah in her room busily unpacking.

"Oh! there you are," cries Eleanor. "I forgot I had given you my keys. It is such a blessing to be able to talk in English, that foreign stuff was awful, I could not speak a word! Yes, I will wear my lovely pink tea-gown—did you ever see anything so pretty, Sarah? I must make you put it on some day, just to show how it looks on another person. You are a bit stouter than I am though, but perhaps you could pull in——"

And so Eleanor rattles on, just as if Sarah were one of the farm-servants at home, and she the same unaffected light-hearted Miss Grebby.

"Are you happy, Eleanor?"

"Do you come from the country, Sarah?" she asks at last.

"Yes, ma'am. My father's a grocer, and mother keeps house for the doctor's children in our next village."

"Then they don't live together?"

"No, ma'am, it's father's temper. We ~~nere~~ of us can't live at home, he is that hasty! It ain't safe, ma'am, it ain't really!"

"How dreadful," sighs Eleanor. "Doesn't it frighten you?"

"Lor! yes, ma'am. I have seen him grow purple round the eyes, and crimson in the cheeks, and throw a whole sack of flour through the window."

Eleanor receives the information with an expressive "Oh!" as she shakes down her hair, and tells Sarah to brush it.

"How many servants have I got?" gazing at her face in the mirror contentedly.

"Three, ma'am. There's me, and Judith, and cook."

"Do you like Richmond?"

"Well enough, ma'am, thank you, but Judith would have rather been in London, and cook has always set her face against the suburbs."

"Then why did they come?"

"Well, you see, ma'am, the gentleman engaged them, and he seemed that put about they hadn't the heart to refuse."

"Good gracious! whatever is that noise?"

"The dinner gong. Judith is very strong in the arms, and she do make it sound, ma'am!"

"Light a few more candles; I want to have a good look at myself."

His wife Eleanor walks up and down before the glass, with spasmodic gasps of satisfaction, till Philip comes to the door to see if she is ready.

Eleanor walks up and down before the glass.

Digitized by Google

Eleanor is brimming over with conversation during the evening meal; she has something to say about everything, and her ideas seem to expand over each fresh course. At the soup she wants a pony cart, but over the fish decides on a brougham and Victoria. The entrée introduces a pair of prancing chestnuts, and Philip is quite afraid that the arrival of the meat will suggest powdered footmen in silk stockings.

"You see, dear," he explained at dessert, when Sarah and Judith have left the room, "I have a very comfortable income to live in a fairly luxurious style without undue extravagance. We can easily keep one horse and man, which I have waited to choose with you."

"I see," replies Eleanor, peeling a banana. There is a pause, then she looks up and repeats uncertainly: "I see, Philip."

"You will try and make a good little housekeeper and manage everything splendidly. I often think of you, Eleanor, in your peaceful domesticity at Copthorne. How quiet it was, and——"

"How dull!" (sighing).

It all comes back with a rush—the pewter dinner service, and spotless parlour, smelling of lavender and soap, the cackle of hens and lowing of cows. Eleanor pushes aside the dish of bananas, "Let us go out in the moonlight," she says. "It is lovely in the garden, and you can smoke. Let me light your cigar," striking a match on the sole of her velvet slipper, and narrowly escaping burning her pink silk train.

"You must not do that, dear, it is dangerous," remonstrates Philip.

"Oh, no! not if you put up your foot so," illustrating her meaning by striking another. "What is that pretty yellow stuff you are drinking?"

"Chartreuse."

Eleanor kneels down by his side and sips out of his glass. "What queer tasting stuff; not half as nice as elderberry wine!"

"Don't you like it?"

"No; it's almost as nasty as the cowslip tea I used to make. But do come for a stroll, I like wandering about in this long silk gown, it feels so grand."

"Master's been home an hour."

"What myriads of stars!" exclaims Philip, who is well versed in astronomy. "Don't they make you feel like a mere atom, Eleanor, when you think they are all worlds?"

"No, I never bother my head about stars. I like moonlight, it's so pretty, and the moonbeams look ghostly and fairylike. But isn't it cold in the garden? I only just realise that summer is over, and what an eventful summer it has been for me! The other girls at Copthorne were mad with jealousy at my wedding. They all want to marry gentlemen now, and come to London. Do you remember the schoolchildren, Philip? How they scattered flowers and crowded round to kiss me. I gave them my wedding cake (or rather what was left of it) when we went, and the three cheers for 'Teacher,' is quite the nicest recollection." Eleanor's passionate love for children pleases her husband, it shows that her nature is good. He puts his arm lovingly round her as they return to the house.

"Are you happy, Eleanor?" he whispers. A soft brightness creeps into her eyes.

"Yes, Philip, there isn't a lighter heart in Richmond!"

* * * * * *

"Oh! dear, more cards! I returned the doctors' wives visits yesterday, three of them, Philip—each intent on her husband's business, I suppose. Two were at home, and I looked so aggravatingly healthy. I could not think what to talk about, having never done that sort of thing before. The first mercifully had a dog, which I admired for a quarter of an hour, the second showed me her pigeons. I knew all about them."

Philip looked at the latest cards which Eleanor handed him.

"Mrs. Mounteagle," he read, "why she is the lady next door. I don't want you to know her, Eleanor. She has not the best of names in Richmond; this place teems with scandal! I am acquainted with half-a-dozen people who positively cram it down your throat whenever you are unfortunate enough to meet them."

"And what have they against Mrs. Mounteagle?"

"Well, my dear, nothing alarmingly serious, only she is rather a fast widow, and not a nice companion for you. She has a queer set at her house, and is almost too 'up-to-date' even for Richmond society."

"But since she has called, Philip, and we live next door, what am I to do?"

"It is awkward, certainly. I should leave cards, and not ask if she is in. That is about the best hint if you don't desire her acquaintance."

"She will think me so horrid," sighs Eleanor, "but I will do as you wish."

The following afternoon Eleanor, card-case in hand, rings at Mrs. Mounteagle's, prepared to carry out her husband's suggestion.

A soft voice singing in the garden arrests her attention. It is the sweetest sound Eleanor has ever heard. Light footsteps crunch the gravel, and a slim, dark woman approaches with slumbrous eyes, which look at the visitor dreamily. A smile, like a fitful flame, flickers over Mrs. Mounteagle's face, suddenly bursting into a bright expression of ill-concealed amusement at Eleanor's nervous demeanour.

"Mrs. Roche," she exclaims, holding out a welcoming hand. "You see, being such near neighbours, I know you already by sight. I am sure if you are only just married you must find first calls most boring and tedious. But I am very glad you selected this afternoon to return mine, for I am simply pining to talk to someone. The dead leaves and general decay out here gives one the blues. Come in, and help me to appreciate my first fire."

Digitized by Google

Eleanor has utterly forgotten her husband's wishes, till she finds herself in a softly-cushioned rocking chair, with her feet on Mrs. Mounteagle's brightly-polished fender. Then she remembers—and ignores.

Never has any woman fascinated her as the lovely widow she is asked not to know. What sparkling conversation! and, oh, what a dainty tea service and piping hot cakes the footman places between them as they talk.

The room is far prettier than Eleanor's boudoir which she has hitherto considered such a dream of beauty. More than once Mrs. Roche suggests going, but the widow intreats her to remain.

"It is so delightful to have you!" she declares, with exuberant cordiality. "I have done nothing all the afternoon but lie on this sofa and yawn over a novel. I could have written it better myself, and that foolish librarian at Mudie's recommended it. I drive to town nearly every afternoon—there is always something to buy or something to see. Are you fond of London, Mrs. Roche?"

"I hardly know, I have been there so little. I lived in the country before my marriage, and was positively buried."

"It is a mercy then that Mr. Roche found you, and dug you up."

"Yes. I like married life much better."

"Spinsterhood is a mistake," retorts Mrs. Mounteagle. "If you have the misfortune to be thrown back upon yourself—widowed in your prime—take my advice and marry again. We poor weak little women were not made to take care of ourselves. We want a stronger arm to lean on—someone who will think for us, anticipate our every wish, load us with all the good things of this earth, and kiss us to sleep when we die!"

Eleanor listens admiringly to this superior mind.

"I shall re-marry," continues Mrs. Mounteagle, "but not immediately. I am practically 'growing my husband.' He is still young in years, though old in frivolity, or vice, whichever you like to call it. He must have his fling before he settles down, or I shall only be binding a burden on my shoulders."

Eleanor attends with deepening interest.

"I married very young," continues Mrs. Mounteagle, "and my husband was nearly eighty. Yes," noting her visitor's surprise, "rather a difference in our ages, wasn't there?

"Love, my dear Mrs. Roche, is a science; you can learn it with careful study, and make it always accommodating, pleasant, and never vulgarly effusive. Do not imagine that the first bloom of youth gleans all the peaches, leaving only apples for after years. A clever woman seldom grows old. She erases Time with the same nimble fingers with which she creates her boudoir, and makes it appear part of her being. You admire my sanctum, and small wonder. It has cost me sleepless nights as long as the furniture bills. I invented it. These chairs for instance were not arranged, they occurred. The minutest detail has positively been prayed over. Look at my quaint treasures! If other hands had placed them they might appear ignoble, debased. You see the curve of this pillowed couch, the tint of the curtains, it is Art Mrs. Roche, Art with a big A."

"I am dreadfully envious," cries Eleanor, "there is no artistic genius in me."

"It must be born in the blood, but if you like I will 'compose' you a room. It shall be like a melody (if you can grasp the comparison)—subtle, entrancing."

"You are wonderful!" says Eleanor solemnly.

The light is fading fast, only the soft glow of the fire filters through the gloom.

"It is all so like a fairy palace, and you are the fairy, Mrs. Mounteagle."

"Then, in the guise of a mysterious gnome, let me give you a word of warning. You are a stranger in Richmond, pray take care not to get into a clique. They are so numerous and unhealthy, so full of civil wars and petty strife, that existence becomes poisoned, and all the romance of life is swept aside, seared, wasted!"

"Thank you," replies Eleanor, rising reluctantly and giving Mrs. Mounteagle both her hands. "How good you have been to me to-day!"

"I hope we shall see a great deal of each other," answers the widow softly, "and be very great friends."

"It shan't be my fault if we are not," responds Mrs. Roche.

They part.

"Oh, ma'am! Master's been home an hour, and he's frightened to death about you."

Thus Sarah greets her on her return.

(To be continued.)

IF ANY READER OF

SHORT STORIES

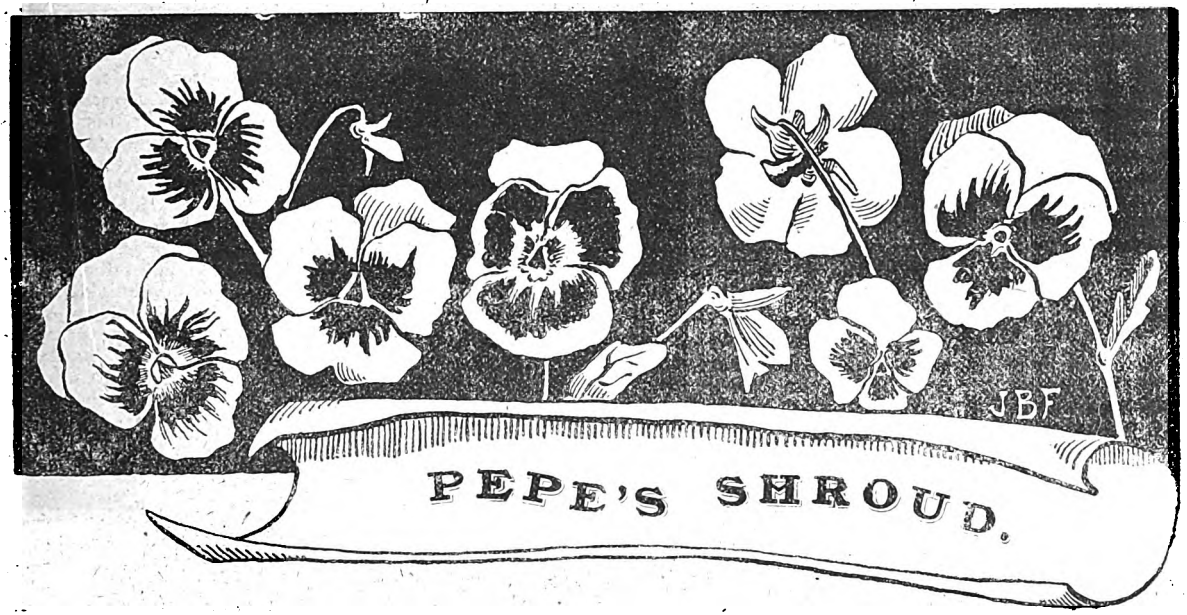
WOULD LIKE TO PUT

£250 in his pocket

It is worth his while to look inside the February number of

Pearson's Magazine.

Digitized by Google



PEPE MURHUA was, perhaps, the most popular young man in San Felipe. He was a singularly cheery lad, and to his unfailing good spirits, no doubt, owed much of his popularity, rather than to his many qualities of greater sterling worth. But the trait which excited most interest among his compeers of his own age and sex was his dauntless, daring courage. None so reckless as Pepe when the amateurs took the bullring for some function whose funds were devoted to charitable or patriotic purposes; none pushed his horse to such strenuous efforts nor clung so persistently to the game at the coleadero, when the young bloods of the community pitted their strength one against another in "tailing the bull."

And brave he was, too, in emergencies in which the soul is less highly keyed to heroism than in such stimulating phases of dash and enthusiasm. Facing calmly and in cold blood men maddened by drink or passion, or else turning a bold, defiant front to the lawless gentry infesting, in his day, the district, Pepe demonstrated ever his self-possession and courageous spirit.

A group of Pepe's friends had had his attributes under discussion, one miserable Sunday afternoon, when the sudden intermittent gusts of rain, and the dusty wind had driven them to shelter from the rather bleak alameda, where to day no carriages dashed under the garrulous cottonwoods, nor demure, dark-eyed maidens paced the gravelled ways, or perched, like gay birds, upon the massive stucco benches. The coterie had betaken themselves to the house of Don Enrique Soto, at the instance of Federico, his son, who sat brimming their glasses with the cordial wine of Parras —to the disdain, be it admitted, of divers supercilious spirits, who would have been vastly better contented with any poor, thin liquor, so only that it should bear a foreign label.

"I tell you, comrades all," cried Pablo Nuñez, "this fine fellow, Pepe, gets credit for valour he does not know. In all these feats of strength that he performs, he knows he is at an advantage by virtue of his limber and strong muscles. But the true test of courage will be a case where he is on an equality with others—with all the world. How would he behave during an earthquake, when his tremendous strength would avail him nothing? How long would he stand before an intangible shape—a phantom?"

At that a shouted chorus of laughter ascended from the circle of young men.

"Por Dios! Pablo, dost thou believe in phantoms? But what ghosts hast thou seen? Come, tell us a tale —a story—a legend. A pretty business this—that Pablo has grown credulous of ghosts—he who was wont to scoff at aught that he could not touch, regarding the doctrines of the church even as the superstitious dreams of ignorant women. Oh, Pepe!" cried the merry crew, deriding as the favourite came to the door, "here is meat for thy mirth! Here is Pablo grown superstitious!"

Pepe smiled when the babbling spirits explained the situation, not failing, either, to mark the point that the question had arisen through Nuñez's doubt of Pepe's valour. But smile although he did, Pepe looked serious, too.

"Remember, mates," he said, "that Pablo is from the Sierra, and in the mountains one grows up more inclined to belief in unearthly things—the very influences of Nature, unchanged by the arts of man, tend that way."

"Eh! Pepe to the defence!"

"Well yes, then," said Pepe, "and I do think, moreover, that deep down in every human heart there lurks belief, of less or greater strength, in the supernatural. Some stake their faith on dreams, and some on signs and tokens. Thou, Corvera, didst shiver and leave off playing mallila one night last week because Juan Luna came and looked over thy shoulder with his crossed eyes. How many of you will join me to-morrow in a dinner I will give to twelve? Come, speak up, boys. You shall have the fullest spread the town affords, and French wines all. What! are you bashful?"

No man made exuberant haste to accept Murhua's offer to make one of the thirteen; rather, the young fellows looked abashed and guilty.

Digitized by Google

"Ajo," cried Nuñez. "I told them you'd wear the white plume on some charges. Now, see, Pepe, you rank as the pluckiest fellow in town; will you come to Campo Santo alone to-night?"

"I don't think I am the pluckiest," said Pepe. "There's Juan Carrazco, who faced that mad bull that was charging a crowd in the market place, and Tito Redona, who overcame and tied crazy Sanchez, the butcher, over the dead body of the maniac's son that he had just murdered."

"So you want to dodge the trial by shifting the honours?" said Nuñez tauntingly. "These are all cases where the danger was clear and definite. You will not go to the graveyard?"

"Oh, yes," said Pepe, "I am not given to dodging; I will go. Now, mind you, I am afraid. Yes, comrades, it is true. The unknown is always the thing fullest of horrors, and I find an awful terror in the thought that, as a bare possibility, even, somewhat that is gruesome and fearful might befal. But, to my mind, the truest courage lies, not in our reckless, foolhardy exploits, but in fearing a thing and facing it all the same. Come, what do you wish me to do?"

"Let us go now to Campo Santo, and see what shall be the test," and at the word they trooped out and up the street to the dreary graveyard, facing on a forlorn empty square above the alameda, a spot so desolate and forbidding that its mere contemplation would make world-weary humanity willing to cling to life rather than face the destiny of lying in such repellent confines. Death, the Reaper, had garnered ample harvests at San Felipe; his granary was full to overflowing.

The long, whitewashed façade was topped by a cross above the great portal of the zaguan, inexplicably wide, since no carriage nor beast of burden ever crosses the threshold. In the long, narrow vestibule, or porch, a chapel was arranged, where, night and day, a lamp burnt before a pictured Holy Family, and its flame threw uncanny reflections upon a row of gleaming ashen-white skulls ranged below.

Passing through this species of atrium, the young men, sobered by their surroundings, entered the city of the dead. The graves lay thick as grass-blades, literally overlapping, and almost without exception facing westward. No shrubs, no flowers, or trees enlivened the scene; only the débris of dried bouquets from the annual decoration on All Souls' Day, which had fallen a fortnight previous, and here and there a harsh, glaring wreath of yellow and black immortelles. Some of the monuments were stately and handsome, but the majority were flat, low-lying stones, carved with no particular skill or taste, and often with defective orthography. Some of the humbler sort were built of masonry, and painted in crudest, vividest tones of blue or green, picked out with weather-tarnished gilding.

A fair proportion of the monuments bore the letters "D.P.," which indicated the right of the tenants to slumber there undisturbed in perpetuity, instead of suffering exhumation like the less-favoured, whose mouldering bones, at the end of four of five years, would be unearthed and thrown into the common receptacle of the huescario.

So depressing was the place, that the visitors, as with one accord, and an instinct of self-defence, lighted fresh cigarettes, and puffed vigorously, until they created a cloud of fragrant blue smoke to mingle with the murky atmosphere. They picked their way with what reverence of tread they might to a section of the northern wall, where the plaster was crumbling away from the adobes, while here and there in the scarred expanse were tablets bearing, besides name and date, the legend, "Slain by the Savage," in mournful suggestion of the days, not so long gone by, when the Indians had been wont to swoop in fierce raids into the city's very streets.

Then Nuñez, still acting as spokesman, turned to Pepe.

"Wilt thou come here at midnight and drive a nail into this wall?"

"I will do it," answered Pepe, "but with reluctance, as you know."

Then, after the inevitable chatter and chaff, the crowd lounged homeward.

It was perhaps ten o'clock when they reassembled at Pablo Nuñez's office, deeming it indiscreet to start such undertaking from the salon de billar or any more public point. Pepe looked a little pale and eerie, but nevertheless came gallantly forward. At the last, Clemente Allande, Pepe's bosom friend, tried to dissuade him from the enterprise.

"'Tis a rash and useless thing, hombre. Give it up. If aught were to be gained by the going, vaya! But to gratify the jealous malice of an envious soul like Pablo, why shouldst thou risk thy life? For at night the exhalations from the graves are more than ever noxious, and thou mayest get typhus or heaven knows what from breathing them."

The plea was potent with Pepe, who had all the usual horror which Mexicans feel for the air of night, never stirring abroad after dusk without muffling his mouth and nostrils in the folds of a silken handkerchief, through which he breathed. "But—I cannot recede now," he said; "cease to dissuade me, Clemente. It may be that the example will be salutary. Seeing that I undertake, for the sake of reason and courage, a thing I dislike and fear, the boys may perhaps be impelled to act with less absolute obedience to their own preferences. We Mexicans of the younger generation are a selfish lot. Give me the hammer," he added, turning back to the others, as he threw the point of his cloak over his shoulder.

This wrap of Pepe's was one of his whims—an affectation, said the malicious. But it was not that. The intense patriotism of the young fellow made him cling to the long Spanish cape of his forefathers—surely the most graceful garment a man can wear—while his comrades disported themselves in overcoats or ulsters of the latest French or English cut.

Throwing, then, over his shoulder one long end of his capa, and tucking under its drooping folds the hammer and the big clumsy spike, Pepe stepped away in the darkness, up the gloomy street between the low houses, whose dark, forbidding façades gave no promise of the kindly hospitality to be found within.

"He is gone," said Clemente Allande, re-entering the house. "I saw him turn the corner of the 'Green Devil.'"

"You should not have watched him out of sight," said one of the young men; "that brings evil fortune."

"Now, croak, you!" snapped Clemente viciously, in the stress of his nervous foreboding, and went out to stand alone in the chilled patio, more and more deploring Pepe's undertaking. "And I might have prevented it if I had not been a fool," he muttered. "What easier than to have sent a hint to the Jefatura, and the prefect would have so moved that the guard of the graveyard would have missed his stolen key and watch would have been kept. Better that Pepe should pay a multa, or even take a turn in the lock-up, rather than get diphtheria or typhus in the miasmas among the graves!" Then the others came out laughing, and dragged him to the card-table, where still he would not play, but sat glowering at the game.

Digitized by Google

An hour passed by, another, and Allande could bear it no longer, but sprang to his feet with an oath of disturbance.

"Two hours and Pepe not here! Some evil has assailed him! We must go to his relief."

"And find him snugly in bed," sneered Pablo Nuñez; "he has been home an hour, or—quien sabe?—perhaps he was not so scrupulous as to go to the graveyard at all!"

"It does not particularly become you, Nuñez, to sneer and throw aspersions on Pepe's courage, when it is at your instigation he has gone into this absurd and useless adventure. It might be interesting to seek a cause for your pique against him!"

"One need not go far for that," murmured another of the young men; "only down to the corner of Guadalupe, where Aurelia Miramontez lives."

"At all events," said Clemente, "I shall go to Pepe. You who will may come. However, I have no faith in ghosts, and I can go alone."

But the crowd were fairly shamed by Allande's spirit, and moved by self-reproach and also, no doubt, by curiosity, they trooped out with him, barring only Nuñez, who slunk away to his bed. The graveyard paths were dismal in their stark bareness, that left the palpable darkness unrelieved, and pressing like material substance on the pilgrims.

The leader stopped short as he rounded a tall and massive monument that concealed the particular space of wall where their quest lay. Something undoubtedly was there, a denser concrete shape against the formless blackness of the night, and the shadows from the wall. Something, too, in human semblance, and in the uncertain light shed by the lantern's flame, flickering and waving in the riotous gale, it seemed to struggle and writhe, as if in mortal throes, or else in the strain of combat. Clemente dashed forward with one wild cry.

"Pepe! oh, Pepe! To the rescue."

He reached the spot, and but one figure was there; bowing and swaying, bending, and reeling in fantastic movement, as if wrestling with its own shadow, projected in grotesque, unearthly proportions upon the wall. Clemente threw his arms about the other's waist, and strove to restrain and drag him aside. A passive and inert but powerful resistance was the result. By this time the others had gathered round, and one of them threw the lantern's rays full on Pepe Murhua's face. Then a cry of fear and horror went up from all throats, so ghastly was that pallid countenance, set in the rigid lines of mortal agony and despair.

"Will you not help to free him?" cried Clemente. "Are you all paralysed? Come! see what holds him, so I can lay him down. I think he is grasping something on the wall."

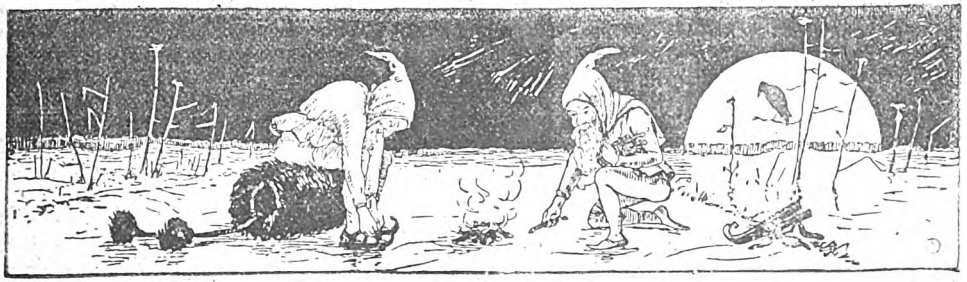
But none of the panic-stricken crew would move, and Clemente himself, still supporting the other, sought to reach along the rigid arms, to detach them from their hold. Both arms hung free; one stiffened hand still held the heavy hammer. Then, with a sudden light breaking on his mind, the faithful Clemente caught at the folds of the ample Spanish cape, flapping and waving airily in the wind, and tried to tear them away from the form of his friend. The resistance which he encountered confirmed his belief, that had taken shape tardily, thanks to the dim and shifting, uneven light.

With a few words of explanation which deprived the incident of its supernatural aspect, he rallied his stiffened companions, prompt enough to act where only material forces were concerned. The nature of the occurrence was plain. Blown by the fitful wind, the folds of Pepe's cloak had been pierced by the heavy spike, whose broad, flat head had effectually held the strong cloth and pinned the young man to the wall. Alone there in the night with such awesome circumstances of time and place, the conditions had unbalanced his judgment when he had seemed to find himself in the grasp of something, unseen, unheard.

Nor had the poor lad succumbed to fear alone. The family physician of the Murhuas had long ago diagnosed a weakness of the heart, brought on or aggravated by Pepe's prowess in field sports, and any excess of mental or spiritual emotion must have resulted fatally. The knowledge of his condition had been kept from Pepe with a view to averting the fate that enlightenment might have spared him.

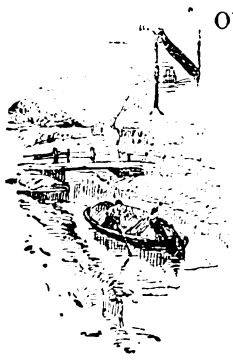
He was buried near the spot where death had met him, but his name is not forgotten. The graceful fashion of the Spanish cloak is coming into favour in Mexico, but never can be found a youth of San Felipe who will don the garment that is known as "the shroud of Pepe Murhua."

Y. H. Addis.



Digitized by Google

TAKING HIM DOWN.



OW, Miss—er—er Miss——"

"Fosdick."

"Thanks very much. Now, Miss Fosdick, in commencing your work as a typewriter for the firm of Poplin and Son, it is necessary for me to instruct you as to your duties. I have charge of the house's correspondence—entire charge. My name, Miss Fosdick, is Hipple."

"Yes, Mr. Hipple," the girl meekly replied.

"In the first place," Mr. Hipple went on, leaning back in his chair so as to expand his chest to its utmost capacity, and twisting the ends of his moustache with both hands as he spoke, "in the first place I always insist on my typewriter taking me down verbatim et literatim. I suppose you know what that means. It's Latin,' he added condescendingly.

"Yes, sir."

"Well, Miss Fosdick, I have had the house's correspondence in my hands for several years, and both Messrs. Poplin have come to rely implicitly upon me. Indeed, I do not really see how this department could move along without me."

The girl's grey eyes looked at the indispensable clerk with an amused twinkle.

"I think I can say, Miss Fosdick," the young man proceeded, as he settled more comfortably in his chair, "and I think I can say it without the slightest egotism or desire to boast, that I have made the letters of Poplin and Son famous throughout the business world as models of English composition and ornate diction."

The clerk watched the countenance of his new assistant closely, to note the impression of his words.

Miss Fosdick nodded understandingly and smiled. It was a sweet smile, for she could not smile any other sort had she tried.

"Those are the reasons why I always insist on absolute accuracy on the part of my typewriter. I do not permit even the alteration of a single word or any other change whatever. I trust you comprehend me clearly."

"Quite so, Mr. Hipple."

"Then we will begin."

Mabel Fosdick's first day's work was perfectly satisfactory to the hypercritical correspondence clerk. He found himself taken down with unvarying accuracy. In the transcribed letters the words were spelt all correctly. She never struck the wrong character on her machine—a fault so common among typewriters, and one which sometimes helped to make type-written communications resemble Egyptian hieroglyphics.

Thanks to Miss Fosdick's skill, Mr. Hipple's specimens of ornate English composition went forth into the business world more faultlessly than ever, and aided in making smooth the rough places of commercial epistolary communication.

The firm of Poplin and Son had been served by a masculine typewriter, but the style of the correspondence clerk had become too oppressive for him, and he had resigned. This was exactly what Mr. Hipple wished, for he longed for a typewriter with laughing eyes and golden hair upon whom to lavish the flowers of language—such a being as he had read about in the funny papers. At last he had found one to suit him, after much examination of applicants, in the person of Miss Fosdick.

Everything went on with apparent smoothness for about a month. The members of the firm noted with approval the modest demeanour of their new typewriter, and the other male clerks of the establishment envied Hipple his pleasant duties.

One day the elder Mr. Poplin sent for Miss Fosdick to come to his private office.

"Sit down, please," he said, when she arrived; "I have here a letter from my friend Mr. Shaw, of Shaw and King, who says that a communication from this firm contains much irrelevant matter."

Poplin looked over his glasses at Miss Fosdick, and found her blushing, with eyes cast down. He asked not unkindly:

"Did you write a letter to that firm lately?"

"Yes, sir."

"Then you know its character?"

"Yes, sir."

"What have you to say about it?"

"I wrote it down just as Mr. Hipple dictated it, sir."

"So I supposed, after reading it; but is it not rather unusual to insert in letters extraneous remarks made during dictation?"

"He has always insisted on being taken down verbatim et literatim, sir," the pretty typewriter went on, with some confusion; "and, really, sir, Mr. Hipple has annoyed me so much with his attention, and has refused to desist, that I felt I must do something to crush him. I'm sorry I took the method I did—I oughtn't to—oh, dear, what shall I do?"

Miss Fosdick put her dainty cambric handkerchief up to her eyes, and her speech dissolved in tears.

"There! there! my dear girl, don't cry," said Mr. Poplin soothingly.

He took her hand to assist in the comforting operation and placed her head on his fatherly shoulder. He was not too old to make mental note of how long her lashes lay on her rosy cheeks, and how dewdrops of tears oozed through them.

"What am I doing?" Mabel exclaimed, as she bethought herself of the picture she and Mr. Poplin would present if anyone should come into the office, and she promptly raised her head.

"You did just right," said Mr. Poplin, referring to her treatment of Mr. Hipple. "The presumptuous rascal! Never mind, little girl—er—Miss Fosdick I'll settle with Mr. Hipple myself. In the meantime you may take a couple of days off. Go home straight away, and I'll see that he annoys you no more."

After the fair typewriter had put on her things and gone home, Mr. Hipple was called into the office, and Mr. Poplin asked him:

Digitized by Google

"Are you in the habit of reading and signing the firm's letters after the typewriter has taken them from your dictation, and transcribed them, Mr. Hipple?"

When Mr. Poplin took the extra time necessary to use the prefix "Mister," in addressing one of his clerks, it was an indication that the subject of the interview was of more than ordinary importance. It was with some perturbation, therefore, that Mr. Hipple replied:

"Well, sir, I used to, but I found Miss Fosdick so scrupulously exact that I lately have permitted her to sign letters dictated to her without my reading them. She takes me down word for word, sir, so I feel that it isn't necessary for me to read the letters over."

"The reason why I asked you that question is this: I received a note from Mr. Shaw this morning—of Shaw and King, you know—in which he asks an explanation of a letter he had just received from this house. Perhaps you can give the needed explanation after I have read you the letter. This is it:

"Gentlemen, — Your favour of Monday was received in due course. Got that down, sweetheart? In reply, we would say—I'd like a sweet kiss from those ruby lips—say that the goods you mention — you charming creature, why are you so cold to me?—mention were shipped yesterday morning. Your birdlike voice thrills me through and through! Why do you never smile on your adorer? Hoping that they have arrived in good condition — give me one kiss, Mabel, darling, won't you?—and that they gave perfect satisfaction — got that down, little beauty—we beg to remain, yours very truly—one kiss now, I insist. What are you struggling for?

"Your obedient servants,
"Poplin and Sons."

Hipple turned alternately red and white while his employer read this letter in icy tones, and said nothing when it was concluded. The occasion did not seem to be one for the display of ornate English composition.

After a painful pause the senior member of the firm went on:

"Mr. Hipple, I think I'll attend to the correspondence of this firm hereafter myself, and what love-making it is necessary to do to the typewriter I will also look after. The cashier will give you your salary to date. Good morning, sir."

"The idea!" exclaimed Mr. Poplin to his son, the junior member, half-an-hour later, when he had laid the whole matter before him. "The idea that a womanly and modest girl like Miss Fosdick should be so grossly mistreated in my establishment exasperates me. She's pretty and sweet, and altogether admirable."

"I rather admire Hipple's taste," replied the son.

"Oh, you do," exclaimed the father. "Then I suppose I have done wrong in discharging the scamp, even when he knew his attentions were distasteful to the girl?"

"No, father, you did quite right. Of course it would not do for that sort of thing to continue."

"Of course it wouldn't. It would be persecution of as sweet a girl as I know."

"Why, you are not in love with her yourself, are you, father?"

"I, a widower of fifteen years' standing? The idea! Can't an elderly man defend a helpless young woman without such an imputation as that?"

"Oh, certainly."

Then the conversation was dropped.

Old Mr. Poplin was in love with Miss Fosdick, nevertheless, and he resolved to ask her to be his son's step-mother on the first opportunity when she should report for duty.

Miss Fodsick returned to her duties at the appointed time, and proceeded straight to the private office. The elder Mr. Poplin was alone.

"Good morning, Mr. Poplin," said Miss Fosdick, with her sweetest smile.

"Oh, it's you, is it?" Mr. Poplin replied, raising his eyes above his newspaper; "sit down, Miss Fosdick, please. Before you take the lid off your typewriter, I have something—er—important. I have been thinking of you almost constantly since you went away two days ago, and I wanted to—er—ask you——"

"One moment, please, Mr. Poplin," Miss Fosdick interrupted him to say, "you must pardon me, but I have not come back to work."

"Eh? What's that?"

"No, sir. Fact is—I—that is—your son, sir, has done me the honour to—to—propose, and —and——"

"The sly rascal," ejaculated Poplin, not giving her a chance to finish. "Well, I suppose I'll have to be a father to you, and I will say that I am extremely proud of my new daughter."

Then he thought, "I wonder if she really suspected what I was going to say?" H. L. C.

FOOTLIGHT FAVOURITES.

PART IV. of this charming series of Photographs of our leading Actors and Actresses is now on Sale.

PRICE SIXPENCE.

Digitized by Google

MADAME ✣ CAPRICE.

Translated from the French of Gilbert Dore.

"DING! Dong!" Maurice Marsy laid down his palette and ran to the door, which he softly opened. A flower-decked hat with a rosy face under it appeared in the shadow of the staircase, and Madame Denise Ligneron entered the room with the laugh of a joyous child. As a spattered sparrow dries his feathers after the rain and turns about and plumes himself, his wings vibrating, his neck strained, she smoothed out her crumpled draperies, rustling her silken skirts about her and fluttering her ribbons as she bent before the almost finished picture on the easel.

Maurice had carefully closed the door. He contemplated for a moment the pretty silhouette of the young woman, from the flowers on her hat to the points of her polished shoes, his look enveloping with silent caresses the little piquant, provoking and charming person of Madame Ligneron. The studio was neither large nor elegant. It did not contain any of the rare and expensive collections found in celebrated studios, where the painter receives beautiful women and respectful reporters. Several moulds and casts, some studies without frames, some hangings thrown over easel frames, a classic divan, a few rustic seats besides a large rocking-chair composed the unpretentious furniture of the room.

The master himself, young, with a manner at once energetic and sweet, did not seem, in his working costume, a man of great fortune, but for him the springtime and the sun entered his studio with the lady in mauve.

The studio seemed illuminated about her. An aroma of unknown flowers emanated from her clothing, and before the eyes of the artist troops of cupids danced fantastically round his easel.

Which signifies, speaking without metaphor, that Maurice Marsy was in love.

"Well, are you satisfied?" he asked, approaching the young woman as she stood regarding his picture.

"It is good; it is excellent," she replied. "A little too mystic for my taste, but I congratulate you all the same."

In truth, this Joan of Arc, the peasant listening to the voices in a dream under the light of a silvery moon, did not appeal strongly to Madame Ligneron.

This pretty person, whom her intimate friends called Madame Caprice, infinitely preferred the draper's shop of the Louvre to the art gallery of the same name. Under the aureole of blonde hair and the Parisian toilette she hid a little, mediocre and prosaic soul, without virtues or vices—one of those souls which Nature seems to create by the dozen, without the aid of God or the Devil.

A widow, comfortably rich and very libéral, Madame Caprice had striven to merit her name. She brought together in her salon a little circle of adorers, nearly all young, nearly all artists, and all amusing.

Her imperturbable aplomb, her parrot-like memory, and a certain feminine finesse, permitted her to give to many people the illusion of an intelligent, delicate, benevolent coquette, who was seductive through her very faults.

One day, when she had regarded

The young man remained standing.

BIBLIOTHECA BODLEIANA
Digitized by Google

Marsy curiously while speaking of the irresistible seduction which talent exercises upon the feminine heart, the good fellow felt a heretofore unknown wish born in his soul, to work and conquer.

"I will be somebody—I will be great—I will be celebrated—she will love me," he thought. And all the winter, at the price of a thousand privations, with beautiful ardour and obstinate courage, he worked on his Joan of Arc.

Now the almost completed work, conceived and executed in love, awaited only the finishing touches. On the moon-bathed meadow-land, the blonde shepherdess, her corsage modestly laced across her breast, listened to the voices of the night. Behind her the recumbent forms of animals were barely visible. A fairylike mystery enveloped the scene, and fell upon the kneeling virgin; a transparent shadow poetised the sleeping village; the heavens seemed starred with legends, and in spite of some incongruities, which perhaps gave the picture a more charming originality, Maurice Marsy might well be content.

"Will you permit me to make a few more finishing touches?" said he to Madame Ligneron, who, with half-closed eyes was feigning the concentrated observation of an old expert.

"It will amuse me to see you work," she said, as she seated herself in an immense armchair.

The young man remained standing, his palette in his hand, putting some light touches on the clothing of Joan of Arc.

"There, isn't that better? See, I have given more importance to the luminous reflection, but there is still a crudeness in the background that must be remedied."

His brush caressed the canvas with a respectful precaution. The fever of creation darkened the grey of his clean frank eyes, and Madame Caprice all at once became aware that this great strapping fellow, simple and credulous though he might be, was not at all disagreeable to look upon.

She knew that this young enthusiast was in love with her. When the day came that he should speak, what an amusement it would be to play with the heart of the great boy. To tease, to irritate, to madden, and then to calm him with a smile. Sport delicious, sport eternal, wherein the pretty little ladies with innocent eyes have excelled from infancy upward.

"There!" said Maurice, "we will rest awhile now," and with one last loving look at his Joan of Arc he came and sat down on a low stool close beside Madame Ligneron, who was half pouting to find herself occupying a second place in his thoughts.

"How good you were to come to-day," he said.

"Was I not? It is so hot to-day, and this early spring weather always fatigues me; but I would not break my promise to come and see your picture. You have a great deal of talent, Monsieur Marsy. You are a great artist."

"A great painter! Oh, no," said he, somewhat troubled by the enormity of her praise; "but after many years and much toil I hope to become great."

He grew animated and related his life to her—his laborious toil, his ambitions, his troubles, his lonely sorrows. He was so unhappy having no one to love him in this world. No one to be proud of him.

"What! Not a father, not a mother, not a sister, not a sweetheart——"

He looked her in the face resolutely: "No one," he said.

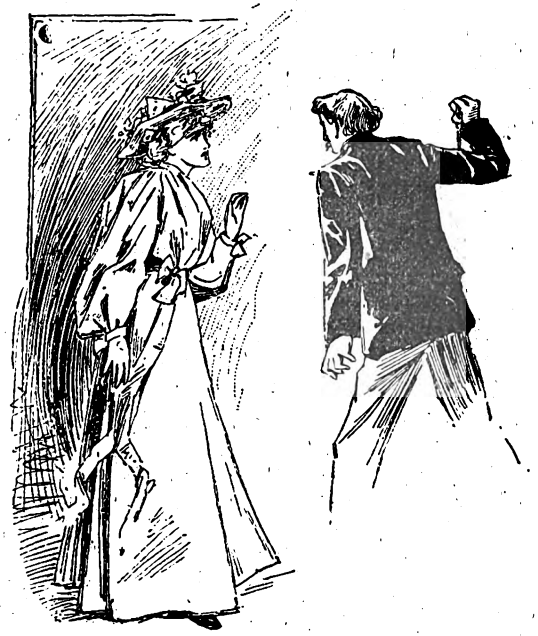
"It is perhaps your own fault," she responded, smiling.

"My fault! How so?"

"Have you such a hard heart, or are there no longer any pretty girls in the world—amiable models, for instance, who would find it a pleasure to console you?"

His cheek coloured as he answered quickly: "No, Madame, those of whom you speak do not exist for me; as for my heart"—he lifted his eyes and he saw in her blue orbs an excessive curiosity that rendered them almost tender; as he saw her red mouth, her blonde cheek leaning towards him. The spring sunshine illuminated the window, flooding the studio with joyous radiance. A bouquet of flowers from a corner exhaled a double aroma. The light, the perfume and love mounted to poor Maurice's head.

"My heart, Madame," he murmured, "is no longer mine; you have it—alas! you have it entirely," and he pressed his burning lips feverishly upon the ungloved hand of Madame Denise Ligneron.



He took a step towards her.

The first movement of the woman who receives an unexpected declaration—if there is such a thing as an unexpected declaration—is always surprise and the feigning of a noble indignation. Madame Caprice, who had foreseen, prepared, and even provoked the declaration from Maurice, felt obliged to rise with an air of offended dignity, which was nevertheless belied by the malicious pleasure of her eyes and lips, as she ejaculated:

"Monsieur—Monsieur Marsy, who has given you permission to be so presuming?"

"Ah, Madame, Madame," cried the young man without freeing the hands that he held, "is it necessary that I should put into words at this moment all the respect with which you inspire me? My language, my character, my attitude ought to re-assure you. I love you. For months I have burned to tell you so. Circumstances have determined this avowal, which I cannot regret, because it is so sincere. Madame, you are so good, so kind, so intelligent—will you refuse to listen to me?"

After much hesitation Madame Caprice consented to sit down, convinced that her living plaything was ready to give her the amusement of witnessing an exalted emotion, all the more droll because she did not participate in it, and Maurice knelt before her without a suspicion of being ridiculed, and commenced his touching confession.

Digitized by Google

He loved her so much. She was so pretty, so dainty, so artistic. She had so encouraged him. This picture which had cost him so much toil, he never could have finished but for her. During his hours of discouragement, her dear, blonde image had haunted his studio and given him hope. For her sake, and because of her, he would be great. At her little feet he would lay, like flowers, the successes which he would gather for her, if she would love him a little, ever so little. They would have a beautiful life together of tenderness, of pride, of glory—she proud of his talent, he proud of her beauty.

He was intoxicated with his own words—intoxicated by the touch of this young woman, fresh as a young branch of lilacs, and who smiled so kindly upon him. Meanwhile Madame Caprice was silent with mute, ravished vanity.

Oh, if her friends could see him at this moment. If they could hear the eloquent accents of this beautiful boy kneeling at her feet. What a triumph it would be! This man belonged wholly to her. She had conquered and vanquished him. For her he would be willing to sacrifice everything; for her he would set fire to his studio; he would trample upon his paintings, even upon his Joan of Arc. And a malicious, almost wicked, smile drew up the corners of her pretty mouth at this thought.

"Oh, how good you are," cried Maurice, with an ebullition of joy. "You will permit me to hope, will you not?"

The little woman shrugged her shoulders. "No," she said, "for you do not love me."

"Not love you!" exclaimed the painter in amazement.

"No, you do not love me. You are deceived by your artistic imagination, and because I am not displeasing to look upon—because I am interesting to you, you believe yourself to be possessed by a passion which, I fear, is not sincere. I must reserve my heart for one who will be willing to give me proofs——"

"A proof, a proof," cried Maurice. "What can I do to convince you of my love?"

"You love only your painting, and that is your right; it is the artist's nature to seek women for suggestions in art; for sensation that will benefit them in their work. But I am exacting; I wish to be loved for myself, for myself alone, first of all and before all."

"But I adore you. I am capable of any sacrifice to prove it to you."

"Very well, then," said she, with a light laugh. "suppose to convince me it should be necessary to destroy your picture there?"

"I should destroy it at once."

"One says those things, but one never does them."

"Because a woman like you never demands such a sacrifice."

"The greatness of the sacrifice proves the greatness of the love."

"Then you could exact such a test from me?"

"Would you refuse to give it to me?"

"No."

"Be careful. Suppose I should take you at your word?"

"Madame, you are not speaking seriously?"

"Oh, very well," said she, with a touch of disdain in her voice. "You are like all men; just as I thought."

Maurice grew deadly pale. "You do not believe me?" he asked.

"Prove it, then," she said, pointing to his "Joan of Arc."

Maurice gave a sharp, smothered cry: "Ah, coquette, terrible coquette, and if I do this thing you will love me?"

"Yes, Maurice," she answered slowly.

Behind them on the table lay a Japanese dagger, drawn from its sheath, shining in the sun. The eyes of the young man were fixed upon it in a sort of fascination.

"You would love me?" he repeated.

She was so close to him that he could almost feel the breath of her lips as she sighed: "Yes, Maurice, I would love you."

Then he seized the dagger, and in a violent access of rage he lacerated the canvas of his dear, beautiful, divine "Joan of Arc."

* * * * * * *

"Oh, Maurice, you do love me! I believe you, and I —I—how I love you! and how I am so sorry that I made you do this! Maurice, you are not listening to me!"

He was standing with the dagger in his hand, before the débris of his picture. A sudden and instantaneous revulsion of feeling had taken place in him. The physical act of destruction had loosened the high tension of his nerves, cooled his ardour, and killed his love. The artist, touched to his very soul, eclipsed the lover. Oh, why had he committed this irreparable folly; and this woman, this vain, imbecile woman, how had he ever loved her?

With a sudden gesture he took a step towards her as though he would drive the dagger into her heart, then threw it across the studio. Startled and surprised, Madame Ligneron drew back, not recognising the Maurice of old in this sombre, menacing man, who stood regarding her with an expression of sorrow, disdain, and disgust.

He went to the door and opened it wide.

"Go out," he said.

She stood as if rooted to the spot by his impoliteness.

"Go!" he repeated with a fierceness that showed the brutal side of his nature. "You have made me commit a cowardly act, a monstrous folly. Is this the price of your love? Then you may keep it for others, with your smiles and promises. I do not want it. Do you hear me? I detest and despise you."

Madame Ligneron grew white with rage.

"You must be both a fool and a maniac to talk in this manner," she said with a forced smile. "I hope that you do not think the sacrifice of your miserable daub was sufficient to make me love you."

* * * * *

And this is how it happens that my friend Maurice Marsy was not represented at the annual exhibition.

Digitized by Google

The Price of Betrayal.

"And what do you say your numbers are?"

"Twenty-two, Excellency, myself included."

The chief of the secret police took the paper handed to him, and silently compared it with one in his desk.

"Bardin, Loubanoff, Sobotin—I was not aware of these last. You have done well, Radovitch, and you will find that the Tsar's Government is not unmindful of those who serve it well. Your recent action will atone for your past errors and merit reward besides."

"My life will not be worth a day's purchase if it is known that it is I who have furnished this information."

"You should have thought of that before joining their society. I see you have something to suggest. What is it?"

"That when the seizure by the police takes place no distinction be made between me and the others."

"Of course you will be apprehended with them."

"And tried?"

"Yes, if you wish it, and condemned too, for that matter. Anything further?"

"And pardoned along with the less guilty of the others, so as to avoid all suspicion?"

"I quite understand you. Rest assured you will have no reason for fear in that respect."

The chief of police smiled to himself as the spy took his departure.

That very evening the police raid took place. Taken as they were by surprise and unconscious of any treachery on the part of one of their number, the little coterie of students, artists, and young doctors found themselves bagged, without a single exception. They indignantly denied the charge of conspiring against the government. But General Garashinin's myrmidons merely shrugged their shoulders deprecatingly, perhaps incredulously.

In a month the trial took place. Radovitch was not called to give evidence, but took his place among the accused.

At length the whole twenty-two were adjudged guilty. Twelve were sentenced to Siberia, but not to the mines, as the clemency of the Tsar provided. It was with a thrill akin to horror that Radovitch heard himself sentenced to death, along with the other nine, though conscious that it only formed part of the arrangement that he himself had suggested to General Garashinin.

"Sentence to Siberia would have served the purpose equally well," he muttered to himself, and, turning to look at his companions, he found himself wondering if his own face was as deadly pale as each of theirs.

"To be shot at the glacis of the fortress at sunrise to-morrow morning," he kept repeating to himself, though assuring himself that the words could have no reference to him, for the Tsar must keep troth even with traitors, or none would be found to serve him in future.

Dostoieffsky and the others calmly accepted their fate, and after a hurried farewell to their more fortunate fellows were conducted to their cells for the last time.

The long night passed, all too quickly for him, for whom the messenger he expected so unaccountably delayed. He had seen General Garashinin in court from day to day, and once a glance of intelligence, he persuaded himself, had passed between them.

At last a faint greyness began to manifest itself through the close bars of his cell. It was light, the herald of a new day, the last for the condemned man. And now Radovitch began to explain, in husky tones, that his conviction was all a blunder. The two warders looked intelligently at each other and pityingly upon the wretched prisoner, but said not a word.

In a few minutes all the ten were assembled in the courtyard of the prison, nine of them calm and collected, for the bitterness of death was already past, one a prey of fear and sickening terror, and evidencing it all too plainly in his trembling limbs and livid countenance. In the hurried good-byes they exchanged with each other, Radovitch came in for more than his share of attention.

"It's all a mistake," mumbled the wretched man. "Where is General Garashinin?"

"He is never present at executions," replied the soldier he addressed. "He issued his final orders last night."

And then a melancholy procession began to move towards the glacis of the fortress prison. A priest led the way, holding aloft a large cross before the eyes of the doomed men who followed in single file, their ordinary dress covered with a long robe of white linen, at once a covering for the living and a shroud for the dead.

At last they reached the place appointed. Five stakes had been driven in the ground near the summit of the long even slope of the rampart. To these they were bound in couples, facing the east, now kindling with the warm flush of the rising sun, whose coming was to be the signal for their death. Ranged in front of them, at a distance of fifteen yards, was a company of soldiers with loaded rifles, whose captain, standing a little way apart, held in his hand a white handkerchief, at whose fall sixty tongues of fire would leap forth and sixty bullets seek the hearts of the unhappy men.

There was still time for the last scene but one in the tragedy before the sun should rise. The cross was held before the lips of each man for a final kiss in turn. Then a dagger was broken over their heads by a soldier detailed from the thousands drawn up to witness the vengeance of the Tsar. At that moment the sun seemed to bound into space, and every heart almost stopped.

But the officer has not let the signal handkerchief drop. Instead the retreat is sounded on a score of bugles, and the troops march off the ground. The kneeling men are informed that the Emperor has been graciously pleased to grant them their lives. They are unbound and, as in a dream, try to realise all that has happened and to congratulate one another ere the last couple has been reached. One of these had fallen forward on his face as far as his bonds permitted. It was Radovitch.

"He has fainted," said the soldier. "Bring me some water, sharp."

"No need to trouble," said the doctor, who had rapidly examined him. "He is dead. The fright has killed him."

It was too true. The chief of the secret police had carried out his promise only too literally. The spy had no longer any reason to fear his betrayed comrades' revenge.

N. N.

Digitized by Google

THE LOVE OF CALIBAN.

THE room of Lady Lucrece was full of cool shadows, though it was midsummer, and the purple-bordered linens at the windows swayed in the hot wind. There were purple-bordered linens. too, on the couch where the Lady Lucrece lay—one cannot do much at noontide in Pisa when it is midsummer. The heavens seemed to hang down near to the languorous earth; a palpitant white heat shimmered on the streets; the lazaroni slept; at the bath-houses the attendants went about in shifts of linen; the shops and the stores were silent; it was too hot even to hate. If one had a vengeance to take he waited till nightfall, when it should be cooler. And the Lady Lucrece, fragrant from her bath, lay on her couch amid the fresh linen, and sprinkled powder on her throat to keep the moisture from gathering there.

As the long day wasted itself in languid hours the lady smiled, although it was not her wont.

"How many hours till moonlight?" she asked of her maid.

"Six and more, gracious mistress," replied the maid drowsily; and she wiped her forehead upon her sleeve.

"Ah," sighed the Lady Lucrece, "bring in Massimiliani."

A moment later a queer, halting step was heard on the tiled floor in the hall outside. The curtains at the door were the green which the sea wears in the morning. They parted and Massimiliani stood between them. Had Nature had her way he would have been tall, but some mysterious force had bent him almost double, and his humped shoulders and heavy head hung always towards the earth. He was not merely grotesque, he was hideous. There are men that Nature has jested with—Massimiliani she had cursed. He made a salutation with his hands—he could bend no lower.

"I am for ever bowing," he said to his mistress. "My grace was so great the first time I had occasion to make a salute to a lady, that I was never allowed to rise."

"Who was the lady?" queried his mistress, shutting her eyes as he stood before her.

"Mother Earth." He looked straight down at the Lady Lucrece.

"I do not want gibes this afternoon," said his mistress. Massimiliani spread out his huge dark hands and smiled.

"Then my gracious lady did not send for me?"

"Send for you? Yes, I sent for you."

"It cannot be. You have forgotten. For what am I but a gibe? It cannot be a question of wisdom, or it would not lie between a woman and a fool. Perhaps it was a matter of grace, and you want me to dance; or a matter of beauty, and you wish me to smile; or a question of sweet sounds, and you wish me to sing,"

The Lady Lucrece sat up and put the damp hair back from her brow.

"I had sooner hear a chorus of ravens," she said, but she laughed as she said it. No one minded Massimiliani, and she pulled at the end of his long, hanging sleeve to make him squat upon the floor by her feet, which he did with a mocking gesture.

"Princes have been here before me," said he.

The lady looked haughty, but she was not ill-pleased.

"It does relate to singing," said she.

Massimiliani leapt to his feet and seized some roses that lay at the foot of the couch.

"The flowers!" he cried, and flung them from the casement.

His mistress stared at him in amazement.

"From the Lord Ascanio," she replied mechanically.

"There was a tarantula among them. Are you so good, madam, that your lovers must send you to Heaven?"

"Fool!" cried the lady angrily, "there was no tarantula among the roses."

Massimiliani sat down again upon the floor.

"Go on with your tale," said he, "I am no greater fool than I was before."

The Lady Lucrece sat pondering, with her elbows on her knees, and her flushed cheek in her hands.

"Fool," said the Lady Lucrece, and her breath came faster, "you have not heard, have you——"

"God gave me straight ears, the saints be thanked," the jester sardonically interrupted.

"Night after night, since the summer came, a voice below my window? It always comes when the shadow of the balcony hides his figure."

"That he may not see your face, if you lean out, and so lose his inspiration?" interjected the dwarf. The lady struck him on the ear with her jewelled hand. The blow was light, but the dwarf shivered. "The voice," said he, "what was it like?" The lady fell back again into her old attitude. The flowing sleeves dropped from her arms. The loose strings of pearl with which they were wreathed, tumbled down to her elbows. Massimiliani spread himself flat upon the floor, and bracing his heavy head against his hands, watched her as a tiger does his prey.

"Ah, fool! I think you know I never loved. Men are so little. I could rule them all; I do not want a man that I can rule. But his voice—it sings of war, of great deeds, terrible and grand. And yet, Massimiliani, it sings of love—of love which counts power and money, and name as nothing. It does not sue for love; it demands it as a right. The verses which he sings are no other man's; they are his own, and he weaves them as he sings. He does not mind that I am great, he loves me for my soul, he loves me for my pride, for my will, for my scorn of petty things. He knows me as I am. He is the first living creature who has ever done so. It mounts—this voice—up to my lattice like a vine. It runs through gay melodies like rippling water. It grows as sad as the voice of the night-bird. I weep when it sings of death; I throw up my arms and walk the room, strong as a giant, when it sings of war; and when it sings of love, fool, I bury my face in my arms and blush. All day I lie and dream of it, and in my sleeping dreams at night I hear naught but it. I dream how we shall meet and where. I am sure he must be beautiful."

Digitized by Google

A sound from the man at her feet caused her to stop. The fool had rolled on his back in a convulsion of laughter, and the tears trickled down his cheeks.

"Fool!" cried the lady, springing from the couch in anger.

"Mother of God!" exclaimed the dwarf, "will the eternal snows melt and the desert blossom? Will the tower fall? Shall I be straight? Will God take pity? Will my lady love?" He threw his jangling punchinello at her feet, and tore his cap from his head. "Wear them," he cried, "my bauble and my cap! I never cracked so excellent a jest."

"Slave!" (the lady grew pale with rage) "to-morrow you shall see, for I shall find which of my courtiers it is that sings thus, and I will marry him, and none but him."

"None but him, gracious lady? And all these perfumed knights that have been praying to you while moons grew great and faded into sheaths again and waned to darkness, and these that hold a courtly contest for your hand?"

"I will marry him alone who knows my soul, and shows it me in song. I sent for you that you might search him out. I thought you might do me some service."

"Aye, for the scorn of fifteen years, which you have given me?"

"Have you not given me back scorn for scorn?"

"At least to-day I have made you forget we are not equals. You are defending yourself against me, mistress, against your slave!"

"Leave me! To-morrow, mind, at night, when my friends are with me, I shall find who sang those songs, and I will be his wife, and none but wife. You think I cannot love? I have known none but fools, though they were not all as ugly as devils. Out of my sight. I do not need your aid." The fool, with his head hanging, and his hot eyes rolling, threw up his hands with a frantic gesture and rushed from the room.

The day passed. Evening came, and, later, the moonlight. Under the balcony the shadows were dark. The Lady Lucrece walked in the chamber where the candles stood dark in their silver sconces, and only the moon lit the white marble which her garments swept. She waited long; the voice did not come. The moon reached the west, and still the lady paced the floor. At length the longed for melody, pure, vaulting, triumphant, burst into a song of victory and love; but ere it had sung a score of words it was choked into silence.

A sound arose to the lady's ears of passionate weeping; there was a discordant jangle of the lute as though a disregardful hand had brushed it heavily, and the night wore on in silence.

The next day no one saw the jester, Massimiliani, nor the Lady Lucrece, till it was night—a festal night—and the stately apartments were ablaze with light. Never had Pisa known such a festival. Liberty reigned in hall and hovel, and the Lady Lucrece was the central figure of the festival. She sat at the end of the hall on a dais. Robes of azure silk fell all about her; jewels looped up her hair, glittered on her arms, clasped her white neck, and shone in the fastening of her slippers. About her were flowers, perfume, light, music, men who were courtly, women who were beautiful. There were marbles, carvings, tapestries, statues, and fountains.

But the deep fire in the eyes of the Lady Lucrece did not catch its inspiration from any of these things. It was midnight when she ordered the music to stop. She had been dancing, and all the sensuous rhythm of the motion seemed impersonated in her. She went back to the dais and stood there, young and fair, in the shadow of the ancient carvings. A look of maidenliness, unwonted in her, spread over her face. She came of tyrants, and the blood of the tyrant was in her; but now she looked as gentle as any maid that ever begged her lover for another kiss.

"I have sworn an oath," said she, "and to-night I must keep it. The people of Pisa have long wished me to take a lord, but I have found none whom I desired. But for many nights someone has sung beneath my window. I do not know the man, but my soul is wedded to the voice, and I will marry him alone who can prove to me to-night that it is his." Her hauteur had returned. She was again the daughter of a line of dukes; she was commanding and not seeing. No one replied or moved. The lady spoke again.

"Surely he need not fear; he may trust me." She waited still; a woman's tremours came back to her. "He must have loved me," she cried, "it was the voice of love. Let me but look on him who sang those songs to me." She held out her arms. The jewels on her bosom rose and fell. She seemed half sinking beneath the tremulous agitation. Suddenly from behind the back of that great chair upon the dais there sprang Massimiliani, the hideous jester.

"It was I," he cried. "It was I!"

A murmur, half wrathful and half jeering, a bubble of laughter, surged up from the company.

"Fool!" cried the lady, "this is no time for jests."

"It was I!" he cried. "It was I!"

"Let us hear your voice, knave!" cried a saucy little fellow of sixteen. He flung a coin towards the fool. Massimiliani seized the coin and flung it in the young noble's face. The bent back that had never straightened seemed almost to straighten now, and a voice full of passionate sadness, yet melodious and thrilling, came out of a form which seemed made to be the covering for only unclean things. It was an existent paradox; an astounding incongruity; the antithesis of facts. And as he sang, a hope leapt into his eyes, and a triumph into his voice. Desire belongs not alone to Adonis; even a Caliban may love.

The lady's head was bowed upon her breast. The song he had chosen was the unfinished one she listened to the night before. The humpback bent forward in hideous importunity, but the lady's face was shaded with her silken scarf. He grew mad with a tumult of wild surmises as to what her mood might be. At length she raised her face and he saw. It was the tyrannical disdain of her race—the unspeakable contempt of a ruler for a presumptuous and menial knave—the mad mortification of an outraged woman and the chaste pique of a maiden.

He saw and comprehended at a glance. He knew it was all over. The song died upon his lips. The swords of the nobles, which amazement had kept in their sheaths, were out. Massimiliani leapt forward towards his mistress, caught her in his arms, kissed her, and as the fierce Italians surged up to him he buried his stiletto in his breast.

So died the last jester of Pisa.

Ella Peattie.

Digitized by Google

It was no use, try as I might, I could no longer rest quiet in Calcutta, slaving away in that stuffy office of the Indian Bank, of which I was junior partner.

I had been working hard the whole year without a single day's holiday, and, what with the heat and mental exhaustion, my health began to give way.

The questions of what to do, and where to go, were soon answered in a letter which I received a few days afterwards from my old friend Clifford Harrison of the 2nd Bengal Cavalry.

Clifford and I were old school chums, and had been going up for the army together, when the death of my mother upset all my plans. I went out to India to enter my father's bank, and Harrison went into Sandhurst. Since then I had not seen him, but we frequently interchanged letters.

His last note informed me that he had just obtained a captaincy in the 2nd Bengal, which was stationed about fifty miles from Patna, at a place called Gya, and asked me to be sure and go and stay with him at my earliest convenience.

The shooting round Gya is particularly good, and the country abounds in big game. These inducements were not to be despised, so a week later saw me comfortably settled in the train running from Patna (where I changed) to the cantonment of the gallant 2nd.

Clifford met me at my journey's end, and soon we were bowling along in a high double dog-cart behind a smart pair of greys.

During the first week we made some fairly good bags of game. Then it occurred to us that we might get better sport if we went to Cheelapunghi, a beautiful spot in the midst of the jungle, about ten miles from our bungalow. This being decided upon, we got up early the next morning and were soon spinning along in the direction of the Pandu ruins, which lay on our route. Arriving at a thick wall of jungle we called a halt, and, leaving the cart in charge of a native servant, we dived into the mass of trees and bushes behind our native hunter or shikaree, named Gulap Singh.

Gulap was a man of no mean merit in his own way. For that day he acted as tracker and gun-bearer.

We wasted much time in following the spoor of a panther which had led us a futile chase, as also did the tracks of a tiger. It was in vain that Singh protested at our carelessness in not keeping to his leadership, and it was only when darkness was coming on that we found how foolish we had been.

The sun was now setting fast, and, look where we would, nothing but one mass of tangled jungle met our eyes. "Very much tigers here, sahibs," said Singh. "When night come, all creep out."

"That's most comforting," growled Clifford, "but he's right, by jove, this is the Rajah's big game country!"

"Then the sooner we get out of this the better; I for one don't relish being a meal for tigers," said I.

Taking our heavy bore rifles from Gulap, we started back at a smart pace. Crashing our way through the tall undergrowth we came to an open space in the middle of which a pool of water lay. Instinct made us halt, and, on looking at the reeds which grew under the shadow of a huge rock on our right, we saw a tremendous tigress crouching ready to spring at us.

Petrified with fear I staggered back a few paces and halted. Like one paralysed, I could neither think nor do anything. A low ominous growl, however, brought me to my senses, and then I was steady enough.

I saw a playful cub emerge from the thicket and bound to its mother, then remembering that I was the nearest of the three, I raised my rifle and pulled the trigger. The click of the hammer as it descended was the only noise that broke the stillness of the jungle. The gun was not loaded!

To turn and snatch a rifle from Gulap was the work of a moment, then, raising it to my shoulder, I fired. Perhaps it was the hasty aim, perhaps my hand trembled—anyhow, when the smoke passed, there was the cub stretched lifeless beside its mother!

Digitized by Google

With a roar of rage the tigress launched herself at me—move, I could not; I only remember seeing two blazing eyes and hearing Clifford cry:

"Down! For Heaven's sake lie down!"

Possibly I moved a few inches, or my knees gave way; however, I know the long, active body of the brute struck me sideways into the pool, and as the water closed over me I heard the crack of a rifle.

Crawling out of the mud and slime, I saw Harrison standing near the tigress with the still smoking gun in his hand. The huge beast was quivering in her death agonies; with one superb attempt she staggered to her feet, then, bringing out a tremendous roar of rage, she fell on her side, dead.

"That was a fine shot of yours," I exclaimed.

"Confoundedly lucky," he answered; "I was afraid you were done for! What's become of your rifle?"

I thought that perhaps it had been knocked out of my hands when I fell, so, going down to the pool, I began to grope under water for it. I had been fumbling about for some time, when I was brought smartly to the upright by the noise of some weighty beast pounding over the reeds. Rejoining Clifford as quickly as I could, I heard Gulap, whose face was absolutely livid, gasp:

"The tiger come to avenge his mate and cub, sahib!"

"Quick! your rifle, then! Here, take mine!" exclaimed Clifford.

Giving his gun to the tracker, he was about to take his own when a deafening roar shook the ground, and out bounded the tiger within fifty yards of us. This was too much for Gulap, brave though he was; spinning round on his heels he sped down the path with both rifles in his hand, leaving us unarmed!

"Stop, you scoundrel!" cried Clifford. Singh stayed not an instant.

Another roar determined us. Off we dashed, without once looking back. A howl of grief and rage spurred us on. The light was fading, but on we plunged—on and on. How could we hope to escape with that awful swish, crack, swish, as the agile brute followed our track.

Stumbling, tottering, staggering, on we went till, out of sheer fatigue, I nearly fell. An awful roar awoke the echoes of the jungle almost behind our backs, and just as death was upon us we came to a space cleared in a thicket, wherein stood an iron cage about nine feet square.

I remember being dragged inside.

I remember being dragged inside and hearing the door jerked fast, as with almost a scream of rage the tiger hurled himself against the closed gate, biting and clawing at us till the bars themselves rattled and cracked.

The gate was all rusty and thin from age, and might break at any moment. The tiger seemed to read my thoughts, for, trotting back a few yards, he crouched, and with another of his piercing roars he sprang full at the door. Crash! over spun the cage, and, on looking up, we saw the head and shoulders of the brute struggling and clawing to get at us!

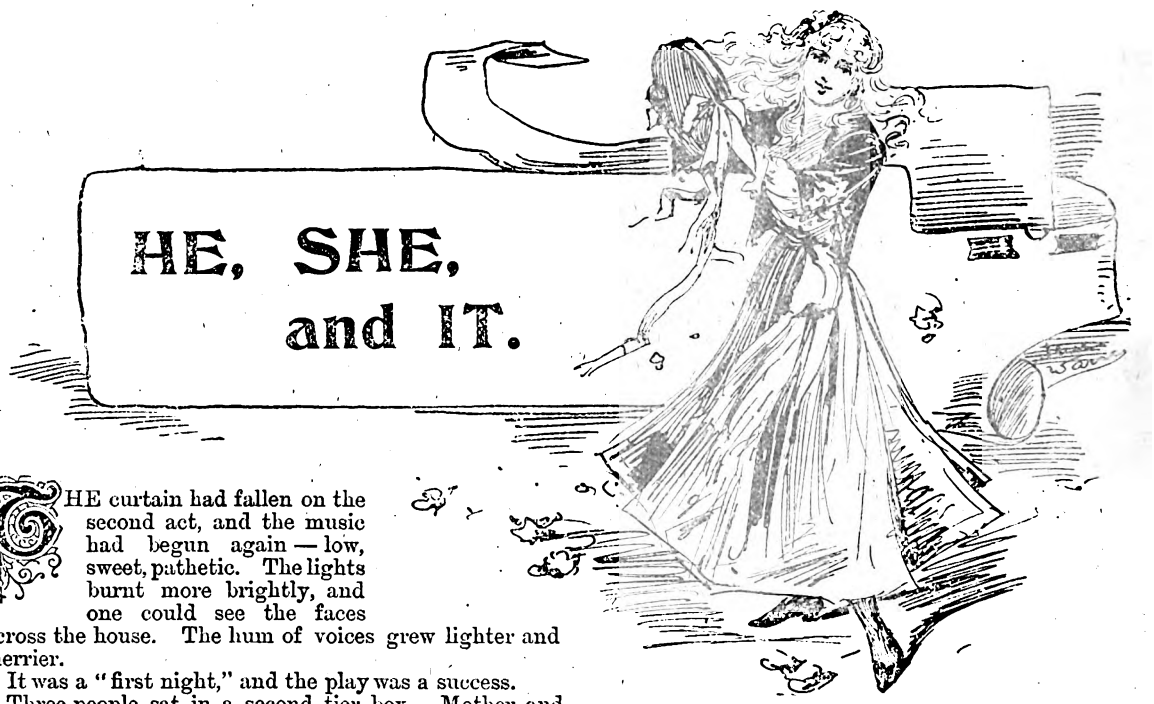
Slowly but surely we watched him work his way towards us. Well could we see that huge paw waving nearer and nearer, and the gleaming teeth snapping just above it. Then I fell to wondering if the tiger would kill me or Clifford first, and whether I should get a good sight of his death, then—bang! the great brute came crashing down between us!

I must have fainted, for when I came to, a crowd of officers, with Clifford in their midst, were standing round me. Then it was that I learnt that Singh had fetched the party to rescue us, and had tracked us to the Rajah's shooting cage just in time to kill the tiger before he had forced his way through the gate.

JOHN FRASER.

Digitized by Google

HE, SHE, and IT.



THE curtain had fallen on the second act, and the music had begun again — low, sweet, pathetic. The lights burnt more brightly, and one could see the faces across the house. The hum of voices grew lighter and merrier.

It was a "first night," and the play was a success.

Three people sat in a second tier box. Mother and daughter and daughter's betrothed. The girl was the fair, fragile second self of the handsome lady, who in her own youth must have been a rare beauty. One could guess that the two were tenderly devoted to each other. Every slightest movement or expression of countenance betokened the fullest confidence; the fond smile of the parent, the responsive murmur, of the gentle maiden, the affectionate gesture or whisper one to the other, all spoke of that delightful and cordial understanding between mother and child, which, alas! exists only too rarely. But Lilian Duncan was her mother's only child, and Lilian's tender heart had never been frozen—or even chilled—with coldness from this widow mother.

She was seventeen and her betrothed was thirty-five, more than twice her age. Yet he did not look old or even blasé beside her there in the box. His face was smiling and almost innocent in expression (his mouth, to be sure, was hidden beneath a heavy, dark moustache); his eyes were of a placid brown that by lamp or gaslight assumed a melting, indescribable beauty. Apart from these, his chief charm was his voice—low, lingering, persuasive. It was a voice to work its master's will against all obstacles.

As the curtain fell on the second act, he, Herbert Grossmith, leant towards his affianced, and spoke gaily:

"So far so good. I'm glad of it, too, for I know the author. He's a good fellow."

"It is quite strong," said the elder lady softly. "One gets the lesson intended almost from the outset."

"The lesson, mamma," put in Miss Lilian. "What is the lesson? Indeed, I wasn't thinking of anything like lessons; I was only feeling sorry for the poor girl who had been deceived, and——"

"Who is going to be murdered—perhaps in the next act," said Mrs. Duncan. "Isn't that the plot, Herbert? Deceived and murdered?"

But Herbert Grossmith did not at once reply. All in a moment a change had come over him. He was gazing steadfastly across the house at the circle below the opposite corresponding boxes. He appeared so engrossed that Lilian, after regarding him in surprise, reached over and laid her opera-glass upon his knee. As her hand touched his own she started.

"Herbert," she said, "you are not well. Your hand is like ice."

The music ceased, and the tinkle of the bell before the re-rising of the curtain recalled him.

He turned and spoke in an altered tone, and as if he had just drawn a breath of relief.

"I thought I saw someone I used to know. I thought someone I believed dead was over there. It was all imagination."

Then he relapsed into silence, and the play went on. But the words of Lilian's mother, to which he had not replied, were ringing in his ears like the echo of an old, old accusation. "Deceived and murdered!" Had it been all imagination? Or had the dead arisen from the dead? It was gone; the figure that seemed to stand over yonder, and to smile wanly, accusingly up at him seated beside his new love—it had gone! With the ceasing of the music, with the tinkle of the stage-bell, with the going on of the play—it had gone. But would it come again?

He made some faint excuse to his betrothed and her mother, and stole quietly from the box. He went down very softly; and round into the circle where it had walked and sat and wanly smiled. He searched carefully; searched with all his might of gaze and reason. He scrutinised separately each chair—they were all filled. He searched among the people who, not having secured seats, were obliged to stand or promenade. It was not there. He began to feel absolute certainty and relief. It had been all his fancy—an optical illusion Perhaps the play had brought up memories that should never rise to darken his life. He breathed more freely; his heart beat normally again; his hands grew warm; he even smiled at his cowardice. But he did not at once return to the box. The act was nearly at an end—a sort of climax was reached. He watched the stage. It was the murder, or the supposed murder scene. The cry of the victim rang out piteously. And soon the curtain had again descended. The lights brightened, and the orchestra played "Under the Daisies."

Digitized by Google

He looked up at his own box, and a chill more terrible than before shook him from head to foot. It was there, beside Lilian and her mother, yet not seeming to speak with or care for them, seated in the seat that he himself had occupied. It was there, and he was doomed.

He slowly made his way back through the foyer; he knew that he met friends, and that they spoke to him, but he could not reply. He went up into the box. It sat there unknown to Lilian or her mother. They were all unconscious of its presence.

"Why don't you sit down, Herbert?" Lilian asked innocently.

"I am not well," he answered. "I have a chill, I think."

Lilian leant over then as if to place her opera-glass upon the seat he had occupied. He watched her with a kind of horror.

It was there, intangible, yet ever present. He saw it push aside the glass, which fell upon the floor. He stooped quickly, and picked up the repelled object and held it in his hand. He stood more quietly then; the chill upon him did not affect him so unpleasantly as at first. His entire temperature was reduced; the numbness was not wholly disagreeable. As yet it had not turned to face him, but sat gazing down upon the merry throng that filled the house with perfume and laughter and happy babble.

The orchestra soloist was still playing "Under the Daises," when it suddenly turned its countenance upon him. And then he saw the face of a woman, long dead, and the form of the same dead woman, and even the pale, primrose gown she had worn. Her lips moved, but he alone could hear her whisper, "Come!" Her hands beckoned; no other eyes than his might see them. She passed by him through the door of the box, and he could only follow.

He heard Lilian speak his name, "Herbert;" he saw Lilian's mother regarding him wonderingly, and yet he had no word to say. Lilian's fair young face and heavenly eyes faded from his sight—for ever! It was guiding him. The wraith of the woman long dead led him out of the theatre, out into the starry, balmy summer night. It walked beside him now with its shadowy hand upon his arm. They fared rapidly along, street after street, northward out of the city. He did not draw back; he felt no weariness. They left the heart of the city far behind them and came to empty fields at last. In the near distance was a rushing sound of the mighty river hastening seaward.

"At last, at last!" the wraith beside him seemed to whisper. Not vengefully, not in triumph, but rather as with a vast relief. And he found himself answering inaudibly, yet distinctly:

"Well, I am here; at your mercy now."

"As I was at yours," the shadow seemed to sigh. "Do you recall that night? Do you recall——"

He did not hear the rest. A great roaring filled his ears. The scene suddenly altered. The starry summer night was changed to one of fitful moonlight and scurrying clouds—a chilly night in autumn. The place became more lonely. He was back again, back a decade, back in his youth. And in the cold and leaf-strewn roadside lay a woman—dead; a woman in a primrose gown with a mark upon her forehead where an angry hand had struck her down. And he himself was there, fearful, horror-stricken, filled with cowardly hatred—he was there for an instant looking down upon the prostrate form, then turning to flee, fleeing far, far, far away in desperate terror.

Again the scene altered—back to the outskirts of the town and the starry, balmy night. And he went on with It beside him.

"Death is the only expiation; death, death, death!" It seemed to say, as It led him towards the rushing of the mighty river. And he followed obediently. Only once a thought passed through his brain of what now should never be—the thought of Lilian, his fair-haired love. One faint flash of thought brought the sight of her as he had left her, at the side of her mother in the box at the play, the curtain down, the throng of happy people, the light, the perfume, the merry murmur, the music "Under the daisies." That was all. It led him to the steep bank of the river.

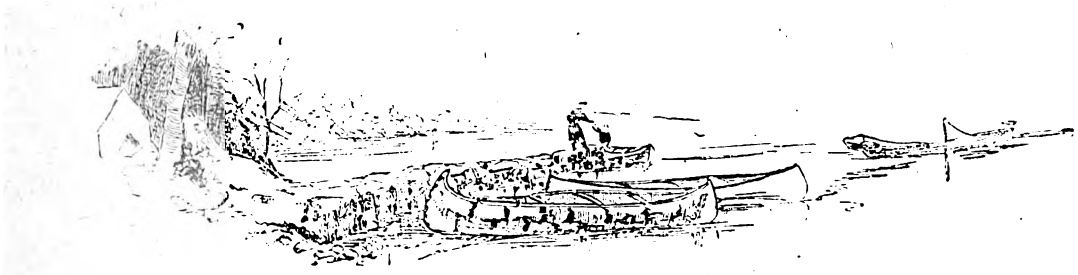
It led him on into the space above the water.

And obediently he followed.

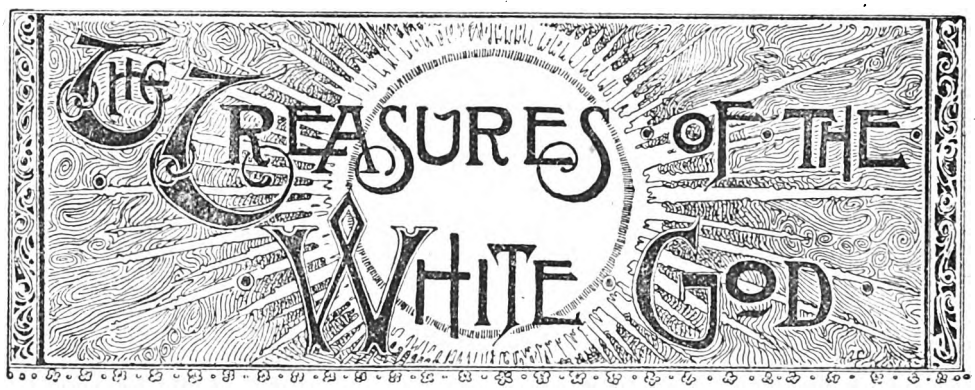
And the mighty waters closed up again, that none should know the story.

And that was the end of what he thought, for when Lilian next spoke to him he lay dead in his chair beside her.

B. S.



Digitized by Google



The Story of a Shameful Crime.

CHAPTER XXIII.

In the White Moonlight.

"Your property! your slave!" stammered Burgoyne incoherently, and with alarm. "You forget, señor, I am a citizen of a foreign country. Your laws cannot apply to me. I can appeal to the English of the American government——"

There Adrian Burgoyne paused. In a flash he realised his helplessness. He appeal to the laws of a country that had set a price upon him as one of its violaters! How? As Adrian Burgoyne—as convict 407—under a new name? How establish a right to that name—his claim to a false identity? Ah! the past might be dead, but its later issues still lived to confront, defy, complicate.

"We constitute law around these diggings," announced the Mexican. "March him to the mine, place him in charge of the overseer," he concluded to his friend.

"As you say, Fuertado. Come, señor, we are too strong for you. We are short-handed at the mine, too. Ten dollars will soon be worked out."

"Ten dollars!" repeated Burgoyne bitterly. "You value your accommodations highly."

"Only one for that," smiled Fuertado, with a covert sneer; "the other nine dollars cover the saving of your life."

There was no help for it. The men had him in a close trap, and to struggle, to defy, to debate, was useless. They were armed. They had half-a-dozen slaves at their command to pursue him if he fled.

A month—thirty days of servitude, solitude, delay! The work he did not mind, the close cynosure of a brutal overseer he was used to, but the delay! Why, in a month!—Colonel Lytle had promised Richard Sheldon to complete his Mexican mission, and place the secreted Ringold fortune in his hands before that term of time had elapsed.

"I will feign to become a willing worker, will throw the overseer off his guard by seeming submission, and in a day or two make a dash for liberty," planned Burgoyne hopefully.

More easily said than done, however, was this, for he was set to work in an excavation far under the surface, and it had but one exit, and that continually guarded by the overseer.

At night he and the half-breeds were marched to a log shed, with barred doors and grated windows, and outside, all the night through, a burly favourite of Fuertado worked for eventual liberty, by watching to nip out any plan for escape with a bullet from the revolver he carried.

Thus two days passed by. On the evening of the third, just as Burgoyne was beginning to despair of escape, and was divided between open defiance of his tyrant masters and a philosophical submission to their will for the prescribed month, something occurred that aroused him with a rude shock from his apathetic dejection and uncertainty, and started every nerve in his frame vibrating to all the old-time vigour and intrepidity.

He lay that night in his hard board bunk, unable to sleep, and revolving plan after plan in his active mind for escape. His companions, done out with their hard labours of the day, were snoring loudly. So near was Burgoyne to the log wall of the shed that he could glance out through an interstice where the clay filling had dried and fallen away, and could make out the armed sentinel pacing up and down on his solitary beat.

Dreamily, mechanically, observing the moonlit expanse through his little port-hole of observation, he started into deeper interest as two forms advanced from the direction of Fuertado's hut.

One of them he instantly recognised as its proprietor. He held an open letter in his hand, as if his companion had just brought it, and its reading had paved the way for a stroll and the seeking of a secluded spot where they could discuss its merits, free from the prying attention of the overseer and the other regular denizens of the place.

"Here, señor, be seated. We will be free from all eavesdroppers here," spoke the Mexican, in his blandest tones, and halting just within the peering Burgoyne's range of vision, and indicating a long wooden box set on edge.

"Mercy—it is he—Lytle!"

Adrian Burgoyne sprang up in his bunk, and glued his eyes to the interstice between the logs, and lingered there, rapt, amazed, discrediting the evidence of his visual senses.

It could be no delusion. Fuertado's companion was his old-time enemy, the same sinister-faced, suave scoundrel as of yore. There was no change in his appearance beyond the ordinary, save that he had affected a border swagger, and wore the conventional sombrero of the country he was in.

Digitized by Google

"Well, Mr. Fuertado," said Lytle, "how does the letter strike you?"

Every word he spoke was distinctly audible to the eager and engrossed listener, shielded from view not ten feet distant by only the thickness of a log wall.

"Excellently, señor—most excellently!" chirped the polite Fuertado. "My friend Mendonca knows me as a trusted neighbour. His will is law. He bids me extend all aid possible to you. You have but to command!"

"That is for money, of course?" laughed Lytle bluntly. "See here, Fuertado! I am a plain, outspoken Yankee."

"Admirable nation! I welcome you, señor," commended the Mexican, with overwhelming courtesy.

"Very good. I am here on a mission."

"So Mendonca states."

"As agent and representative of the great World's Fair at Chicago."

"We have heard of it, señor."

"I come with influential introductions to State and clergy, with an abundance of means, and with a coterie of servants, or, rather guards. My point of interest in and about Guayli is the cave of Bureldo."

"Ah! the Aztec house of mysteries?"

"Exactly. I wish to inspect its numberless curiosities I wish to purchase what curios I can. Failing in that, I am anxious to photograph its treasures, to make up a collection for the Mexican exhibit in the great Columbian Exposition."

"A truly philanthropic and public-spirited motive," commented the fulsome Mexican.

"Very good. I arrive three days since. The government officer at Guayli treats me handsomely. He helps me on the first step of my way, by insuring a warm welcome from the priests at the San Miguel monastery. They hear my story. I am taken to the Aztec priest in charge of the cave of Bureldo. He is very friendly; with all the idiotic, clinging superstitions of dead ages, he is still very keen and clever. He offers me a lot of common, worthless curiosities, but when I offer to pay an immense, an exorbitant price for some of his stone idols, noticeably the celebrated White God, old Medeiras, as he calls himself, lifts his hands in holy horror, and cries out, 'Sacrilege!'"

"They are very tenacious of their past traditions and mementoes, these Aztec desendants," vouchsafed Fuertado.

"However," resumed Lytle, "he had no particular objection to my photographing with my camera some of their deities. He will allow myself and what assistants I require to enter the sacred cave. The day after to-morrow is the time apportioned for this visit."

"Ah! then your object is gained?" murmured the Mexican carelessly, but watching his guest with a furtive, insinuating glance.

"Yes and no," responded Lytle vaguely.

"Yes and no! Rather ambiguous, señor, is it not?"

"Yes, because I gain admittance to the cave. No, because I imagine Medeiras will only allow me to see a few of his rarities. These fellows are very conservative and tricky. Now, then, I want free access to all the curiosities of the cave."

"Señor," interrupted Fuertado, with a covert, crafty grin, "be the blunt Yankee you profess! Truth to tell, you desire an opportunity to secrete a few of those self-same curios, unnoticed, eh?"

"Well, perhaps," winked Lytle. "At any rate, I met your friend, Mendonca. I explained to him what I wanted. He is unable to assist me, but he directed me to you. Now, then, Mr. Fuertado, I will pay you a liberal amount to come under my directions for just two hours the day after to-morrow."

The eyes of the Mexican sparkled with active, crafty cupidity.

"How much, señor?" he demanded eagerly.

"A thousand dollars, current coin, cash down."

"You are generous!" spoke Fuertado, his face one great glow of expectation and avarice.

"Then I can count upon you?"

"It is a bargain! As I said before, Mendonca is my trusted friend. He sends you to me. Command me; I am yours."

"Very well; you will come to the San Miguel Monastery to see me the day after to-morrow morning. You will come prepared to act."

"In what way, señor?"

"At noon, accompanied only by the Aztec high priest——"

"Medeiras?"

"Yes, myself and my photographing party"—and Lytle gave a significant and emphatic sneering intonation to the word—"will enter the cave of Bureldo. Our explorations will consume, say, three hours. At present only a few women, whom we do not fear, guard the entrance to the cave in a perfunctory sort of a way."

"Where are the men?" asked Fuertado.

"Gone, most of them, luckily for my plans, to a religious celebration across the mountains."

"I understand!"

"About a score are at home. It is these I want you to keep out of the way, from noon until dusk, the day after to-morrow."

"Ah! and you care not how?"

"Not I."

"A little drugged pulque will settle their cases. You can rely on me, señor. They shall be inactive, helpless, at the time you name, and I shall never be suspected of having a hand in it."

"I can rely on you?"

"Implicitly."

"Then I shall place in Mendonca's hands, to-night the one thousand dollars, to be paid when your task is faithfully executed."

"To-night? Can you not remain and partake of my hospitality until the morning?"

"No, thanks. My plans require my presence at San Miguel."

The two men moved away, Fuertado accompaning Lytle as far as a little thicket near by, where his horse was tethered.

The wondering and excited Burgoyne saw his old-time enemy mount a mustang and disappear along the narrow mountain path. Then Fuertado returned, slowly and thoughtfully.

He paused near the shed again, and whistled.

The man on guard came instantly to his side.

"You signalled me, señor?" he questioned servilely.

"Yes. Go to the hacienda and send Pedro here. Then keep out of earshot until we complete our confab."

A few moments later, the man who had assisted Fuertado in rescuing Burgoyne from the quicksand appeared, and he sat down by the side of the Mexican on the self-same box where he had held the colloquy with Colonel Lytle.

Evidently a partner, a friend of Fuertado, the latter proceeded at once to make a confidant and accomplice of him. He detailed the episode of the letter, and repeated his recent conversation with Lytle, word for word.

"Well, Pedro," he queried at its conclusion, "what do you think of it?"

"I think—a thousand dollars!" laughed the other.

"Yes, but what is the Yankee up to?"

"What matters it, so that we get our pay?" asked Pedro.

"I wish I knew!" persisted Fuertado.

"I can surmise."

"Indeed?"

"Yes."

"Out with it, then!"

"He is after some valuable relic or curio in the wave."

"Very probably," admitted the Mexican.

Digitized by Google

"He will take forcible possession of it, overpowering Medeiras."

"And then?"

"Fly with it. In doing so, he will have to pass the guards at the entrance to the cave."

"But they are only a lot of old women at the present time?"

"He counts on that. They cannot deter him, resist, or fight. He fears only the men. If you have them under control, drugged and helpless, he will be able to escape."

"I imagine you are correct, Pedro," announced Fuertado speculatively. "As you say, what matters it to us how many of those hideous old stone idols he steals. Only—"

"Eh? you have a thought?"

"A bright one."

"Then it means?"

"Two thousand dollars, instead of one."

"Speak!" urged the Mexican's companion.

"I know a secret exit from the cave."

"You do?"

"Yes; with a knowledge of that, the Yankee can escape at his leisure, and without being observed. Would he not pay another thousand for the information, think you?"

"Fuertado, you are a genius! Tell me! Where is this secret outlet?"

In detail the Mexican awarded the required explanation. In detail, point for point, the eager listening Adrian Burgoyne memorised the valuable information.

"Oh!" he exclaimed, as the two men moved away towards the hut, "I know all—a secret way to the cave, all the plans of Lytle; another day and I shall be too late. It must not be. I must escape, and to-night, at all hazards!"

He glanced through his loop-hole of observation once more.

Perfect silence and serenity held the scene. One human barrier to liberty alone was in view—the solitary sentinel, pacing his confined beat in the white moonlight.

CHAPTER XXIV.

The White God.

He must escape!—but how?

So often during his brief confinement had Adrian Burgoyne mentally discussed every feasible plan looking to liberty, that it seemed like going over a well-worn road to cast up the chances of this and that scheme.

He waited patiently for an hour. The lights of the hut had been put out. Its denizens were probably asleep. The sentinel, smoking a cigarette, was swinging indolently in a hammock strung between two trees; but as he slept all day, Burgoyne knew that he would maintain a surveillance over the shed all night long.

It would be impossible to break out of the shed without attracting the guard's attention. The door was stoutly barred on the outside; the window was grated with broad bands of hoop iron, sunk and looped into the woodwork at the sides. Burgoyne had about abandoned all hopes for a dash for liberty until morning, when fortune, a trivial circumstance, favoured his plans immensely.

One of the sleepers moved uneasily; then he began to groan. Then he woke up, uttered a howl of pain, and this instantly grew into cries of horror and alarm.

The disturbing sounds aroused the sentinel. He came up to the door of the shed.

"What is that?" he demanded sharply.

"Manuel!" groaned the unhappy sufferer. "I am ill, dying. I drank of the surface water in the digging to allay my thirst. It has given me the fever."

The fever! The guard knew what that meant. He realised, too, its deadly contact. An expert in such things, he insisted on an immediate examination of the patient, quarantine, isolation, if he, indeed, betrayed active symptoms of a disease that attacks at morn, and leaves its victim stark and stiff at high noon.

"Wait!" he spoke. "I will come in and see you. I will light the lantern. Do not disturb the others. It will cause a panic. It may be only a passing pang of pain."

This, just beyond the door, and the bar rattled.

Adrian Burgoyne glided across the dark structure. He got just at the side of the door, and crouched back into the shadow and shelter of the thick post, forming a part of its massive frame-work.

The door opened, and the sentinel, after listening for a moment, strode across the room. The snoring of the sleepers reassured him.

"I will soon have a light," he said.

Swift as an eagle, Adrian Burgoyne made a forward swoop. He was across the rude threshold in a flash.

Slam!—he drew the oaken portal shut. Crash—the bar shot into the grooves, closing in the keeper of prisoners, a prisoner himself.

Then he sped for the near timber, unheeding the cries of the sentinel, his shrill signal whistle of alarm for the overseer and the other denizens of the hut, calculating only to keep out of range of the barred window, through which a shot might stop his flight.

If there was pursuit, it never neared his trail. Straight as an arrow he set his course for the cave of Bureldo. He minded not weariness or exhaustion. He had a mission to perform, and a speedy one.

Time was the essence of his plans. Within forty-eight hours Colonel Lytle would possess the White God and its precious contents, unless he anticipated him.

At bare daylight Adrian Burgoyne crawled into a dense copse, and flung himself upon the ground, too wearied to keep his eyes open. Thorns had penetrated his insufficient foot-covering, the brambles, the sharp-pointed rocks, had rent his attire in pieces. He had lost his hat in a fall dangerously near to the edge of an enormous pit, but—he had arrived!

Within a few hundred yards he made out a peculiar rock formation, which Fuertado had described as the position of the secret entrance to the cave. It was only a matter of rest, recuperation; then he would essay an expedition into the bowels of the mountain.

It was several hours later when Burgoyne awoke. He was not afraid of intruders in that desolate spot. A few nuts and berries served for a meal. Then he traversed the base of the mountain, in search of the aperture that led into the cave.

"This must be it," murmured the searcher, as he pulled aside a dense growth of vines, revealing a yawning gap in the rocks beneath.

The flare of a match within the darksome void that Burgoyne now penetrated, revealed the fact that at some remote time the subterranean gallery had been employed as an exit from the cave. As if to verify the conjecture, secured around a stone was a hempen cord, apparently a guide-string, and, seizing it, Burgoyne groped his way forward.

It was damp and rotten, and had certainly been unused for some time, but he followed its course. But for it he would have been at loss how to proceed, for, further on, the gallery he was traversing diverged into numerous smaller avenues.

His last match was employed for a survey around, as, with a jarring fall, he stumbled down a steep slant in the path, the cord breaking in his grasp. The situation now alarmed him. He groped confusedly about to regain and reunite the severed strands, but could indentify neither. Bewildered by the dense darkness, he wandered aimlessly about. At last he selected a path leading straight ahead, and somewhat concernedly realising that the most difficult portion of his task would be to find his way again out of the perplexing labyrinth he had so rashly penetrated.

Digitized by Google

"I must rest. It seems endless groping — unvarying darkness!" murmured the wearied wanderer at last.

He sat braced against a rock, and dozing when a sudden commotion, faint but reverberating, aroused him.

Human voices and the sound of some sweet-stringed instruments were mingled in a chanting, sing-song rhythm. Then a dim glow shifted across the walls of rock about him.

Looking straight ahead, at the end of the gallery he was in, Adrian Burgoyne made out moving forms. The light grew stronger. Human beings, arrayed in priestly garb and bearing torches, were visible in an immense, cave-like apartment, marching about, and bowing and chanting to numberless idols set upon pedestals of wood and stone.

Adrian Burgoyne drew a long, deep breath of interest and satisfaction. He had penetrated to the cave of the Aztec—he had reached his goal, the self-same solitude where his dead friend, Ralph Ringold, had lurked a hunted fugitive, seven years ago, and where he had stowed away his treasure!

The voices died away, the stringed instruments were silenced, the glare of light grew dim.

Creeping to the remote end of the gallery, Burgoyne gazed after the retreating procession.

A single glow now permeated the subterranean apartment. As he strained his vision he made out that it proceeded from an ancient silver lamp. Within it lay oil and a wick, and this latter sputtered fitfully.

He made his way towards it. Then he glanced up at the idol in whose honour, it seemed, it was kept burning.

Awe, wonder, checked his pulses as he looked; a vague mysterious emotion enchained his senses as he realised that he viewed the blank, patient face of a Deity older than Montezuma—a veritable heir of the ages, the mute, dumb witness of all the splendour, terror and mystery of the rich courts of the ancient Aztecs!

The old and the new joined hands across the abyss of the centuries. His long quest was ended—his mission all but accomplished.

For Adrian Burgoyne knew that the dazzling white form that looked down upon him was none other than the oldest idol in the world—the famous White God!

CHAPTER XXV.

A MIGHTY COST.

BIRDS of a feather, utterly soulless, crafty and cruel the Mexican, Fuertado, and Colonel Lytle had little difficulty in coming to a distinct and harmonious understanding.

The day succeeding that upon which Adrian Burgoyne made his escape from peon servitude, the plots of Richard Sheldon's emissary were ripe for execution.

At noon, as he had previously arranged, accompanied by four ruffianly-looking cohorts, whose services he had secured upon arriving in Mexico, Lytle appeared at the entrance to the cave of Bureldo, and, at the same hour, the villainous Fuertado was industriously engaged in administering drugged pulque to the few able-bodied men left in the Aztec camp.

Medeiras, the priest, met Lytle at the cave. He was a young man, but his early training, his earnest appreciation of the king-like attributes of priesthood, had left a deep impress on his classic face. All truth, sincerity and seriousness, his deep devotion to a dead religion was a commendable example to many more highly educated in a more meritorious cause. To him, the fading glories of an almost extinct race held a glamour that idealised the cave of Bureldo into a storehouse of antiquity and tradition more precious than a regal palace of rare magnificence.

Arrayed in his priestly robes, and alone, he ushered his visitors into the cave.

Torches had been set about to illuminate the dark interior. He exhibited many strange and curious relics; he even pressed several upon Lytle as a gift, but, with ill-concealed eagerness, the schemer insisted on seeing and photographing the idols.

Had Medeiras been more experienced in the progress of science, he would have known that the manœuvres of Lytle were a weak feint. It was impossible to take photographs without the aid of a flash-light in the cave, but Lytle went through all the movements with his camera. His sinister eye glittered covetously as he finally came to the White God.

Affairs had reached a climax. The receptacle of a princely fortune, to secure which he had travelled thousands of miles, was before him.

He made a significant movement to his assistants. They feigned an awe at the presence of the famous idol that gratified the high priest. Then Lytle said:

"The famous White God?"

"Yes," replied Medeiras—"our mightiest and holiest possession. Few, except priestly devotees, are allowed to view it, but the monks at San Miguel recommend you as a friend."

"I must photograph it," spoke Lytle.

Medeiras bowed.

"There is scarcely light enough, however. Would you secure another torch?"

The priest murmured an accommodating assent. He started back the way they had come, alone.

"To work!" ordered Lytle promptly, to his companions.

He knew that Medeiras would be out of view of the idol for some moments, the nearest torch being several hundred yards distant.

Immediately the four men who had accompanied Lytle reached under their coats and produced as many bags.

The White God was a squat figure, perhaps three feet high, and weighing some two hundred pounds.

It was formed of some white, shining substance, resembling gypsum, and stood upon a pedestal of blue marble.

In a twinkling the men tore it from its stand. One bag enveloped it, the other three were strapped about it, and a rope was whipped across the bulky parcel, so that it could be readily carried away.

At just the moment when they had completed their nefarious work the priest, Medeiras, reappeared, bearing the torch in his hand.

The flaring stick went nervelessly from his grasp as he viewed the pedestal, bereft of its accustomed deity.

"Sacrilege!" he fairly screamed. "The White God!"

A terrible look in his calm, flashing eyes, he raised a whistle to his lips that would have sounded a speedy alarm to his friends at the entrance to the cave.

Ere he could give utterance to the warning, however, Lytle raised a small leaden stick he had quickly taken from his pocket.

A cruel blow fell across the dusky, classic brow of the fanatic priest. He went down like a shot, bleeding, prone and senseless, lay inert at the base of the pedestal that had been ravished of its sacred guardian.

"Now, to leave the cave. Quick!" ordered Lytle to his accomplices. "Get away from the camp to the horses. Remember, two hundred dollars to each one of you if I reach the Valdis range by nightfall, with the idol, safe!"

The men took up the idol by the ropes and sped towards the entrance to the cave.

Lytle leading, they came out into the light of day again.

A score or more of women and children gathered there, stared vaguely at them—suspiciously at the bulky object the men bore wrapped up in the sacks.

"Go straight ahead," directed Lytle, in an undertone. "I will attend to these old hags, if they make any disturbance."

His cruel, calculating eye viewed an approaching woman grimly as she advanced, and his hand stole to his coat pocket and clasped a revolver there.

Digitized by Google

"Medeiras?" spoke the woman sententiously.

"Oh! your priest?" returned Lytle, with affected carelessness.

"Yes; he has not returned."

"Oh! he, he——"

A glib lie was ready on the schemer's lips. Its utterance was checked, however, for at that moment, from the recesses of the cave there echoed a shrill, piercing whistle.

Instantly every member of the Aztec group sprang from the ground. With lowering, excited faces they advanced towards Lytle.

"Confusion!" breathed the latter. "He has recovered—the signal of warning!"

"Medeiras! Treachery! Sacrilege!" shouted a dozen voices.

"Stand back!" ordered Lytle.

The women seized cudgels and other missiles. A fierce hail of stones assailed the retreating Lytle.

"I've got to do it," he hissed grimly. "Luckily I brought it with me."

Crash!

He drew a tin spherical object from his pocket suddenly. He gave it a forward fling, and then, nimbly putting a great rock between himself and his pursuers, started to overtake his emissaries.

A blinding glare, a paralysing shock, an explosion that echoed and re-echoed through the far hills like a peal of thunder, made all Nature recoil and shudder.

Frantic, fearful cries of agony rent the scene, next. One glance only the ruthless assassin cast upon the writhing, mutilated masses of humanity into the midst of which he had cast the explosive.

Then, all unmindful of the wreck and ruin he had wrought, he hurried on to his companions.

They rounded the mountain and came to their horses. The idol was secured to a mule, the cavalcade pushed forward.

"Ten miles," soliloquised the triumphant plotter; "the train—the border—then home—a royal fortune!"

Whiz—thud!

An ominous sound made the horses start, and caused the men to glance about and above them in sudden alarm.

"What was that?" demanded Lytle sharply.

"An arrow!"

The man who replied pointed to a tree. An arrow, shot from some hidden covert, still quivered where it had struck.

As he pointed, a second weapon grazed the speaker's head and drew blood.

"Look!" cried another member of the party.

Gazing aloft along the side of the mountain, for a moment Colonel Lytle stood transfixed.

They had been rounding the hill in which was situated the Aztec cave.

From a ledge of this eminence, some forty yards above them, the arrows had been directed.

They evidently constituted the sole armament of the attacking party, for, glancing thither, Lytle caught sight of a man holding a bow in his hand, and waving it menacingly at them, in lieu of further weapons of attack.

"Medeiras!" muttered Lytle, with a malignant scowl. "He may make us trouble yet."

No; a moment sufficed to indicate that the high priest of the cave abandoned all hopes of preventing the theft of the White God and the escape of its despoilers.

The blood from Lytle's blow still drenching his face, he glared down upon his enemy with eyes the schemer would never forget—so accusing, so fierce, so resentful was their gleam.

"Hark you!" he cried, and his voice rang out clear as a clarion note on that still afternoon air. "You plotter, thief, and assassin, you have bereft us of our most revered deity; you have stricken our women and children in cowardly murder; you have fled unscathed, but the end is not yet!"

"Fire—shoot down the prating infidel," cried Lytle angrily, with all the zeal of a religious enthusiast—but of an enthusiast whose god is gold.

A fusilade of bullets tattooed upon the rocks about the priest, Medeiras, but, by drawing back into some secret passage-way by which he had reached the mountain-side from the cave, Medeiras evaded the deadly leaden hail.

"Drive on!" ordered Lytle. "Hasten—we have no time to spare!"

The cavalcade started forward again, but, ere they rounded the rocks that led to the valley below, from the mountain side rang forth a second anathema.

"Go upon your blood-red course!" came the stern, thrilling message. "You thief, murderer, sacrilegious monster! Go back to the proud, disdainful people who laugh at us, who will call your base theft clever, because we are down-trodden, and poor, and obscure! But, mark you! though your countrymen entrench you behind ramparts of steel, though you hide in the uttermost parts of the earth, the avenger of the White God shall seek you out, shall find you, shall drink your heart's blood, drop for drop. By the spirit of Montezuma, I swear it; Lytle—I know your name! It is written in hateful characters of murderous scarlet across my heart. Lytle!—tremble! beware! for the destiny that marks you as a victim to the avenger of blood shall never waver or falter in its purpose until your base, cowardly life has paid the forfeit of vengeance to the devotees of the White God!"

"Oh, I say, this boaster's ranting is monotonous!" cried Lytle, but with a slight shudder at the ringing echo of the ominous threat.

One week later, with a sigh of infinite relief, Colonel Lytle paid off his unscrupulous emissaries on the banks of the Rio Grande.

The next day, with the White God safe in a hermetically sealed iron box, he took his seat in a Pullman, to follow it, and tranquilly puffed away at his cigar, with the satisfaction and contentment of a noble warrior returning from a victorious battlefield.

A brief telegram had preceded him.

It was directed to Richard Sheldon, and it read:

"I have succeeded. The White God is ours!"

(To be continued.)

£100

Will be given to the person who collects the greatest number of Coupons from

SHORT STORIES, PEARSON'S WEEKLY, AND THE STORY TELLER.

Short Stories Coupon is on the second page of cover. All Coupons are to be kept until the end of the year, and then forwarded to the offices of S.S.

In the Story Teller published on February 5th, will appear the opening chapters of a new story, entitled,

"The Eccentric Mr. Fenton."

By Ida Deahl.

POSTAL RATES.

Short Stories will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. Arthur Pearson, at "Pearson's Weekly" Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

EXTRAORDINARY SUCCESS

IN THE

TREATMENT OF OBESITY.

"Our corpulent readers will be glad to learn how to positively lose two stone in about a month with the greatest possible benefit in health, strength and muscle by a comparatively new system. It is a singular paradox that the patient, returning quickly to healthy state, with increased activity of brain, digestive and other organs, naturally requires more food than hitherto, yet, notwithstanding this, he absolutely loses in weight one or two pounds daily, as the weighing-machine will prove. Thus there is no suggestion of starvation. It is an absolute success, and the author, who has devoted years of study to the subject, absolutely guarantees a noticeable reduction within twenty-four hours of commencing the treatment. This is different with other diseases, for the patient in some cases may go for weeks without being able to test whether the Physician has rightly treated him, and may have derived no real or apparent improvement in health. Here, we repeat, the author guarantees it in twenty-four hours, the scale to be the unerring judge. The treatment aims at the actual root of the disease, so that the superfluous fat does not return when discontinuing the treatment. It is perfectly harmless. We advise our readers to call the attention of stout friends to this, because, sincerely, we think they ought to know. For this information, we may say that on sending six penny stamps a book 'Corpulency, and the Cure,' 256 pages, containing a reprint of press notices from some hundreds of Medical and other journals (British and Foreign), and other interesting particulars, including the 'recipe,' can be had from a Mr. F. C. Russell, Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C."—Extract from The Belfast News Letter.

CORPULENCE.

INCREASING POPULARITY OF AN EFFECTUAL CURE.

Many of our readers are, doubtless, familiar with the nature of the extraordinary revolution in the cure of obesity which, within recent years, has been wrought by the original researches of that now eminent expert, Mr. F. Cecil Russell, of Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C. It is evident that the certainty, the rapidity, and the agreeable surroundings of his curative process have been recognised, in a very large degree, among ladies and gentlemen belonging to the highest social circles. Keen observers who have an opportunity of judging inform us, through the pages of society papers and otherwise, that owing to the general employment of Mr. Russell's treatment extreme obesity is becoming as much a thing of the past, at fashionable gatherings, as intoxication; and, no doubt, it will soon be regarded as nearly as disgraceful. The issue of an eighteenth edition of the author's singularly convincing little text-book, "Corpulency, and the Cure," however, serves to remind us that the popularity of the system has now reached spheres far remote from those of West-end fashion. The book of 256 pages may be had (post free) by sending six penny-stamps to Mr. Russell's offices, as above; and it is worth the careful attention of those who wish to free themselves of a burden of fat—not merely because it is unseemly and adds enormously to the apparent age of the sufferer—but because extreme obesity terribly interferes with the energy necessary in these days of competition to make one's way in the world, or even to earn a very modest competency. A large proportion of the letters of Mr. Russell's grateful correspondents refer to their delight at being enabled—within a very brief period, and without any irksome conditions implying semi-starvation—to attack their accustomed tasks with pleasure instead of wearied disgust, through being reduced to their normal weight. The popularity of the system is also largely due, doubtless, to the English hatred of mystery, which is utterly swept aside by Mr. Russell. He fully explains his modus operandi, and supplies the receipt for his preparation.

Digitized by Google

GIVEN AWAY £5,000!

GRAHAM & CO.'S

MONSTER GIFTS.

IMPORTANT NOTICE.—Messrs. GRAHAM & CO. intend to present their Customers with a Monster Parcel as a means of advertising their celebrated

EGYPTIAN GOLD JEWELLERY.

For the small sum of 6s. 6d. we will send as follows:—

NOT A TOY

WE GIVE YOU A WATCH.

	Our Price.
One Gent's Egyptian Gold Albert, or one Lady's Egyptian Gold Albert	2s. 6d.	FOR
One Seal or Locket for Chain	1s. 6d.
One Gent's Carbon Diamond Ring, or one Lady's 5-stone Diamond Ring	3s. 6d.
One Gent's Carbon Diamond Scarfpin, or one Lady's Fashionable Brooch	2s. 6d.
One Pair of Cuff Links, or one Carbon Diamond Bracelet ...	2s. 6d.
Total	12s. 6d.	6s. 6d.

In addition to the above Every Purchaser will be Presented Free of Charge with one of our handsome

KEYLESS WATCHES.

USUALLY SOLD AT HALF-A-GUINEA.

Read what is said by those who have purchased.

WANTS A SECOND PARCEL.

Lowick-by-Neale, Northumberland, August 17.

GENTLEMEN,—Received to-day your second parcel of jewellery, with which we are immensely pleased. We really wonder how you can do it. The watch itself is worth more than the money charged for the whole. Many thanks for punctuality.—Very truly yours, WILLIAM McISAAC.

GOES BETTER THAN HIS £15 WATCH.

11, North Street, St. Peters, Tunbridge Wells.

GENTLEMEN,—Some few weeks ago I sent to your firm for the jewellery and advertised watch, of which I am surprised; the watch is a beautiful timist. I must admit, in fact, it goes better than my £15 gold watch; and for the jewellery it is astonishing value. I think you must lose money over such gifts, as I term it. The watch alone is worth double the 7s. I enclosed. I have shown it to several of my friends, and they were astonished. You can add this to your testimonials if it will be of any service.—I am, Gentlemen, yours faithfully, LEWIS C. RHODES.

GUARANTEED TO KEEP CORRECT TIME.

Any Watch not received in going order will be exchanged.

Every Watch is Carefully Examined, Timed, and Guaranteed a Correct Timekeeper. Call and see them.

We do this to save the enormous cost of advertising, preferring to give our customers the benefit. As we lose money on each parcel we cannot supply more than two parcels to one person. If you cannot call get a P.O. at once, and send for this wonderful parcel. Orders will be executed in Rotation. MONEY RETURNED IF NOT AS REPRESENTED.

NOTE.—The entire parcel will be sent for 6s. 6d. (post free, registered, 7s.). Each customer will receive gratis one of our HANDSOMELY ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUES. Be sure and call or send to-day for the

6s. 6d. Monster Presentation Parcel including the Handsome Keyless Watch.

S. S. GRAHAM & CO., 277, STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

VIOLIN MADE EASY.

The "CARRADOS TUTORETTE" (patent) saves years of practice and pounds in tutors' fees. Positions and Shifts learnt at once. Post free, nickel plated, 1s. 6d. (P.O. only). FINCH & CO., 6 Garfield Rd., London, S.W. FITS ALL VIOLINS.

RED NOSES

Caused by INDIGESTION, etc. All who suffer from this disfiguring complaint should write for DR. HOWELL'S RENOWNED REMEDY, 23, Glasshouse Street, London, W., who guarantees a cure in a few days. 2/6 a box.

TRILENE REG'D TABLETS THE ONLY CURE for STOUTNESS Registered by GOVERNMENT Price 2/6

ALL FAT PEOPLE

Readily Reduce Weight and Cure Corpulency Permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are very agreeable, harmless, and never fail to PRESERVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of diet. Reduction begins immediately.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably." Send 2/6 to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C.

THIN BUSTS

Quickly transformed and a good figure permanently obtained by a perfectly harmless, simple, and inexpensive self-treatment. Success guaranteed. For particulars, free, send stamped envelope in confidence to "Madame B. J.," Oriental Toilet Co., 87, Strand, London.

RED NOSES

Permanently cured in a few days by a simple, inexpensive self-treatment. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope to Dr. A. M. CURTIS, York Chambers, Adelphi, London, W.C.

NEW SERIAL JUST COMMENCED, PROFUSELY ILLUSTRATED.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

NO. 372. FOR WEEK ENDING FEBRUARY 15TH, 1896. [ONE PENNY.

WHAT'S IN A NAME?

The Public are invited to LUKE through the following, and ascertain if their respective appellations appear; but whether such happen to be "on the carpet" or not, all readers who are wise will no doubt carefully MARK the advice offered:

BEECHAM'S PILLS can ADA man to be JOE-vial, HUGH-merous, and blithe as a TOM-tit.

BEECHAM'S PILLS are LILLY-putian in size, but they bring great BEN-efits.

BEECHAM'S PILLS if PERCY-vered with, wholly AMELIA-rate BILLY-ousness.

BEECHAM'S PILLS bring a healthy ROSE-y complexion, and make you as lively as LUCY-fer.

BEECHAM'S PILLS invariably act like MADGE-ic, and are as searching as salt-PETER.

BEECHAM'S PILLS are known through CHRIS-tendom, and MILES beyond, as the most EFFIE-cacious.

BEECHAM'S PILLS are as well known as the field DAISY, the VIOLET, or the POLLY-anthus.

BEECHAM'S PILLS are as celebrated as England's Union JACK, round the globe JENNY-rally.

BEECHAM'S PILLS make you as hard as ADAM-antine, and help you to a GRACE-ful MILLIE-tary carriage.

BEECHAM'S PILLS are ever MINNIE-sters of relief; you may safely SAM-ple them any time Carte-BLANCHE.

To ANNIE-mate you, and make your breath fragrant as sweet JESSIE-mine, try BEECHAM'S PILLS.

When you feel TIM-id, OWEN to nervousness, you should PAT-ronise at once BEECHAM'S PILLS.

If Nightmare is ROBIN you of proper repose and pulling you down a PEG, try BEECHAM'S PILLS.

When you feel RUTH-ful, and un-AMY-able, through EVA-gation from health, take BEECHAM'S PILLS.

To assist you in your JIM-nastic and recreative exercises there's nothing more ABEL than BEECHAM'S PILLS.

If you wish to use PRUDENCE you will with all CONSTANCE-y stick to your BEECHAM'S PILLS.

To help to MOLLY-fy the JOSS-tle of life, and its FLO of excitement, take occasionally BEECHAM'S PILLS.

If you are SALLY-ing off to the seaside, or to rusti-KATE, always CARRIE with you BEECHAM'S PILLS.

After the excitement of DAN-cing and being BELLE of the ball, GLADYS she who can find her BEECHAM'S PILLS.

We don't wish to DICK-tate, or PHIL you with FAN-cy ideas, but we ask you in all HONOR to try BEECHAM'S PILLS.

Rumour both at home and abroad SETH your GUY-ding star in health shall ever be BEECHAM'S PILLS.

To be quite FRANK and ERNEST in the MAT-ter, we MAY say the Pills of VICTOR-y are

BEECHAM'S PILLS.

Digitized by Google

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

THE JOHN NOBLE
HALF-GUINEA COSTUMES

Direct from the Largest Firm of Costume Manufacturers in the world, have secured beyond a doubt the ADMIRATION OF THE WORLD. Being Absolutely Without an Equal Anywhere for Stylish Appearance, Durability, and Actual Money Value. 10/6

TWO GOLD MEDALS AWARDED.

These Costumes have received the highest praise from the leading journals of the day, and are justly regarded by all purchasers as Even Better than Advertised.

Each Costume scientifically cut, tailor-made, and beautifully finished in an exceedingly smart mode, as illustration. The design consists of full wide Godet skirt with belt, also very neat bodice with full front and broad box-pleat down centre, trimmed bold silk cord and three large buttons. Collar and cuffs outlined silk cord; saddle and sleeves lined.

Price complete only 10/6, safely packed and sent carriage paid for 9d. extra.

Sizes in stock fit any figure up to 38ins. round bust under arms, skirts being 38, 40, and 42 ins. long in front; larger or special sizes made to measure, 1/6 extra.

THE JOHN NOBLE COSTUMES FOR YOUNG MISSES are made in the John Noble Cheviot Serge, and trimmed military braid as illustration. A large box-pleat down the centre of the lined bodice, and a fancy pocket at each side of the skirt, complete a charming design at these prices: FROM 8/6

Lengths	35	38	42	46	50 inches.
Prices	8/6	9/6	10/9	12/-	13/6 each.

Each costume safely packed and sent carriage paid for 9d. extra.

KNOCKABOUT FROCKS FOR GIRLS are also supplied in the John Noble Cheviot Serge, with saddle top, long full sleeves, and pocket, at following prices: FROM 1/6

Lengths	21	24	27	30	33	36	39	42	45 ins.
Prices	1/6	2/-	2/6	3/-	3/6	4/-	4/6	5/-	5/6 ea.

Postage 1½d. extra. Lengths stated above are from top of neckband to bottom of skirt in front.

COLOURS: Any of the above garments can be supplied in Black, Navy, Brown, Myrtle, Bronze Green, Electric Blue, Ruby, Dark Cinnamon, Fawn, or Grey.

The JOHN NOBLE CHEVIOT SERGE in which the above garments are made is a fabric of world-wide fame and durability, measuring 52ins. wide. The full Dress Length of Six Yards can be supplied for 7/6, or any length at 1/3 the yard. Colours as above. 7/6

PATTERNS, also "THE BOOK OF THE SERGE," and FASHION SHEETS of numerous other designs in Ladies' and Children's Costumes, etc., sent Post Free on application. Please mention "Short Stories" when ordering.

JOHN NOBLE LTD., Brook St. Mills, MANCHESTER.

MRS. JACKSON

An artist's wife, residing at Norton, near Malton, states: "I am deeply grateful to you for the good received through taking your Wind Pills. I suffered severely from

INDIGESTION, SPASMS,

and LIVER COMPLAINT. The doctors gave me up as incurable, nor did I think it possible for me to recover. I scarcely dared to eat any food, fearing suffocation. Seeing an advertisement of

Page Woodcock's Wind Pills,

I resolved to try them. After taking a few small boxes I lost all the painful symptoms, and now enjoy good health. Publish my statement as you please."

All sufferers from INDIGESTION, LIVER COMPLAINTS, WIND on the STOMACH, SICK HEADACHE, BILIOUSNESS, etc., should avail themselves of this most excellent medicine.

☛ The Wind Pills being purely Vegetable, Tasteless, and Mild, and Tonic in their action, may be taken with perfect safety by the most delicate of either sex.

Of all Medicine Vendors, at 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. Post Free for P.O. or Stamps from PAGE WOODCOCK, LINCOLN.

EPPS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

COCOA

TO THE DEAF.

A Gentleman who cured himself of Deafness and Noises in the Head after fourteen years' suffering, will gladly send full particulars of the remedy post free.—Address, H. CLIFTON, Amberley House, Norfolk Street, Strand, London, W.C.

TO TOBACCONISTS COMMENCING.

£20 See Illus. Guide and Catalogue (259 pages), 3d. "How to Open a Cigar Stores, from £20 to £2,000." TOBACCONISTS' OUTFITTING CO., 186, Euston Road, London. (Over 50 years' reputation.) Manager, H. MYERS.

S.S. S.S.

PEARSON'S

£100

COUPON.

No. 7

Feb. 15, 1896.

S.S. S.S.

HAIR DESTROYED.

A doctor's widow knows of a simple, inexpensive remedy that permanently destroys the roots, and will forward particulars free to all those afflicted sending stamped envelope. Address Mrs. B. D. WOOD, 4, DUKE STREET, VILLIERS STREET, LONDON, W.

ARE YOU LITTLE?

If so, wear the "A D" Invisible Elevators (Regd.). Will increase your height up to four inches; the only approved means; detection impossible; simple, inexpensive. Send stamped envelope for particulars to the ORIENTAL TOILET CO. (B 5 Dept.), 87, Strand, London.

DOUGLAS, HUNGERFORD, AND WILLIAMS.

PROFITS PAID DURING 1895.

Jan. 2, £8 per cent., Feb. 1, £6, Mar. 1, £5, April 1, £8, May 1, £7, June 2, £10, July 1, £9, Aug. 1, £9, Sept. 2, £8, Oct. 1, £8, Nov. 1, £7, Dec. 2, £7.

Total for 12 months £92 per cent., an average of nearly £8 PER CENT. PER MONTH.

PROFITS PAID DURING 1896.

Jan. 2 ... ... £6 per cent.

OUR NEW ILLUSTRATED MANUAL mailed free upon request, showing how these profits may be made WITHOUT SPECULATION. Cheques for profits mailed promptly 1st of each month, and for withdrawals of capital on 2nd and 16th of each month. Trial investments of £5 and upwards may be made.

We have not a dissatisfied Client.

DOUGLAS, HUNGERFORD, & WILLIAMS, 5, Copthall Avenue, London, E.C., and 11, Place de la Bourse, Paris.

WE GIVE AWAY

Free of all cost, Hosiery, Dress Skirts, Printed Blouses, and Complete Dress Lengths. Every woman should write for particulars and the most Marvellous Dress Guide, which are sent free on receipt of a Post Card. ADDRESS: Shakespeare Manufacturing Co. (Dept. 19), Milk St., Manchester.

TOO STOUT

Dr. Grey's FAT REDUCING Pills.

A safe, rapid, and permanent reduction and improvement in health and breathing guaranteed. A special preparation kept for stubborn cases (either sex) which have resisted other treatment.

ABDOMINAL OBESITY A SPECIALTY.

2/9 and 4/6 per box, plain wrapper, post free to all parts. Dr. O. GREY, 57, Weymouth St., Portland Pl., London, W.

VIOLIN STRINGS.

4 Best "E's" (samples) 9d., post free.

S. S. CARY, NEWBURY.

TOOTH-ACHE

CURED INSTANTLY BY

BUNTER'S NERVINE

Prevents Decay. Saves Extraction. Sleepless Nights Prevented. Neuralgic Headache and all Nerve Pains Removed by BUNTER'S NERVINE. All Chemists, 1s. 1½d.

KNOW THYSELF! YOUR CHARACTER, APTITUDES, and CAREER marvellously described from Handwriting by distinguished Graphologist. Business Guidance. Success ensured. Fee 2s. Professor CARONA, F.B.I.M.S., 126, Ledbury Road, Bayswater, W.

HAIR DESTROYED.

A lady who has permanently destroyed Superfluous Hairs on herself, will be happy to forward free, to all similarly afflicted, full particulars of a simple, inexpensive and harmless self-treatment. Send stamped addressed envelope in confidence to Mrs. "T. D." 87, Strand, London.

Digitized by Google

EDITED BY ARTHUR PEARSON OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY

SHORT STORIES

No. 372.] For the Week ending February 15th, 1896. [ONE PENNY.

THE SLUMBER OF TRELAWNEY.

THERE were certain things in our family which afforded subject for gossip; and this died out, revived, and died out again, according to circumstances. We had wealth—few were richer than the Trelawneys. All admitted that we were just, and even generous in our dealings with others; but we had no intimate friends, and kept apart from our neighbours. We neither made visits nor received visitors. No invited guest ever crossed our threshold, and those who came on business were courteously bowed out when their business was concluded. A meal in the kitchen, and sometimes a trifle of money, was given to a mendicant; but, the meal eaten, and the money taken, the recipient was unceremoniously turned out.

Our servants had been with us from their childhood; they served us well and faithfully, they received good wages, their duties were light, they had kind treatment, their children were born and reared on the place; when superannuated, their wages went on till they died; but they formed no attachment to us, nor we to them. We used our fortune liberally for public purposes, but grew richer every year, for we never lived up to half our income, and with every generation the Trelawney property increased in extent, while it shared the general appreciation of value.

The Trelawneys were long-lived; few died young. But there were few of them born. For six generations, with one exception, but one child followed each marriage, and that was always a son. The exception was with my great-great-grandfather, who had a brother two years younger than himself, named John. The latter's birth was down in the family record as occurring in 1772, but what struck me as singular was the absence of any mention of the year of his death. He seemed to have disappeared and died, probably, in some place and at some time unknown.

For some reason or other a large amount of personal property, supposed to have been his, was held in trust by my great-grandfather, and that trust had been renewed regularly from father to son. I once asked my father about this missing great-granduncle. A deeper gloom than usual overcast his face at my question. "You will know all about it some day," was his reply, and then he went on to speak of something else.

Certainly both my father and grandfather wore a troubled and gloomy look upon their faces. They were a prey to settled melancholy. I never saw them smile. Everyone noted their careworn expression; but none knew why.

There was a mystery. Next to the library, in the northern wing, was a large chamber, as laid down in the architect's plan of a century before. Its shutters were always kept closed and a light was seen there all night long. In the rest of the house gas had been introduced from a small generator on the premises. This solitary lamp was filled and trimmed by my father or grandfather, oil being kept in the library for the purpose. No one but they was allowed to enter the chamber, which was kept locked, and each carried a key.

And three times a day, no matter whether they had breakfasted, dined, or supped, or not, there was a slight refection, not enough for more than one, brought to the library. It was either milk or bouillon—something liquid. They partook of it in secret, the library door being locked until the repast ended. And another remarkable fact was observed: my father and grandfather never went out of the house together. If one went out, the other remained at home, as though to guard the secret of the chamber.

Concerning this mystery there was much discussion among the servants. It was a theme of never-ending interest; but, as either boy or man, when I happened among them it was not touched, and I only inferred their talk by the fact that when I appeared the conversation was hushed. It was more talked about after my mother's death. The idea somehow got abroad that the chamber was a storehouse of treasure. This led to the visit of burglars. But my grandfather, who always slept in the library, having a cabinet bedstead there, shot one of the burglars, and the other escaped. After that there were no more attempts of the kind.

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

So I grew up, often wondering about, but never knowing, the secrets of the closed room. Unlike the rest, I went about a great deal, and, after coming down from Oxford, travelled in this country and on the Continent, in which mode of amusing myself I was encouraged. I had an ample allowance of money, owned several good horses, kept a yacht, and indulged in many other extravagances until I exhausted the resources of mild dissipation. Suddenly my grandfather died, and I was called home.

I found my father looking more gloomy than ever. Between him and my grandfather there had always existed an intimacy more like that of brothers than that between father and son. He asked me into the library as soon as I came, locked the door, and bade me be seated. Then he said:

"Your grandfather's death makes it necessary to impart to you a ghastly secret, which, as a precaution, should be kept by two. You have looked over our family record?" I nodded. "You remember, then, there is no account of the death of your great-grand-uncle John, who mysteriously disappeared eighty years ago. The reason is that he never died at all. He still lives, if his condition may be considered life."

He arose and, taking a key from his pocket, opened the door of the great room and entered, bidding me follow. The chamber was long and lofty. The floor, which had once been waxed and polished, had evidently been neglected, and bore on it neither carpet nor rug. There were half-a-dozen heavy, old-fashioned chairs, and an old-fashioned table ornamented with marquetry, and a heavily-curtained bedstead. My father threw aside the bed-curtains and pointed to a form upon the bed.

At first I thought it was the wax figure of a very old man, but a second glance showed me that it breathed. The eyes were closed; the face wrinkled and pallid. It seemed less like one asleep than as a man whose animation was nearly suspended. The features, in spite of the deep wrinkles, and the fact that the lower part of the face was hidden by a long white beard, were those of the Trelawneys, all of whom had marked and peculiar faces. I suppose that I looked inquiry, for my father replied to my thoughts, though I said nothing.

"This has been the secret curse of the family for eighty years, and will continue until that poor old frame wears out. Come back to the library, and I will tell you all."

With the evidence before me, and the fact that it was told by my father, whose truthfulness no one could doubt, I was forced to credit the story. Thus it was:

Guy and John had been very much attached to each other; and when Guy married, John still remained in the house. They were co-heirs, but that mattered little—they practically held but one purse. The fatality attending the family came. My great-grandmother died, leaving my grandfather, a boy of two years. My great-grandfather did not marry again, though time soon softened his grief. One day, when he had begun to receive company, his guest was a French gentleman, a M. Delille.

After dinner, the guest happened to mention that he was a pupil of M. Mesmer, and was well versed in his system. Some good-natured scepticism being evinced as to the power of producing hypnotic sleep, he offered to experiment on his host, and did so successfully. Then he proposed to try it on John, who assented. He was equally successful there. He put a number of questions to John while in the mesmeric state, which were answered, to his brother's great delight.

The windows were open as the day was warm. They were what was called at the time French windows, opening to the floor, on a narrow balcony with a low railing. One of the answers seemed so comical that the Frenchman fell into a fit of laughter, so violent that he lost his balance, and fell backwards out of the window and over the balcony to the ground—the chamber being on the second storey. My great-grandfather ran to assist him, but he was past assistance. The man had broken his neck.

A doctor was immediately summoned, but his examination only confirmed the terrible truth. When that was over the elder brother, Guy, went in to John, who, in the excitement of the moment, had been forgotten. He found him still in the mesmeric stupor, and tried to awaken him. Failing in this, he called up the family physician, to whom he detailed the circumstances. Every effort was in vain. The doctor insisted that it was a cataleptic fit; he pooh-poohed at Mesmer and his devices. But whatever it was, John could not be aroused, and was put to bed.

Thus he had remained through these long years. To avoid scandal, the secret had been kept in the family. His food, which was given him by a stomach-tube, was of a liquid character, and had served to maintain life. His brother had attended him, performing the most servile of offices faithfully and well. When his son was near manhood, he had let him into the secret. When the latter married, the wife, in time, was made acquainted with it. Thus it had gone from father to son, and on down, the Trelawneys being chained to aiving corpse.

Of course, I accepted a share in the responsibility of the secret. What else could I do? But I never married, though often urged by my father. I would wait, I said, until all was over.

John Trelawney was now over a hundred and eight years old. He could not last much longer. When I asked my father why no attempt had been made to awaken the mesmerised man, he replied that the secret of doing that had died with Delille. This stimulated me. I eagerly read and studied all about the subject, and when it came my turn to wait on the old man, I made a number of experimental reverse passes, but always in vain.

Two years after this, my father exhibited marked symptoms of an incurable disease, with which he lingered for two more years, when he died.

The secret had now become my sole burden. John Trelawney, if we could give the corpse a living name, had been reduced almost to a skeleton, withered, and dried up, but still alive. I had given up all hopes of resuscitating him; but he exercised over me a grim fascination. I used to remain after I had fed him with the stomach-tube, and sit and read an hour or so, with a bottle of wine before me, though I only sipped a single glass. One day I had taken a solitary pamphlet—a German magazine, rather—and on glancing over its pages I noticed a paper on "Hypnotism." The only thing in it which excited me was a statement of the author that there was no difficulty in arousing one from the artificial sleep provided the reverse passes were continued without intermission, and the operator had faith in his own powers and an unconquerable will.

"I know," I said, "that I have all the will-power in which the Trelawneys have been deficient, and I will control this man. He shall awaken."

I began making the reverse passes over the prostrate form, and continued them without intermission until my arms arched. But I kept on. "You shall awaken." I said, and I meant it.

Digitized by Google

Suddenly the figure beneath me uttered a deep sigh.

How my heart throbbed! I continued the passes.

John Trelawney opened his eyes, looked round, half-closed his eyes, and fell back. I ran to the table, filled a glass of wine, and poured it between his lips. To my intense delight, he swallowed it, though apparently with difficulty. It seemed to invigorate him. He half raised himself, while I supported him, and looking in my face, said, in a thin, piping voice:

"Where am I? Who are you?"

"I am Guy Trelawney," I replied.

"Guy Trelawney! Nonsense! You are not my brother. Ah!" he continued, looking round, and then at me. "I see it now. This is a dream."

With that he closed his eyes.

I put him gently down, and procured another glass of wine. "Take this, Uncle John," I said; "it will do you good."

"He calls me Uncle John," he muttered. "Just now he wanted to pass for my brother. What a queer dream! Wine, eh! Well, it does seem natural in taste."

He drank the wine, and I supported him in a sitting posture by piling the pillows, reinforced by a chair at his back. Then, as it was growing dark, I drew a match from the box, and, after igniting it, lit the lamp.

"What on earth is that?" he cried. "Did you get the light by rubbing the ends of your fingers? This is certainly the oddest dream that ever entered a man's noddle."

I told him it was a friction match, and lit another to show how the light was produced. He was very much amused, and listened with a sardonic smile while I explained the mode of manufacture, and the materials used. "We find them indispensable when there are not only fires to make, but so many gas-jets to light."

"Gas-jets?" he said inquiringly.

"Let me assist you to dress," I said. "It is some hours yet till bedtime. We will go to the library, which is more comfortable."

He had a dazed look as I said this, and was still more astonished when I brought out a pair of trousers and a dressing-gown.

"Ah!" he said, "these are the new things people are wearing now—what they call trousers. Bah! Where are my breeches?"

I went to the chiffonier in which his clothes had been always kept, and drew forth his breeches. I found them literally riddled.

"Uncle John," I said, producing them, "they are ruined by moths."

"What!" he said, "my best breeches cut up in this way! What the—oh! but it's all a dream, of course. Well, I'll try the others."

He thrust himself into the trousers, buttoned and braced them, put on the dressing-gown and laughed.

"They flap about my legs. Legs! Why, I am notorious for my muscular calves, and my legs look like pipe-stems.

"Now, what could have led me to such a dream as this. I must have been talking of trousers before I went to bed, and trousers suggested legs, and—oh, the development of the idea is quite clear!"

I assisted him—he was evidently very weak—into the library, and installed him in an easy-chair, into which he sank with a sigh of pleasure. Then I lit the gas, and he eyed me curiously.

"I see that, too," he muttered to himself. "Guy and I were talking of this new project of lighting London by inflammable air—gas, they called it. That accounts for it. But the friction matches! However, if I can remember the process and the materials when I wake up, and if it works in reality as it does in a dream, I shall be known as a famous inventor. But the queerest thing is, that while I know it is a dream, I have to keep on dreaming."

"Shall I order supper?" I said; "you have had nothing but milk."

"Milk!" he replied. "If there is anything I detest, it is milk. Order what you like."

I rang the bell, and when the servant appeared ordered supper to be served in the library. When Peter—who, impassive as he generally was, displayed by a look his astonishment at the stranger's presence—had gone out, John Trelawney said:

"That's another of the dream people. I never saw him before, and when I wake up won't see him again. But what—what the deuce is that?"

A mingled look of terror, doubt, and amusement went over his face as he lifted the end of his long, white beard, which he now observed for the first time. He passed his hand upward and traced the beard to his chin, and then he gave it a sharp tug.

"Of all the farrago of nonsense which comes to a man's head in dreams, this is the most absurd. A long white beard on me, a man of twenty-eight, and heavens!" he continued, as he caught a glimpse of his face in the mirror over the mantel, "there's white hair and wrinkles to correspond! This matches the thin legs. I shouldn't wonder if I turned to an old woman next, with a black satin dress, and a lot of falbalas."

Here he burst into a loud fit of laughter.

"What is the matter with my voice, I wonder," he exclaimed; "it's of a piece with my beard, and my wrinkles, and—my legs. If I were awake, and looked like this, and talked so, I should think I had got to be eighty at least. Won't I have a fine tale to tell to Guy in the morning."

Peter came in with a tray bearing plates, dishes, and eatables, and John with the tea-service. When they had spread the cloth on the library-table, and arranged everything my rather stately housekeeper, Mrs. Lang, sailed in.

"Mrs. Lang," I said, "let me present you to Mr. John Trelawney, who remains with us, and to whom everyone in the house will pay as much deference and attention as to me. Uncle John, this is the housekeeper, Mrs. Lang."

Mrs. Lang was evidently mystified, but she was equal to the occasion. She performed an elaborate curtsey. Uncle John, as a polite, old-young gentleman, rose and bent his body in acknowledgment.

"Now," I said, "no one need wait, as we are to have some conversation on family matters. I can even dispense with your attendance, Mrs. Lang."

The housekeeper sniffed faintly, but departed with the others.

"Now for the feast of Barmecide," said Uncle John gaily. "No! the tea tastes as natural as if it were tea. These chops, too, what is the matter with my teeth? Why, hang it! they're half gone. I see, all in keeping—sans teeth, sans everything."

"Uncle John," I interposed, "you must excuse me, if I caution you to be careful about your eating. As your stomach has been accustomed solely to liquid food for over eighty-four years, solid matter might——"

"Liquid food! Eighty-four years!" he burst out. "Now what could have led to such a mental vagary even in a dream r And knowing this to be a dream, why can't I wake myself?"

Digitized by Google

The supper passed off, though Uncle John would pause occasionally, and tap his head and smile. He evinced signs of fatigue shortly after, and I led him to a chamber, where I assisted him to disrobe, and left him.

The next morning, finding he was very weak, I had chocolate served to him in his room. The servants were evidently puzzled, and I could fancy the below-stairs parliament in active session. But they were well drilled, and evinced no surprise in our presence, and made no inquiries as to how and when this newly-found relative had come to be a visitor. About eleven o'clock my guest rose, and I assisted him to the library, where we had breakfast. While we were eating, he was startled by the screams of a steam-whistle—the railway passing within two hundred yards of the house.

"Wha—what is that?"

"Oh, nothing," I said, "but the train. We have a railway crossing over the estate, and a station within a quarter of a mile from the house."

"Railway!—train!"

The servants were listening and I changed the subject by finding fault with an egg which was overdone. When we had finished I took Uncle John into the library, got him an easy chair, and handed him one of the morning papers. He looked at it in amazement, and repeated the title.

"Why, I never heard of it before," he said; "and the type is so small that I can't read it. Oh, I see: white hair, wrinkles, thin legs, weakness, poor teeth, and so failing sight is in keeping. I wonder I am not deaf."

I took grandfather's spectacles from a drawer.

"Try these," I said.

He put them on, but shook his head.

"Perhaps you were near-sighted when you were young," I said.

"Was! I am near sighted."

"Try these, then," and I handed him a pair used by my father.

"Ah! these do nicely. But what stuff is this? Ocean steamer! Six days and eighteen hours!"

"Yes," I said, "quite a fast voyage across the Atlantic, but there have been faster."

"The Queen received the American Minister at Balmoral, to which he has been specially invited. Balmoral! the Queen! Queen of England, I suppose. But why not the King? Balmoral! where on earth is that?"

"It is Queen Victoria's seat in the Highlands."

"And who the—I beg your pardon—but who is Queen Victoria?"

"She is the present reigning sovereign, and succeeded William the Fourth forty-seven years since."

"Oh, she did. did she? and who was William the Fourth?"

"He was Prince William Henry."

"What, that midshipman who got trounced? But where was the Prince of Wales?"

"He succeeded his father, you know, as George the Fourth, and died without issue."

"No, I don't know. But, 'by telegraph.' What does that mean, and how do you get news from India, as I see you do here in a day? Am I expected to believe that? The dream grows queerer and queerer."

I explained the action of the electric telegraph, but he did not seem to comprehend it.

"The fantasies are wilder and wilder. The lightning is made a courier; by-and-bye it will be bottled up for lamps, and the sun will paint our portraits."

"All that has been done long since," I replied. "But the next train is nearly due, and with this field-glass you can see it from the balcony. There—I hear it in the distance. You needn't rise, I'll wheel your chair to the open window—so."

The train soon came in sight, dashed on, turned a curve, and we could hear it slow down as it approached the station. Uncle John's hands shook, partly with weakness, partly with excitement, but he seemed to have had a good sight of the engine and carriages. He sat there reflecting.

How was I to impress him with the fact of his real condition. It would have to be done, some time or other. But would it overturn his reason? I mused over it.

"Well, Nephew Guy, as you call yourself, what are you thinking about?"

"Pray," I returned, "do you remember Monsieur Delille?"

"Yes; where is he? He tried to put me to sleep, but failed."

"Uncle John, he did not fail. He succeeded."

"He did, you say. That is a little hard to believe, even in a dream."

"You have been asleep ever since, and were so until I awakened you."

"And for how many hours, pray?"

"Eighty-four years. You fell into a hypnotic slumber in 1800, and this is 1884."

Uncle John broke into a fit of laughter; but seeing my serious face, paused, and then deliberately bit his finger.

"I shall be awake presently," he said, looking at his finger. "And yet this pain—tell me all about it."

I told him all, as I have written it, but with more detail. Then I added: "Look at yourself in yonder glass. You have grown old during your artificial slumber. Action has been suspended, but not the processes of life. Read the journal you have thrown down, and you will see that the world has moved, and you have not. Clasp my hand—there, is that not flesh and blood—real, and not visionary?"

"And brother Guy?"

I took down the family record and read:

"Guy IV., has issue:

"1. Guy V., born at Trelawney Park, April 3rd, 1770; m. December 28th, 1794, Mary Louisa, eldest daughter of Lawrence and Gertrude Gansevoort, of Gansevoort Manor; widower, June 3rd, 1798; died, May 9th, 1855.

"2. John, b. February 1st, 1772."

"Poor old Guy," murmured Uncle John. "But go on."

"Guy V. had issue:

"1. Guy VI., b. February 1st, 1796; m. Alice, second daughter of Pierce and Mary Compton, June 20th, 1818; widower, June 9th, 1821; d. March 19th, 1878.

"Guy VI. has issue:

"1. Guy VII., b. October 9th, 1820; m. April 1st, 1850, to Grace Amaranth, sole daughter of John George Pigott, of Pigott Park, Leicestershire; widower, May 4th, 1870; d. February 5th, 1882.

"Guy VII. had issue:

"Guy VIII., b. May 1st, 1856."

Digitized by Google

The truth seemed to possess the old man's mind. He looked at his hands and feet, felt his beard, and his countenance assumed a look of extreme terror. Would he go mad?

Suddenly he burst into a flood of tears, and I felt relieved.

"This—this is cruel," he said at length, with a sob.

"We did all we could, Uncle John," I pleaded.

"Yes, I know—I know. But to keep me in a living grave, to wake old, decrepit—it was better to have let me die while I was unconscious. I am weak—I would like to lie down."

"Do so, Uncle John, you will be better by dinner-time."

I assisted him to his chamber, where he laid down on a lounge, and I left him to his repose.

Just before dinner I sent Peter to his room to bid him prepare for the meal. The servant came back. "The old gentleman seems a little out of his head, sir. He told me to put a tinder-box in the mantelshelf."

I hurried to the chamber, where I found the old man muttering to himself. I spoke to him, saying that dinner would soon be ready.

"You are there," he said; "and you come to tell me this is no dream, and I am a hundred and twelve years old."

Then he stared vacantly and worked his fingers in a convulsive way.

I sent at once for Dr. Quitman, our family physician, while I managed to persuade the old man to get to bed. When the physician came, and before he saw his patient, though, I gave him none of the previous facts, I stated that he was my great-great-granduncle, and that he was a hundred and twelve years old. Dr. Quitman looked surprised at the relationship, and the gleam in his eye showed that he doubted the age given. He went with me to the chamber, and made the customary examination. Uncle John answering his questions in monosyllables, not always as though he perfectly understood.

"Well, doctor?" I inquired when we had come out.

"He is certainly very old," replied the physician; "he may be close upon a hundred. There is no disease—the powers of life are simply giving way. By a careful administration of stimulants—I should recommend Huxham's tincture—and by judicious nourishment, you may prolong life a little, but he will probably peaceably fade out in a very few days."

And he did. On the third day, growing weaker, and apparently without any feeling of pain, he passed away. I had my finger on his pulse. It was very weak and slow. As I stood there he muttered, and I stooped to listen. He murmured:

"Guy, it was as real—you can have no idea——"

Here he stopped. I pressed the artery, but it had ceased to beat.

THOMAS ENGLISH.

MELODY

A Musical Magazine.

The First Number will appear on February 29 for March 1.

PRICE SIXPENCE MONTHLY.

48 PAGES.

SHEET MUSIC SIZE.

The Contents will consist of original works, both vocal and instrumental, by the best and most popular authors.

Digitized by Google

WHEN THE BIRDS BEGIN TO SING

BY WINIFRED GRAHAM. Author of "Through the Valley," "Six First-Class Passengers," etc.

SUMMARY.

Philip Roche marries Eleanor Grebby, daughter of a farmer, and they spend their honeymoon on the Continent. On their return to Richmond, Eleanor becomes friendly with a frivolous widow, Mrs. Mounteagle, against her husband's wishes.

CHAPTER V.

"THE FLY THAT SIPS TREACLE IS LOST IN THE SWEETS."

"I AM tired of arguing the subject," declares Philip hotly, rising from his chair and pacing the room. "If you will disregard my wishes and go your own way, well——"

"Let me, that's all!" retorts Eleanor.

"No wonder you have hardly a single friend in Richmond, if your whole time is spent with Mrs. Mounteagle," he replied.

"I don't want other friends—I dislike them, Philip, and what is the good of pretending friendship for people you don't care a button about? There is not a woman in the place that can hold a candle to Giddy."

"Oh, it's 'Giddy' now, is it?"

"Why not? I have known her nearly three months."

"Yes; and every month has been one too many. Do you think I cannot see the harm she is doing you? We might have led a happy, contented life if she were not here to poison it. What did you think of your home—before you met her? Everything was perfect! What did you say of it after?"

"Dowdy—old-fashioned—run to seed. Look at the transformation! Isn't my drawing-room a poem? Has not 'Liberty' descended like the goddess of Beauty on our abode, and made it the envy of our neighbours? Giddy has practically built me up, Philip. I owe her my dressmaker, my tailor, my style, my hats, my——"

"Oh! spare me," he interrupts, "I have heard it so often."

"Dear old fellow, don't be angry," coaxes Eleanor, with her old cajoling manner. "It is very hard for a poor little woman to be left alone all day, while her better half is frivoling in the City with stocks and shares, and all sorts of nice amusing things. There really is no harm in Giddy, and she's so awfully clever and entertaining."

"But I do not approve of the people you meet at her house, nor your frequent visits to town together. I don't wish my wife to be constantly seen with a woman of doubtful reputation."

"Nonsense about her reputation, it's all bosh! People are jealous of her beauty that say nasty things. She told me so herself. Besides, we only do a little shopping, and it is so dull going all by oneself."

"How do, dear?"

Eleanor has crept into his arms, and is soothing his ruffled feelings with caresses.

"It is only because I love you, Eleanor," he says, with more passionately, hungering devotion than of yore. "Her companionship is not good for you, and she is always taking you away from me. That sounds selfish, doesn't it?"

"Well, I forgive you," she whispers, "if you will be less ferocious in the future. I declare when you walk up and down—like this," imitating his stride, "and show the whites of your eyes—so! I want to hide under the sofa and scream."

"Oh! Eleanor, was I such a bear?"

"Much worse than a bear; he is in a cage, and cannot get out. You just stand and laugh at him, and please him with a biscuit, or tease him with a feather."

"I didn't want to quarrel before going, only you started the subject of Mrs. Mounteagle, and it is rather a red rag, you know, Eleanor, since I objected from the first."

"But I am so wickedly wilful," she sighs, peeping through her eyelashes coquettishly. She has caught the "eye-lash" trick from her next-door neighbour.

"I am sorry, dear, to have to stay in town to-night, but it is most important. You won't give up your party at the Hillier's?"

Digitized by Google

"Oh! no. I shall go alone. It is only one of their deadly musical evenings, with about three second-rate professionals, and a sprinkling of local talent. The Misses Hillier play the harp and violin, with particularly red arms and bony elbows, their sister-in-law sings in a throaty contralto, and the ices run out before ten."

"Is Mrs. Mounteagle asked?"

"They don't know each other, and Giddy is so glad. It gives her nearly a fit to look at them."

"Ah! yes, I remember Mrs. Hillier telling me she had not called."

"Now you are beginning again."

"But is it a fact, dear, people don't call?"

"And just as we had made it up, too," putting her hand over Philip's mouth.

"Well, I'll say no more. At least, I shall have the satisfaction of knowing you won't be with her to-night."

"Poor Giddy!" sighs Eleanor as he leaves; "how she is misjudged!"

"Mrs. Mounteagle," announces Sarah.

"How do, dear?" cries the widow sweetly, pressing Eleanor's cheek.

Then as the door closes: "I don't like that maid of yours, she shows one in as if one were a dressmaker or sister of mercy, and always looks at me as if my bonnet were crooked. You really ought to get a man, it gives such a much better appearance to the place."

"I do not believe Philip would have one."

"My dear, a man is the last subject I should ever think of consulting my husband on. By-the-way, Eleanor, my fiancé has turned up again. You know he went abroad to grow, and was not to come back for six months, but three seem to have nearly killed him. He has had typhoid fever in Antwerp, and then took a trip to New York, where he got jaundice. I must introduce you next Sunday, he is going to drive down."

"You never told me his name."

"Didn't I? Bertie—Herbert Dallison."

"Oh!" with an expressive intonation. "Is he fond of ices?"

"Yes. How did you know?"

"They are very unwholsome, and—and you said he had been ill."

"You are going to the Hillier's to-night," Mrs. Mounteagle says, unfolding a parcel on her lap. "You intend wearing your white silk, I believe."

"Yes. It is good enough for them."

"I should think so, the cut of the skirt is lovely, but I am not altogether satisfied with the severe bodice. I want you to wear this fichu of mine, it is a perfect gem."

She holds out a cloud of spangled gauze.

"How lovely!" cries Eleanor, flinging her arms round the widow's neck.

"You're very welcome to it."

"Philip is deserting me to-night," continues Eleanor—"business in London."

"How dull you will be going and returning to your party alone. I know!" (her face lightening up as with some magic inspiration) "I'll come and stay the night with you, dear, see you dressed, and have a real good gossip up in your room about those stupid Hillier's afterwards."

Philip's words return to Eleanor.

"At least you will not be together this evening."

Yet what can she do? Besides it will be such fun to have Giddy.

So the plan is settled, and that evening Mrs. Mounteagle arrives in a flowing tea-gown, her maid unpacking a dainty dressing-bag with gold-topped ornaments, and hanging up a dress for the morning. Giddy sits in a low arm-chair watching Eleanor's toilette.

"Sarah is doing your hair abominably!" she exclaims. "You will look a fright. Here, let me show you, my good girl," addressing the maid in the superior drawl she adopts towards menials. "Twist the coil at the top—so, like a teapot handle, and let the side pieces wave loosely over the ears. You don't want to make a guy of your mistress, do you?"

Sarah resents the interference, but between them Eleanor's coiffure is eventually arranged.

"Now you are lovely, a sight for sore eyes," declares Giddy Mounteagle. "Yet what is the good after all in being beautiful for such a dowdy set? They will only hate you for it, as they hate me, the fools! We cannot help being well favoured."

"And she calls 'erself a lady!" says Sarah scoffingly, to Judith later on. "She's as different to our young mistress as chalk to cheese."

"I don't like leaving you alone," declares Eleanor after dinner.

"Afraid I shall steal something?" asks Giddy, laughing.

"Here, let me show you, my good girl."

"Don't fret, my dear, I shall be quite happy in this glorious book-land. Mr. Roche has a most enviable collection. I have rather a headache, and shall go to bed early and read. I never sleep before two or three in the morning, so don't ring, but just throw a stone at my window. I should love to let you in."

"Just as you please, dear. It is all the same to me."

"You need not sit up for Mrs. Roche," says Mrs. Mounteagle, when she goes to her room, "and, Sarah! bring me coffee in the morning, my nerves will not stand tea."

Flinging open her window, Giddy lets the chilly night air mingle with the fumes of her cigarette, as she lies on a sofa before the fire.

In the meanwhile the beautiful Mrs. Roche is causing quite a sensation at the Hillier's, who are not so dowdy after all. The smartest Richmond girls arrive on this occasion, yet the men crowd round Eleanor, who, elated by success, converses in a most effervescing style.

She finds herself using Giddy's expressions, stealing Giddy's ideas, remembering her droll sayings, and repeating them second-hand.

They seem to go down, and amuse Eleanor as much as her listeners. She has just told a smart story (rather too smart

Digitized by Google

She is fascinated.

for the occasion), when her glance falls on a man in the doorway. He is looking straight across at her with strangely magnetic eyes. He is tall, slim, handsome. She stops speaking. The stranger awakes a new interest; she forgets the others, she wants him.

He seeks out the youngest Miss Hillier, and asks for an introduction.

"Mrs. Roche—Mr. Quinton."

Two magic words make them friends. He takes the seat of honour by her side, monopolises the conversation, and eventually disperses her admiring circle.

Eleanor is glad. She is fascinated by the profound interest he displays when she speaks of herself. Besides, from what he tells her she gathers he is a man of genius, destroyed by pessimism, given to analyse human hearts and discover their misery, to look deeply into the lives of his fellow creatures, below the platitudes and conventionalities. He is richly endowed with the divine gift of sympathy, the supreme art of discrimination, yet occasionally reveals the witty spirits of the cynic, who is cynical to please.

He sees through Eleanor's society prattle the guileless mind, the childish innocence. He recognises that as yet she is undeveloped—he mentally reviews her. She is absurd, improbable, and therefore fascinating. She is like a book with the best chapters torn out—you long to find them and never rest till you succeed.

Palmists or clairvoyants would prophesy a future for her, simply through looking in her eyes, but whether notoriety is to be won by downfalling or uprising were better left unstated. Eleanor, he decides, is neither highly-strung nor excitable, but outspoken, fresh, and conscious of her beauty, without conceit. He thinks he loves her at first sight, the lukewarm love arising from admiration, which a man may feel towards a married woman, without blame, but at the close of the evening he is certain of it.

"What have we been talking about all to-night?" asks Eleanor, with a puzzled frown, and a smile which counteracts it. "So much was frivolous and foolish I cannot remember."

"Yet every word is hidden in some secret cell of your brain. Oh, that the secret cells could be opened and revealed to our nearest and dearest. What countless forgotten treasures might be restored."

"Or what ill-spoken words and evil quarrels revived," adds Eleanor wisely.

"Thus speaks a guilty conscience," he retorts. "I could sum up my life on a sheet of foolscap. 'Preface: apparent folly, covering intents and purposes. A boyhood of ambition, a manhood of misfortune.'"

"Misfortune!"

"Yes, since I grew to realise facts; to see men and women as they are, not as they appear! Sometimes the bare word 'reality' fills me with such loathing for this paltry world, with its pigmy minds and soulless bodies, that I can hardly control my contempt. I pull myself together, and pray for a new set of nerves, a stronger heart, and a better flow of healthy blood to the brain."

"What a pity that nerves cannot be purchased like false teeth," says Eleanor laughing.

"Nerves are the finest satire on our human organisation, and our bodies, each a theatre of perpetual activity, the most confusing mystery of all. I believe in a dual nature existing in men and women, but the difficulties which bar our progress to perfect knowledge of each other cannot be overcome."

"Things that can't be understood are invariably irritating," sighs Eleanor.

"Some day we will think it out together," he whispers, waving her fan gently. "We shall meet again, Mrs. Roche" —speaking confidently—"for have we not a mutual friend in Mrs. Mounteagle, whom I regret is not here to-night?"

"Yes. It is strange that we should both know her."

Eleanor has risen, and is holding out her hand for the fan.

"You are not going?"

"Look at the hour! I shall be disgraced if I stay longer."

She leaves him, and bids her hostess good-night.

He is waiting in the hall for a last word.

"May I call your carriage?"

"I did not order it, as I only live three doors off."

"Then may I escort you?"

Eleanor glances at him confidingly with her large innocent eyes.

"Yes; I meant you to."

Mr. Quinton smiles, and takes her arm as they step out into the darkness.

"I knew somebody would see me home," she says, the old, childish Eleanor breaking through the "Giddy" manner. "I thought it would be much more fun than driving this step."

"Then it was premeditated."

She laughs softly.

"I wish it were not so near," murmurs Mr. Quinton.

"Mrs. Mounteagle wanted to let me in—I believe out of simple curiosity. I am to throw stones at her window. Quite romantic, isn't it?"

"May I have a shot?" he asks. "Which is the pane of beauty's shrine?"

"There, on the left of my room," pointing upwards.

A handful of gravel flies through the air. Rattle, rattle on the glass.

Then Giddy appears in a white robe de chambre, her dark hair falling in waves about her shoulders.

"All right, I am coming down."

A moment later she stands before them, laughing and shaking hands with Carol Quinton, two small, bare feet peeping from under her airy garb, her hair still unfettered.

"It is a delightful surprise to see you, Carol," she cries. "I have sent all the servants to bed, Eleanor, but told them to leave out some aspic and champagne, as I know the Hilliers starve their guests. What do you say to an impromptu supper party? It would be so delightfully unconventional."

She has dragged Carol into the hall and closed the door.

"Yes, do come in," echoes Eleanor feebly, pleased and yet awed by Giddy's suggestion. She is looking somewhat shrewdly at those delicate pink toes, and the dark mane falling over the white gown.

Digitized by Google

"Shall I get you some shoes?" she whispers.

"No, dear, Nature is better than leather, and more négligé."

She speaks in a tone that silences Eleanor, who feels she has been dense and awkward.

"Come along," says Giddy, leading the way, and lighting the silver candelabra in the dining-room. "Do make Eleanor take off that heavy fur cloak, Carol. Oh! isn't this nice?" as he fills her glass with champagne. "Was there ever a jollier little trio?" leaning back in her chair and surveying the other two complacently. "Pass me a brown sandwich, I am hungry if you are not, and the stuff inside them gives you an appetite. What do you call it?—something beginning with an 'L.'"

The nectar of the gods puts a bright sparkle into Eleanor's eyes, their lustrous beauty gleams on Giddy and Carol Quinton in luxurious contentment. She permits her guests to smoke, and tries a whiff from Mrs. Mounteagle's cigarette, finally lighting one up on her own behalf.

She dislikes smoking in reality, but considers it smart to imitate the widow.

"Have you really missed hearing Kitty Bell at the 'Frivolity'?" asks Mrs. Mounteagle, giving Carol a light from her cigarette. "My dear boy, she is perfectly charming, the most piquante little singer of the day. Why the chorus of her last song has haunted me ever since—the tune, not the words. It went something like this, as far as I can remember:

"Poor little Flo,
How should she know?
A simple country maiden
From the wilds of Pimlico."

As Giddy Mounteagle sings the lines a latchkey turns in the hall lock, footsteps advance down the passage, the dining-room door opens, and Philip Roche stands before them!

Philip Roche stands before them!

CHAPTER VI.

Like one that on a lonesome road
Doth walk in fear and dread.

Eleanor's blood runs cold at the sight of her husband. She knows well what he will think of this impromptu supper-party. Giddy's feet for the moment are mercifully concealed by the table-cloth. She half rises, however, and stretches out her hand to Mr. Roche.

"Eleanor was just wishing you would come back," she murmurs sweetly.

"I returned quite by chance," he answers coldly, knowing her words to be untrue. "Brown could not put me up after all," turning to his wife, "so I drove down."

"Philip, this is Mr. Quinton; he kindly saw me home, and—and——?"

"We persuaded him to come in," adds Giddy, as Carol, grasping the situation, says pleasantly:

"Delighted to make your acquaintance, Mr. Roche."

But, though Philip is far too gentlemanly to show his disapproval, all the hilarity has gone from the evening. Perhaps it is due to Eleanor's sudden tranquility, the pallor of her face, and nervous hesitating speech. She is no adept at concealing her emotions or "passing things off" like Giddy and Carol. She leaves the rest of the conversation to them, and while Philip is seeing Mr. Quinton out slips upstairs for Giddy's shoes and beseeches her to put them on.

"My husband will think it so odd," she whispers. "I saw him looking at your hair."

"Yes," replies Mrs. Mounteagle, "men always admire it. But don't be alarmed, dear, I am far too fond of you to care about making a friend of your husband." Then she saunters up to bed, with a pitying glance at Eleanor's pretty, troubled face.

"I wonder if she'll have sense enough to hold her own?" thinks Giddy. "Poor little fool, to be sat upon already!" She hears them come up, and creeping from her room steals on tip-toe to their door, with her ear to the keyhole.

There are high words within, and some unpleasant allusions to herself in distinctly masculine tones. Eleanor is heard crying, but her tears do not hasten a reconciliation.

Giddy goes quietly back.

"Bah!" she exclaims, stretching out her hands to the fire. "What rot! As if there was any harm!"

She stirs up the blaze and laughs. "I shall breakfast in bed," she says to herself.

* * * * * * *

"He doesn't understand me. He wants me to be so good, so uninteresting, so domesticated! I believe he married me for that. Oh! oh! oh!"

Mrs. Roche is wringing her hands and sobbing on the sofa.

"Another quarrel?" sighs Giddy, stroking Eleanor's soft hair. "Come, come, this won't do. Pluck up your courage, go your own way, act as you like, and laugh at your husband. He can't scold you if you laugh! Tears will only gratify his vanity, besides they are disastrous to beauty

Digitized by Google

Once your eyes become swollen, and your nose red, you can no longer hold your own. Your sense of superiority is gone, you are undone!"

"How awful I look," sighs Eleanor, rising and facing the glass. "I hope Sarah will say 'not at home' if anybody calls."

Steals to their door.

"I am not going to let you stay in and mope, just because Mr. Roche happened to leave in a lecturing mood this morning. I have arranged a little tea in town at my club."

"Your club? I did not know you had one."

"Oh! yes, and I am on the committee. Nearly all the artists and literary women have their clubs nowadays, so I and some friends started one for people who do absolutely nothing. It is very useful to members with jealous husbands. We call it the 'Butterflies' Club,' a land of cosy corners and rendezvous. You really will have to join it Eleanor, if Philip goes on like this. I will put you up at our next meeting. It is rather an expensive luxury, ten guineas a year, and a Turkish bath attached."

Giddy places her arm affectionately through Eleanor's, and leads her to the door.

"Come up and dress dear, my carriage will be here in half an hour, and I don't intend going without you."

Eleanor cheers up at the prospect. She is like an April day.

Giddy fans her friend's flushed face, rubs some powder gently with her fingers round the swollen eyes, and showers eau-de-Cologne on the burning forehead.

"Do not throw yourself into any more fevers," she says; "life is too short, and sorrow too long."

Eleanor is soon attired in green velvet and fur, for Mrs. Mounteagle declares it is necessary to be smart at the Butterflies' Club.

They drive away together in the widow's snug little brougham.

Herbert Dallison is waiting outside the club door to receive them; he starts, colours, and stares at Eleanor as Giddy introduces him.

"Say 'how do you do?' prettily," she cries in a bantering tone, "and don't gape like an overgrown school-boy, if you love me, Bertie!"

Mr. Dallison holds out a limp hand in a grey glove, smiles feebly, and thinks of the "relics" and the cat!

"Why are you not at the Junior Conservative?" murmurs Eleanor, laughing softly, "instead of dangling round the 'Butterflies'!"

"Ah! you remember my card."

"Yes, I have it still. I hope you will make Giddy a good husband," speaking demurely.

"I ought to, after all I've gone through for her sake. It is a mercy I have come home alive after my illnesses, and the dangerous young people I met on the Continent."

"Let me introduce you to our coming member, the Butterfly that is to be," says Giddy, and Eleanor turns to face Carol Quinton.

Mrs. Mounteagle laughs merrily at her astonished look. "I did not tell you he was coming, but now we are just a cosy quartette."

"I am afraid," murmurs Mr. Quinton, "that my visit to your charming home the other evening was ill-timed. Mr. Roche seemed somewhat taken aback by my presence."

"Yes," stammers Eleanor, growing red.

"I was so vexed you should be annoyed," he replies, "that I could not go home, but paced the pavement for an hour, watching the light in your window."

Eleanor's eyes expand. She has a way of looking "surprise" without saying it, and the look lasts quite a long while, during which an ordinary person would have expressed their feelings several times over. Then the wonderment fades like a magic-lantern slide, and she talks of something else.

"Have you ever seen the sun burst suddenly through a fog? It is like your smile," says Carol, gazing into Eleanor's face. "Why don't you always smile?"

"Because I am not always happy," she responds quietly.

A pained expression steals into the man's eyes, and Eleanor flushes rosy under his look. It is deep, searching, admiring; it confuses her. She wants to push it away like something oppressive, a funeral veil dark and heavy, or a chloroformed handkerchief, stifling breath!

"Not happy!"

The words break from him with bitter irony.

"You have youth, beauty, personal magnetism, the power to charm, eyes that might wreck a life every day in the year. You need not scheme for love nor demand it. It is yours by natural right. Why is not your life one of wildest exhilaration, conquests, pleasures? Who could deny you anything, Mrs. Roche?"

Eleanor knows well, but is too loyal to say. She would sooner bite out her tongue than answer "Philip!" Yet he would rob her of the companionship of her dearest friend, would deny her intercourse with Carol Quinton, could he hear these low-whispered words of adulation! As she thinks of it, her husband takes the form of some heartless monster, sapping her youth's freedom, fettering her down to his side like a dragon-fly on a pin, she can only flap her wings faintly and gasp in vain.

"Were you sorry to see me to-day?" asks Mr. Quinton, watching the firelight playing on Eleanor's figure.

"No, I was very miserable this afternoon; I had been crying. I like meeting you, it does me good."

As she speaks the electric light is turned up, and a little groan issues from Giddy.

"Just as we were all so comfortable in the gloaming!" pulling her hand from Bertie's with a pout.

"Butterflies should like light better than darkness," he drawls.

"I want to look round now," cries Eleanor, enthusiastically viewing the beautiful room. "Anyone could see that Giddy had something to do with this."

"Here is a pretty little writing-table behind a screen, with a rose-coloured lamp," says Carol. "When you are a member, Mrs. Roche, will you sometimes write to me?"

"What should I have to say?" she asks innocently, surprised at the suggestion.

"Tell me about yourself, if only in one line: 'I live—I breathe—I have my being.'"

"What an odd letter!"

"I like odd things, I like odd people; I hate conventionality, and scorn the commonplace. I know a girl who always speaks the truth, and everybody hates her. She glories in it."

"How splendid to be hated for such a cause!" declares Eleanor.

"She never will embrace a woman she dislikes, so many people think it is necessary, and the kiss of detestation is more fashionable in Society than that of real affection.

Digitized by Google

The touch thrills her with bewildering emotion.

For myself, I think a kiss is overrated. It should be looked on in the light of a hand-shake—harmless and agreeable, a mark of courtesy, endearment, or respect."

"Then you would have to explain it," says Eleanor. "'I kiss you because I idolise you;' 'I kiss you because you are estimable;' 'I kiss you because you are rich and entertain me.' No, it would never answer."

She is fingering the delicate, scented writing paper.

"How nice this address is in gold, with a big butterfly in the corner. I have some invitations to answer, and I should like to do it here—it looks so well."

Eleanor seats herself, and draws the paper towards her. "Mrs. Roche regrets that owing to no previous engagement, she is unable to accept Mrs. B's dull invitation for Thursday!"

Carol laughs.

"Have you an 'At home' on Thursday week?"

"Yes, but I shall decline it."

"Don't," he whispers. "Accept—let them expect you—and fail to turn up. Come and meet me instead."

Eleanor trembles suddenly and grows pale. She feels herself face to face with temptation.

"No," she replies faintly. "But I shall be in, and if you call——"

"If! there is no 'if' in the matter. I would come every day if you let me."

"Every day!" Oh! how alluring it sounds.

She twists her wedding ring round and round, looking down on the carpet. She remembers the pattern that night in her dreams, a red Maltese cross on a blue ground. The blue and red swim before her eyes now like the colours in a kaleidoscope. A solitary tear rises in her left eye and falls on the blotter.

"If only I might do as I like!" she murmurs.

"'Might' is a word you could blot from your vocabulary. Why not?"

"Oh! don't—don't—don't," as he lays his hand on hers, and the touch thrills her with bewildering emotion.

"Where is Giddy? Oh! Giddy, take me home, it is nearly half-past five, and Philip will be back."

Mrs. Mounteagle raises her eyebrows at Eleanor's agitated tones.

Digitized by Google

"You told me he would be late this evening."

"Did I?" easing on her gloves.

Carol is standing behind with her cloak. His hands linger a moment as they fall on her shoulder, and he turns up the warm fur collar about her ears.

"My mite of a brougham only holds two," says Giddy, "and Bertie is coming with me, so I dare say Mr. Quinton will see you home in a hansom."

The suggestion amazes Eleanor. Really Giddy has the most delightful ideas, and as to Philip's prejudices—well her thoughts on this subject are better not divulged.

One moment she is a panic-stricken girl, afraid at the very word "flirtation," the next, inconsistent, susceptible, a slave to Giddy's whims, easily led, easily beguiled.

She can hear her heart beating, as Carol helps her into the hansom. It is dark already, dark as the unknown future, while they whirl away in the gloom.

"It is cold," says Eleanor.

He wraps her furs closer round her.

"Cold?" with a tender glance.

There is a volume in the word.

* * * *

Philip in the meanwhile is having tea with his cousin, Erminie Henderson.

She is a thoroughly staunch woman, with the warmest of hearts, sociable, bright, reliable, always ready with a helping hand where help is needed, yet human enough to err occasionally. Philip has known her from a child, has seen her weaknesses and excellences. The former overrule the latter. She is fond of him in a cousinly spirit, and delighted at his visit.

He . . . leans his head on his arms over the mantel-border.

For a long time they talk on ordinary subjects, till at last Erminie folds her arms, looks him searchingly up and down, and asks straight out:

"What's the matter, Phil?"

He starts, but returns her glance openly.

"To tell you the truth, I have come to confide in you—to ask you a favour."

"Good," replies Erminie, who has heard many a confidence in her day. "Go on."

"You know but little of my wife—she is young, quite a girl—very easily influenced."

His words come shortly. He breathes hard. "I would tell you what I could not say to any other creature. It is early days, and we have begun to quarrel. She has made great friends with a frivolous widow—a woman next door—whom I warned her against from the first.

"I have done all in my power to stop the intimacy, but protestations only appear to strengthen it. This woman has got Eleanor entirely under her thumb; she is like soft clay in her hands. I thought I could mould my wife, who was utterly uninformed, a little country farm girl. But Giddy Mounteagle has proved stronger, cleverer than I. Perhaps her method is easier to follow, perhaps I have misunderstood Eleanor from the first. Day by day she drifts farther from me, and yet if such a thing were possible, I love her more."

He rises and leans his head on his arms over the mantel-border.

"Help me, Erminie; you might do so much."

"How?"

"Come and stay with us—use your influence with Eleanor."

Miss Henderson seems confused.

"I should be delighted. I would do anything for you, but——"

Philip looks up quickly, his eyebrows rise involuntarily. He has never yet known a "but" from Erminie's lips, when asking her aid.

"The 'buts' of this world are its stumbling blocks."

"I am going to be married very shortly, I am in the midst of 'trosseauing.'"

"Ah! I had forgotten," he replies, smothering his disappointment.

Erminie makes a resolve.

"I'll come, Phil," she says, holding out her hand.

"But it will be so inconvenient!"

"Never mind. I shall interest Eleanor in my things, and try to win her from the widow. Erminie Henderson versus Giddy Mounteagle. What is the betting, Phil?"

He grasps her hands, and wrings them heartily.

"You are the best little woman that ever lived!" he says. "You shall not be isolated from Nelson's society, for we will ask him, too. I suppose he can come?"

"What do you think?" cried Erminie, laughing.

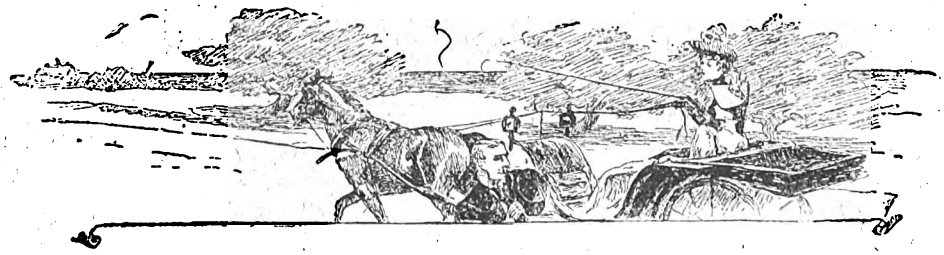
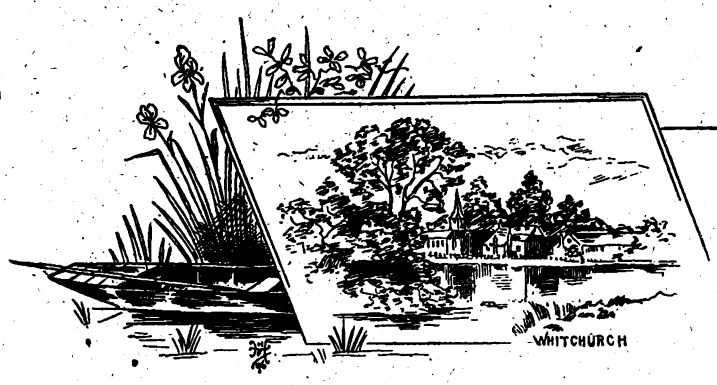
(To be continued.)



Digitized by Google



A POINT OF HONOUR.

"EVERYTHING'S settled," said Clavignac cheerfully, entering the café where Fougeret, surrounded by the usual group of journalists and professional men who frequented the place, awaited his return, "pistols, twenty paces, firing to go on till a result is reached."

"Good!" said Fougeret calmly, "and the rendezvous?"

"Vezinet racecourse, ten a.m. Then on to Asnières. Order me a carriage for eight o'clock and be sure to have the same driver. He'll bring us luck."

"As you say."

"And do not forget the doctor. The pistols I'll attend to; I have a brand-new set and it's a fine chance to try them."

"I leave all to you."

And with a warm hand-clasp to Clavignac, Fougeret turned, nodded a hasty adieu to the rest of his friends, and left the room.

"A cool head, that Fougeret," admiringly remarked the sporting editor of a morning daily.

"Deuced cool!" came in a chorus from the group of men behind, as if, in some way, their comrade's courage reflected credit upon them.

"He ought to be cool, too," declared Clavignac, pouring himself out a glass of absinthe. "Fougeret is not a chicken at this business; his fourth affair, if I count right."

"So it is," responded the journalist respectfully. "He shall head the line in my forthcoming series of the noted duellists of Paris."

Meanwhile Fougeret had passed into the street. At the door of the café he had paused a moment as if to reflect; then, with a decided gesture, he started down the boulevard at a rapid rate. Presently he halted before the window of a big book shop filled with placards and gaily-bound volumes. Prominently displayed in the front row were a dozen or so dainty little pamphlets neatly stamped on the back: "Contes Roses, Armand Fougeret, Third Edition."

He opened the door, entered and passing between the long files of book-laden cases demanded of a clerk:

"M. Lavine—is he in?"

"In the office alone, sir."

Fougeret turned to the right and tapped at the door.

"Come in," responded a voice beyond.

Fougeret obeyed. The publisher, a man as young as himself nearly, with blonde beard and lively eyes, met him cheerfully.

"Come in, come in," said he, "glad to see you, too; 'Contes Roses' going splendidly. You saw them in the window. Third edition already. But what can I do for you to-day?"

"Can't you guess?" replied Fougeret, smiling in turn.

"Money? The deuce!" cried the publisher, his brow clouding visibly; "always money. You have already drawn in advance it seems to me."

"True, but I go out to-morrow, and it is necessary——"

"A duel!" broke in the other, "with St. Landry, of course, for his article on 'Contes Roses.' You are right, my friend, entirely right. The critique was in bad taste, and has affected our sales. Now, a duel as an offset will be an excellent advertisement, and, better still, will cost us nothing. Every paper in Paris will have the affair in full, and in giving the cause of the quarrel, will speak of the book. A capital, admirable idea. Ten louis will be enough?"

"Amply sufficient."

"There they are, then," said the publisher, piling ten pieces of gold before the author, while the clerk drew up a receipt.

"A thousand thanks," Fougeret answered as he gathered up the money.

"Not at all, not at all," said the other, carefully shutting the receipt in his desk. "Always ready to oblige you. I count on seeing you at the Varieties to-morrow night."

Fougeret took the hand extended to him and went out.

It was now five o'clock, and Fougeret took his way to the Madeleine, briskly keeping step to a lively opera air that he whistled between his teeth, till he reached the throng of public vehicles that crowd the streets of that quarter. Bearing in mind his friend's injunction touching the choice of a driver, he hunted up the wheeled mascot, instructed him to call for Clavignac at eight sharp the next morning, and then turned his steps towards the Saint Lazare station.

These preparatory details did not seem to disturb him at all; he knew them all. Every affair was the same, and as he walked along he ran over in his mind the duels that he had already been engaged in. The first was seven years back, at Savigny-sur-Orze, where he had made his journalistic début on a local paper. A follower of the Noirville candidacy, he had found himself arrayed in fierce opposition to the Legitimist organ in a controversy that wound up in the field. He was wounded, but Noirville was elected by a large majority.

The second occurred from a Bourse transaction, where he figured as Noirville's secretary, a connection that involved him in a dispute with a jealous colleague, who sought a quarrel and found a sword thrust. The third was not very long after the second, and close on its heels came the ruin of his patron, Noirville, whose speculations terminated in a sudden collapse. With the great banker's fall went all the secretary's prospects, and Fougeret's little savings were also swallowed up in the general whirlpool.

Digitized by Google

Despondent at first, Fougeret rallied quickly, and sturdily set to work to recover lost ground. He had others to think of besides himself—his brave little wife, whom he had married in days of prosperity, and who had clung to him closer than ever in the hour of misfortune. The thought of her and his two little children stimulated his efforts and strengthened him in the struggle for existence.

Through his connection with Noirville, Fougeret knew a number of journalists, and through the kindness of one of them the doors of a review were opened to the young writer, whose contributions were received with marked approval by the literary world. His first novel achieved a brilliant success, and the comedy taken from it met an enthusiastic reception on its first performance at the "Odeon."

From that time on, his success was assured, and he, in consequence, began to acquire enemies. The present collection of some of his articles into a volume entitled "Contes Roses," had drawn from the pen of the cavilling St. Landry a critique so scathing, bitter, and unjust, that Fougeret, acting on his friends' advice, had sent his seconds to his jealous colleague.

And to-morrow he would be on the field as calm and careless as ever. What greater satisfaction could be given him? thought Fougeret, as he halted before his modest house and turned the key in the door.

"At last, Armand," said a soft voice coming from the kitchen; "I am so glad. Wait in the dining-room; dinner is ready."

He entered the room. The table was set with four plates, and looked so tempting and inviting that the young man gave a contented sigh. Then the door of the kitchen opened, revealing a dainty little woman, a trifle pale, with very blue eyes and very blonde hair, bearing a smoking tureen, followed by a four-year-old baby, who solemnly brought up the rear with the ladle.

"But how is this?" Armand inquired, seating himself and unrolling his napkin, after tenderly kissing his wife and children, "you are waiting on the table? Where is Rose?"

"Rose," replied the little woman, with a shade of embarrassment. "Rose is gone. I sent her away."

"Sent her away?" said Armand, surprised. "And why?"

"She was dishonest," responded Claudine. "I could not keep her. I paid her a week in advance and dismissed her. You owe your dinner to Georget and me."

"Yes," said Georget gravely, "it was us. Don't you like the soup, papa?"

"Delicious!" declared Armand; "you are famous cooks. But," dropping his voice a little, "where did you get the money, Claudine, to pay her?"

"I used what you gave me this week for the house. I knew that since your new book was nearly completed you could go to your publisher to-morrow morning and ask an advance."

Armand trembled.

"So you see," continued his wife, "we can get along nicely. I would rather wait, of course, till the novel is finished, but I do not think I am strong enough to go without eating till then. I have the will, but not the power, you know."

"And the money you shall have," broke in Armand hastily, "you will tire yourself out. I will have it—I will take it—two, or even three hundred francs, if you desire."

"That will be better," Claudine assented with a charming air of content, "because then I shall not have to part with my little piano. I did not intend you to know, but I found it a superfluous article of luxury, and they were coming to-morrow to take it away. Three hundred francs will get a nurse for the little one and many needed things besides."

"I see," said Armand with a sad smile, "that the money will not last long."

"But in three weeks' time your book will be finished and we shall be rich again. Then I can have a new dress. This has been made over so many times that there is scarcely enough left to hold the threads together."

"Yes," replied Armand, gazing consciously at the little threadbare gown, "I know—I know."

"And you need some new clothes, too, my dear; and a new dress for Georget. Why, we will spend at least fifteen hundred francs, my dear."

"Fifteen hundred francs," repeated Armand thoughtfully.

"Fully fifteen hundred. A tremendous sum for us at present, dear, but your novel will bring us at least three thousand, and to think that twenty days will see it finished!"

"Twenty days," echoed Armand, speaking like an automaton.

"Ah, how happy we shall be!" Claudine went on, her eyes sparkling at the prospect of the pleasure she saw in advance. "We can pass the summer at the seaside; Georget can have a little red cap, and we'll all enjoy ourselves as we did four years ago, when we were rich. How it all comes back to me, and with it all the other pleasures that I owe you. Kiss me, dearest!" and the loving little woman threw her arms about her husband's neck, who embraced her tenderly.

"But really," said Claudine, when she had disengaged herself from Armand's arms, "it is nine o'clock already. I must put baby to bed, lock up the house and see you settled at work before I go. Come!"

And taking the lamp she preceded her husband into the little library that adjoined the bedroom.

"There," said she, raising her lips for a parting kiss, "now work fast, get through, and remember that our happiness depends on these pages."

Left alone, Armand seized his pen but found it impossible to write a single line. Other thoughts which refused to be banished occupied his mind. His head on his hand, and staring vacantly into space, he remained in one position for two hours.

Presently a light tap sounded on the door.

"Armand," murmured the soft voice, "I am going to bed. Baby's asleep and everything's locked up safe and secure. Don't work too late—you should not weary yourself, deary."

The words recalled him to himself. He looked at the paper. It was blank.

"Come," muttered he, "this won't do. I must get to work!" and resolutely beginning he wrote on and on with feverish haste, filling five or six pages without raising his head. Suddenly he stopped. He had just written the words placed by himself in the mouth of one of his characters: "So be it; if a duel you are seeking a duel you shall have."

"A duel!" he cried, "why, I am going to fight a duel myself!"

Digitized by Google

And a vision of the morrow passed swiftly before his eyes—the open clearing, the group of seconds, two men dressed in black facing each other, pistols pointing at the grass awaiting the signal, while the sunbeams sifted through the trees and the birds sang joyously. But the scene changed suddenly. It was a man he saw now, pale and with closed eyes, lying on a litter, while one of the carriers stood knocking at a door—his door, as he recognised instantly. The woman who ran to meet the cortège—the trembling creature who, with a terrible cry, threw herself upon the body—he recognised her, too. It was Claudine!

Armand rose hastily and rapidly paced the room. The thing was true. To-morrow he was to fight. To-morrow, pistol in hand, he would be risking his own life to take another's.

His life! Great God! did it belong to him? Had he the right to dispose of it? Did he not owe it, as much as he owed money, to those who depended upon him? Were he dead, what would become of his wife and children, thrown helplessly on the mercy of his terrible creditors? He had no means. There wasn't as much as a hundred-franc note in the house. His sole dependence was his pen, his brain, and his talent. Where would they be to-morrow?

And his little wife, so frail, so delicate, what was in store for her? The hospital. And after that? His children, too. Georget, so bright, so happy, so intelligent; his little girl, his merry darling, what would become of her?

Fougeret continued to nervously pace up and down. The veins in his temple throbbed to bursting. He moistened a towel and bound it about his head. The cold water helped to cool his burning brain. Now he saw it all clearer. He had exaggerated the situation. A duel was not necessarily fatal. Had he not fought three already, and was not he still alive on the verge of a fourth?

Yes; but then he was alone in the world. His life was his own; he had a right to dispose of it as he pleased. He had no wife to leave behind, no children to leave fatherless, penniless, and helpless. And as these thoughts began again to whirl through his brain, he fancied that he could see the shining barrel of the pistol, with the little, round, dark hole aimed directly between his eyes.

He tried to shake off the feeling, to think of other things. It refused to vanish. He was responsible for those he loved. They lived through him, and they would perish without him. The ball that struck him would take more than one life. There would be three other victims, three to whom he owed love, happiness, and bread. Great God! How terrible it all was!

But another thought, equally cruel, tortured his soul—his honour.

He knew his comrades and the scoffing strollers of the boulevards. He heard their comments and their pitiless mockery. What were they saying? "A coward!" No! Impossible. Some of his comrades would surely defend him. Men were good at heart. Some one would be found that could understand.

"Armand," cried an anxious voice from an adjoining room, "is anything the matter, dear? You have been talking to yourself so loudly, so strangely, for more than an hour. Are you ill, dear?"

"No, no, little one!" returned he, going to the door. "No, do not worry. I—I am working."

"Dear, good boy!" murmured Claudine with a smile. Then, as the lids fell heavily over the sleepy eyes, she added softly, drowsily:

"Just think, Armand, what would become of us—if you were—to be ill—the babies and me. Good-night, dear."

And the loving wife resumed her interrupted dream.

At the other end of the room, tucked in her little crib, smiling and peaceful, her little hands clasped across her bosom, little Georget slept tranquilly.

A sudden storm of tears met Armand's cheeks. He rushed to his desk, caught up a sheet of paper, and wrote furiously.

* * * * *

At half-past ten next morning a man irreproachably clad in black stood on the Vezinet field holding out a letter with agitated air to another individual equally anxious and no less solemn.

"Is it possible?" cried the first.

"Simply incredible!" responded the second.

"He forgets himself and reflects upon us."

"Which shall not happen," cried both in a breath.

And with a grave air and measured steps the two men advanced towards the opposing group, who were viewing these proceedings with a puzzled air.

"Messieurs," said one of the two, speaking clearly in the midst of a general silence, "we regret to announce that our principal and former friend, M. Armand Fougeret, will not be on the field to-day. He declines to fight. It is needless to add," continued he, replacing the hat on his head with a sweeping gesture, "that we are entirely at your service—in M. Fougeret's place."

Le Vier.

Digitized by Google

In the summer of 18— I was living in the city of New York, and occupied the position of foreign editor on one of the leading journals.

A journalist who does his work thoroughly has little time for amusement, and, after a while, even loses his taste for it. I had one relaxation only, but that was a great one—music. I was passionately devoted to opera—never missed a first night, and on one of those occasions began the singular series of events related in this brief narrative.

I was seated in the stalls waiting for the rising of the curtain, when I observed two persons enter one of the proscenium boxes—a middle-aged man and a young lady. I was certain I had seen the former somewhere. He was low of stature, had a commanding forehead, and wore a heavily-matted beard, already grizzled, which descended nearly to his breast. The young lady was a beautiful blonde, but her face was entirely unfamiliar to me, while I had certainly met her escort before. Where had I seen him?

I was still looking curiously at the pair when a third person entered the box, and I recognised a well-known officer of the detective force. He approached the young lady's escort, leaned forward, and said a few words to him. His head turned quickly and I could see his eyes flash, but he rose and accompanied the officer to the rear of the box, where they remained some moments in conversation. He then returned, said something to the young lady, and they disappeared from the box.

The whole affair was perfectly plain. The stranger had been arrested, but so quietly that it had attracted no attention and after speculating idly upon this rather singular incident, I dismissed it from my mind as of no personal interest to me.

I returned from the opera about midnight, and was about to begin my night's work, when a messenger brought me a note. It was dated from a well-known hotel on Fifth Avenue, and contained these words:

Dear Friend Hartley,—I am sorry to inconvenience you at so late an hour, but I need a friend to vouch for my character, and found your name in the directory. Your police have arrested me for theft, and my daughter is much disturbed.

Your Friend,

Magnus (of Switzerland).

Magnus of Switzerland! So the stranger was my old travelling companion in the Oberland—Dr. Magnus. He was much changed, but I certainly ought to have known him. I had made his acquaintance about ten years before in the Alps, where he was exploring the glaciers, and from the first he had impressed me as a remarkable person. I knew little of him. From chance speeches I supposed him to be a native of Saxony; that he had graduated as a Doctor of something at Gottingen, and had lived in France and England, as he spoke both languages almost without accent. Long association had produced a warm friendship between us, but when I had parted with him I had never expected to see him again, and now here he was in New York indicted on a charge of felony.

A cab was waiting at the door, and I was driven to the hotel, where I found Dr. Magnus in a private room, with the police officer seated opposite him.

He rose, and we exchanged a warm grasp of the hand.

"My dear Magnus," I exclaimed, laughing, "what brought you to the States, and what on earth tempted you to commit a felony?"

A slow smile came to his face, and he replied, with his slight foreign accent:

"I confess appearances are against me. It seems a lady in this hotel has been robbed of some diamonds—she occupied the room next to my own—and, as I took some stones to a jeweller to be set yesterday, I am arrested as the criminal."

I was delighted to meet Dr. Magnus again, and felt in a jesting humour.

"You took diamonds to a jeweller to have them set? That is a suspicious circumstance," I said.

"It seems so," he replied. "I was not pleased with the styles shown me, and my friend, the jeweller, was offended, I think. He probably saw a notice of the robbery, and this has led to my arrest."

"Oh, but you have only to call on the lady to describe her diamonds, and then produce yours. I will remain with you, and in the morning we will clear up the whole affair."

As the police officer was a personal acquaintance of mine, matters were soon arranged. I gave him my word that Dr. Magnus would appear to answer the charges against him, and the officer then retired with a polite bow.

Digitized by Google

He had scarcely disappeared when Dr. Magnus rose and going to the door of the drawing-room, called:

"Frederica."

The door opened quickly, and the young lady whom I had seen with him at the opera came into the apartment. Her beauty, as I then got a good view of her, quite dazzled me. She was tall, apparently twenty, and had brown hair worn low on the forehead; large blue eyes, and an expression of such exquisite sweetness and modesty that it afterwards haunted me.

"My dear," said Dr. Magnus, "this is my friend Hartley whom I have spoken of so often. The friend of the father ought not to be a stranger to the daughter."

The young lady held out her hand with a shy smile, and then looked anxiously at her father.

"Don't fear, there will be no further trouble," said Dr. Magnus, in reply to the look, "and now, my dear, go and get some rest; all this excitement is bad for you."

An expression of relief came to her face, and, kissing her father on the forehead, she bowed to me, and returned to her chamber.

Dr. Magnus resumed his seat, and, without waiting for my questions, briefly explained his presence in the City. His wife, a native of England, had died soon after his visit to Switzerland, leaving an only daughter, and, as the child's health was delicate, he had taken her to Teneriffe for the benefit of the mild climate. It had proved, however, too enervating, and, hearing the air and mineral springs of Virginia recommended, he had come to America and taken up his residence in south-western Virginia, where his daughter's health had become completely restored. He was now returning after a summer excursion through Canada, by way of Niagara.

Upon my expressing a wish to see the diamonds, he produced the case, and showed me the jewels, which were in the form of octahedron, and quite dazzled me.

"These strike me as rather uncommon," I said.

"They are very uncommon."

"They are probably heirlooms, or did you purchase them?"

"Neither," said Dr. Magnus briefly. "I manufactured them myself. They are crystallized carbon, and they have stood every test as pure diamonds. They retain the shape of crystallization, as all diamonds would, if not subjected to attrition."

"And they are worth——"

"One hundred thousand pounds, I suppose," said Dr. Magnus, laying the case on the table.

"Well," I said, with a feeling of amazement, "your discovery is certainly wonderful."

"I have made others far more important—one especially, but I dislike to speak of it."

He turned his head quickly, and I could see his eyes flash.

"Dislike to speak of it?"

"It is extremely deadly, and perhaps it is my duty to bury it in my own breast. But men are certain to make bad use of it; but, after all, that is not my concern. The student's duty is to extend the limits of knowledge——"

A knock at the door interrupted the speaker, and the police officer came in, bowing and smiling. He had come, he said, to make Dr. Magnus an apology. The stolen diamonds had been found on the person of the lady's maid, and he returned expressing regrets.

As it was now daylight, I took my leave, promising to call again when my friend had taken some rest. When I returned, he had driven out, and I only saw him again for a moment as he was leaving the city.

"Come and see me," he said; "it would be a great pleasure. Stay—I will trace you a carte de la route."

And he wrote some words on a card.

"We can then return to the subject we were discussing when we were interrupted," he said.

"I will certainly make you a visit as soon as possible," I replied.

And exchanging a warm pressure of the hand with Dr. Magnus and the beautiful Frederica, I took leave of them.

* * * * *

These things took place in August. About the middle of September I was set down by the railway train at a little wayside station in one of the wildest parts of south-western Virginia.

I had come to make my promised visit to Dr. Magnus, and was impelled by two motives—love and curiosity.

Digitized by Google

To come to the point in a few words, I was very much in love with Frederica. I was thirty-three, and had never seriously loved a woman, and now what romance writers called my fate, had come in a single moment. The blue eyes haunted me, and the shy smile of the exquisite lips followed me everywhere. One of the most remarkable of all human events had occurred. A man had met a woman, passed a few moments with her, and she had become all the world to him.

He had grown taciturn and absent-minded.

I need not say that I had an additional motive for my visit—to ascertain the nature of that deadly discovery to which Dr. Magnus had alluded. Upon arriving at his house I saw Frederica waiting to receive me. She seemed a thousand times more beautiful than when I had seen her in New York, and held out her hand with the old, shy smile. It was only when she coloured slightly that I became aware of a simple circumstance—that I was looking at her in silence, and still held her hand.

Dr. Magnus, who had been away, returned in the evening, greeted me as cordially as I could wish, and then began the most delightful month of my life. The days passed like a dream. I hunted in the mountains, fished in the river, passed hours in my host's library—full of rare and curious volumes—and took long rides on horseback with Frederica. Of these rides I will not speak—the subject would carry me much too far. Let me come to another—a long interview which I held with Dr. Magnus, and what followed it.

I had seen little of my host since the first few days of my visit. He seemed to be absorbed in some mysterious occupation, and I had found it impossible to renew the conversation broken off in New York in reference to his great discovery. He had grown taciturn and absent-minded; regularly retired after breakfast to his laboratory, and, though he had conducted me to it at once on the day after my arrival, he had revealed none of its secrets to me. I saw only a large apartment filled with machinery, crucibles, retorts, and the usual appliances of an experimental chemist. He always kept the key of the room, which no one entered unless accompanied by him; but the reason of this precaution was unexplained to me, and I could only guess at it.

At last an ardent curiosity got the better of me and I said to him one morning:

"Do you remember what you spoke of in New York—your important discovery? You did not promise to tell me your secret, but, to be frank, I would like very much to hear about it."

He looked at me absently, and said:

"My discovery? Yes, I remember, and I am about to test it. Come to the laboratory to-night and we will speak of it."

* * * * *

At a late hour on the same night I was seated with Dr. Magnus in his laboratory. He seemed greatly depressed. The habitual expression of his face was one of philosophic calmness. Now something evidently troubled him, and he was ill at ease.

"You are unwell," I said: "you have lost all your cheerfulness at least. What is the matter, friend?"

He looked at me with a vague expression, hesitated, and then replied:

"I am not unwell. The trouble you notice is occasioned by a presentiment."

"A presentiment?"

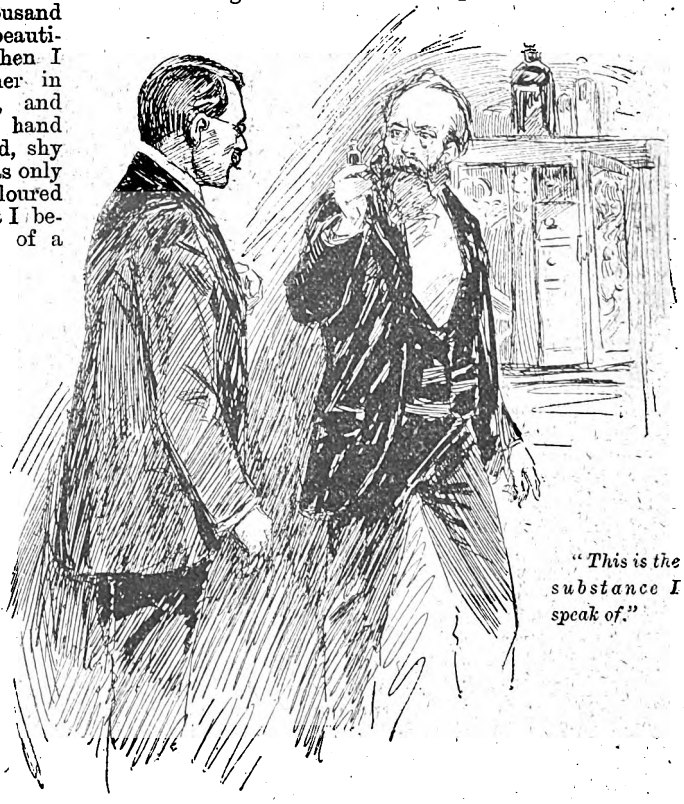
"What day of the month is it?" he asked.

"The 11th," I said with surprise.

"Well, the 13th of October will be a bad day for me."

"A bad day?"

"Something sinister will occur upon it."



"This is the substance I speak of."

Digitized by Google

I looked at him with the utmost astonishment.

"You are surprised?"

He spoke in the calmest tone, and was evidently convinced of what he said. What was I to reply? That he was a mere visionary? That seemed unnecessary, and I changed the conversation. I spoke of the discovery he alluded to when we conversed in New York.

"It is simple, as all wonderful things are," he said. "I have discovered—almost by accident—a combination of the simplest substances which produce an element of destruction of the most fearful character."

Doctor Magnus rose, went to the cabinet, and, opening the door with a key which he kept upon his person, brought back a vial containing less than an ounce of what appeared to be a white powder.

"This is the substance I speak of—no, it would be better not to intrust it to you, though, so far as I am aware, there would be no danger from the concussion if you were to let the vial fall. All the properties of the substance are not known to me, however."

"Then your discovery is an explosive."

"Yes—but one of such enormous power that all others are nothing in comparison with it."

And, hastily restoring the vial to the cabinet, he led the way out of the laboratory, up a flight of stairs to the observatory, on the summit of the house.

Dr. Magnus looked at his watch.

"In two minutes you will see something," he said.

"Something?"

"Do you remember that I was absent yesterday?"

"Yes."

"Well, I had ridden into the mountain and descended into a cavern yonder beneath that peak. In one minute the mountain will be torn to pieces."

As he spoke an immense column of flame rose from the summit of the mountain, and a roar like thunder rolled through the gorges.

"What does this mean?" I exclaimed.

"I mean that an ounce of white powder buried a thousand feet, and, connected with an electric clock, has lifted a million cubic yards of earth and granite."

He spoke quietly, but added suddenly in a low and awe-struck tone:

"Do you see?"

"See what?"

"The smoke! the smoke! It is like a girl kneeling and praying!"

I looked, and must say that what I saw excited my astonishment. The white smoke from the explosion has risen to an immense height, and has assumed the exact form of a girl upon her knees, looking up with clasped hands, and apparently praying.

"It is like Frederica," whispered Dr. Magnus.

* * * * *

The next day was the 12th of October, and I shall always remember it and the day that followed.

In company with Dr. Magnus I rode to the scene of explosion. The mountain was torn asunder from base to summit, and was an immense ruin. It was no longer possible to doubt the fearful character of his discovery.

An hour afterwards I was walking with Frederica.

We rode slowly back, and I recall the solemn and mournful tones of his voice.

"These terrible forces of Nature," he said, "profoundly sadden me, for I feel my insignificance. What is the poor pigmy man in presence of them? They sport with him."

"Your pigmy is the master, since he controls them," I replied.

"And the Providence you talk of is the master of both, I suppose," replied Dr. Magnus.

He spoke in a gloomy tone, and added:

"I have tried to believe in your Providence and cannot."

"And yet you believe in astrology—in signs in the heavens—why not in that behind them?"

"Signs in the heavens," he repeated in a low voice. "Did you observe that cloud of smoke last night."

"In the shape of a woman praying? Yes, and it certainly was remarkable."

"But the resemblance."

We looked at the end of the avenue leading to the house.

"Look," he said, touching my arm and speaking almost in a whisper.

I looked, and I confess I was startled. What I saw was the figure of Frederica, clad in a white dress, and kneeling on the grass. She had gathered some wild flowers, and as she knelt, holding up both hands and arranging the flowers, her figure exactly resembled the strange shape assumed by the smoke, to which Dr. Magnus had called my attention on the preceding night.

Digitized by Google

An hour afterwards I was walking with Frederica on the banks of the island, and this long interview changed the whole aspect of my life.

I knew what I had not dared to hope—that the beautiful girl returned my own affection; that she had seen how much I loved her, and had gradually come to love me in return: and at twilight, when we went back slowly, I held clasped in my own hand the hand of the woman who had promised that she would be my wife.

Frederica had made but one request—that I would defer my interview with her father. He was subject to fits of melancholy, and of late had been very much depressed. Would I please not speak to him of our engagement, at least not during the next day? She had a reason for this request which she would afterwards explain to me.

Her words had produced a singular impression on me. Did she share her father's belief that something would occur on the 13th of October? I dared not ask her, and simply said that I would obey her wishes.

I passed the evening with Frederica in the drawing-room, and she retired about eleven. I then went into the library, and found Dr. Magnus engaged in writing.

As I entered he turned his head, and I said:

"I am afraid I disturb you."

"Not at all; I am only writing my will," he replied.

"Your will?"

"To-morrow is the 13th of October, and, as something may happen, I am preparing for it."

With these words he went on writing, and I soon afterwards left him.

* * * * *

The morning of the 13th of October duly came, and I am obliged to confess, in spite of my profound incredulity, I experienced a vague emotion. There is something in earnest conviction which affects the most sceptical; and, though I felt that the apprehensions of Dr. Magnus were visionary, his words had left on me an indefinable impression of uneasiness.

It seemed absurd, however, to connect anything sinister with such a day. The sun had risen without a cloud, and all around was bright and cheerful. The sky was blue, and the robins were chirping; a light breeze laughed in the leaves.

Dr. Magnus retained his depression, though I could see that he made a resolute effort to conceal it from Frederica. In this he appeared to have succeeded. She was radiant, and after breakfast said that she had planned a little excursion. Would we accompany her?—she would promise to make herself agreeable.

"Let us wait," cried Frederica, throwing her arms round him.

I looked at her smiling face, and felt that under her gaiety there was some earnest purpose. What it was I was unable to divine, but I found it impossible to rid myself of the impression.

Dr. Magnus at first demurred to joining the proposed excursion — he would be occupied all the day, he said, in his laboratory. But Frederica renewed her entreaties—declared that the day was much too beautiful to be passed in the house—and the result was that he consented to accompany us.

An hour afterwards the carriage appeared; we entered, and crossed the ford; and then the driver, by direction of Frederica, proceeded due west towards the mountains.

I recall every trifle connected with this day, and especially the exhibition of nervous terror on the part of Dr. Magnus. In a man of his resolute character, his proceedings were unaccountable. He kept his eyes fixed upon Frederica, and seemed to find in every trifle something disquieting.

An hour's drive through a lovely country brought us to a point where the road ascended the mountain, and the carriage proceeded slowly up the steep acclivity. At last it entered a body of pines, emerging from them a few minutes afterwards, and I saw before me what took me suddenly back to Switzerland.

It was a little Swiss chalet perched upon a shoulder of the mountain and commanding a view of the entire country for many miles. A winding path led to the door, and we ascended it and entered the chalet. Here a new surprise awaited me.

The interior of the rough building was the picture of elegance. The cottage furniture was in exquisite taste, bright rugs lay on the polished floors, wicker chairs held out arms of welcome, and we were met by the smiling faces of the servants from the island, sent in advance by Frederica to prepare for our reception.

Digitized by Google

A few words explained this marvel. Dr. Magnus had purchased an estate on the slope of the mountain for grazing cattle, and built the chalet as a souvenir of his travels in Switzerland. He had intended it for his herdsman, but Frederica had taken a fancy to it, had proceeded to furnish it as a summer villa, and had ended by declaring that the air of the mountain was far better for her than the humid atmosphere of the island.

As the hours passed on, the laughter of Frederica gradually dissipated my impressions of the morning, and I think they would have disappeared but for a circumstance for which I could not account. Looking attentively at her, I became convinced that her gaiety was assumed. She was evidently acting a part, and seemed to be straining every nerve to retain her father at the châlet until night.

Dr. Magnus was gloomy and agitated. Sunset was near now, but the sun was obscured, and he could only tell the time by his watch, at which he repeatedly looked. A storm was coming, and if we proposed to return it was plainly time to do so. An immense black pall swept over the mountains, extending above the amphitheatre, and flashes of lightning, followed by sullen thunder, lit up the wild landscape.

What followed will never be effaced from my memory.

We were standing at the door of the châlet, watching the storm, which was sweeping eastward, when a small clock on the wall of the sitting-room struck the hour.

"The danger is over. Let us return," Dr. Magnus suddenly exclaimed.

"Oh, no, let us wait," cried Frederica, throwing her arms round him.

"But there is no one at the island."

"Oh, I beg of you."

And, falling upon her knees, Frederica sobbed and clasped her hands. For the second time I saw the resemblance to the figure in the smoke.

"The day has ended. There is no more danger," cried Dr. Magnus, clasping her in his arms.

"The clock is too fast," I heard Frederica whisper.

As she spoke a sudden glare reddened the sky, and the ground shook. A roar came from the direction of the island, and I saw what I shall never forget. A flash of lightning had struck the house—no doubt ignited the substance in the cabinet—and the great mansion resembled the crater of a raging volcano.

The 13th of October had had its sinister event after all, and the great discovery had wreaked its vengence on its author.

J. E. COOKE.

A LOVER'S LETTERS.

Translated from the Dutch of "Holda."

THERE lay the letters on the table in front of her—love letters, each of which had made her heart leap with joy when she had received it. Many times since that day when he had passed out of her life she had taken the packet out of the drawer, intending to read them through for the last time and then destroy them as she had destroyed or removed everything else which could remind her of her folly.

But each time her heart had failed her at the sight of the familiar handwriting, and, with scalding tears trickling down her cheeks, she had thrust the packet back into the drawer. Oh, the misery of it! Why had she trifled with the man she had loved? Had loved? Nay, the man she loved still, passionately, but who was lost to her for ever.

But she had done it at last; she had read them, in consecutive order, from date to signature. The first—how well she remembered it—written in a shaky hand, indicative of deep emotion, was a frank but timid declaration of love; the last, a bitterly formal letter of farewell.

The task was over; a task which had caused her the sharpest pain mingled with that strange sensation of pleasure which we all experience in recalling the past with its sorrows and joys. It only remained to destroy them and turn her back resolutely on all that had gone before. She gave one last look at the small heap of paper and then took it up in both hands and dropped it on the fire.

She watched the tongues of flame slowly wind round and among the paper, destroying for ever the words of love which a man had poured out from the depths of his soul. How slowly they burned! She took up the poker and stirred them, and as the flames leapt up it was as though a knife had pierced her heart. The sheets of paper crackled, and curled up like human beings in agony; and as she stared at them with fixed gaze, she could now and then see some loving word which he had written.

Oh, God! It was too hard to bear! Would they never burn? With a low laugh that had no sense in it, she again thrust the paper between the bars.

Up leapt the flames, swallowing the letters that had brought such joy to her and had been kissed again and again. She could not bear it. A cry of pain, a moan rather, such as makes one fear for the mental equilibrium of the being who utters it, came from her as she sank upon a chair.

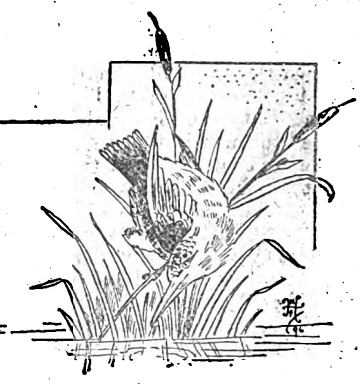
At last it was finished. She stood up, trembling, with a feeling at her heart as though she had crushed the life out of a human creature. As she turned, her eyes fell upon a charred piece of paper which had been jerked out of the grate when she had plunged the poker into the burning mass. Scarcely knowing what she did, she picked it up and read these words:

"My own darling."

She let it drop, pressed both hands to her heart, and fell to the ground unconscious.

Digitized by Google

THE BUNCH OF VIOLETS.



Above the din of conflicting voices, sharp, insistent—for the discussion between these men, perfunctory at first, had grown passionate and acrid—Ayessa's voice broke at last like a bell:

"You talk and talk—of love! How you talk of it! In every key, on every note; and yet not one of you—not one—knows what love is."

She lay, half-reclining, on the cushioned divan, like a Sultana among her slaves. And she was, as some Sultana, powerful. All the great city that year crouched at her feet. That arched gipsy foot of hers was on its neck.

Royalty sat in the great box, with the crimson and gold draperies, night upon night. Reared in a strolling player's tent—born no one knew where—perhaps in purple and fine linen—who might tell?—perhaps in rags—this breaker of wild horses, this bareback circus rider, wielded a might in this hour of her triumphs as ever jewelled sceptre did.

As a chorus of voices protested she rose, suddenly shaking off her languor, beginning to pace the floor, half-oblivious of them all, her long interlaced fingers quivering a little, her great eyes darting jets of sombre fire, an ironical smile just touching the curves of her disdainful lips.

"I speak what I know," she continued. "I speak the truth. How many of you here profess to love me? Profess to be consumed with passion so great that all the waters of the Polar Seas could not quench their flame?" Her glance swept faces blushing, and faces pale with emotion, and the smile on her lips deepened. "Who would answer?" she cried, "if I asked which of you all would be ready to die for me to-night?"

There were men of all ages in that room, men of all temperaments. Yet all answered "I." But the smile on the lips of the girl deepened the more.

Every man had answered but one. That one remained silent. But when the others had gone, he still lingered.

"And so, Decroix," said Ayessa, and her teeth gleamed like pearls in the ripe pomegranate bloom of her mouth, "you would not be ready to die for me to-night?"

When Decroix answered, his voice was hoarse and muffled, a dangerous look was in his eyes.

"Did you suppose I would join the chorus of all these fools and knaves? Do you count upon throwing me in with the mass of your adorers—the crowd that philanders about your footsteps day and night? I did not reply to your challenge—no! But if you ask me whether I would die for you to-night——"

The sentence broke unfinished between his teeth. He touched with trembling fingers the yellow-coloured rose languishing on her breast.

"Throw that into a pit of fire, and ask me to bring it up from the depths again!"

She took the rose from her breast and let it drop at her feet. She turned from him and laughed a little. She stood opposite a long mirror, and in it she saw a reflection of herself.

"See!" She crossed her arms and from under her lowered brows her great eyes fastened themselves on the reflected image. "That is what you love with so mad a passion. You, in one degree; all those other men in a hundred others. These eyes, these hands, these lips, this throat. This skin, because it is softer than that of some other woman; this hair, because it is longer, silkier, more abundant. Let us lose all this to-morrow, and where would your vaunted admiration be? Do you love the soul beneath all this?"

Her voice had changed to a new key. There had come a strange tremour to the full lips:

"Do you care for the immortal spirit that gives life, breath to all this clay, whose chance perfection so influences your imagination?" She broke into a shrill little laugh. "But perhaps you think that a gipsy circus rider, a girl who shows herself in silk tights every night on a bareback Arab horse can have no immortal soul?"

Decroix stood frowning, gazing at her half bewildered, gnawing his moustache.

"You try me far," he muttered. "If you were transformed, through some fatal blight, into a thing hideous—to-morrow—this very night—still I should love you!"

But Ayessa looked at him and smiled.

"No, you would not," she said softly. "You would not, my friend. You think so, perhaps. But you would not."

"I swear to you——"

But already his insistence had begun to gall upon her. She turned, with a faint line of fatigue on her lips, and murmured:

"Useless. All you could say would not change my conviction. It is instinctive, and instinct never leads astray."

Over the fire of the Eastern face a veil of thought had dropped that night. The eyes were shadowed, introspective. Scarcely a ripple softened the set, disdainful expression of the mouth under the wild plaudits of the great ring. And Ayessa rode as she had never ridden before—with a dash that was almost reckless, with an abandon that was almost desperate, with a well-nigh insolent disregard of consequences. The boxes rose at her. The plaudits turned into long shouts of mad approval. Such feats as no woman had ever performed before Ayessa performed that night, as in a half-conscious state, easily, carelessly, as a child tosses an iridescent soap-bubble into the air.

Digitized by Google

Panting a little she stood now in the sawdust pathway that led from the ring to her dressing-room. The black Arab horse had been led slowly past her by a supernumerary; another man followed, carrying the flowers, the baskets, the crowns.

"Ah, you Decroix?" said Ayessa indifferently, her glance resting on the young man who had made his way in. He stood near her dressing-room door, devouring her with his sullen eyes.

"You know that it is against the rules for you to be here?" she pursued, shrugging her shoulders. She was about to pass him without another word. But her glance beyond him had discerned another face. A face pale, a little emaciated, with deep-set eyes, which she had seen many times before, but only recently had begun to observe.

This man did not belong to her train. He was a young poet and journalist, poor, struggling; an enthusiast aflame with those dreams that visit chosen souls in the first wildly sweet years of youth alone, with no fortune but his genius, such as he had, nothing to offer the beautiful gipsy, to Ayessa, the unknown Bohemian circus-rider, who reigned like a queen and wore jewels that would have ransomed a crown.

But now their eyes met, and Ayessa paused. In the young man's fingers drooped a little knot of purple violets.

"For me?" she said softly, and she extended her hand. The tips of those velvet fingers touched his for an instant, and a quiver ran like flame through his veins. His pale cheek grew a little paler, and Ayessa smiled. The crowns, the great clusters of rare exotics lay tossed in careless heaps, unglanced at, in her dressing-room, but when Ayessa came out into the sawdust ring again the little bunch of purple violets drooped against her heart.

Why had she placed it there? She could scarce herself have told, perhaps.

This man had never sought to approach her. He had always stood afar, on the outskirts of the retinue of men of fashion that surrounded her. Only a swift, intenser pallor where her glance had intercepted his had told his secret. Or had there been no secret to tell?

Breathless the row upon row of intent faces watched the last feats of the bareback rider for that night. The most wonderful had been reserved for that moment. And Ayessa rode again as she had ridden all that evening—as if half-unconscious of herself, of the hundreds of spectators, the almost superhuman difficulty, involving intense physical fatigue in every movement. Even the black Arab horse appeared, magnetically, to have caught some of this spirit. The people rose in their seats and cheered wildly. Then through the cheers there broke suddenly the frightened cry of a woman.

How had it happened? No one exactly knew. A hair's-breadth swerving of the horse, an infinitesimal deviation on the part of the rider, an instant's loss of balance, and Ayessa lay prone in the sawdust. It was all over in a moment. They gathered up the unconscious form. The Arab horse had stopped, quivering in every limb. They bore Ayessa swiftly out of sight, and six Japanese trapeze performers hurried in to take her place.

The evening's programme went on to its close. The excitement in the audience subsided. The idol of the hour was not forgotten; but there was a belief that she could have sustained no serious injury. A slight shock, a few moments of unconsciousness, and to-morrow night she would delight their eyes again as before.

But those who left the great building by the players' exit an hour later knew otherwise; knew that never again would Ayessa hold hundreds of eyes spellbound upon her every motion; that never again would she be the power, the fever, the queen that she had been. In a moment, in the drawing of a breath, she had been hurled from the highest pinnacle of her triumph into the shadows of a blasted life.

"For," said one of her obscurer companions of the ring as she hurried home with her lover, a juggler with knives, "what'll Ayessa ever be good for now, with one arm broken and one ankle so shattered that both those doctors they called in said she must have a limp for life. Beside, that cut across her cheek from the horse's hoof will leave a scar that'll disfigure her till the day of her death. So good-bye to all this famous beauty!" And the girl laughed a little.

She was not more ill-natured than many another of her kind. But she had some share of comeliness herself, and where Ayessa was no other beauty had ever been remarked.

* * * * *

On the outskirts of the great city stand some scattered rows of white cottages framed in verdure. No echoes from the clamour of the paved streets reaches this retreat. The restless fever of the city's life dies out in quietude.

From out of the door of one of these cottages a young man has just come, walking slowly with head sunk a little, gnawing his moustache, so lost in thought that he passes without seeing or recognising him, another man just about to enter. But the latter has both seen and recognised Decroix.

A moment later he stands in the darkened room, where, on a low lounge, lies Ayessa.

"Decroix has just been here."

Ayessa slowly raises her eyes, and through the gloom, his own eyes becoming accustomed to the muffled light after the glare of outside, the new-comer sees her smile.

"Yes. He thought he really loved me, poor fellow—loved me in spite of all the accounts of my disfigurement. But I knew better. And when he insisted on coming here I raised the curtain from that window. Then he realised the change. I am not a monster, after all, but I am no longer the beautiful Ayessa! And Decroix—Decroix, after a few stammered phrases—left me."

She speaks calmly, softly, still with the inscrutable smile on her lips.

But the man before her watches her with unwavering eyes. He is very pale. Suddenly he takes his hand from his breast. In his fingers is a little bunch of violets.

"Once before I offered you violets and you wore them on your heart. Will you take these now, and with them my life?"

Slowly her hand is outstretched for the odorous blossoms. Her steady glance questions his. He slowly bends his knee.

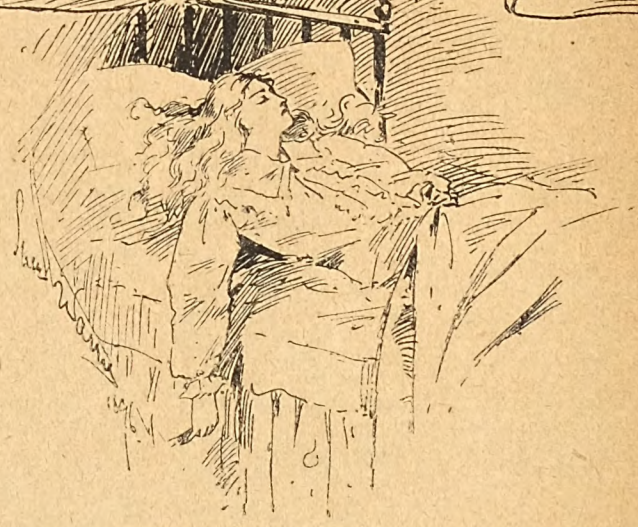
"Whatever other men have done, I have loved you!" he says.

She looks an instant into his impassioned poet's eyes.

"I know it. I think I knew it from the first," she softly murmurs in reply. F. R. Rogers.

Digitized by Google

WAS IT FATAL?



I was on a visit for a few days to a married schoolmate. This, my first evening there, was stiflingly hot and I slipped out for a breath of air, leaving my friend busy with some housewifely duty.

I went as far as the gate and leant over it, musing on the difference between her life, so full of loving interests, and my, as yet, solitary one. As I meditated, half enviously, a flash of lightning, harbinger of the much needed shower, brightened the road before me and illumined the path, dark with overhanging trees, on the opposite side. It disclosed to my view the slouching form of a man slowly moving along and with his face turned directly towards me. I shivered slightly with fear—yes, it was fear, though I was ashamed of it a moment afterwards. A man returning from work, I thought; and yet, why did he not look straight ahead instead of towards this house, unless he was attracted by the cheerfully lighted windows?

I felt strangely uneasy and peered into the darkness, vainly endeavouring to see if he were still there. No more friendly flashes came, and as the rain began to patter down, I was fain to return unsatisfied to the house.

Why was I suspicious?

I did not know. It was not that the man's face frightened me, for the glimpse had been so momentary that if the countenance were evil, or that of the most benign philanthropist, I could not tell.

I wanted to ask my friend if there had been any burglaries in the village of late; but I feared to needlessly alarm her, and so refrained from mentioning the incident; but while I conversed on ordinary topics, the form of that man persistently recurred to my mental vision.

I did so far forget my intention as to say to Mr. Adams, my friend's husband: "Have you any firearms in the house?" To which he replied that he always kept a revolver under his pillow. "A very excellent precaution," I exclaimed with relief. And the matter dropped; but afterwards the thought came to my mind that while the revolver might be a good means of defence to him and his wife upstairs, it would scarcely benefit me, who slept in the little spare room downstairs.

The windows of this room, I tremblingly remembered, were easily accessible from the piazza which extended round that side of the house, and the fastenings on the shutters and sashes were very frail little arrangements.

I did not believe in presentiments, but wondered how and why this burglar question, a thing which had never troubled me before, should haunt me so.

Still pondering the matter, I followed my friend into the kitchen, where she wanted to get a pitcher of water. On the table lay a knife that had been worn and ground away till the top was a sharp point. She often used it for peeling vegetables, and that it had a keen edge I knew, for I had helped her that day.

As she turned for the water I quickly picked up the knife, and slipped it up my sleeve, urged to do so by the instinct of self-defence, not of any kleptomaniacal tendencies.

I flushed guiltily when my friend faced me, for I was unaccustomed to any underhand or undersleeve movements, and fancied she must know I had done something sly. However, she did not suspect anything, and a few minutes after went as far as the door of my room with me, kissed me good-night and retired.

Under my pillow I slipped the knife I meant should act as my protector. Then, smiling at my cowardice, I dismissed the subject from my mind, leisurely undressed, and was soon fast asleep.

How long I slept I do not know, but a ray of light fell across my eyelids, and in an instant I was wide awake. I did not move a muscle, but all my previous fears rushed across me.

The light from a burglar's lantern, reasoned my fright. A faint flash of lightning, whispered my cooler sense. Nervously alert, I listened. A slight rustling and rattling fell on my ear. Someone was at the window near the head of my bed, of that I was certain. Without moving my head, I turned my eyes round till I got a view of the window, then saw, with horror, that it was being slowly raised. By some diabolical means, the fellow must have broken or loosened the fastenings.

Digitized by Google

I was frozen with terror. In a few seconds the opening would be wide enough to admit the ruffian. I dare not scream; for before help could come, even supposing that my cry should awaken those above me, the brute would have time to silence me, perhaps for ever.

Then I remembered the knife. A ray of hope filled my terrified heart.

I slipped my hand, oh, so stealthily and silently under my pillow, at the same time trying to maintain a regular breathing to indicate slumber.

Never did soldier clap his hand on his faithful sword with more implicit trust than I did the little bone handle of my humble blade.

None too soon did I grasp the weapon, for now appeared a big head covered with a thick shock of dark hair. Two glaring eyes rolled fiercely round. I closed my eyes a moment in terror, and remained rigid. Then I opened them slightly, and saw that, with his head and shoulders in the room, the man was leaning over the window-sill, and placing something—perhaps his lantern or tools—on the floor.

Now was my opportunity—my only one. The back of his neck gleamed bare before me. I set my teeth. Swift and silent as a panther about to spring, I rose to my knees, raised the knife above me, then—oh, horrible! —dashed it down with all the fierce, mad strength that possessed me, straight at that broad, bare nape.

It sunk in soft flesh a moment, then struck something hard. Oh, missed! A living human bone, I thought, as the blade swerved aside and sunk deeper. Then deadly terror, and a burning desire to undo my murderous act filled my soul. I tried to drag the knife from its bed of living flesh.

It snapped off, and with the handle still in my grasp, I fell back on the bed.

When next I opened my eyes, the bright sunlight was streaming in at the window, and the joyous twittering of birds fell upon my ear. I smiled at the sound, then shuddered as the memory of something flashed across me. What a dreadful dream, I thought, then sat up and rubbed my eyes.

Alas! no dream. Red drops of blood, now dry, dyed my hands and the sleeves of my nightgown. The handle of the broken knife lay on the counterpane, where it must have dropped from my hand as I fell back and lost consciousness.

Imagine the horrible amazement of my friends on hearing of my midnight encounter when they came to my room, for I was too weak to leave the bed that day. The grass without showed the footprints of two men. A trail of blood crimsoned the green for several yards, then ceased.

Mr. Adams placed the matter in the hands of the police, but no trace of the men has ever been found. I try to forget the deed; but at times in the night the thought haunts me—was it fatal? G. P. Willson.

RESULT OF THE - - - - - - Picture Puzzle Competition.

THE PICTURE PUZZLE COMPETITION, particulars of which were published in the issue of SHORT STORIES dated January 25, has been an eminently successful one. Many thousands of persons entered for it, but, unfortunately, we underrated our readers' ingenuity in this matter, and did not make the task sufficiently difficult, for, of those attempts received on the first day, no fewer than 160 were correct. In order that there may be no disappointment among the correct competitors, we have decided to divide the £10 among them, with the result that each person whose name appears in the subjoined list receives 1s. 3d. The addresses may be seen at this office by anyone who may so desire.

Mrs. Wickers, Charles Harwood, Walter R. Eiden, A. Page, jun., Arthur Grigg, E. Britton, Harry Smith, J. P. Fitzgerald, Mrs. H. C. Batchelor, J. E. Smith, E. A. G. Howard, F. J. Gill, John Ness, William E. Hurst, Charles E. Wacogne, Miss Mary Belliss, R. H. Sentance, William Hurt, Herbert H. Jennings, Frederick Travers, Albert Vigor, Sydney Warr, Frederick Provis, F. E. Rennison. F. W. Comrie, Thomas Logan, J. Selby, A. E. Taylor, Don MacGillivray, W. Nicholson, W. H. Braw, Mrs. Day, W. Hull, C. Young, E. Bierman, W. E. Tanner, C. Phillips, J. W. Lavender, F. Napoli, Miss M. Benson, W. Martin, C. Bearman, Louisa Bastin, Mrs. S. A. Howe, W. Hood, P. H. Orme, G. Baker, A. H. Huss, W. Martinnant, H. Williams, F. Jarvis, J. Lamberton, P. A. Watts, W. S. Parry, J. A. Thornton, N. De Courcy, T. Seddon, C. H. Godden, T. H. Smith, J. McGowan, E. R. Cartwright, T. Albion, J. W. Rayner, E. Holmes. P. C. A. Cotton, F. T. Vine, W. Andrews, H. Lacey, J. A. Bates, S. Roe, Frank Harcourt, H. F. Wootton, Mrs. C. Ward, Martha Johnson, F. Cookson, James O'Brien, Oscar J. Carlisle, W. J. Brown, J. A. Raven, Mrs. A. Beresford, W. H. Goodwin, Lilian Cooper, R. J. A. Bennett, E. E. Du Soir, E. Johnstone, W. G. Sanders, G. S. Syndercombe, J. Doman Turner, H. H. Parry, Mary Rex, A. J. Collick, W. Bennett, R. T. Wall, A. E. Roby, T. Draper, Miss K. Webster, A. Raynham, C. J. Wright, A. Ramell, W. T. Tigg, L. Wiles, G. Shore, W. Walter, Mrs. A. J. Clark, A. C. Crumpler, K. Nelson, F. C. Long, A. B. Du Soir, W. H. Clark, H. Wilson, G. A. Parker, O. E. G. Allsup, G. S. Riche s, jun., H. Picton, Mrs. Wilkinson, T. P. Hiorus, B. S. Barber, F. G. Callcott, E. A. Page, Mrs. Woollett, Leo Hicks, L. H. Good, A. Clegg, A. W. Boothby, W. F. M. Hunter, Mrs. Cartwright, Miss M. J. Bailden, Mrs. A. Edkins, F. H. Hemming, S. Frames, H. Willmott, R. P. Wall, B. Herring, G. J. Lodge, T. Dittmar, E. Stones, A. W. Rowe, C. J. H. Dunning, K. Black, A. Skeats, G. Waller, C. E. Oliver, A. Raymond, E. C. Webb, C. E. Ayland, R. Bathurst, J. Brawmuller, W. Wilmore, Mrs. Wesley, C. Morris, jun., H. J. Gable, Ethel F. Jach, J. H. Hack, S. N. Crowle, R.N., Mrs. A. F. Moncrieff, H. A. Molt, Miss Arch, T. H. Helsdon, E. Smith, A. Lowe, and L. Jezzi.

Next week we shall have something to say about Consolation Prizes.

Digitized by Google

The GIRL with the CAT EYES.

One day when the stage arrived at Big Flats a very handsome, well-dressed, athletic-looking young man alighted and took the trail for Shady Canyon. Turning the corner of a huge granite column, out of whose perpendicular-split centre grew a stunted pine, he stopped short and laughed outright at the kittenish antics of a small girl playing alone by the trail.

The girl stopped her play and stood before him with hands down and clasped, looking straight into his face, not boldly nor yet bashfully, but with a sort of wonderment of expression. She was a very small creature, and as to age, might have been anywhere from twelve to sixteen. Her hair, which was a peculiar yellow, was cut close to her head.

The young man started slightly when he met the full gaze of the strange, yellow eyes. "Cat eyes" was his first thought. A repelling fascination crept over him as the impression deepened in his mind that there was an indescribable feline expression all over the child. So swiftly do one's thoughts take shape, before he could bring his lips to form a question, the ridiculous idea had come and gone that should he turn away from the moveless stars of those curious yellow eyes, the small creature would spring upon his shoulders a ferociously wild cat.

"My little girl, can you tell me how far it is to Shady Canyon?"

She bobbed her head over one shoulder, thus indicating both distance and direction.

"See it?"

He flushed slightly at the nearness to the town, or maybe at the implication conveyed in the tone and the gesture.

"Nobody ever said that to me since he died."

"Said what?"

"My little girl."

"What is your name?"

"It's Cat Eyes since he died."

The creepy sensation again came over the young man when the child uttered the first thought which had come to him about her eyes. He conquered the feeling, and asked her very kindly: "How long has it been since he died?"

"It's been a hundred years, I think. Anything in that," nodding to the bag which he carried, "that'd get out?" Assured that there was not, she continued in her quiet, quaint way, "Then I'll carry it up to the house for you, 'cause you called me what he used to."

He let her take it, and followed her up the trail just to see how the adventure would end. To him anything that promised a new sensation would surely be followed. He was only twenty-four, but he had been born rich artistically, intellectually, physiologically, and financially, and had been adventurously prodigal with all these gifts. A few steps below the trail one of some boys who were picking gum from a burnt pine log said to his companions, purposely loud enough for the girl to hear: "By Jehoshephat, it's Cat Eyes a-towing a greenhorn up to Mrs. Squeers."

She put down the bag, and turned upon them in a fury of rage and shame, but they had vanished in a chorus of laughter. The girl could not have told why she was ashamed, but ashamed she was. Cat Eyes belonged to Shady Canyon, but not a child in the village would play with her. They said they were afraid of her cat eyes, and that sparks would fly from her yellow hair. One boy declared that he had only given her hair the least little touch, and that she had turned into an angry yellow cat and scratched his face.

Three years before, on a chilly Sunday afternoon, she had been left crouching on her father's grave. Each kind-hearted woman thought, of course, that some other kind-hearted woman would care for her. And so it happened that Mrs. Squeers, returning from a walk in the woods, took the sobbing child to her saloon and gambling resort. The child's father had squandered many a gold piece in her place, and, when the child clung to her in her desolation, a feeling of protection sprang up in her heart.

Mrs. Squeers was an educated woman with much graciousness of manner. So she was popular with the men. Cat Eyes, therefore, in spite of her environments, received some advantages of speech and polish from the woman.

Cat Eyes led the young man into Mrs. Squeers' place. Vernon Allinson, which was the young man's name, did not stay, as Cat Eyes had hoped, but went to the little hotel, whose creaking signboard seemed always lamenting a better time.

Allinson's stay at Shady Canyon lengthened into months. He took Cat Eyes on long rambles up steep heights where they had to use their hands to help them up. On these long rambles their talks were grave and quiet, and on many subjects. She learnt much from him, and was an eager though unobtrusive listener.

One evening she was called into the saloon to recite. She had a marvellous voice, and it amazed the crowd. Barty Nesman in his enthusiasm attempted to kiss her, when Vernon struck him a blow on the face. There would have been bloodshed had not Mrs. Squeers interfered. Barty vowed that he would have revenge. At the same time Allinson peremptorily told Mrs. Squeers to send Cat Eyes out of the place and never have her in the saloon again. Frightened and stupid with amazement, she was sent to her room and never again recited in the saloon. But from that hour she was a self-abnegated slave to Allinson and was afraid that Barty would take vengeance upon him.

Digitized by Google

One crisp, cold morning in the late autumn she stood among the fading flowers and yellow leaves in the garden, with an ache of intuition in her heart. She had changed much in a few months—no longer a child, not yet a woman. Presently Allinson called to her, as he had done on other mornings. A dull red, painful to see, darkened her face.

He carried the bag which he had brought to the place. Silently, entirely subdued, she walked beside him down the canyon, and though he tried his best he could not get a word from her.

Just beyond the great boulder where he first met her he said good-bye. He made a pretty speech and gave her advice. She only gazed at him with a helpless, vacant stare, which so irritated him that he dropped her hand and walked away.

"Stupid creature," he said to himself. "I've wasted a summer trying to put a soul into this odd creature." While she in the dead leaves where he had left her standing, dropped to the earth, shaking from head to foot with tearless sobs. She bit the dry leaves and scratched her face with her hands, and there in the afternoon of the day Mrs. Squeers found her.

* * * * *

It was seven years since Vernon Allinson left the little girl, Cat Eyes, standing in the mountain path. He had just returned to San Francisco, and stood shaking hands with an acquaintance, a young man, much younger in years than he had knowledge of years.

"How long have you been in the city?"

"Landed at ten this morning."

"Straight from Paris?"

"In a roundabout way, straight from Paris."

"Then you have not seen the Tigress?"

"Nor heard of it. What is it?"

"It? Ha, ha, ha! It's at Maguire's, and it has set the town crazy in three nights."

"A woman I see," said Vernon indifferently.

"A woman you do not see," said the other, "or you would not speak so indifferently. Oh, Vernon, such a woman! A glittering, dazzling creature, whose acting and face are indescribable and incomparable. You have never seen anything like her, I know."

"Hard hit you are, my boy—very hard hit. You forget that I have dined on the theatre beauty of Paris, London, and Madrid. Do you think I'll be captivated by an amateur in your primitive metropolis at the Golden Gate?"

"You may laugh at me, but you will not laugh after you have seen her."

"Then, by all the saints, take me to her at once."

They were comfortably seated. A storm of applause announced the appearance of the débutante. "A glittering, dazzling creature, incomparable and indescribable." He kept repeating the spirit of his friend's words, and from that moment his eyes never left her while she was in sight of them. "Tigress? Tigress? Why the Tigress?" he thought, then felt the appropriateness of the title.

Only a tigress with the freedom of the jungle in its limbs could have such a superb grace of movement and perfection of contour. And such eyes, what were they? They were mirrors of topaz reflecting the gaslight. And her hair, what a glorious crown it was! He thought it richer amber in the shadows, and spun sunshine when the lights fell upon it. And yet it was the impression rather than the appearance that made him repeat again and again: "Tigress, my beautiful Tigress," so quick are we to lay claim to what pleases us.

In the middle of the play he took the diamond pin from his cravat and the boutonnière from his coat, and thrust the improvished bouquet at her feet. She saw the gleam of light coming, and the hand which had thrown it, and flashed her wonderful eyes on his face. She picked up the boutonnière, pinned it carelessly to her breast, then made an interpolation in the part she was playing, and sang:

Oh, do you remember the well-beaten trail
That led from the camp to the spring?
And the potpies we had from the squir'l and quail,
And the evenings when we used to sing?
The shady old camp is all gone to decay,
The ham-bone has dropped from the pin,
The roof and the door have both rotted away,
And the chimney is all tumbled in.

The glorious voice rose untrammelled. The warm, rich notes filled and thrilled the place. The words of the old song, sung at so many camp-fires, seemed to float and linger over the heads of the people. A large part of the audience were Californians of the old days, and the familiar tune, with its memories, made many a grizzled face wet with tears.

Vernon did not applaud. She had sung at him for him. This was the girl he had thought stupid in the mountain path, shaded with pines, seven years ago. Cat Eyes had grown to the subtle grace and charm of the tigress. He had been blind—so blind. Who had made this change? A fierce jealousy took possession of him. What man had taken up this beautiful creature? Allinson forget that he had dropped her with a few words of cold advice

"Take me to the stage to see her," he said to his companion.

"Take you to the moon!" he replied.

"Why not to the stage?"

"Why not to the moon? One is as accessible as the other to you."

"Where does she live?" asked Allinson.

"What?" asked the friend.

"The Tigress. Who else?"

"Don't know. It is said she does not receive callers, except those on business."

"Well, I'll find out."

And he did. The next morning at an early hour he handed his card to the Chinaman who opened the door, with the request to take it to the lady of the house.

"No, sabe," said the Chinaman. Vernon pointed to the card, then to his hand, then into the house.

"No, sabe."

"Let me brighten your understanding." And he handed him a piece of money. "Heap no, sabe," but there was a sly twinkle in the Chinaman's eye. Just then a young woman came to the door and invited him in. With his pulses on fire he waited to see if she would come. Then there was a sliding of folding doors, the heavy curtains were pushed apart, and the Tigress, in all her royal, graceful loveliness, stepped into the room. Vernon rose eagerly to meet her. She held his card in one hand and extended the other and prosaically said: "Mr. Allinson, I am pleased to meet you."

Digitized by Google

This cold, beautiful woman, whose name he did not know, had evidently no prior knowledge of him.

"Cat Eyes, it is not fair." These were not the words he intended to say. It was what he called her in Shady Canyon. He said it now with so much of the plaintive and petulant in his tone that Cat Eyes laughed. And such a laugh! Clear as the ring of a silver bell. A musical ripple of merriment. Then she shook hands with him again. The ice was suddenly melted.

They sat down facing each other, their knees nearly touching, so close were they. They lived over that summer in Shady Canyon.

"And do you remember," he said, "that I made you a wreath of manzanita berries and crowned you queen, you, my little Cat Eyes—Miss——. What is your name? Strange that I should have known you so long and not know your real name."

"An evidence that you have been very, very much interested in me."

"Remember I stayed three months longer in Shady Canyon because you were there."

"I remember."

"Then pity my embarrassment. You have outgrown Cat Eyes. Your friends call you——"

"The Tigress."

"Tigress be it then. My Tigress, my precious, royal, dangerous, jungle Tigress. My arms shall be your cage." He leant forward to clasp her in his arms. There was something in the laughter of her shining topaz eyes that stopped him.

"There are forty-nine other cages with the same placard on them all, ahead of yours."

"But I love you," he said.

"Same announcement that the other forty-nine make," as she glanced at him.

"But you loved me a little bit, did you not?"

"Maybe, but that was seven years ago. They say one changes utterly in seven years. And if Cat Eyes loved you, the love has evaporated, and been shorn from her head, and clipped from her nails, and rubbed off on towels. It is the Tigress now."

"You are cruel. You know I loved you so, seven years ago."

"You must have loved me. How you must have loved me then."

The yellow topaz eyes were laughing, the mouth was still smiling, but the words were cutting and ended in a moan like that of a wounded wild beast. All the days of her joyous childhood were crowded into it. The nails of her hand, which rested on the arm of the sofa, dug into the velvet till her wrist was raised from the cushions and the knuckles of her fingers looked white because of the tenseness of her skin.

He got up and sat down beside her, and took her hands. "I love you passionately now. My love is an avalanche broken from every restraint. I love you, Miss Tigress."

"Perhaps Mrs. Tigress. I wonder you are not afraid to hold a tigress's paws; you might get scratched."

"You've scratched my heart into shreds already. What a fool!—oh, what a fool I was not to know seven years ago that you loved me!" he said.

"And what a fool not to know it now!" There was bitterness—nay, almost contempt—in her voice, but the words were all-satisfying. He caught her to his breast and kissed her, and kissed her eyelids and forehead, cold hands and pale cheeks, amber hair and her wrists, and her sleeves, and tremulous mouth. Her head sank on his shoulder, her beautiful arms clasped round him, and a torrent of tears burst from her eyes, the first she had ever shed.

RICHARD SIBERT.

Digitized by Google

The Story of a Shameful Crime.

CHAPTER XXVI.

Cancelled!

Mr. Detective Dean cashed the cheque that Richard Sheldon gave him the day succeeding that upon which he had apparently witnessed the death of Adrian Burgoyne or Robert Lane, convict 407.

So far excitement, the pursuit of a cherished object, had sustained him. For years, drawing a fair salary, he had dreamed of the day when a single "turn of luck," a substantial reward, would place him beyond want, and afford him the means of gratifying the one dominant ambition of his life—to become a landed proprietor.

Once the precious price of silence, honour, a wronged fellow-creature's innocence, reposed safely in his pocket, however, Mr. Detective Dean began to experience a sensation foreign to his nature for years.

He realised that the £2,000 was a bribe, hush-money practical black-mail. He comprehended that he was joining hands with a thorough scoundrel. He did not know all the details of the scheme of Richard Sheldon, but he could, without much difficulty, fit the disjointed pieces of the disordered enigma together, and form a pretty plausible theory that Sheldon was a scheming villain, and dead convict 407 his persecuted victim.

"He's dead—drowned, burned to a cinder," mused Dean. "All the vindication in the world would not help him now. I'm paid for my trouble. I've earned my reward—I'm going to enjoy it!"

But that was more easily said than done. In the rush and bustle of his active profession, hardened by daily contact with sordid, soulless criminals, Mr. Detective Dean had believed that emotion, sentiment, even conscience, were dead. Once out of the whirl, however, his mind began to prey upon itself. He was amazed to find his thoughts going back to the days when he sat at a loving mother's knee, and listened to the early precepts of wisdom and religion.

He began to see the face of the hunted convict in his dreams; he grew nervous, uneasy.

"You have failed in your duty—you have sold your soul for gold!" whispered regret.

"The man is dead. I could not prove his innocence, if I would," the worried heart cheated him into believing temporarily.

Somehow he did not feel right. What did his boasted record amount to? Shadowing a few law-breakers, dragging a dozen or two unfortunates to gaol! He could not recall a case where he had done a real bright, joy-giving deed. It was all gloomy justice, resentment, stern unwavering punishment. The record was all on the side of terror, gloom and darkness.

He began to evade his former associates. They regarded his sudden resignation from the force, his reported accession to a fortune left him by a favourite relative, suspiciously. He evaded them more than ever as he one day met Inspector Grey.

The latter was flushed, proud, buoyant, over the successful termination of a case, the first steps in which had been directed by Dean himself.

Persistent effort had resulted in the unmasking of a villain; the restoration to her family of a lovely girl; happiness, joy, justice—justice evolved from darkness, plotting and fraud. The papers rang with praises of Grey; the family he had reunited, idolised him. He had done a good deed, and, as a material benefit, a reward of £2,000 had been forced upon him.

With a bitter sigh at "the rare luck of other men," ex-Detective Dean left his jubilant friend, feeling the coward and craven more than ever.

"Bosh!" he ejaculated angrily, after a wretched, remorseful day. "Money is money—come easy, come hard, come rightfully, come wrongfully. I am not going to mope. The money was justly earned. I am not going to bother myself about a dead man's wrongs. It's the inactivity after active service that is preying upon my mind. Once I get at home among my pets, my beauties, the flowers, I'll feel all right; these dismal vagaries will cease to haunt me."

"All the same, you helped to drive convict 407 to his death!" rang out the disquieting voice of remorse.

Mr. Detective Dean purchased the rose garden in question—a pretty ten-acre plot, with a picturesque house, situated near Lynde, and within easy distance of the city.

A thrill of pride buoyed up his hopes and plans for the future, as he recorded the deed. Then he fell to wondering if that name, Berwyn Dean, would hold a place on the witness-book of eternity, when convict 407 summoned him before the last court of final inquiry, on the Day of Judgment; and he spent the rest of the day in wretched, sullen moping.

The garden was a beauty, its roses enough to set wild a less intense enthusiast. Ah! the fresh, crisp touch of the clear country air! the soft, intoxicating perfume of the velvet glories of pink and white!

Digitized by Google

Yet, somehow, those zephyrs seemed to blow across a charnel-house of guilt within him, and he felt as if his breath would blight the pretty flowers. The man was becoming morbid, depressed, haunted.

He fought the grim phantoms his sensitive mind evoked with every subterfuge and system of fallacious reasoning he could conjure; but vainly. He had an inherent love of Nature, but that pure devotion to flowers could not exist, untainted, in company with the one crushing, ever-present reproach that he had sold his honour for gold, that he had hounded a possibly innocent man to his death.

So, leading an existence of indifferent comfort, ever restless, ever haunted, he tried to forget the canker of regret by looking into the golden, glowing hearts of the beautiful flowers about him.

One day—it was a week after the sending of the telegram to Richard Sheldon that announced the success of Colonel Lytle's mission in Mexico—the gardener came to where Dean was putting some plants in a remote corner of the garden to announce a visitor from the city.

"Who is it?" Dean questioned, irritated at an interruption, morbidly shrinking from meeting any one whose presence would revive memories of the past.

"Says his name is Grey."

"Oh, the inspector! I'll come—no, he doesn't need a formal welcome. Bring him here; I can't leave these slips, now I've started in on them."

He hurried his work, and completed the task just as a grim, erect figure shadowed the flower bed.

"Well, old partner!" spoke Grey cheerfully. "I find you at work?"

Dean tried to greet his old-time friend effusively. It was a failure; and the shrewd, suspicious eyes of the old police officer noted it to be so.

"Yes, inspector, but glad to see you. It's getting lonely here."

"See here, Dean!" smiled Grey, an unusual twinkle of self-satisfaction in his eye. "Inspector is a thing of the past."

"Eh?" ejaculated Dean with a start. "You don't mean to say that you've resigned?"

"Not much."

"But——"

"Salary doubled—month's holiday; so I thought I'd run down and see an old crony."

"Then you're promoted?"

"My last case brought me advancement, yes. They've made me Superintendent."

Dean's face fell. Superintendent! What he had lost! Ah! the man before him could crush and hound and punish, but only when duty dictated. He had not sold his soul for a bribe!

Dean listened dismally, shrinking within his unworthy self, as Grey chatted on animatedly. He felt like a lost angel, shut out of paradise.

"Enough of me!" cried Grey finally. "I came to see you. And those wonderful roses? Come, rouse up, Dean! You appear half dead. Rural felicity ain't doing much for you, it seems to me. Show me the grounds."

Dean tried to be more cordial and energetic. He took the chief through the garden. He showed him roses enough to garland a palace.

He rattled over the bewildering varieties. Here were the glowing Jacqueminots, there the stately Cloth of Gold—pink, white, amber, crimson, single, double; tiny as a posey, mammoth as a sunflower! A veritable garden of beauty! The old police officer enjoyed the tramp mightily, and then, as they reached the end of the garden, and came to a broken high fence, he began carefully reading the inscriptions that were written on the little wooden tags attached to each bush, indicating its age, variety, and pedigree.

"Moss-rose, crossed with yellow common," droned Grey.

"Quite a complicated business! What's that? Some new plant, not yet sprouted?"

The spot where the two men had halted was the identical copse that had harboured Adrian Burgoyne a few weeks previous.

As the old inspector spoke he curiously indicated a little mound of earth, with a tag, somewhat larger than those used on the rose-bushes, sticking up at its head.

"Eh?" muttered Dean, staring. "That? No, I've planted nothing there that I know of."

"There's a wooden tag."

"Yes, and—why! it's got writing on it. Maybe the gardener—Mercy!"

Dean had carelessly picked up the piece of wood.

The mock tombstone, the fanciful epitaph that Adrian Burgoyne had written nearly two months ago, at that self-same spot, looked up at the detective with sentient power of overwhelming speech and accusation.

Wild-eyed, he perused it; with trembling hands, he thrust it into his bosom. His companion stared at him as if he was mad, for, with a vehemence that was almost frantic, Dean dragged him from the spot, as if it was haunted.

He tried to be jovial, cordial. He invited his friend to remain a week, a month, as his guest. In the light of that bloodless face, those hollow eyes, the chief of police politely dissented. He had to be on the move; he must catch the next train. Sorry, but he would come again; and he left the place with a serious, wondering face, trying to analyse the strange incoherent actions of Mr. Detective Dean.

Once alone, with feverish wildness Dean tore the wooden tombstone from his bosom, where he had hidden it, as if it was a burning brand.

Once again, with distended eyes and ashen face, he perused the mystifying chronicle.

It bore a date—a date four days later than the day upon which convict 407 had seemingly met his death—and it read.

"Sacred to the memory of Convict 407—Adrian Burgoyne. Died——" and the date followed. "Murdered by the law. Resurgam!"

What did it mean? Written after Burgoyne's death! What did it mean? The handwriting was his, indubitably!

"Murdered by the law!" Over and over, and over again, the haunting words ran riot through the fevered brain of the half-mad detective.

"Murdered by the law!" As dusk came on he seemed to see those words written in scroll, like characters of fire, in the air, on the walls, among the bushes.

Was he going mad? No. The chronicle was plain, terse. His trained mind traced cause and effect. He could yet reason.

At midnight a lone, forlorn figure stole from the garden and made for the railway station at Lynde.

At earliest dawn Mr. Detective Dean knocked at the door of the house in the city where lived the man from whom he had purchased the rose villa.

The latter regarded his white, anguished face, wonderingly.

"You look troubled, Mr. Dean," he began sympathetically, when the other waved him to silence with an imperious gesture of his hand.

"No nonsense!" he grated hoarsely. "You told me the day I bought the villa that I had just anticipated another customer?"

"Yes."

"It was true?"

"I am not given to lying!" bluntly and indignantly came the response.

"He offered more money?"

"Yes."

"He wants it now?"

"Badly. He would raise his offer, I think."

"Take it! Give me your cheque for what I paid you, now, at once—the bare amount I paid you—and make what you can of it."

"Why! Mr. Dean——"

"Take it or leave it—no trifling!" cried Dean, almost fiercely. "I need the money—at once!"

Digitized by Google

"I will accept. Make out your deed!"

10 o'clock—Detective Dean ran up the steps of the bank, a fluttering cheque in his hand.

10.5—He came down, bearing a parcel wrapped up in a newspaper.

10.15—The cab he had engaged halted in front of the palatial home of Richard Sheldon.

He ran up the marble steps. He fairly brushed by the servant who answered his ring at the door and stated that his master was in the library.

Into that apartment the detective dashed.

Richard Sheldon looked up with a start at a sight of the white face, the disordered attire, the bloodshot eyes of his unexpected visitor.

"Dean," he cried wonderingly. "In the name of goodness—"

"Stop!" rang out from the detective's lips, in a hoarse, echoing gasp. "No words! You bid for my soul, and I sold; but I cancel the bargain! Blood-money, a curse, a bribe from perdition, I give it back. I spurn it. I refuse it. There, there, THERE is your £2,000!"

He flung the package he bore before the appalled Sheldon as he spoke.

Then overstrained nature gave way. He uttered a strange, grating cry, he tore spasmodically at his shirt collar, he reeled suddenly.

10.25—Mr Detective Dean threw up his arms and fell to the floor, prone, senseless.

The merchant arose, trembling in every limb. He stared at the packet of bank-notes; he glared down at the motionless form of his visitor.

His thrilling words haunting his soul, Richard Sheldon made a movement to ring for a servant; then his hand fell nerveless to his side.

What was that? He started and listened! A ring at the front door—sharp, exacting, sudden; a loud, familiar voice—jubilant, bold, aggressive; hurried footsteps, the bumping, dragging thud of some heavy object.

10.30—The little clock on the mantel pealed out two silvery strokes. The door of the library was thrust open, and a man strode in, all excitement, all bustling animation, all triumph—

Colonel Lytle!

CHAPTER XXVII.

The Penance of Berwyn Dean.

Like an old campaigner fresh from the wars, flushed with victory, and bursting joyously in upon an old comrade, Colonel Lytle had unceremoniously entered the library.

With perturbed manner and white, annoyed face, Richard Sheldon greeted him. He had been expecting him. Various telegrams had kept him posted concerning the northward progress of man and treasure, but he had counted on no such interruption and annoyance as the startling and dramatic appearance of Detective Dean had evolved.

Before he could fully analyse the motives of Dean in returning the money, before he could fairly comprehend that the money itself had been returned, the Colonel was overwhelming him with questions.

"Hello!" ejaculated the latter, "what does this mean?" and he stared in wonder alternately from merchant to detective.

"I hardly know; it was so sudden, so dramatic," replied Sheldon, in a choked voice.

"He—he hasn't betrayed us?"

"Hardly. He's in the trap as closely as ourselves."

"Then——"

"He broke in here like a madman—threw that package of bank-notes on the table, called it hush-money, and—" Sheldon gave a graphic description of the startling scene.

"Hum!" muttered Lytle sardonically, "I see. Guilty conscience, remorse; too fine strung for a detective; too sensitive for a tool or confidant. Well, if he doesn't want the money, take it!"

"But it was the price of his silence!"

"He won't talk; he can't afford to. He presents the anomaly of an honest man who would like to be a rascal, and dares not. He'll feel better now, pose as a martyr, do his penance in silence, and trouble us no further."

"But what shall I do with him?"

Lytle inspected the prostrate officer.

"Lift him to a couch, and let him stay there until he recovers. No use making a gossip for the servants; it's only a fainting fit."

"Besides, he may have something to say of importance."

"Exactly," chimed in Lytle, "only"—and his sinister eyes sparkled jubilantly—"all he might say or do, or, for that matter, any one else, need trouble you and me no longer."

"Ah! then, you mean—" began Sheldon suspensefully, and with eager excitement.

"We are made for life!"

"The Ringold treasure——"

"Is ours! Do you understand, old chum, crony, partner? We're rich! we're nabobs, Crœsuses, kings!" And Colonel Lytle slapped his friend and familiar sharply on the shoulder, and chuckled gloatingly.

"You've got the——"

"White God! yes, at a cost! Five thousand in cold, hard cash, half-a-dozen lives, and a legacy of fanatic vengeance!" and Lytle laughed contemptuously—"but I've got it!"

"Where is it?"

Sheldon's voice shook with poorly suppressed emotion and anxiety.

"Pretty glad to see it, eh?" demanded Lytle tantalisingly.

"Don't torture me—don't play with me!" cried Sheldon sharply. "I'm on the pins and needles of suspense. I tell you, Lytle, I'm standing on the verge of an abyss, into which I feared some untimely accident would topple me any day of your absence."

"As bad as that?" muttered Lytle seriously.

"Yes. The ready cash I had to supply you, the two thousand for the detective, the losses on the Board of Trade, bad investments generally, had all contributed to bring me practically to the verge of ruin. How I have tided over, I don't know. I have been operating on borrowed money for over a month; every penny of my own is locked up in the Golcondas: I can't draw it out. The mine isn't paying, and I expect a crash in that quarter any day."

"But why now talk of failure—a crash?" interrupted Lytle buoyantly. "We have the White God — Ralph Ringold's treasure-chest, his hidden fortune. One million —two—a royal dowry, at the least! Come! Help me in with it."

The prone form on the couch moved restively, but the plotters noted it not. The one all gloating, supercilious triumph, the other verily quivering with emotion, they advanced to the door, and Lytle threw it open.

"There it is!" he announced.

An iron box lay just near the threshold of the vestibule doors, whither the cabman who had brought it and Lytle from the train had helped the latter drag it.

"Take hold!" ordered Lytle.

"Where shall we take it?"

"Into the library, of course. Why, man! you're fairly stupefied. Don't you want to have a look at your treasure?"

After considerable exertion the two men managed to get the heavy box across the threshold of the merchant's study.

Lytle did not delay in exposing its contents. He drew a key from his pocket, fitted it to the lock of the iron box, and threw back the lid.

"Look!" he ordered.

Digitized by Google

An awed expression crossed Sheldon's face as he peered. The white, blank face of the idol stared up at him. In its squat hideousness, it was repulsive; it seemed to squint and shrink from the light of day.

"Did—did you open it—examine it?" queried he confusedly.

"Not I! Too quick work in getting over the border safely to think of that. No, no; original package! Ha ha! I only appropriated one thing—this. It was blazing in the forehead of that impossible monster, and I fancied it, and had it set for my more classic bosom. See?"

The Colonel indicated a peculiar yellow brilliant that gleamed from his immaculate shirt front, and irradiated it with a pale, straw-colour glamour, and then he pointed to the cavity in the head of the idol, where it had reposed for centuries.

"You are sure this is the idol—our idol?" queried Sheldon.

"Sure? Yes, it's ours—very much ours! There is but one White God. It's the end of our scheming, Sheldon—possession! Think what it has cost—others! We sent that devoted martyr, Burgoyne, to gaol on a trumped-up charge; we have kept the girl, Patrice, in seclusion for five years; we have plotted, sinned, waited. Well, the last act is on. Get a chisel, and ring down the curtain. Then for the final transformation scene in Aladdin, or the Wonderful Scamp!"

In a truly jovial mood was Colonel Lytle this fine, autumnal day! And a really lamb-like and innocent trust in the perfect justice and honour of his friend he seemed to repose! That did not not trouble him, however—treachery. Had he not documents at home, in his private desk, carefully saved, devoutly treasured, the production of which would unmask all his ally's villainies, if he ever "kicked over the traces?"

"Get a chisel," he repeated. "Here, lift this magnificent specimen of carved abomination to the table."

They raised the dumb deity from the iron box. Then Sheldon sped from the apartment. He returned quickly with the tool designated.

"See!" spoke Lytle, pointing to a seamed section at the back of the figure—"there is where Ringold cut out the piece, stored his treasure, and cemented it up again with a paste made of the rock dust."

"I see," murmured Sheldon. "It cuts as if it was pretty fresh, doesn't it, Lytle?"

"That's all right. Ah! you have it!"

The loose section came free. It toppled to the floor.

"Drag the treasure out!" spoke Lytle excitedly. "Ah!"

"Empty!"

Empty—past grand and present grand graduates of the glorious school of fraud, rottenness and corruption!—empty, after all of hope, and avarice, and crime, and guilt, to be pricked by justice—mighty fabrics of wrong, erected carefully, only to crash to ruins at the touch of unrelenting fate!

Empty!—hearts and hands alike. They groped, they shook the idol, they inspected it again and again—empty!

They stared at one another blankly, like two crushed beings shipwrecked at the high tide of fortune. Three white faces glared one at the other, and the face of the idol was the whitest, and seemed to mock and sneer at their dismay.

"Murdered by the law!"

Out upon the hushed air of the room rang the sudden words, solemnly, ominously.

"Resurgam!"

The plotters fell back. The detective, rising from the couch, advanced towards them like a spectre.

His eyes swept their craven faces, and the face of the squat idol. Once again he repeated the strange words; then, turning, he dashed like a hunted fugitive from the house.

"Murdered by the law"—one convict, 407? No! no! his honour, the golden years of his early manhood, the golden years of his young life; not the man himself!

That, by a miracle, through Providence, had not come about—the detective knew it; the detective felt sure of it.

"Resurgam"—"I shall rise again!" He had risen! Convict 407 had written his own epitaph!

Therefore, he was alive. Detective Dean had overheard all that had passed between the two plotters in Sheldon's library. Therefore, convict 407 was innocent.

At noon that day a humble-browed, subdued-looking man sought an audience with the inspector of police.

He asked to be reinstated on the detective force; he asked a special and secret commission to open up and reinvestigate the case of "dead convict 407."

At dusk that afternoon, Berwyn Dean started out upon a quest that was a penance—a pilgrimage of contrition, remorse and self-abnegation, that should end only at the shrine of innocence vindicated.

(To be continued.)

'TWIXT YOU AND ME.

Pearson's Magazine. 6d. nett.

In these hard times of toil and tribulation we are endeavouring to do our best to alleviate your troubles. We seriously think of giving you

TWO HUNDRED AND FIFTY POUNDS!

Of course if you don't want it there's an end of the matter, but if you do, it will be worth your while to look inside the current number of

PEARSON'S MAGAZINE.

"The best illustrated monthly in the world."

1d. Home Notes. 1d.

Do you know what a delightful, ideal little ladies' paper is like? Well, Home Notes will immediately make clear to you that such a thing does exist.

ANOTHER £10 NOTE

will be offered as a prize for the solution of a Picture Puzzle in Short Stories next week. Full particulars as to conditions will appear in that issue.

POSTAL RATES.

SHORT STORIES will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON, at "Pearson's Weekly" Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

EXTRAORDINARY SUCCESS

IN THE

TREATMENT OF OBESITY.

"Our corpulent readers will be glad to learn how to positively lose two stone in about a month with the greatest possible benefit in health, strength and muscle by a comparatively new system. It is a singular paradox that the patient, returning quickly to healthy state, with increased activity of brain, digestive and other organs, naturally requires more food than hitherto, yet, notwithstanding this, he absolutely loses in weight one or two pounds daily, as the weighing-machine will prove. Thus there is no suggestion of starvation. It is an absolute success, and the author, who has devoted years of study to the subject, absolutely guarantees a noticeable reduction within twenty-four hours of commencing the treatment. This is different with other diseases, for the patient in some cases may go for weeks without being able to test whether the Physician has rightly treated him, and may have derived no real or apparent improvement in health. Here, we repeat, the author guarantees it in twenty-four hours, the scale to be the unerring judge. The treatment aims at the actual root of the disease, so that the superfluous fat does not return when discontinuing the treatment. It is perfectly harmless. We advise our readers to call the attention of stout friends to this, because, sincerely, we think they ought to know. For this information, we may say that on sending six penny stamps a book 'Corpulency, and the Cure,' 256 pages, containing a reprint of press notices from some hundreds of Medical and other journals (British and Foreign), and other interesting particulars, including the 'recipe,' can be had from a Mr. F. C. Russell, Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C."—Extract from The Belfast News Letter.

CORPULENCE.

INCREASING POPULARITY OF AN EFFECTUAL CURE.

Many of our readers are, doubtless, familiar with the nature of the extraordinary revolution in the cure of obesity which, within recent years, has been wrought by the original researches of that now eminent expert, Mr. F. Cecil Russell, of Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C. It is evident that the certainty, the rapidity, and the agreeable surroundings of his curative process have been recognised, in a very large degree, among ladies and gentlemen belonging to the highest social circles. Keen observers who have an opportunity of judging inform us, through the pages of society papers and otherwise, that owing to the general employment of Mr. Russell's treatment extreme obesity is becoming as much a thing of the past, at fashionable gatherings, as intoxication; and, no doubt, it will soon be regarded as nearly as disgraceful. The issue of an eighteenth edition of the author's singularly convincing little text-book, "Corpulency, and the Cure," however, serves to remind us that the popularity of the system has now reached spheres far remote from those of West-end fashion. The book of 256 pages may be had (post free) by sending six penny stamps to Mr. Russell's offices, as above; and it is worth the careful attention of those who wish to free themselves of a burden of fat—not merely because it is unseemly and adds enormously to the apparent age of the sufferer—but because extreme obesity terribly interferes with the energy necessary in these days of competition to make one's way in the world, or even to earn a very modest competency. A large proportion of the letters of Mr. Russell's grateful correspondents refer to their delight at being enabled—within a very brief period, and without any irksome conditions implying semi-starvation—to attack their accustomed tasks with pleasure instead of wearied disgust, through being reduced to their normal weight. The popularity of the system is also largely due, doubtless, to the English hatred of mystery, which is utterly swept aside by Mr. Russell. He fully explains his modus operandi, and supplies the receipt for his preparation.

Digitized by Google

GIVEN AWAY £5,000!

GRAHAM & CO.'S

MONSTER GIFTS.

IMPORTANT NOTICE.—Messrs. GRAHAM & CO. intend to present their Customers with a Monster Parcel as a means of advertising their celebrated

EGYPTIAN GOLD JEWELLERY.

For the small sum of 6s. 6d. we will send as follows:—

NOT A TOY

WE GIVE YOU A WATCH.

	Our Price.
One Gent's Egyptian Gold Albert, or one Lady's Egyptian Gold Albert	2s. 6d.	FOR
One Seal or Locket for Chain	1s. 6d.
One Gent's Carbon Diamond Ring, or one Lady's 5-stone Diamond Ring	3s. 6d.
One Gent's Carbon Diamond Scarfpin, or one Lady's Fashionable Brooch	2s. 6d.	6s. 6d.
One Pair of Cuff Links, or one Carbon Diamond Bracelet ...	2s. 6d.
Total	12s. 6d.

In addition to the above Every Purchaser will be Presented Free of Charge with one of our handsome

KEYLESS WATCHES.

USUALLY SOLD AT HALF-A-GUINEA.

Read what is said by those who have purchased.

WANTS A SECOND PARCEL.

Lowick-by-Neale, Northumberland, August 17.

GENTLEMEN,—Received to-day your second parcel of jewellery, with which we are immensely pleased. We really wonder how you can do it. The watch itself is worth more than the money charged for the whole. Many thanks for punctuality.—Very truly yours, WILLIAM McISAAC.

GOES BETTER THAN HIS £15 WATCH.

11, North Street, St. Peters, Tunbridge Wells.

GENTLEMEN,—Some few weeks ago I sent to your firm for the jewellery and advertised watch, of which I am surprised; the watch is a beautiful timist. I must admit, in fact, it goes better than my £15 gold watch; and for the jewellery it is astonishing value. I think you must lose money over such gifts, as I term it. The watch alone is worth double the 7s. I enclosed. I have shown it to several of my friends, and they were astonished. You can add this to your testimonials if it will be of any service.—I am, Gentlemen, yours faithfully, LEWIS C. RHODES.

GUARANTEED TO KEEP CORRECT TIME.

Any Watch not received in going order will be exchanged.

Every Watch is Carefully Examined, Timed, and Guaranteed a Correct Timekeeper. Call and see them.

We do this to save the enormous cost of advertising, preferring to give our customers the benefit. As we lose money on each parcel we cannot supply more than two parcels to one person. If you cannot call get a P.O. at once, and send for this wonderful parcel. Orders will be executed in Rotation. MONEY RETURNED IF NOT AS REPRESENTED.

NOTE.—The entire parcel will be sent for 6s. 6d. (post free, registered, 7s.). Each customer will receive gratis one of our HANDSOMELY ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUES. Be sure and call or send to-day for the

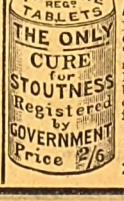
6s. 6d. Monster Presentation Parcel including the Handsome Keyless Watch.

S. S. GRAHAM & CO., 277, STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

HAIR DESTROYED permanently and absolutely by an entirely new and harmless self-treatment, total destruction guaranteed. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope. Prof. F. T. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

BLUSHING

Permanently cured. A Pamphlet giving sound practical advice and particulars of a successful treatment for a rapid, simple, and inexpensive home-cure, forwarded free to all upon receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—Prof. B. L. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.



ALL FAT PEOPLE

Readily Reduce Weight and Cure Corpulency Permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are very agreeable, harmless, and never fail to PRESERVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of diet. Reduction begins immediately.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably." Send 2/6 to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C.

THIN BUSTS

Quickly transformed and a good figure permanently obtained by a perfectly harmless, simple, and inexpensive self-treatment. Success guaranteed. For particulars, free, send stamped envelope in confidence to "Madame B. J.," Oriental Toilet Co., 87, Strand, London.

RED NOSES

Permanently cured in a few days by a simple, inexpensive self-treatment. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope to Dr. A. M. CURTIS, York Chambers, Adelphi, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

NEW SERIAL JUST COMMENCED, PROFUSELY ILLUSTRATED.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 373. FOR WEEK ENDING FEBRUARY 22ND, 1896. [ONE PENNY.

"THE NIMBLE 9D."

Great Reduction in price to 9d. per lb. in order to reduce stock, but

QUALITY GOOD AS EVER.

NEARLY 100,000 BEDS ALREADY SOLD

TO THOROUGHLY SATISFIED PURCHASERS.

NEWHAM'S LINCOLNSHIRE FEATHER BEDS

THESE BEDS are warranted doubly purified, dusted, and perfected in our own extensive factory at Boston, Lincs., made in strong linen bordered tick. The quality, sweetness, and purity of every bed guaranteed. These beds ALWAYS GIVE SATISFACTION, and many thousands of purchasers have sent us flattering testimonials and other orders for beds. Note following prices, which are 25 per cent. less than our recently advertised prices.

No. 1—Single Bed, Bolster and Pillow, 6ft. 3in. by 3ft. 6in., weighing 40lbs. 30/-

No. 2—Double Bed, Bolster, and Two Pillows, 6ft. 6in. by 4ft. 6in., weighing 50lbs.... ... ... 37/6

No. 3—Double Bed, Bolster, and Two Pillows, 6ft. 6in. by 4ft. 6in., weighing 55lbs. 41/3

No. 4—Extra Size Bed, Bolster, and Two Pillows, 6ft. 6in. by 5ft., weighing 65lbs. 48/9

Any sized Bed only 9d. per lb., Carriage Paid, to any station in the United Kingdom. FEATHERS ONLY 9d. PER LB. The trade supplied. All orders must be accompanied by cheque or P.O.O. (which, as security to purchasers, may be post-dated ten days). Send for samples of Feathers and Ticks, Price Lists, etc., which will be sent Post Free and need not be returned. A great reduction on three or more Beds. Please mention this paper.

S. S. NEWHAM & CO., Boston, Lincolnshire.

MASON'S EXTRACT OF HERBS

For the Immediate Production of

BOTANIC BEER.

A Nine-gallon Cask of Alcoholic Beer from a Brewery will cost you 10/6, but Eight Gallons of Beer made from

Mason's EXTRACT of HERBS

Can be obtained for 6d., plus a pound or two of Sugar and a little Yeast.

THE FINEST BEVERAGE IN THE WORLD.

Inventors and Manufacturers:

Newball & Mason,

HYSON GREEN WORKS,

Nottingham.

If unable to obtain it in your neighbourhood, send 9 stamps for sample bottle; or samples of both Wine Essence and Extract of Herbs, post free for 15 stamps.

RISING SUN STOVE POLISH

EASIEST, QUICKEST, CHEAPEST, & BEST BLACKLEAD IN THE WORLD

1 GREAT BOONS 3

Risin' Sun METAL POLISH

Gives a beautiful soft brilliant polish to all kinds of Metal.

A sample of any one post free 2 stamps.

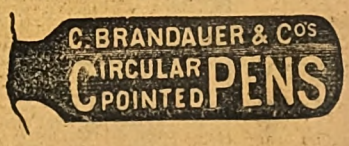
Name this publication

C. CHANCELLOR & CO. London, E.C.

MACK'S DOUBLE STARCH

CONTAINS IN PROPER PROPORTIONS GLOSS, BORAX, GUM, WAX & &c

SEVEN PRIZE MEDALS.



These series of pens neither scratch nor spurt. They glide over the roughest paper with the ease of a soft lead pencil. An assorted sample box for 7 stamps from the works, Birmingham.

Digitized by Google

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,

SUCH AS

Sick Headache, Constipation,

Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion,

Disordered Liver & Female Ailments.

ANNUAL SALE SIX MILLION BOXES.

In Boxes, 9½d., 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

MRS. JACKSON

An artist's wife, residing at Norton, near Malton, states: "I am deeply grateful to you for the good received through taking your Wind Pills. I suffered severely from

INDIGESTION, SPASMS,

and LIVER COMPLAINT. The doctors gave me up as incurable, nor did I think it possible for me to recover. I scarcely dared to eat any food, fearing suffocation. Seeing an advertisement of

Page Woodcock's Wind Pills,

I resolved to try them. After taking a few small boxes I lost all the painful symptoms, and now enjoy good health. Publish my statement as you please."

All sufferers from INDIGESTION, LIVER COMPLAINTS, WIND on the STOMACH, SICK HEADACHE, BILIOUSNESS, etc., should avail themselves of this most excellent medicine.

☞ The Wind Pills being purely Vegetable, Tasteless, and Mild, and Tonic in their action, may be taken with perfect safety by the most delicate of either sex.

Of all Medicine Vendors, at 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. Post Free for P.O. or Stamps from PAGE WOODCOCK, LINCOLN.

TOOTH-ACHE

CURED INSTANTLY BY

BUNTER'S NERVINE

Prevents Decay. Saves Extraction. Sleepless Nights Prevented.

Neuralgic Headache and all Nerve Pains Removed by BUNTER'S NERVINE. All Chemists, 1s. 1½d.

RUBBER STAMPS

FREE BY POST.

AGENTS WANTED.

Liberal commissions.

Your MONOGRAM, 2 letters, 1/2; 3 letters or Name in full, 1/8, including Box, Pad, and Ink, for Paper or Indelible Marking Ink for linen. All kinds of stamps. Illustrated Lists free.

S. S. IRETON & CO., Ltd., 92, Gracechurch St., London, E.C.

KNOW THYSELF!

YOUR CHARACTER, APTITUDES, and CAREER marvellously described from Handwriting by distinguished Graphologist. Business Guidance. Success assured. Fee 2s.

Professor CARONA, F.B.I.M.S. 126, Ledbury Road, Bayswater, W.

S.S. S.S.

PEARSON'S £100 COUPON.

No. 8

Feb. 22, 1896.

S.S. S.S.

HAIR DESTROYED.

A doctor's widow knows of a simple, inexpensive remedy that permanently destroys the roots, and will forward particulars free to all those afflicted sending stamped envelope. Address Mrs. B. D. WOOD, 4, DUKE STREET, VILLIERS STREET, LONDON, W.

ARE YOU LITTLE?

If so, wear the "A D" Invisible Elevators (Regd.). Will increase your height up to four inches; the only approved means; detection impossible; simple, inexpensive. Send stamped envelope for particulars to the ORIENTAL TOILET CO. (B 5 Dept.), 87, Strand, London.

WE GIVE AWAY

Free of all cost, Hosiery, Dress Skirts, Printed Blouses, and Complete Dress Lengths. Every woman should write for particulars and the most Marvellous Dress Guide, which are sent free on receipt of a Post Card. ADDRESS: Shakespeare Manufacturing Co. (Dept. 19), Milk St., Manchester.

DOUGLAS, HUNGERFORD, AND WILLIAMS.

PROFITS PAID DURING 1895.

Jan. 2, £8 per cent., Feb. 1, £6, Mar. 1, £5, April 1, £8, May 1, £7, June 2, £10, July 1, £9, Aug. 1, £9, Sept. 2, £8, Oct. 1, £8, Nov. 1, £7, Dec. 2, £7.

Total for 12 months £92 per cent., an average of nearly £8 PER CENT. PER MONTH.

PROFITS PAID DURING 1896.

Jan. 2 ... £6 per cent. | Feb. 1 ... £7 per cent.

OUR NEW ILLUSTRATED MANUAL mailed free upon request, showing how these profits may be made WITHOUT SPECULATION. Cheques for profits mailed promptly 1st of each month, and for withdrawals of capital on 2nd and 16th of each month. Trial investments of £5 and upwards may be made.

We have not a dissatisfied Client.

DOUGLAS, HUNGERFORD, & WILLIAMS, 5, Copthall Avenue, London, E.C., and 11, Place de la Bourse, Paris.

EPPS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

COCOA

SULPHOLINE LOTION

For clearing the skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness, giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance.

SHILLING BOTTLES.

VIOLIN STRINGS.

4 Best "E's" (samples) 9d., post free.

S. S. CARY, NEWBURY.

HAIR DESTROYED.

A lady who has permanently destroyed Superfluous Hairs on herself, will be happy to forward free, to all similarly afflicted, full particulars of a simple, inexpensive and harmless self-treatment. Send stamped addressed envelope in confidence to Mrs. "T. D." 87, Strand, London.

TO TOBACCONISTS COMMENCING.

£20

See Illus. Guide and Catalogue (250 pages), 3d. "How to Open a Clear Stores, from £20 to £2,000." TOBACCONISTS' OUTFITTING CO., 185, Euston Road, London. (Over 50 years' reputation.) Manager, H. MYERS.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

SHORT STORIES

No. 373.] [ONE PENNY.

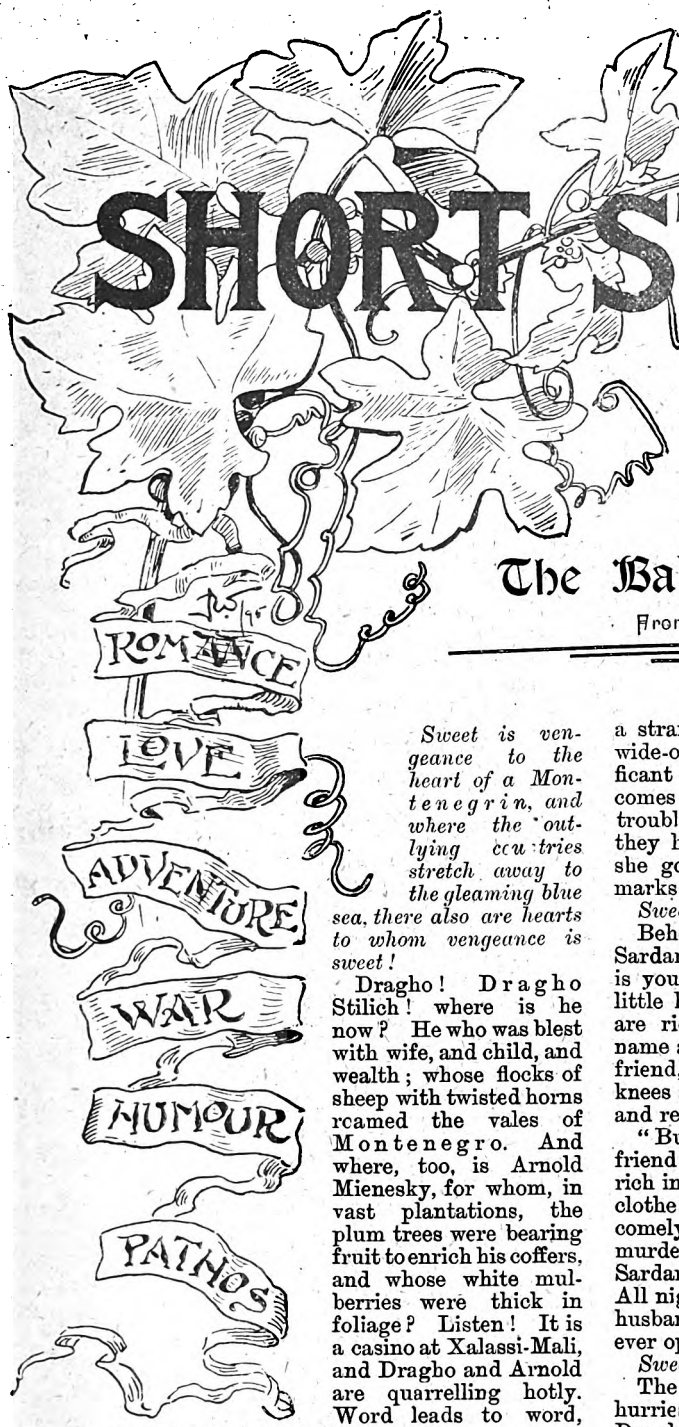
EDITED BY

C. ARTHUR PEARSON.

For the Week ending February 22nd, 1896.

The Ballad of Jane Stilich.

From the Montenegrin. By A. T.



Sweet is vengeance to the heart of a Montenegrin, and where the outlying countries stretch away to the gleaming blue sea, there also are hearts to whom vengeance is sweet!

Dragho! Dragho Stilich! where is he now? He who was blest with wife, and child, and wealth; whose flocks of sheep with twisted horns roamed the vales of Montenegro. And where, too, is Arnold Mienesky, for whom, in vast plantations, the plum trees were bearing fruit to enrich his coffers, and whose white mulberries were thick in foliage? Listen! It is a casino at Xalassi-Mali, and Dragho and Arnold are quarrelling hotly. Word leads to word, and rage mounts high in both their breasts. Ah, hold your breath! What deed is this? Arnold draws his dagger, and Dragho, smitten, falls to the earth murmuring "Vengeance."

Sweet is vengeance to the heart of a Montenegrin.

And now who is this who comes weeping, to claim the dead? Jane—Jane Stilich, the widow. And the neighbours lift the body in their arms and carry him where the fire is smouldering upon his own hearth, and lay him on the mat, where the dying flames send a strange glow upon the pallid cheek and light up his wide-open eyes. What is the meaning of that significant gaze from those staring eyes? The priest, who comes with holy water to bless the dead, is strangely troubled. Only Jane Stilich understands, and when they have placed beside him his weapons and his pipe she goes forth to seek the Sardar. The hour-glass marks four o'clock.

Sweet is vengeance to the heart of a Montenegrin.

Behold, it is the widow who enters the house of the Sardar. She speaks: "Hear me, oh friend! My son is young. An ear of corn is the heaviest sword his little hand can hold, and I have no brothers. You are rich in brothers, and four sons who bear your name are of an age to carry arms. You were Dragho's friend, punish his murderer," and Jane fell upon her knees at the Sardar's feet. He fixes his gaze upon her and replies:

"But look you, Dragho Stilich has been no more my friend since last year's Christmas feast was held, when, rich in flocks, he refused to give me four sheepskins to clothe my four brave sons. But you—you are fair and comely—my sons and I will search the country for the murderer, and then you shall give yourself as wife to the Sardar." Jane's eyes blaze with fury, and she departs. All night long Jane is weeping over the body of her lost husband, and Dragho gazes steadfastly before him with ever open eyes.

Sweet is vengeance to the heart of a Montenegrin.

The skies are bright with another day. Far and near hurries the tortured widow. Among the friends of Dragho she looks in vain for one who will arm himself and seek the fugitive. With one accord they answer: "Ah, but Arnold, too, has always been our good friend." And then, with despair in her soul, Jane turns her steps towards the house of the Sardar. "It is well—I accept the compact."

The eyes of the old Sardar flash beneath their hoary brows. And Jane, once more is she alone in her widowed home; once more she weeps over her dead; then, bending low, she whispers in his ear, and lo! the

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

open eyes close in quiet rest and Jane weeps on, and the hour-glass marks four o'clock.

Sweet is vengeance to the heart of a Montenegrin.

"Awake—hasten, my sons—let us prepare powder and ball and rations for the days we shall wander far from our home. Where are the hunting knives? Tighten your belts that the gurrine may closely protect your chests, bring forth the deerskin robes, that the dews and showers of night may not destroy our arms and our stores. Arnold Mienesky has flown to the mountain heights, and we go to take his life, for is it not he who has killed Dragho, our dearest friend?"

Sweet is vengeance to the heart of a Montenegrin.

Skilful is he and wary—the old Sardar, and soon the fugitive shall feel the danger that is near him. The Sardar discovers his tracks, and on the first day they meet, one of the four brave sons falls dead, and when the second day breaks, behold another son is slain. The Sardar hesitates, and questions his course. Arnold, the murderer, bethinks him if it would not be well to surrender. The priest seeks the widow and urges reconciliation. With fury and passionate words she refuses, and as she speaks, the sand falls and the glass marks four o'clock.

Sweet is vengeance to the heart of a Montenegrin.

"She refuses in wrath," is whispered through the streets of Xalassi-Mali—but the people, still hoping, send to the Lord Bishop a hundred sequins—the price of a head. With the Lord Bishop rests the charge of calling a tribunal of reconcilation. In the great church all is prepared for the mass of peace. Ring out, O bells, for the blessed mass of reconciliation, and ring for the twelve young mothers who come, carrying their babes in their arms, to knock at the widow's door. "Jane, Jane, open the door to us—we bring gold and 'broidered kerchiefs," but no response comes from the close fastened door.

Sweet is vengeance to the heart of a Montenegrin.

"Jane, our good neighbour Jane, in the name of our children we ask for forgiveness. Arnold repents. It was but a dispute. Malice there was none. It was the dagger which slew Dragho. The dagger alone is guilty—only listen, the priest will come to shatter it and pronounce it accursed. Open the door, Jane, open to us." But Jane Stilich is silent and relentless. She has sworn an oath to her dead, and woe befal him who breaks his oath.

Sweet is vengeance to the heart of a Montenegrin.

Dragho's murderer wanders once more through the forest's depths. This time, supported by his two brothers and by the two sons whom death has not stolen away, the aged Sardar again essays the capture. Fear seizes upon Arnold; to fly or to search a place of hiding, in both lurks danger. Enveloped by the dark shades of night, wild beasts beset his way, and his breast is filled with terror—his days are days of hurrying, fearful flight from his memories. The aged Sardar sounds a note of triumph! Arnold abandons his defence. He surrenders—he is the Sardar's captive. And the vision arises before the Sardar of Jane—the fair widow waiting for him in her lonely home. And now behold the victorious procession that enters Xalassi-Mali. Men, women, and the children in the streets, follow in the train of the Sardar and his two brave sons, the prisoner Arnold Mienesky in their midst.

Sweet is vengeance to the heart of a Montenegrin.

From afar the drone of the pipes and the noise of many feet reaches Jane, and sends a thrill to her heart as she reads in the din the announcement that the Sardar has returned. No time for thought. She opens her coffers and takes out the rich marriage robe which has lain untouched since the joyful day that saw her Dragho's bride. Its folds shake out the scents of lavender and asperule. How beautiful she is in this bright garb. Her fingers sparkle with gems, and jewels shine in her ears; on her head-dress rings together a double row of Turkish sequins. In one hand she holds her distaff, in the other her household keys. "He has avenged Dragho to possess Dragho's wife and Dragho's flocks. It is well. I am his."

Sweet is vengeance to the heart of a Montenegrin.

"Make way, make way for the procession!" The heralds proclaim the Sardar's approach. His brothers and his sons still follow him. Jane, happy Jane, climbs to the roof of her house to bid them welcome. The old Sardar thinks upon her charms; his wrinkled visage is full of ardour. He hastens to open the door which alone separates him from the woman he longs to possess. As he knocks a voice from above falls in clearest tone upon his ears. "Behold your bride!" He turns quickly, eagerly, with anxious longing, and Jane flings herself from the lofty roof as the echoes repeat to the affrighted Sardar: "Behold your bride!" Where is now the spirit of Jane, Jane Stilich, as she lies dead, dead before the Sardar and his followers?

And the glass marks four o'clock, and the Sardar has not Jane Stilich, nor has he Dragho's flocks of sheep with twisted horns which roam the vales of Montenegro.

Sweet is vengeance to the heart of a Montenegrin, and where the outlying countries stretch away to the gleaming blue sea, there also are hearts to whom vengeance is sweet.

Digitized by Google

The Startling Legend of The Weathercock.

Adapted from the French by Edward Vizetelly.

The little town of Saint-Vrain-sur-Mesle is rightly proud of its church, which is quite a marvel of Gothic architecture, erected by the Prémontrés monks, who founded their first monastery there, and for many years devoted half their immense revenue to building the sacred edifice.

The order at that time was in all the splendour of its power, and the monks, to mark their pious enthusiasm and enhance the glory of Saint Augustin, their patron, determined that the spire of their church should surpass that of any other in Burgundy.

The steeple, which is beautifully sculptured, as indeed is the whole of the monument, towers up three hundred feet above the ground, and at that altitude, from a terrace surrounded by a forged iron balustrade, an octagonal spire with prominent knobs of stone running along each arris extends into the air another hundred feet and is terminated by a flowery cross.

The architects of the building seem, to have thought this spire would never require to be touched, for they made no provision for ascending it, and it so happened that one day when lightning struck the superb weathercock which in those times darted backward and forward in the wind, above the cross, and sent it flying to pieces, the priests were in great perplexity as to how to have it replaced.

This was all the more vexatious as the congregation who were for the most part exceedingly superstitious, saw an ill-omen for the church, town, and crops in the accident, and to increase the trouble, someone all at once discovered that the remnants of the zinc bird, still remaining on high, seen from the threshold of the parsonage, had all the aspect of a silhouette of the Devil.

It was then recalled that during the building of the church the Grand Prior Pancrace, according to the legend, was one day at prayer, when his thoughts having wandered to the magnificence of his work, the Evil One cast a feeling of pride into his heart. The saintly man whilst at once rapidly performing an act of penance, had quietly taken his chaplet from his belt, thrown it over Satan's head, and after dragging him several times round his cell, sprinkling him with holy water, had condemned him to keep the building in perfect repair from the foundations to the cross; but naught had been said anent the weathercock, and it was now averred that the Prince of Darkness was avenging himself on this poor zinc fowl!

In order to allay the anxiety of the inhabitants and put an end to all this silly superstitious talk, it became absolutely necessary that something should be done. The priests, therefore, put their heads together, and having studied the documents relating to the building of the church and ascertained the exact proportions of the weathercock, ordered a brand-new one from Paris; and when one Sunday morning the announcement was at length made from the pulpit that the damage was about to be repaired, the satisfaction was general.

A fortnight afterwards the cock, very carefully packed, was delivered at the vicarage, and being removed from its case was exhibited to the public gaze, when it very soon became an object of admiration to the curious and devout.

The bird's arrival, however, was marked by several small misfortunes. His comb, cut into little sharp teeth, tore the lips of a babe who had leaned from its mother's arms to kiss his head; his beak scratched the forehead of a girl who had been pushed against it by some rough boys endeavouring to approach nearer the object of general attention; the point of his tail made a great rent in the vicar's cassock, and his reverence remarked to one of his curates, that he should not be at all sorry when the bird was definitely fixed in position.

But that was just the question. Who was to place it there? Inquiries had been made, but no one sufficiently venturesome, steeplejack or other, had as yet presented himself to perform the task.

At last, however, a slater came forward and announced himself ready and willing to do the job. Cap in hand, he stood listening with deference to the vicar's instruction, nodding his head as the explanation proceeded, and calculating in a thoughtful business-like manner the difficulty and expense of the work. Stroking his chin with his hand, he fixed the amount: so much for a pole, so much for rope, so much for hooks and rings, so much for labour.

Digitized by Google

The bargain was struck, and the workman, wishing the priest good-day, was about to cross the threshold when the latter, calling him back, inquired with some concern, whether he were quite sure of his strength and courage, if he were not afraid of giddiness, whether he had calculated and considered all the danger of the undertaking?

The man stared at the vicar surprised, rolling back his sleeve he exhibited his muscular arm, slapped his huge thigh, expanded his chest, drew himself up erect like a Titan ready to scale the heavens. Then he went his way.

* * * * *

At last the great day came.

It was a couple of hours after sunrise. Refreshed by sound sleep, invigorated by a hearty meal, the brave slater ascended the steps of the steeple, followed by two assistants carrying the cock, pole and cordage to the terrace.

All the population of Saint Vrain, reinforced by contingents from neighbouring parishes, are out of doors and swaying to and fro at the foot of the steeple. Gendarmes in full uniform move among them, preserving order and keeping an open space round the tower in case something might fall from the top. Within the church a few compassionate and anxious old women are burning candles and praying for the unknown man who is risking his life up above. The vicar is thumbing the pages of his breviary, all in a tremble, in the vestry, daring neither to go outside and see for himself what is transpiring, nor to ask anyone for news.

All at once a sort of dull prolonged yell bursts from the crowd assembled in the streets and squares.

The man has appeared on the terrace!

Only half his body has as yet issued from the door. He is pulling something up behind him. Presently he is seen unrolling cords and rope which he places in separate lots at the edge of the parapet. He is next perceived placing a pole taller than himself at the base of the spire; finally the cock appears. He seems to roll it up in something and then lays it down on the terrace.

He is at the base of the spire.

He walks round it on a narrow ledge, encircling it with a rope ending in a slip-knot. In this rope are passed two others which dangle downward and are finally attached to the cock and pole respectively.

Now he's off!

He passes the thick rope round his loins, tightens the running knot until it brings him near the spire, then making an effort with his hands and knees he advances sideways, rising slightly at each movement and thus tracing the initial curve in a spiral which takes him to the foremost projecting stone. There he fixes a hook fastened to his chest by a short leather thong, and with his two hands now free, undoes the slip-knot, tightens the thick rope and recommences his turning, ascending movement to the second prominent piece of masonry.

Forty times in the course of an hour, which seemed an age, the terrified spectators, holding their breath, watch him appear and disappear in turn, proceeding higher and higher, quicker and quicker, in proportion as the diameter of the spire decreases until his head is on a level with the small circular platform supporting the cross. He is then seen to twirl his legs round the spire, which at that point is quite small, and again tightening the thick rope girdle, wipes his forehead with his cuff, and remains motionless, his head bent slightly forward as if recovering breath. Then he takes a flask from his pocket and has a pull at it.

That flask contained brandy, and it has always been a matter of discussion among the wiseacres of Saint-Vrain, as to whether on that occasion the bold slater took too little or too much.

From the height he has now attained, he is able to touch the bottom of the cross without an effort. After a few moments' rest he is seen passing his arms round the four iron bars by which it is kept in position. He has encircled it two or three times with the rope and, having caught this with the hook fastened to his chest, has clutched hold of two of the iron bars, let go the spire with his legs, and, straining with his arms, has hoisted himself up into a kneeling position on the platform.

Then measuring the height of the cross with the eye, he notices with satisfaction that it is barely ten feet. As the pole is twelve feet long, he sees he will only have to hook it on once, which will shorten and simplify the last part of the ascent considerably.

He stands erect, passes the rope once round the perpendicular part of the cross, fixes the hook at his chest into it, seizes one of the two small cords hanging attached to the thick coil, and draws up to him the pole which until then had been lying at the base of the spire.

This pole, armed at the end with a three pronged claw, is encircled from distance to distance with rolls of leather, interlaced with wire, which stand out very prominently from it. The man hooks the claw on the flower at the top of the cross, and in a few minutes, thanks to his chest-hook and the slater's stirrups fastened to his knees, climbs up the pole as up a knotted cord, but with this advantage that the former being inflexible and firmly fixed by the broad claw, does not sway about, and at last he finds himself seated on the flower with his chest against the pivot of the weather-cock which extends barely a couple of feet above his head. He fastens himself firmly to this rod, and by the aid of the second cord draws up the cock.

When the multitude below perceived this human figure rise into the air, more daring than the daring edifice he towered over, they broke into a wild roar of applause which ascended with terrible harmony to the unfortunate wretch who had aroused it.

That was his death warrant.

Up to that fatal moment, the idea had never entered that humble heart and narrow mind, that in the eyes of the world there could be any difference between him and the bird that flies by on the wing, or the blade of grass that is trampled under foot. And even now, a few minutes ago, amidst the terrible undertaking he was about to crown, not one of his iron nerves had quivered, not a thrill had passed through any of his fibres; he had reflected neither on the danger he was exposing himself to, nor on his courage. He had said to himself that it was hard work, that was all. His thoughts had not gone further.

But at this spontaneous explosion from all those souls beneath him, his eyes which until then had never once caught a glimpse of the radiant magnificence of glory, his ears which had never heard the formidable thunder of acclamation, both opened amidst dazzling splendour, and he was seized with a sort of frenzy.

From the height at which he stood he embraced the heavens, towered above the earth, and the thousands of human beings who were gesticulating and shouting at his feet seemed smaller to him than ants. He who had never known but the wretched side of humanity, suddenly understood its greatness and felt imbued with all its majesty!

Digitized by Google

The multitude saw him stoop down, seat himself on the flower, take the weathercock on his knees, remove the cloth in which he had wrapped it to save it from injury in the transit; then, holding the bird in one hand, and assisting himself with the pivot which he grasped with the other, he stood erect. Stooping slightly again, he raised the remains of the old cock with his shoulder and sent them bounding down the spire on to the roof of the nave with a great clatter. Then taking the cock by the tail, he placed it on the pivot waiting to receive it. He bent down once more, set it in motion, and another shout from the crowd greeted the first turn of the new acquisition.

The unlucky fellow had now only to descend. By sliding on to the branches of the cross first of all, then down the pole, he would find at the top of the spire the cords which had assisted him in hoisting up pole and cock. He would then only have to twist the rope once round each leg, and let himself slowly descend, with his back comfortably leaning against the roof of the spire. In three minutes at the most he would reach the terrace.

But that shout, that shout of triumph, uttered by the swerving multitude below, had wrested from him the little reason he still retained.

An uncontrollable burst of pride, as vulgar as himself, as frightful as the courage he had been displaying, put into his head the mad idea of surpassing all he had till then achieved by a more startling act of daring still.

He bestrode the weathercock, and by a powerful movement of the loins set it in motion.

At the sight of this fearful folly, the crowd stood there silent, motionless, holding their breath, and with parted lips and straining eyes watched the bird whirl round and round.

One minute, two minutes, three, four, five minutes passed.

The cock was still turning!

The man who, first of all had bowed with his cap, was now bending forward straining the cock's neck with his arms. He sought to pass one of his legs over the bird's tail; but whether it was that he had already lost his presence of mind or that the obstacle was too high, he was unable to do so. He also tried, by stretching his leg, to attain the flower at the summit of the cross, but he waved it about in space in vain. In bestriding the cock he had probably taken a spring, for his feet were dangling in the air. The people saw him cross and lock them together under the bird's stomach.

Then the man drew himself up, opened his arms, and stretched them out on either side of him with a gesture of supreme pride.

He remained so.

And the cock continued whirling round and round.

As this frightful scene became prolonged the crowd began to stir. Persons looked at one another, nudged each other, not yet daring to speak. Some of the women began to cross themselves, others to faint. At last a piercing shriek was heard. A young girl had fallen backward in hysterics. At the same instant, as if by the effect of a shock from a current of electricity, several other women fell down, victims to the same sort of attack; children yelled and a great many persons began running about in bewilderment, crying out unaware of what they did or what they said.

This had been the order of things for at least a quarter of an hour. The cock at last had stopped, but it was perceived with horror, that the man was still motionless on its back with legs crossed and extended arms.

Someone suggested that the vicar, who was still in the vestry awaiting the end of the job, ought to be informed of the strange turn affairs had taken and this was done.

When the worthy man came out on to the square to look for himself he at first sought to reassure those who spoke to him, but his heart, nevertheless, was beating very fast. Not having been present at the whole scene, he was not so much affected as the spectators.

The man was seated so thoroughly upright, his gesture so neat and firm that the fact of his remaining so long in the same attitude could be naught else than bravado pushed to the extreme. It was in that sense the vicar spoke to those about him, but whilst doing so he felt horrified at heart, and he hurried off a messenger to the doctor to request his presence and his telescope.

Shortly afterwards the telescope on its tripod stood pointing towards the weathercock, and the doctor placing his eye to it to adjust the sight, bounded backward with an exclamation.

At that cry the vicar rushed forward, and in his turn looked.

In the black circle of the objective, standing out against the clear background of the sky, he saw the slater stiff, and motionless as a statue. His face was green, daubed with two blackish spots on the cheeks and contracted by a frightful rictus displaying his tongue hanging down between his teeth, which were uncovered by the lips; the eyes, wide open and fixed, were gazing upward, the white of them alone being visible.

The vicar turned to the doctor.

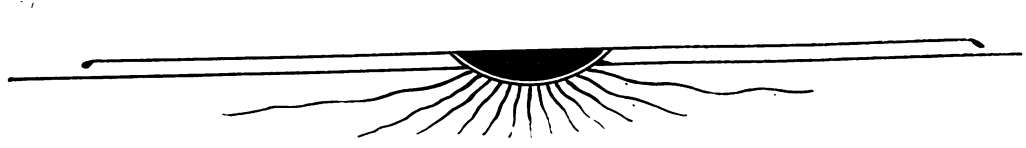
"Is he still alive?" he inquired.

"Perhaps," answered the medical man; "if he has not been struck by apoplexy, nor gone into a fainting fit, immediately followed by cadaverous-like rigidity, he must be in a state of catalepsy, to remain hooked on by the legs in that way!"

"I know what my duty is," exclaimed the priest, and accompanied by some assistants the worthy man ascended to the terrace and took the poor wretch absolution.

Towards evening a few carrion crows began turning round the steeple; the next day two or three were seen to alight on the skull. Soon afterwards, vultures arrived from the mountains far away.

The cock no longer turns, and the legend has it that it will remain stationary until the end of time, as motionless as the stones of the sacred edifice it crowns.



Digitized by Google

When the Birds Begin to Sing

By Winifred Graham. Author of "Through the Valley," "Six First-Class Passengers," etc.

SUMMARY.

Philip Roche marries Eleanor Grebby, daughter of a farmer, and they spend their honeymoon on the Continent. On their return to Richmond, Eleanor becomes friendly with a frivolous widow, Mrs. Mounteagle, against her husband's wishes. She is introduced to Carol Quinton, who fascinates her. Her husband is heart-broken, and consults his cousin, Erminie Henderson, who comes to stay with them.

CHAPTER VII.

The Shadows Rise and Fall.

"I am so sorry, Giddy, darling," Eleanor writes, "but I can't possibly go to town with you this afternoon, as Philip's cousin, Miss Henderson, has just arrived to stay, and her fiancé, Nelson, is coming, too. She is quite jolly, and I thought she would be horrid. Many thanks for sending on that silly little note from Mr. Quinton. Why did he address it to your house? I suppose he forgot 'Lyndhurst,' though I told him the name.

"Ever your devoted,

"Eleanor."

"Dense little idiot!" sighs Giddy. "She cannot understand poor Carol's passion, and yet he kissed her in the hansom. It was like Eleanor to tell me. She always gives herself away. I pity those refreshingly young people who can never keep anything to themselves." Giddy waves up to the windows of Lyndhurst as she drives by.

"Who is that little Jezebel?" asks Erminie.

"My great friend, Mrs. Mounteagle," replies Eleanor.

"Tell her to knock off blanc de perle," responds Miss Henderson, "she would be twice as good-looking."

"I should like to see Giddy if any one interfered with her appearance! But come to the fire, Miss Henderson."

"You must call me Erminie. I am your cousin, you know."

"Yes. What was Philip like as a small boy? You were children together he tells me."

"Yes, and Phil was a little wretch. He used to pull my hair and tease me frightfully, but always ended by spending his much-valued pocket-money in sweets and presents to make it up. Ah! you have a really good-hearted husband, my dear, and I hope you appreciate him!"

"When is Mr. Lane expected?" asks Eleanor, fleeing from the subject of Philip's virtues.

"In about an hour."

"Then I shall go and change my dress now. I look so fearfully dowdy in this brown thing."

"Who is that little Jezebel?"

Eleanor is very fond of talking over her own clothes, but takes small interest in those of other people. She has yawned twice during Erminie's account of her trousseau, and only brightens at the prospect of trying on the hats that are to be sent for approval the following day.

"It will be fun to see how I look in them," she says gleefully, and Erminie is so charmed with her frankness that she forgets to condemn the evident self love in Philip's wife.

"It is not often my husband is at home in the daytime; it is quite in your honour," says Eleanor, as Mr. Roche enters. "The City generally claims him. Stay and entertain Erminie, Philip, while I adorn myself. Put on some coal, and make her sit in a comfortable chair."

Then Eleanor flits away, leaving the cousins together.

"What a dear little thing she is, and so pretty!" declares Erminie.

Philip gives her a grateful look.

"Things will go better now you are here," he replies.

Digitized by Google

"I say, Phil, you do like Nelson, don't you?"

"Of course, he is an awfully good chap. Why do you ask?"

"Only because I think so much of him. Do you know I love him ten times more now than when we were first engaged."

"Really! Well that is on the right side anyhow. He is young, rich, handsome."

"Yes."

Erminie is looking down nervously, and interlacing her fingers.

"If I had loved him so well at first," she sighs, "I could not have deceived him."

"Deceived!" cries Philip. "My dear girl what do you mean?"

"You confided in me, Phil," she continues, "I will confide in you. Yet I hardly know how to put it, it sounds so dreadful! I often drift into wrong-doing unintentionally, then I am afraid to draw back, to own up. Nelson, as I told you, is rich; he imagines that I, too, am well off. I pretended I had money in fact (you may guess how tempting it was) before our engagement, when I wanted, as some people vulgarly term it, 'to catch him!' Bah! what a vile expression! I did not consider the consequences, and the day of reckoning has yet to come, when I must confess myself a dowerless wife, and pretend to have lost through misfortune the money I never possessed. Ah! how lowered I should be in his eyes if he knew—if he knew."

She wrings her hands in despair.

"Why did I ever do it? Why did I stoop to anything so mean—so despicable? What shall I say, Philip—how explain? You have always advised me well—if you don't utterly despise me now, show me the way out of my folly."

He is genuinely sorry for Erminie, for he can well imagine how she was drawn into the error, and, thoughtless, fell! He has seen her in many a trouble before to-day, and determines to help her if possible.

A thought strikes him.

"Are you willing," he asks, "to run a risk?"

"Run a risk! What wouldn't I do?"

"I've got an idea, then. I know of some mining shares which are likely to have a very big rise."

Erminie's face brightens.

"Oh, Phil!" she cries, "I was hoping you might suggest putting me into a good thing. Tell me more about it. How much are the shares? What is the mine called?"

"Four shillings, at present. The name is Klerksdorp."

"How many would you advise me to buy?"

"What do you say to putting £2,000 in it?"

"All that I have!" with a little gasp.

"Yes." He speaks convincingly.

"I hardly dare. How much will the shares rise?"

Philip laughs.

"If I knew that," he answers, "it would be worth something! No Erminie, I cannot name the profit, but it is likely to be large. I have the very best information on the subject, or I would not fire you to speculate. Under the circumstances, it is the wisest plan to follow. If you lose, well, your husband has plenty of money, and you can bewail the loss of your fortune, with the failure of the 'Klerksdorp.'"

"And if the shares go up, I am saved!" she cries enthusiastically, drawing a deep breath. "Oh! Phil, you are a dear!"

Erminie flings her arms round his neck, and kisses him.

"Two thousand pounds!" she murmurs. "My little all."

"You will get 10,000 shares for that sum, which may become worth—— No, I won't guess, or raise your hopes. You know what speculations are?"

"I do, indeed. Have I not lost many a year's savings already through unsatisfactory ventures? But a drowning woman catches at a straw, and whichever way it turns out, Nelson must never guess that I deceived him! You'll back me up, won't you, and see me through this?"

* * * * *

Nelson Lane and Erminie Henderson have been staying over a week at "Lyndhurst."

The quarrels between Philip and Eleanor have not recurred since their visitor's arrival, for Eleanor has little chance of meeting Giddy. Erminie always wants her attention, and makes such fun of the "painted lady," as she calls Mrs. Mounteagle, that Eleanor drops the subject of her friend next door.

"You are a lucky man, Mr. Lane."

Nelson is the most pleasant companion imaginable, and is not selfish over his love for Erminie, though it is easy to see how mutually devoted the couple are. They never forget their duty to host or hostess in their infatuation for each other.

Eleanor likes Nelson immensely, and they are the greatest friends.

One morning she is pacing up and down the terrace in the crisp, frosty air, waiting for Erminie to join her. They are all going to the Penn's Ponds to "look at the ice," which is not yet considered safe enough to bear.

Nelson comes up, and walks by her side; the exercise puts a warm glow into their cheeks.

"Erminie is just finishing her letters," he says; "she will be out directly."

"I love Erminie," declares Eleanor; "she is so sweet to me. You are a lucky man, Mr. Lane."

"I wish I were worthy of her," he says, with a sigh.

Eleanor catches the sadness in his tone.

"I believe you are fretting about something," she says. "You look as if you had a weight on your mind."

Nelson laughs off the remark, but his inward care deepens. Even this simple woman can read it at a glance!

Digitized by Google

"Fool that I was," he thinks, condemning himself bitterly. "to stoop to such imposture to win the woman I love. But she thought I was rich from the first, and I did not like to undeceive her. I'll work like a horse and make up for it somehow, besides she has money of her own. What a miserable misunderstanding it has been. Why did I let her believe?"

"You are very silent," remarks Eleanor, watching his expression. "What are you thinking of?"

"My sins of the past and how to redeem them in the future."

"Oh! don't bother about your sins this morning, it is much too bright and exhilarating in the frosty air, besides, here is Erminie. Doesn't she look a duck in that fur toque? Come, I am tired of waiting."

* * * * *

Nelson's greatest friend, Jack Woodherst, came to him the following day in the City. They had been like brothers since their boyhood, and were deeply attached to each other.

Buries his face in the cushions.

"Hulloa, old man," cries Nelson, "what's up?" noting his friend's harassed, care-worn look.

Jack holds out his hand mechanically, his eyes are haggard and blood-shot from want of sleep, his face is pale as death—drawn, old!

"I am in awful straits for money," he replies, "and I have come to implore you, Nelson, to buy my shares in the 'Golden Link Mine.' I received them for an interest I had in the property. I know they will become very valuable. I must raise £1,000. Will you let me have it for these shares? They are intrinsically worth a great deal more, but being at present unmarketable, I cannot sell them. They will only stand you in 2s. 6d. a share."

Nelson controls a smile, and casting a glance at his watch chain, thinks that a few links of it are probably of more value than all the proffered shares.

Jack looks pleadingly.

"You will help me!"

Violent impulses are disturbing Nelson's mind. He must help his friend, but how can he? Such a sum from his small capital! It would be robbing Erminie. She must be his first consideration.

Then the black thought of how little he has considered her rushes across him, and—the ending. Only one end. He must be utterly ruined after their marriage by some imaginary disaster, which he has not yet concocted.

Yes, utterly ruined! So what difference would this make? He will have enough left to go on for a time, while arranging the impending catastrophe.

These thoughts pass in a second through his mind.

He will help his friend! This good action may comfort him, and palliate in a measure his deceit.

"Jack, old fellow," he says, "I'll do it!"

Jack grasps his hand, and is speechless for a moment with relief.

"Nelson," he cries, "you're a brick."

But Nelson Lane cannot endure thanks, and escapes from Jack's gratitude with a lighter heart than he has had for many a long day.

He dismisses the shares from his mind, however, hoping that Jack, who is going back to Western Australia, may sometime repay him.

His wedding-day approaches, and still unconfessed he leads Erminie from the altar, and together they go to foreign climes, each with a secret buried in their hearts.

* * * * *

"I quite miss Erminie and Nelson," says Eleanor, glancing at her husband across the tea-table with a bright smile. "They were most delightful people certainly."

"Yes, dear, and I really think we have been happier since their visit. They were so peaceful, so loving together, perhaps it was the force of good example."

"I don't think there has been one cross word for a fortnight," says Eleanor laughing. She piles up the silken pillows on the sofa beside her.

"Come and sit here close by me, and we will have a little flirtation, like in the old days. Only you must imagine these brocade flowers are real red field poppies, and this sofa is a haycock, just at the back of Copthorne Farm. I can almost hear the lazy hum of the bees, and smell the fresh mown grass. I am not in a silk tea-jacket, but my old blue cotton frock with the tear in the elbow, you remember I caught it on a nail by the gate. Isn't it fun to make believe like children? We don't often play, do we Philip? You must take my hand very gently, under the hay," pulling the cushion over her wrist. "I draw it away, you see, rather shyly, looking deliciously coy, and say: 'Oh! you mustn't, Mr. Roche.'

"Then you are horribly audacious, and kiss me straight off, you know how you used to. We are silent for a few moments, just holding each others' hands in unspeakable content, the sort of ecstasy that comes before marriage.

"We listen to the birds singing—a thrush keeps repeating my name—they generally seem to say something. I remember one at home that used to sit outside my window and chirp: 'Think of it! think of it! think of it!' till I grew quite angry, always recalling an unpleasant incident. 'I don't want to think of it!' I would declare, stamping my foot. Oh! Philip, what a good actor you are! You look frightfully in love."

"I am," he murmurs tenderly, clasping her in his arms.

Eleanor laughs incredulously, and lays her head on his shoulder.

"Listen," she says, disengaging herself from his embrace. "We must not shock Sarah!"

The door is flung open.

"Mr. Quinton."

Eleaner rises slowly, her eyes flash with strange brilliancy; she trembles slightly, flushes, pales!

Her husband sees it in a moment—the rush of colour to her cheeks, and the pallor as her hand meets Carol's.

Philip mutters something inaudible under his breath. The chilly air of winter creeps through the hayfield behind Copthorne Farm—the voices of birds are dead—it is cold, cruel January once more!

A horrible presentiment steals over him, numbing his senses—paralysing his brain. This man seems their evil genius, the red firelight playing on his tall slim figure, transforms him in Philip's eyes to a crimson Mephistopheles. Eleanor pours out a fresh cup of tea, and hands it to Mr. Quinton smilingly, as a moment ago she did to her husband.

She moves the poppy-patterned pillows for the newcomer; he is beside her now on the sofa.

Philip feels left out. A jealous pang shoots through him like the stab of a knife, or the burning of iron red-hot on the flesh. Yet, Eleanor, unconscious of the evil feelings she arouses, takes but little notice of her husband, and hangs upon Carol's words with eager interest, agrees with all he says, prevents him leaving twice when he rises to go, and hopes he will "look in again" soon.

"You might have asked him to stay and dine, Philip," she declares, when they are again alone. "He is so chatty and amusing. Why, what are you looking so black about?"

Digitized by Google

"I can't bear the fellow," mutters Philip. "I should like to knock him down when he looks at you out of those loathsome eyes, and talks rot enough to make one sick. The worst of it is you like him. I shudder for your taste."

"You are prejudiced," replies Eleanor hotly, "you can't bear me to have a friend that is not of your own choosing! My taste wasn't a thing to be shuddered at when I married you, was it? A selfish, egotistical——"

"Hush, Eleanor," he says, laying his hands firmly but not unkindly on her shoulders. "Don't let us quarrel, you will be sorry afterwards."

"I don't care that" (with a snap of her fingers) "whether we quarrel or not. It is better though to speak out than bottle it up inside. There! now you have got your reproachful look again, like the day you said I was vulgar! Let me go," wriggling herself free.

She stifles a sob, bangs through the door, and runs upstairs whistling. The refrain of the "Miller's" song is wafted down to the hall in Eleanor's clear, rich voice:

I care for nobody, no, not I,
If nobody cares for me.

Philip walks slowly back to the sofa, gazes a moment at the cushions, then buries his face in their midst, grinding his teeth.

CHAPTER VIII.

Kind Hearts are More than Coronets.

Giddy Mounteagle's face is wreathed in smiles as she talks animatedly to Eleanor.

"Yes, my dear," she says triumphantly, "Lady MacDonald comes to me to-morrow. She is one of the smartest women in town and moves in the best circles. She will stay the night and be the belle of my 'At home' the following day. I long to introduce her to you. Such a stately, aristocratic-looking woman, a little 'difficult' sometimes, but usually charming. She takes offence if you introduce her to any one not quite up to the mark, and, since her marriage, is very particular whom she knows. I used to see a great deal of her before she was Lady MacDonald, but lately we have drifted apart."

"Is she stuck up?" asks Eleanor bluntly.

"No, that is hardly the word. 'Proud,' shall we say: 'dignified.'"

"Because she has married an old lord? How amusing! I shall like to see her."

"I will bring her to tea with you, Eleanor," replies Mrs. Mounteagle, feeling she is conferring an immense honour on Mrs Roche. "Mind you use that duck of a service, and wear your heliotrope gown. You look so distingué in it, and dear Lady MacDonald notices clothes."

"Any more orders?" asks Eleanor laughing.

Giddy's glance sweeps over the room.

"Yes. Remove that awful photograph, the one of the old people outside a farmhouse. It is not ornamental, and quite spoils the beauty of that corner. Lady MacDonald is so critical it might catch her eye."

"Then she will have to sit with her back to it or suffer," replies Eleanor staunchly. "It is my favourite picture, and I don't mean to take it down."

Giddy sighs, puts on a martyred expression, and kicks the footstool.

"Your taste is as terrible as ever," she declares sadly, shaking her head. "What would you have been, Eleanor, if I hadn't taken you in hand?"

"I don't know, dear," she cries, feeling she has been ungrateful. "You have done me no end of good turns! But I love that portrait, it is sentiment."

"An old nurse of yours and her husband?" asks Giddy.

Eleanor flushes rosy red.

She would like to say "my parents," but dreads Giddy's cynical smile. She could not bear to hear them scoffed at, even in their absence.

Instead she murmurs

"That woman nursed me in her arms as a baby, tended me in childhood—loved me always."

Eleanor, on tiptoe, kisses the two faces in the photo.

"They are good," she says, "generous, kind-hearted; they might grace the grandest palace——"

"And smile at the claims of long descent," quotes the widow. "What a true little woman you are, Eleanor! Sometimes I half envy you, gaucheries and all!"

"I can't help being stupid, Giddy; I was not born wise, like you."

"Yet you really have developed marvellously under my training. The way you kept up the conversation at that dull luncheon party last week was admirable. I could not have done it better myself. As it was, a wretched sore throat condemned me to silence. How your badinage with Quinton astonished our hostess! She sat up so straight in her chair, I thought her fringe curls would reach the ceiling. She will never invite you there again, but it was simply splendid.

"'What do you think of Mrs. Roche?' I asked her afterwards, when Carol was bending over you in the window seat. She drew in her thin lips and muttered: 'Most refreshing!' in a tone that meant something very different."

"What did it mean?" cries Eleanor, with a gasp.

"I am in too great a hurry now to interpret," answers Giddy, kissing her effusively. "Ta-ta, beloved—and mind you adopt your best Society airs for Lady MacDonald to-morrow. She will swallow any amount, and may be very useful to us in town. Comprenez-vous?"

* * * * *

Eleanor is quite in a flutter the following afternoon. Her room looks bright with flowers purchased that morning

Kisses the faces in the photos.

Digitized by Google

"We couldn't help bringing him," says Mr. Grebby.

in the town, her Crown Derby tea-service is set out on a new and dainty cloth, which had been laid by for an occasion. The curtains are drawn to shut away the dreary fog, and fire-light mingles with the rosy rays from a tall lamp. Eleanor is still quite in a tremble lest the oil should smell, as Sarah frequently fails over the art of wick trimming.

"How does my heliotrope go with this chair?" she asks, settling her sleeves, and critically contrasting the yellow brocade furniture with the shade of her gown.

Sarah assures her the effect is most desirable, as she places a pink iced cake by the tray.

"Don't keep Lady MacDonald waiting on the doorstep; you might be in the hall ready to answer the bell."

"Yes, ma'am."

"And if the fog gets denser light the gas outside."

Eleanor draws her chair to the fire, and pretends to read a Society paper, but her thoughts are far from the fashion article.

She is supremely contented with herself and her surroundings. Her hair has its prettiest wave to-day, she is wearing her smartest toilette, and a new pair of bronzed beaded shoes. Her only trial in life at this moment is the propensity shown by her diamond crescent to turn over in its bed of lace, and reveal the back, with a fastening for a hairpin. She fixes it in her fringe at night.

A little tremble of excitement rushes over Eleanor; the bell rings.

Sarah flings open the door, and Giddy Mounteagle sails into the room with Lady MacDonald. Mrs. Roche feels quite small and insignificant under the stranger's patronising smile.

Lady MacDonald raises her long-handled lorgnette to scrutinise her surroundings.

Giddy is conscious of the offending photograph. Eleanor draws forward the largest chair. Lady MacDonald sinks gracefully back among the cushions, her head poised on one side—she always holds it so. Some admirer once told her it was like a flower bending on its stem with the weight of its own beauty.

"Oh! the fog outside," she cries, with an affected little cough, first cousin to a sigh. "I suppose it rises from the river."

Digitized by Google

"Yes, and creeps into your soul, and clogs your brain," adds Giddy, "the yellow land of mist is not attractive."

"No one will turn up at your party to-morrow," says Eleanor, "if it doesn't lift."

"I never thought of that. The professionals will be stuck on the line, perhaps, and we shall have a songless, tuneless, 'musical,' with only locals to eat our cakes."

"My husband has promised to fetch me to-morrow; I must be back in town by seven, for two or three evening engagements," says Lady MacDonald.

"Then I am glad mine is an afternoon," murmurs Giddy, "or I should not have secured you. It is delightful of dear Lord MacDonald to drive down."

"Oh! he always does what I tell him," she replies, with a superior smile.

She has a quantity of jingling golden ornaments hanging from a chatelaine at her waist, a gold crown on the handle of her lorgnette, and so many rings on her long pink fingers that they bulge over her knuckles. Her nails are manicured to appear almost crimson, her teeth are shining white under her curved lips, that look capable of bitter sayings and smiles of scorn.

"The fire is too hot," she says, laying one soft hand against a still softer cheek. Her complexion is a marvel. Eleanor hands her a painted screen.

"What a charming picture," continues Lady MacDonald. "I adore nymphs. Did you paint this, Mrs. Roche?"

"Yes," replied Giddy, "Eleanor is a perfect artist."

Eleanor raises her eyebrows, staring at Giddy in amazement, never having touched a brush in her life.

"Do you exhibit?"

Giddy again answers for Eleanor.

"Mr. Roche won't let her, he thinks any publicity infra dig for a woman."

"Perhaps he is right," says Lady MacDonald; "I know Edward won't allow me to pen a line for the press, though I have quite a genius for scribbling. He is so mad because people get my picture sometimes for the Society papers. I have to hide them away from him. The last one caught his eye hung up on a bookstall, and he was nearly suffocated with wrath on the spot, and could not speak for three minutes."

"The penalty of beauty," cries Giddy gaily.

"Are you one of the types of English beauty?" asks Eleanor.

"Oh! no. Nothing so common. I leave that to Irish belles, and ladies of the ballet."

She raises her delicate chin, and rests her languid eyes on Mrs. Roche.

The door opens, and Sarah's voice announces:

"Mr. and Mrs. Grebby!"

Eleanor starts to her feet, and rushes forward.

"Father! Mother!"

There they stand. Mrs. Grebby in a black satin gown, a long gold chain suspended round her neck, a Paisley shawl crossed over her chest, and a close bonnet of quilted blue satin.

Mr. Grebby, with a sparse frill of grey hair growing right round his face, his chin and long upper lip guiltless of hirsute appendages. A gorgeous suit of a very baggy cut, flowered satin waistcoat, and a basket of apples and cooking pears in his hand, as a present to his daughter.

At his heels a shaggy dog, blind in one eye and toothless—one that in its puppyhood had leaped and played with Eleanor in the green fields of Copthorne Farm.

A cry of delight breaks from her, as she hugs her parents in turn, and catches sight of her old favourite.

"Rover—my darling!" she exclaims, sinking on her knees to fondle the dog.

He springs up with his muddy feet on the shoulders of her beautiful heliotrope dress. His claws catch in the lace, but she heeds them not, only laughs gleefully as he licks her face.

"We couldn't help bringing him," says Mr. Grebby, wiping his brow with a red handkerchief, which is shining and damp from excitement. "Poor fellow, he did want to come! Black Bess will miss him, won't she?"

"We took it into our heads sudden like to visit London and surprise you, dearie," Mrs. Grebby vouchsafes.

"How lovely of you!" cries Eleanor, in her joy forgetting the guests by the fire, then she turns and faces them.

Giddy feels as if cold water is coursing down her back, the palms of her hands are icy cold. The feathers in her friend's hat seem dancing up and down before her eyes.

Lady MacDonald is positively glaring through her tortoiseshell glasses.

There is an air of offended dignity in her mien, as she looks the couple up and down freezingly.

"This is my father and mother," says Eleanor, an elated smile upon her lips, a merry sparkle in her eyes. What do these people matter, now that her parents have come to her new home? She longs to show them everything, and watch their wonder.

"Mr. and Mrs. Grebby, Lady MacDonald, Mrs. Mounteagle," she continues. "Now, Ma dear, you sit here," pulling up a chair between Giddy and Lady MacDonald. "Loosen your shawl, or you'll scorch, and I will give you some tea."

Mrs. Grebby gazes in awestruck wonder at the grandly dressed visitors, and her daughter's elaborate clothes.

Mr. Grebby stumps round the room, remarking on everything.

Mr. Grebby stumps round the room, remarking on everything.

"Well there! What do you say to that for a picture," addressing his wife. "Tell Ma to come here, Eleanor, I want 'er to see this 'orse, and the lady on the moon in the next frame. I wish you could paint pictures, my girl, but maybe Mr. Roche will 'ave you taught."

Digitized by Google

Giddy flushes scarlet. Lady MacDonald fans herself violently with the screen. Mrs. Grebby takes the tiny cup Eleanor hands her, and turns it round to examine it. Then her eyes fall on the slices of thin bread and butter, the dainty biscuits, and minute squares of buttered toast.

"Don't you get 'ungry, dearie?" she asks. "I thought you'd be sure to 'ave a knife-and-fork tea, living in this style."

Her daughter laughs heartily. A wicked desire to shock Lady Macdonald, as Giddy has so often excited her to do on previous occasions, seizes Eleanor.

"Oh, no, Ma! We have big dinners at eight o'clock. Five courses and serviettes. You ask Lady MacDonald!"

"I don't call this a cup," declares Mr. Grebby, grinning broadly as Eleanor hands him his tea. "It's more like an acorn!" He takes half-a-dozen slices of bread and butter and munches them hungrily.

"I'm a bit peckish, my girl," he says. "But then we've had a long day, and fastin' don't agree with me! We went to the Tower, Madame Tussaud's, and the Exhibition of Tortures in Leicester Square. We liked that best of all."

"But what did you do with Rover?" asks Eleanor, exciting the dog to jump on the sofa and patting his wet nose.

"We left him at Cousin Harriet's. We can stay the night here with you, and after that we are going to put up a bit at her lodging-house in Bloomsbury. Ma was set on bringing old Rover to see you, as we think he won't last long now."

"The dear fellow!" murmurs Eleanor, cutting the pink cake. "Some more tea, Lady MacDonald?"

"No thank you," and the severity of the tone startles Eleanor.

She fears she has committed some deadly offence in offering this proud beauty a second cup. Never was there a more grotesque tea-party on the terrace than in Eleanor's boudoir that afternoon. Giddy with deepest shame, resentment and horror, raging in her heart. Lady MacDonald haughty and disdainful, eyeing the homely couple as she would the beasts at the Zoo. Mrs. Grebby, speechless in admiring silence, fingering the frills of the sofa cushions, and taking in the pattern of the wall-paper, her breast swelling with pride and gratification. Mr. Grebby, his large boots on the brightly polished fender, his red face wreathed in smiles, as bucolic a specimen of manhood as Copthorne could produce.

Lastly, Eleanor, looking perfectly fairy-like under the red lamp, caressing the old dog with her slim white hands, and talking first to one guest, then to the other, with supreme good nature, her father's basket of apples on her knee.

"I must send some of these pears in to you, Giddy," she says, "I can't spare the apples, but your cook may like to stew——"

She pauses, reading her friend's expression of disdain.

She stammers something unintelligible to hide her confusion, wondering what she has said to offend, and changing the subject, asks hesitatingly:

"Did—er did you put me up for the 'Butterflies?'"

Mrs. Mounteagle had only that morning requested Lady MacDonald to second Eleanor.

Now she grows crimson at the thought, for Lady MacDonald is her trump card in the club.

"Thinking it over," replies Giddy. "I am quite sure Mr. Roche won't approve of us poor little Butterflies. He will imagine that a club must necessarily be emancipated, that it will lead you into latchkey habits, and advance your ideas too rapidly. I should advise you to stay at home, my dear, and" (with a cynical little smile) "stew your pears."

Mrs. Grebby has drawn the parish magazine from the recesses of an enormous pocket in her petticoat, and hands it to her daughter.

"I thought you'd like to read the news," she says. "Mrs. King's baby was christened last Sunday, and the little Browns have spread the measles in the schools."

Lady MacDonald and Giddy exchange glances that palpably say: "Why don't we go?"

The fact is Mrs. Mounteagle has been rooted to the spot, paralysed as it were by a sense of shame and humiliation.

Lady MacDonald has watched the scene as at a play, a comedy in low-life, acted for the benefit of the stalls and boxes.

"We really must go," murmurs Giddy hastily, catching her breath. She rises, gathering up a long feather boa to wind round her neck.

Lady MacDonald follows her example, her jingling chatelaine clanks irritatingly, as if protesting at being found in such company.

She draws on a light kid glove, proffering Eleanor her finger-tips.

"Good-bye, Mrs. Roche," she drawls. "I have so enjoyed a peep at your little coterie to-day, but we really must not intrude ourselves upon you longer, you will have so many home topics to discuss."

Mrs. Mounteagle refrains from her customary caress, whereat Eleanor remarks:

"How pale you look, Giddy! Are you ill?"

"Yes," she replies, under her breath, "I have over-eaten myself—overdone with APPLES!"

(To be continued.)

A TEN-POUND PRIZE.

(See Next Page.)

On the next page is a puzzle picture composed of 88 squares. If these squares be rearranged in a certain order they will form a real picture.

We offer a prize of £10 to the first person who sends the correct solution. In order to give readers in all parts of the United Kingdom as equal a chance as possible, the whole of the solutions received at 17, Henrietta Street in any one day will be considered together. In the very unlikely chance of two or more correct solutions being included in one day's post, the prize will be given to the sender of the neatest one. Consolation Prizes will be awarded at the discretion of the Editor.

If no correct solution be received on or before Tuesday, March 3rd, 1896, the Ten-Pound Prize will be given to the sender of the solution then to hand which is most nearly correct.

Pictures should be packed flat or folded, not rolled, and the outside wrapper must be marked "March."

N.B.—To make the puzzle more difficult some of the squares have been turned upside down.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

A Mother of Mexico.

"MAMACITA," cried Blaso Aldana, coming across the patio with old Dolores, her sometime nurse and present maid, shuffling at her heels; "mamacita! The Saenz were robbed last night. The door of the sala was broken in and the house ransacked. Lupe's pearls are gone, with all the silver cups, and spoons, and ladles, and Julio's suit that cost three hundred dollars, and, oh! a lot of money Don Lauro had in his chest."

Cleofas Mora, widow of Aldana, shook her head in silent comment. She had heard all too much in the last few weeks of the depredations committed by the lawless gentry who had just begun to work their way up to Chihuahua from the States below.

"And, mamma," said Blasita, "Lupe Saenz says that Lorenzo Garcia has been walking past her window every night this week, and she is quite sure he cares more for her than for Augustina."

"Chismes!" then answered Cleofas Mora. "Why do you retail gossip? Have I not heart and hands full already, that you should come babbling of Guadalupe Saenz and her flirtations? I thank the saints that my Augustina is a prudent child, who does not take up with every young blade that appears on the Alameda. Who is this Lorenzo Garcia?—whence comes he?—to whom does he bring letters? In my young days we knew who a man might be before we owned he watched under our windows. A pretty pass we are coming to."

Now, truth to tell, Doña Cleofas was, on the average, little of a scold; but to-day she was sore distraught. She was the fortunate possessor of means, moderate enough to be sure, but still adequate for her needs, and she and hers were gifted with sound minds and bodies. But at the present moment she was much exercised in spirit, and over the very two matters on which Blasita had touched so glibly.

There was no doubt that Lorenzo Garcia had been making tentative advances towards the house of Aldana. And there was equal certainty that Augustina was rather kindly disposed to hearken to the voice of the charmer, coyly as yet, it was true, and not to a compromising degree; but Doña Cleofas foresaw a lively contest for the day when the girl should definitely decide for her quasi admirer, for Augustina was endowed with some tenacity of purpose.

Lorenzo Garcia was a stranger in Chihuahua, for whom none could vouch, and, for all his handsome eyes and suave address, Doña Cleofas had no notion of passing over to his control one-third of the snug little sum she had laid by as dowry for her daughters. Now, too, Doña Cleofas had another source of disturbance, which she would by no means impart to her household, composed exclusively of women as it was. In the silent hours of the preceding night she had heard clearly and distinctly the sound of feet moving cautiously in the little court of her domicile, and her big watch-dog Pinto had been found stiff and dead that morning, although none save herself had thought of the cause she confidently assigned for his demise.

So far as appeared, there was no protection to be had. The Aldana abode was rather isolated, and the very peculiarities of architectural form which render a Mexican house almost like a fortress to outside attack, virtually cut off communication with and assistance from the outside world, once the foe has gained foothold within the gates. In those days the police force of Chihuahua, now admirably organised, was insignificant both as to numerical strength and effectiveness. Then Doña Cleofas, imbued with the spirit of woman's subjugation and social passivity of her race and day, felt that she could call on no man of her acquaintance for succour or protection. There was nothing to do but await the course of events.

The day went on, slowly enough, perhaps, to Augustina, before whose eyes the form of Lorenzo appeared not, but all too swiftly to her mother, enduring a sort of breathless apprehension. Night fell, and the little family, shut inside their four walls, passed the long winter evening as best they might. At bed-time Doña Cleofas called her people together, and, to their surprise and against their protests, marshalled them away to a great room, a guest-chamber rarely used, which lay at the rear of the house, towards the kitchens, and which was strongly defended, having no windows, but only heavy oaken doors. These Doña Cleofas locked and barred securely, and mustered her flock together.

"Hush, Blasa! and you, too, Augustina. But look you at Eduarda, the youngest of you all—how silently she obeys, while you set up a clamour. Why do I bring you here? Because I will so, then. How now! Am I no longer mistress in my own abode? Here are three beds with ample pillows—get you to rest. And you, Beata, Hermelinda, and Dolores"—to the sewing-women—"spread out your blankets here on the floor, near the ninas, and let me hear not so much as a chirp from one of you till I call you in the morning."

Thus, disguising her tenderness and anxious fears with severe speech, like many a woman of greater lore before her, Doña Cleofas summarily locked the one remaining door from the outside and marched away alone. She was confident that if trouble were imminent, it would come in the direction of the little shop that was her source of income, where was a respectable stock of goods of worth, portable, besides her strong box itself—no patent money-safes being obtainable in Chihuahua.

Thither, then, to the store-room behind the shop did Doña Cleofas wend her way, and near by its weak point, a small door, opening on the patio, she seated herself in a great arm-chair of willow-work, and for a brief time gave herself up to the luxury of weeping. For, with all her force and decision of character, Doña Cleofas was but a woman, and it might be on the cards that she should gaze not on the faces of her children again.

She had brought her arsenal with her; no cunning fabrication of Colt's, nor many-balled Winchester; for these inventions of murderous man, to maim and slay his fellows, Doña Cleofas had not the slightest use; she was the traditional woman in her horror of firearms, and would not have known how to make offensive use of them, unless as missiles to be hurled against an intruder's head. But alongside her, and resting against her knee, lay a heavy long-helved axe, whose keen, broad edge had never been turned against knot of stubborn oak nor the gnarled roots that serve as fuel thereabouts. And Doña Cleofas had all faith in the power of her own right arm to wield it hard and well against a foe.

Digitized by Google

The night went on, the silence was unbroken, and Doña Cleofas slept—slept hard and fast until, all at once, with a start, she was as wide awake as ever she was in her life, and realising that very close to her the throat of a man was emitting laboured yet rapid breathings. The auditory sense was strong and definite in Doña Cleofas, and it took her not many seconds to decide that the intruder had crawled through an opening cut in the panel of the door before her, and there he was, apparently caught fast, sprawling, clawing, and wriggling to force himself farther in and clear of the opening. Now and then, in the fellow's contortions, his hot breath swept the hand of the watcher.

Doña Cleofas drew a deep, soundless breath, and, rising swiftly, noiselessly to her feet, raised the axe in the air. Swift as light it fell—chack! One mighty, convulsive writhe, and the man with that last twisting shudder had drawn himself past the grip of the ragged planks, and Doña Cleofas, stooping resolutely, drew him quite within with as natural a movement as her quivering nerves could compass.

A few moments of silence; then, barely audible, a sibilant whisper: "Thou, Lencho, is all well?" Through the hollowed hands of Doña Cleofas an answer was sent back: "All well—come on!" Then, almost breath for breath, that same scene, unviewed in the great darkness, was enacted, and yet again.

But the third time, what with the strain on her over-wrought nerves, and the tax on her aching muscles, as she dragged aside three well-grown bodies—the third time, and little wonder Doña Cleofas could not answer the question: "Art safely in? Does all go well?" But the fourth man, cautiously putting his head within the gap to reconnoitre just missed the blow of the heavy axe.

Staying the steps of a tottering woman.

"Por Dios! but what was that? Some treachery is here," his voice broke forth. "And—the earth beneath the door is wet—with something slippery—hot—good Heavens—with blood!" There was a smothered howl of rage and fear, the rush of scuffling feet, a ladder rattling against the wall, as it was drawn up to the roof, and Doña Cleofas was alone, but for the dead.

The dawn had not yet opened into day when a watchman, staying the steps of a tottering woman, knocked at the great zaguan door of the Jefe Politico's house, and, after a parley with the servant on duty and his summons to the master, the prefect came forth, looking curiously at the pale, haggard face of his early guest.

"But what is this, good Doña Cleofas? I cannot credit the tale, and yet your blood-stained hands and garb—well, well! You go not hence on foot, nor fasting. After so sore a struggle you must want strength. Come in and sit you down while coffee and wine are brought to us, and the horses are put to my coach."

But if the good woman had seemed faint and ill when she sought the aid of the prefect, she had well-nigh quite recovered her wonted calm and self-reliance when she stood, an hour later, beside that dignitary and watched his wondering face, while he stripped the black masks from the faces of the dead.

"This is 'El Zorro,' the Fox," he murmured, consulting a formidable-looking paper adorned with great red seals; "that is to say, he corresponds in every particular with the description of that bandit sent up for my instruction by my esteemed colleague, the Jefe of Zacatecas. This bearded one must be—yes—the Tarantula; and this one—I seem to know his face."

"No doubt," said Doña Cleofas drily; "with the name of Lorenzo Garcia, he has been playing the gallant to such of our girls as would hear him, and, no doubt, getting from them the points to use in his raids. Faith, one of my own pullets has listened to his purr! Señor Jefe, if I have done aught that merits praise, I pray your licence to go and bring the girl, to whom, perhaps your grace will say a word. A hard test for her?—an awful sight? 'Tis so, your worship; but the chit needs the lesson. What might it not have been for her mother?"

All ignorant of what was going on, the rest of Doña Cleofas's flock thought it hard she should forbid them to follow Tina; but so the dame decrees, and locked them fast again, all breakfastless, pending the place was freed from its ghastly sights. And never, in Augustina's life to come, would she forget the awful scene, as she came to where the three stark dead men lay, drawn by her mother's hand.

"Santo Cristo!" she cried; "what is it?—what does it mean?"

"It means, my child," the Jefe hastened to answer, "that your ready acceptance of the attentions of a stranger might have brought ruin and death upon your house. As it is, your good wise mother has averted the danger, and even has added to your dowry, since to her accrue the fifteen hundred good, hard dollars offered by the paternal government for these three robbers she has killed, the leaders of an infamous band. Yes," he answered her piteous look; "yes, even this handsome Lencho, who was the decoy, the traitor, the spy, the worst of all the lot. What! Catch her! she is fainting! Ah, well, in truth he is, or was, a handsome scamp. Your axe has marred his beauty, good Cleofas!"

The family Aldana still live in Chihuahua. The daughters all are married, and the unwritten history of the city, noted for its obedient, discreet maidens, places foremost in the rank of good daughters, the three of Doña Cleofas, and most submissive and dutiful of them all, Augustina.

Y. H. Addis.

Digitized by Google

ON Saturday, December 5th, 1880, I sailed from Liverpool to New York in the Cunard liner Gallia, then a comparatively new boat. It was certainly not the best time of year to choose for an ocean voyage; but it was not a matter of choice with me. In my capacity as special Queen's messenger I was obliged to take out to the embassy at Washington some official documents of an urgent character, but as regards the nature of which I can say no more. No time was to be lost, and on the Friday night preceding, when just sitting down to dinner with a couple of friends whom I had asked to join me in the discussion of a brace of pheasants from my eldest brother's well-stocked preserves, I was summoned post-haste to the Foreign Office.

Leaving my wife to do the honours alone, I bade good-bye to her and my comfortable warm dining-room, and took the first train up to town, getting my papers and instructions and going on to Liverpool by the midnight express from St. Pancras. It can be imagined that my preparations for a sea voyage were not on a very extensive scale. But Queen's messengers for foreign service are used to that sort of thing. I don't count the eight home service chaps who for two hundred a year make daily trips by special train up to Balmoral, or down to Windsor, or Osborne, and back, with a dispatch-box full of papers with which to beguile the time of Her Most Gracious Majesty, and bring home to the nation that she works for a living. These fellows have an easy time of it.

But we foreigners—there were twelve of us always ready, if not willing, to start off to Brazil or Siberia at an hour's notice. But we get four hundred pounds a year, with an allowance of one pound a day and travelling expenses when away from home, which is not to be sneezed at in these days when lots of fellows from Oxford and Cambridge are glad enough to go out as under-gatekeepers. Still one isn't apt to think of that when compelled to go away on a sudden for thousands of miles at such a time of year.

As we dropped down the Mersey and headed down channel in a chilly, drizzling rain, I didn't know a soul on board. My mission was of a sufficiently secret character (how little the general world knows of what diplomacy is doing for its good!) to make it expedient that my identity should be unknown to even the officers of the ship; otherwise I should have been duly accredited to Captain Hains and have fared like a prince. I went into the saloon and sat down to write up my diary notes in my pocket-book.

In looking over the papers in the pockets I came on a bill from a ready-money shop in London, where my wife had bought some new drawing-room curtains, and which had been sent down by post that morning. In the sudden hurry of my coming away I had forgotten all about it. It wouldn't keep till I came back, and I didn't want my wife bothered with it. What was I to do? The bill was for a few shillings under five pounds. I looked over my money, and, as good luck would have it, found a five-pound note which I hadn't changed into American money. I would send that, and they could send the change and receipt to my wife.

Getting a sheet of my ship's notepaper and a couple of envelopes from the saloon steward, I wrote a few lines explaining, inclosed the bill and note, first entering, as was my custom, the number 76-1, 28396, in my pocket-book, fastened up the envelope, addressed it, stuck my last English stamp on it, and put it back in my pocket-book, preparatory to posting it at Queenstown.

The ship wasn't full. Transatlantic steamers seldom are at that time of year, either with passengers or cargo, so that the first day's dinner as we rounded Holyhead, and the next morning's breakfast as we lay at Queenstown waiting for the mails, were sufficient for the completion of the mental catalogue, which, when on a sea voyage, I invariably make of my travelling companions. With the exception of two men, whose acquaintance I subsequently made, there were none who could be classed as out of the common run of men and women as they go.

One of these two was named Kimball—Professor Kimball, as I found upon inspection of the printed list which the Cunard company so unlimitedly and gratuitously bestow upon each passenger—and the way we made acquaintance was thus: He was my next door neighbour at meals, and our acquaintance began by the usual formula: "First voyage, sir?"

After that we were good friends whenever we met. He was a man of about fifty, I should say, with a foreign air, and pompous manner. In his buttonhole he wore the red ribbon of the Legion of Honour. As for the other man, he came up to me when I was sitting alone in the smoking-room while we lay at Queenstown, and while Divine service was going on in the saloon, asked if I read at sea, and offered to lend me a book.

"My name is Jervise," he said. "Oh, you won't find it in the list. You needn't look. I only took my passage the day the ship sailed, and they hadn't time to print it."

Digitized by Google

I thought this strange, as I had done the same, yet my name was in.

"Here is my card, if you doubt it, sir," he went on in rather a hurt tone, as he fumbled in his pocket. "I haven't got one, but I will give you one again."

I told him it didn't matter in the least, and he continued, with a pleased smile: "But to return to the books. I know there's a library on board, but everyone knows what a ship's library is—'Robinson Crusoe,' the 'Swiss Family Robinson.' There's sure to be a Robinson somewhere." I laughed, and told him I had the honour of possessing the name of Robinson myself, whereat he coloured slightly, and said: "No offence, I hope, sir." I told him not the least, and he went on again: "Now I've laid in a good stock of recent novels—just the sort of light reading for a sea-voyage like this. I'll show them to you if you come down in my cabin. Come along now."

I bade good-bye to my wife.

He conducted me to one of the best state-rooms in the ship—an outside one—and well forward of the saloon and machinery. I was surprised at this, and told him so.

"I thought you said you only took your passage yesterday?" I said.

"That's just where it is," he replied; "these good rooms are always kept back at this season, and the inferior ones sold first. There were only good ones left when I applied. See?" and he laughed at the cleverness of it. I confess I didn't see, but didn't tell him so. I thought I'd find out from someone who knew better how these matters were managed.

He showed me all his books—a varied assortment of novels principally, with here and there a work on magic and sleight-of-hand. "The Memoirs of Robert Houdin" was one of them, I remember. We chatted along pleasantly for half-an-hour, smoking cigarettes with the door shut and port open, which—the ship not being under way—the steward hadn't fastened.

"You seem to take a considerable interest in this sort of thing," I said, picking up a magician book.

"Well, yes, I do," he answered; "I have for some years. Indeed, in a small way, I've gone in for amateur conjuring, and have taken lessons from no less than—" he said some name that I couldn't catch. "I find a good deal of amusement in it. I will give you a few 'sleights' to show you what an amateur can do."

I told him I should only be too glad, and thereupon went through a short series of sleight-of-hand tricks, such as vanishing coins, passing two into one, and crushing a lemon through the top of his portmanteau, afterwards picking it out of my hair—very simple, commonplace ones as he claimed, being only "palming," as he called it, but at the same time very cleverly and neatly performed.

"By Jove!" said I, "you ought to go on the stage. No one could do better than that."

"I did think of it once," he said, in a curiously gloomy tone, but brightening up the next instant. "Oh, those are not anything. I wish I could show you something really worth notice. Let me see. Yes, I might do that one. Wait a moment." He went to a small black leather bag, such as London city men carry, and unlocking it, looked it well over. "No, I am sorry to say, I haven't one. I thought I had. It's too bad, for it's an awfully pretty trick."

I asked him what he wanted, thinking it might be some article common to Transatlantic passengers.

"It's only a five-pound note. But never mind. I'll try something else."

I am sure I wish I had let him; but I gave my pocket-book a look through. I found nothing but circular notes upon Coutts & Co, a few American five-dollar pieces, and some loose silver.

"I thought I had a five-pound note," I said, and then remembered the letter. "Stay. I think I can find one, but I'm afraid it is fastened up." I took the letter out of its compartment, and found in doing so the unused envelope I had put in with it. "It's all right, though, for I can put it up again in this." I tore open the letter and took out the five-pound note and handed it to him. He took it and crumpled it up quickly in his fingers, shut his hand an instant and opened it again. The note was gone. My face must have shown the concern I felt, for he said:

Digitized by Google

"Any letters, sir? Mail-bag just going."

"Oh, don't be alarmed. It's safe enough now," drawing it out as if from his skull-cap, and smoothing it out between his hands; "but we'll give it another test." He struck a match along his leg, and, putting the edge of the note into the flame before I could stay his arm, it flared up as though soaked in turpentine, and fell in curled-up ashes on the floor.

"I say!" I exclaimed, quite carried away by the dexterous deception, "you have no right to do that."

He laughed a merry laugh.

"No harm I assure you." He put his fingers into the watch-pocket of my waistcoat—a pocket I never use, by-the-bye—drew out the note, and handed it to me.

"There's your note safe and sound," he said, "and I should advise you to put it up again in your letter as quick as you can—not through fear of its ultimate destruction at my hands, but there goes the bell of the tender, and you've no time to lose if you wish to post it in the ship's bag."

"It's the most wonderful trick I ever saw!" I went on, still lost in amazement and admiration at the simplicity of the trick. At that moment one of the stewards approached the door.

"Any letters, sir? Mail-bag just going."

"Yes, stop a moment. Here's one." I hastily folded up the note and thrust it into the fresh envelope with the bill and letter, licked the flap and smoothed it down, turning the letter over in doing so. "By Jove! I have forgotten the address, and I've no pen and ink."

"Here's an indelible pencil," said Jervise, "it will do as well."

I took the pencil and wrote down the address as quickly as possible, and then discovered I had no stamp.

"Botheration!" I said, trying to get the one off the old envelope. "I can't without tearing it."

"Oh, here's a stamp, too," said Jervise, quietly taking one out of his pocket-book. "It's all my fault, so it's only right I should stand some of the consequences."

I stuck the stamp on, and rushed up to the purser's office myself, not wishing to trust it to the steward after his seeing the note put in it. I was just in time, and dropped it in as the purser was in the act of locking the bag. I went back to Jervise's room, intending to pay him for the stamp, and in the hope of seeing some more tricks. He had gone. Presuming he had gone up on deck, as the steamer was getting under way, I went up there. But I could see him nowhere. Presently the gong sounded for luncheon—rather late, owing to the delay of the mails—and I went down. The Professor was there before me.

"Well, sir," he said, "been ashore, I suppose? I haven't seen you all the morning."

"No," I told him; "I've been down below, in a friend's room—at least an acquaintance, I made on board—and he's been doing some most wonderful tricks."

"Tricks?" he said, knitting his brow; "tricks, sir?"

"Why, conjuring tricks."

The Professor drew himself up quickly, and put down his knife and fork with a very visible start.

"Conjuring tricks?" he repeated; "and who, pray, sir, is there on board this ship who can do conjuring tricks? Perhaps you may not be aware, sir, that the art of necromancy, legerdemain, sleight-of-hand, prestidigitation, or whatever else you may choose to call the profession of magic, is my business, sir. I am now going out to a series of engagements in the States. My stage name is De Ville—suggestive and French, both most necessary in these days, sir," and he smiled.

The name seemed familiar. It seemed as though I had heard it before quite lately.

"Tell me, sir, who is this person who is thus——"

"Only a young man," I said; "only an amateur. Yet he did one remarkably clever trick right under my nose," and I told him about the five-pound note.

"My trick, sir! my invention!" he exclaimed.

"There's only one other person who knows—or, rather, knew—that trick, and I taught it to him, and he——"

"Beef or turkey?" interrupted the steward behind.

"Beef, please. And who may this young man be?"

I described Jervise as best I could. The Professor wheeled round his chair and looked at me severely.

"Come, sir, I see you know more about me than I thought. But that is no subject for joking, I think."

"Joking?" I said; "my dear sir, I'm not joking."

He had begun eating again, and said with a mouth half-full:

"I dare say you will tell me what the young man's name is——"

"Jervise," I interrupted.

The Professor dropped his knife and fork again, with a clatter, but quickly recovered himself.

"Now I know you are making this thing up, sir. But, as I said before, you have selected rather a cruel and heartless topic.

"Of course, you have heard, for it was this very ship," and he went on eating again. "It can't be a resemblance—leaving out the similarity of name—for I have no such person on board, and I think I know the face of every soul in the ship. Memory is part of my business, sir."

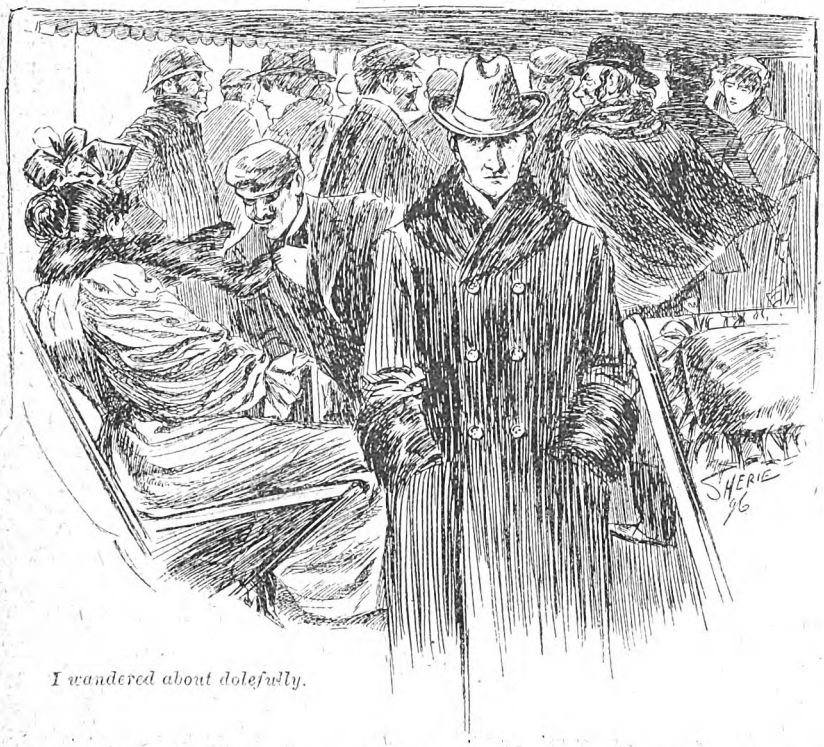
Digitized by Google

"Well, all I know is that I've been down in this man's room this morning, and saw the trick I told you of," I said, somewhat nettled at his manner and words. "I can tell you the number of the room, for I noticed it particularly, owing to the numerical sequence of the figures. It is 123."

"My room!" shouted the Professor. "Oh, ho—ho! Now I know you are humbugging. You've overdone it, sir. Suppose we drop the subject," and he gave me a withering scowl.

"Ah, captain," turning to Captain Hains, who at that moment came down and took his seat at the head of the table, "so we are now breasting the broad billows of the stormy ocean. Excuse me, sir; no more on that subject," as I made an effort to renew our conversation.

To a tender sailor like myself, the motion of the ship had become already rather trying. Annoyed at what I considered the Professor's rudeness, and feeling decidedly more uncomfortable every minute, I soon joined the small army of hasty departures from the different tables, and, postponing further talk with the Professor until we met again, went down to my berth. We had a succession of gales and storms after that and I kept my berth throughout, now and then making an effort to gain the deck, but never having one essay crowned with success.



I wandered about dolefully.

I saw nothing of either Jervise or Kimball. I took it for granted they were both ill, like myself, especially the former, for I didn't expect the latter, even if well, would get over his huff soon. I didn't trouble my head much about the Professor's remarkable behaviour at the luncheon table. It was some mistake of his exaggerated into a mountain by his vanity and annoyance at having anyone trespass on what he considered his exclusive preserves. During and after a week's régime of mal de mer one doesn't trouble oneself much about anything. I could hear nothing of either of the two men from my steward, whose "beat" didn't extend to the forward cabins.

My first appearance on deck, or indeed at a meal, was on the morning we got into New York for the first time, "weather permitting." It was clear and cold, and the sea smoothing down every minute as we approached Sandy Hook, and as I went up on deck I experienced that feeling which I dare say many another ocean traveller has felt after a long term below—viz., a sense of strangeness, as though I had just come on board.

No one seemed to know me or recognise me. I looked about for Jervise and Kimball, but could see neither. I knew no one I could ask about them, so I wandered about dolefully while everyone round me stood or sat in cliques and sets, laughing and joking in high spirits at the thoughts of landing. At length the luncheon-gong sounded for the last time, and in the hope that I might find the Professor, more than through any desire to eat, I went down to the table. Yes, there he sat, chatting away like old friends with everyone within his reach. It was some minutes before he noticed me.

"Well, I declare," he said, with his hands up in feigned surprise; "your face seems familiar. Ah, yes; you are the gentleman who used to sit next to me. Mr. Robinson, I believe. Glad to see you back again, sir, though it is but for one meal."

I bowed and thanked him, though inwardly vexed at his quizzing, which had brought the notice of a dozen grinning faces upon me. I wanted to get on the old subject, too, and didn't exactly know how. I didn't like to leave myself open to what he might choose to say before all these people, in whose eyes I had already assumed the preliminary proportions of a butt. At last, just as the Professor rolled up his napkin and drank a glass of ice-water, I ventured to remark to him:

"Oh, by-the-bye, Professor, have you discovered Jervise yet?"

He turned pale, and his lips and cheeks swelled out with the suppressed anger that glittered beneath his shaggy eyebrows.

"Not another word, sir, on that subject," and he brought his fist down on the table with a thump. "I won't have it, sir. If you wish to talk to me you must choose some other."

He rose and strode away. I felt like a fool; not only on account of the direct shutting-up, but because so many people had seen it and were still exchanging glances. I left the table as soon as I could.

Everyone who has crossed the ocean knows what the turmoil and bustle are as the steamer makes her way up New York harbour. The noise, the confusion, the tipping of stewards, the collection of one's traps, and the interchange of good-byes among people who had in a week grown to know each other better than twenty years' acquaintance on shore would have enabled them to do—all, everything forbade my ascertaining anything more, from either observation or inquiry. Besides, my own business demanded my earliest departure for Washington, and to the achievement of that end I devoted my attention exclusively.

Digitized by Google

One thing: I saw no more of Jervise. I had thought of running down to his cabin, but feared to encounter the Professor, whose cabin I concluded must be near by. So I got ashore and through the custom-house as fast as I could, and within two hours was sitting comfortably in a Pullman, whirling down over the Baltimore and Ohio to Washington.

I had been there a fortnight, and, having fulfilled the mission upon which I had been sent, was only waiting for letters I expected from home before I took my departure. The English mail arrived, and among other letters was one from my wife, inclosing a blue enveloped one with "On Her Majesty's Service" on it.

Thinking it was only some formal notification from the Foreign Office, I was about to put it back in my wife's letter, when my eye caught, "Returned Letter," I opened it. Inside was a plain white envelope with the Cunard Company's coat-of-arms embossed on the flap. On the back was neither address nor stamp, though the postmark was "Queenstown, Dec. 6." What could it mean? I was puzzled. The envelope had, of course, been opened at the Returned Letter Office to find my name and address. I took out the contents.

It was my letter which I had posted at Queenstown with the five-pound note. But deuce the bit of a five-pound note was there in it. Instead was a polite missive from the chief clerk, whose ironical tone rather spoiled its official civility, advising me in future to "put whatever money I might wish to send by post in the envelope, which should be addressed, and stamped, and registered, in order to insure its safe arrival at its destination."

Here was a pretty state of affairs. For a moment I was in a safe state of perplexity bordering on coma. But I pulled myself together, and tried to unravel it all. Yes, there was the letter, and Marshall and Snelgrove's bill, and there was the envelope I had put them into. But where was the address I had written, the stamp I had stuck on, and the five-pound note I had inclosed? All three were gone—gone!

At first I suspected the post-office people. But suspicion vanished into thin air as I thought about it. They couldn't have removed the writing, which had been written with an indelible pencil (what a mockery that word seemed!) or taken off the stamp without showing some sign of roughness on the surface, and there was none. Then, too, there was the postmark complete. None was lacking by the removal of the stamp. Besides, what would have been the use? Why not, if they meant to steal, and did steal the money, why not have destroyed the letter altogether?

Oh, no, it was not the post-office people. That was clear enough. Who then? Jervise! Yes, it was another trick of his. Rather a costly trick to me. He had got possession of the note which I fancied I had put in the letter. It was a magician's pencil he had given me to write the address with—whose writing faded in a few minutes. Could there be a doubt of it? That was why he had kept out of my way afterwards, and what the Professor meant——"What? Eh? By Jove!" I shouted. "I believe the Professor knew more about it than he let on. I bet he and Jervise are confederates. Of course, that is why he wouldn't talk about him. What a fool I have been! But how can I trace them? There's the rub?" I remembered the Professor telling me he was going to give a series of entertainments in the States. "Of course, he'll begin in New York—everybody does—and is there now."

I put on my hat and hurried down to the reading-room of the hotel to have a look at the New York Herald. Yes, there it was at the top of the second column of "Amusements."

NIBLO'S.
EVERY EVENING AT EIGHT O'CLOCK.

PROFESSOR DE VILLE
IN HIS MARVELLOUS MYSTERIES AND MYSTERIOUS MARVELS.

That night I arrived in New York and put up at the Metropolitan Hotel, which I knew joined Niblo's Theatre, and that the Professor was going on, so I went in for a few minutes to make sure it was the same man. It was. How angry I felt. I could have fired fifty thousand blunderbusses loaded with watches, eggs, and ladies' gloves full at him, instead of the one that was exploded in the air by a weak-kneed youth who had gone on the stage to see that all was fair. But I had decided it wouldn't do to show temper. I had no proof whatever that the Professor had anything to do with the theft, no matter what I thought, and the surest way of getting my five-pound note back was to make friends with him.

To have a look at the NEW YORK HERALD.

At last the performance was over. I gave the Professor a quarter of an hour to get to his room, and then sent up my card. I was told to walk up. He received me most kindly, without a shade of the trepidation I had expected him to show when I made my appearance.

"Sit down, my dear sir," he said, shaking my hand warmly, "and join me in a bottle of champagne. It is a real pleasure to meet you again." I thought how we had parted, and wondered if this were not consummate acting on the part of a man whose nerves his business required to be made of adamant. He produced some excellent cigars, and we sat smoking and drinking, and talking of every subject under the sun but the one I most wished to discuss. How to manage it I knew not. The more I put it off the harder it seemed. I hated, too, to spoil the harmony of our most pleasant interview by attempting to introduce the forbidden topic. He had seen much of the world, and warmed by the wine, interesting experiences and amusing anecdotes followed one another from his lips until the clock struck two.

"I had no idea it was so late," I said, rising to go in a sort of despair at my lack of moral courage in not yet having spoken of what I had come purposely to speak. "The time has so flown in your most delightful society."

Digitized by Google

The Professor smiled and bowed.

"You flatter me, sir," he said, and took my proffered hand absently.

"Now or never," thought I, "Pro——" I began, but got no farther. He had begun to speak before me.

"Mr. Robinson, I feel that I owe to you an apology for my rudeness to you at luncheon on board the Gallia that last day. I would have written to you, but I knew not your address. Allow me to make my apologies now."

I soon found a chance to tell him the circumstances of the loss of my bank-note as I have told them to you. He listened attentively, and throughout the narration his face exhibited many different and conflicting emotions. He spoke no word until I had finished with: "Do you think you can explain it, Professor, and help me to get back the note?"

"To the first part of your question, I answer—yes, most undoubtedly; to the second—possibly. It is now some fifteen years since I first met Philip Jervise. He was barely eighteen then."

"Fifteen and eighteen are thirty-three. Surely he can't be so old as that?"

"Be good enough not to interrupt me. I think I ought to know. I remember, I thought him too young to be my assistant, for which I had engaged him. But he soon proved himself to be the quickest, sharpest, cleverest assistant I had ever had, and in a few years he had become almost as adroit as myself—pardon the conceit. He went with me everywhere—St. Petersburg, Berlin, Vienna, Madrid, Paris, London—and much of my great success in those cities, which won for me this red ribbon, was owing to the admirable manner in which he aided me without seeming to do so. You have no idea, sir, how much depends on one's assistant. I naturally grew very much attached to him, and hoped in time to see him succeed me when I retired.

"Well, I was offered inducements to come to America. I accepted them. Would that I had never come! I might still have had Philip with me! In December, '79—just one year ago—we took our passage for New York, by another strange coincidence you will think, aboard the Gallia. She was the crack boat of the line then, and Commodore Cook commanded her. We had wonderfully fair weather until within two days of Sandy Hook, and then got into a regular twister—a cyclone, which lasted thirty-six hours. Every one was advised to keep below. Some did, others didn't. Among those whom you couldn't keep off the deck was Jervise. He would sneak up after I had gone to bed. On one of these occasions, sir, the ship was struck by a tremendous sea, which swept her decks fore and aft from stem to stern. Jervise was standing just abreast the port side-light tower when the sea struck her—so the second officer, who was on the bridge, told us—but was never seen again."

The Professor covered his face with both hands, and leant forward with his elbows on his knees.

"And—and—do you mean to say," I gasped, "that Jervise was drowned?"

"I do," answered the Professor in a voice much broken by emotion. "The ship was searched from end to end, but no vestige of him was found."

"You astonish me!" I exclaimed; "it seems almost past belief."

"It is quite true," said the Professor, slowly recovering his self-possession. "Excuse this exhibition of

It was my five-pound note!

feeling, pray; I'm all right now. And now, as to the recovery of the note. It must be somewhere, for it is clear he cannot have taken it with him, and——"

"But may he not have burned it by mistake?" I suggested.

The Professor shook his head. "No fear of that, sir. He never made a mistake. But stay; I have a sort of inspiration. You say he drew the note you sent in the letter from the pocket of your waistcoat? Have you that waistcoat now?"

"It is the one I have on now," I said; "I always travel in this suit."

"Well, it's only an idea of mine; but suppose you feel in the pocket now?"

Incredulous, but wishing to please him, I thrust my finger and thumb into the pocket. They touched something; it felt like folded paper, crisp and tough. I drew it out and unfolded it. It was my five-pound note! To assure myself, with heart beating fast against my ribs, I looked in my pocket-book at the number. It was the same—76-1, 28396.

But you may ask: What was to prevent the Professor from getting the note into my pocket by sleight of hand if he was such an adept at it, when he found I might make trouble about it, and from inventing the tale about Jervise being swept overboard and drowned? I'll admit I had those doubts myself. So to satisfy myself, when the Britannic landed me in Liverpool, nine days later, I went to the Cunard office, in Water Street, and found—first, that the number of the Professor's room was 123; second, that no such person as Jervise had taken passage on the steamer; and third, that the 1879 log of the Gallia, deposited in the office, and which they were most polite in overhauling for me, had this entry: Dec. 18. Lat. 50.32 N.; Lon. 40.23 W. Saloon passenger: Philip Jervise, aged 32; occupation, Wizard's assistant; lost overboard.

James Lucellf.

Digitized by Google

My only Engagement

BECAUSE I couldn't help it. There! Do you suppose I wanted to be an old maid? Do you suppose I prefer grey cats, green tea, and knitting work to a good-looking husband? I'd like to know what you take me for!

I'm resigned—but I wasn't always so. I was nearly being engaged once, and once I was all but married. I'll tell you about it—in confidence, of course!

He was a fat, jovial, middle-aged widower, with two daughters, and the handsomest whiskers I ever saw, and the delicious, insinuating way he had of bending down his head close to mine, and saying in a half whisper: "How do you do, Miss Hetty?" was beyond all description.

He didn't positively come to see me very often but he was always stopping at our gate (his father's joined ours), and having nice little chats, and strolling home from singing lessons with me.

One evening he dropped in about dusk. I heard him rubbing his boots on the doormat, as I sat at work in the front window.

"Come in, Dutton, and have a pipe," says my father, as hospitable as could be.

"No, thank'ee," says he, "I've called to see Miss Hetty!"

"Oh," says my father, with a little chuckle, "that's it, hey? Well, you'll find her in the drawing-room."

I worked away, making believe not to hear his step until he was close upon me. And then started, and cried: "Dear me!" and dropped my thimble, in the most natural way in the world.

"Don't be frightened, Miss Hetty," says Dutton.

"I'll try not to be, sir," I answered.

"Now what do you suppose I'm going to say to you, my dear?" says he.

"I'm sure I don't know, sir," says I, hanging down my head.

"I've been thinking, this long while, Miss Hetty, that you were fitted to adorn another sphere than that you so admirably occupy here!"

I didn't make any answer, but I eventually resolved that when we were married I'd have a wing added to the south end of the Dutton house—the dining-room always was too small—and I'd have new crimson curtains, instead of the faded old green hangings, and that the old hemlock tree should be cut down as quick as axe could level it.

All these ideas shot through my brain in less than a minute, when I sat and listened with my eyes intently fixed on the hem of my dress.

"Do you suppose," he went on, "you could be induced to leave your home here, and your kind, indulgent father? I know it's asking a great deal of you, Miss Hetty."

"Yes," I faltered, "but ——"

"But the little bird must leave the home-nest some time," he said laughingly, "and if you would accept the offer I have to make you——"

Little as I was experienced in such matters, I felt that the time was come to speak.

"Can you doubt it?" I asked, trying hard to blush, but with a painful consciousness that all my tender emotions were congregating rosily, as usual, in the end of my nose.

"Then it is yes?"

"Of course it is yes," I said archly.

"You are fond of children? My two girls will be among the claimants for your time and affection."

"They shall be daughters to me," I answered with enthusiasm.

"And what time could you——"

"At any time you please to name."

"Ahem—yes—the first week in September would, I suppose, be preferable."

"I will be ready then," I faltered.

"And I will ascertain the particulars, and let you know as early as possible. I told the trustees I thought you could be persuaded to accept the position."

"What trustees?"

"The trustees of the St. Genevian Seminary. The position of which I speak is that of English teacher."

I dropped my work-basket with a crash. Teacher in the St. Genevian Seminary, when I had all the time imagined myself to be sought in marriage. Oh, my countrywomen, what a fall was here! And there sat Dutton, as complacent and smiling as ever. "You see," he pursued the hateful topic. "I have a very special reason for wishing to send my daughters to boarding-school just now; I don't mind telling you, in confidence, my dear Miss Hetty, that I am contemplating a speedy marriage with Lucy Hooper."

Lucy Hooper, indeed! A pink-faced little girl of eighteen who knew no more about housekeeping than I did about verbs. Lucy Hooper!

"And," went on the absurd old widower, smirking like a lover of twenty-one, "I should like to feel that your improving influence was brought to bear upon my dear girls, for Malvina is a little inclined to be sullen, and Sarah Jane——"

Digitized by Google

"Yes, I know," I interrupted, with an impatient little toss of my head, "but I don't like teaching!"

"Don't like teaching! Why, I thought——"

"I can't help what you thought!" I interrupted tartly. "I don't choose to accept the place."

Dutton started with eyes like miniature full moons.

"My dear Miss Hetty——"

"I'm not your dear Miss Hetty!" I burst out, ready to cry with rage and indignation, "and I see no use in wasting any further words on the matter. I won't teach in the St. Genevian Seminary! And I dare say Miss Lucy Hooper is wondering why you don't go over there this fine evening."

"Am I to understand——"

"You're to understand exactly what you please!" I exclaimed, beating a retreat with my work-basket. "Good evening, Mr. Dutton."

And that was my first offer—or, at least, the first I was near having.

It was two years after that, when I was living in Madame Rocheparde's fashionable establishment—for I had got tired of the country, and wanted to enjoy a glimpse of fashionable society—that I became acquainted with Gustave Emile Dupin, the dearest, dark-eyed foreigner in the world, with a lisp, and a moustache like black silk.

"I trust that Mademoiselle has not yet her heart surrendered to other aspirants," he said, "for is it that I may hope?"

I didn't know what to say, but Gustave caught my hand in both of his.

"The charming Mademoiselle—why does she hesitate?" he ejaculated; "I am her slave, her faithful dog—the dust beneath her tiniest of tiny feet! Shall my brains explode with the pistol! for life without my Henriette's devotion were but a lengthened misery."

"Gustave, how frightfully you talk," said I, beginning to be quite terrified.

"You will, then, be mine?"

"Yes," I faltered. What else could I say?

I was engaged this time; and how the widows and maidens of Madame Rocheparde's boarding-house did envy me, to be sure. The Countess Dupin—for Gustave had hinted at a title to which he was next heir.

How delightfully it would sound, and how I should enjoy sending my wedding-cards to Lucy Hooper—I mean to Mrs. Dutton.

The wedding was fixed for the next month: it was rather a precipitate arrangement, but Gustave told me, in his pretty chivalric phrase, that he could not exist without me any longer. And I really didn't see the necessity for any more delay; so I got the dress—white silk dress—and began upon the trousseau, with two seamstresses and a machine.

It was the day before the eventful Thursday, and I was busy packing my trunk, when Gustave came in, with dishevelled hair and cravat tied all on one side.

"Dear me, Gustave, what is the matter?"

"It is that your Gustave is wretched, that he seeks but to bid his Henriette adieu ere he himself annihilates. Weep not, my angel! but forget that thy poor Gustave has ever lived."

And then, in answer to my questionings, he confessed that he had endorsed the note of a commercial friend, that the friend had failed to meet his engagements, and that he, consequently, became liable.

"How much is it?" I asked.

"But a paltry hundred pounds, and to-morrow gold will flow in upon me in streams. My arrangements are all made; I shall receive remittances to-morrow. But for to-day—alas, my Henriette! why does not heaven strike me with thunderbolts? Why do I live?"

"I can lend you a hundred pounds, Gustave!"

"My guardian angel! my queen of love! It is but for one lee-tel day, and then your Gustave will heap the treasures of all his ancestors at your feet."

I happened to have just a hundred pounds left, for my outfit had been less expensive than I had expected, and I gave it to him. He bent to kiss my hand—Dutton, in all his common-place courtship, never dreamed of kissing Lucy Hooper's hand! there wasn't the shadow of poetry in his nature.

"To-morrow!" he murmured, "to-morrow! Ah, my Henriette! Until then I count the minutes, I number the seconds."

And he went off buoyant and débonnaire as a Chevalier Bayard.

The wedding morning came, but no bridegroom! the mystic hour—but still no Gustave.

I was beginning to grow hysterical, when finally Madame Rocheparde hurried in, with a note bearing my betrothed's delicate caligraphy.

"My poor Mademoiselle, read that!" she cried, throwing it into my lap.

It was a communication from Gustave to Madame Rocheparde, to the effect that he had sailed for France on yesterday's steamer—that he was tired of England and the English, and sought in the more genial sunshine of his native shore a brighter career.

"As to the maid, old and ugly, to whom I am affianced," he wrote, "she has served my turn. I have spent her part of the hundred pounds to buy a passage! Did she for an instant dream that I, Gustave Emile Dupin, should squander myself on her! For her conceit and folly she is but rightly punished. Adieu, my good madame for ever, from your GUSTAVE."

That was the end of my only engagement.

R. H. L.

The Puzzle Picture.

IN last week's Short Stories we gave the names of 160 people who had succeeded in correctly putting together the second of the picture puzzles. The only thing to do was to divide the Ten Pound prize amongst them. After the first post and before the competition closed something like nine thousand readers had also sent in correct solutions. It was impossible to divide the sum we had set aside for consolation prizes amongst these, for the simple reason that they would only have obtained a farthing each.

Under the circumstances and in view of the immense interest taken in the picture puzzles we have set a more difficult one this week, which will be found on page 109.

Digitized by Google

LEGENDS OF WOLFVILLE.

BY "DAN QUINN."

Wolfville is a Cattleman's Settlement in Arizona, and the Characters in these Legends are Cowboys.

No. 7.—Jaybird's Last Joke on Tenderfoot Smith.

"WHATEVER makes this yere Jaybird Bob believe he's a humourist?" said the old cattle man one afternoon as he slowly returned from a walk.

"Whatever it is misleads him to so deem himself is shorely too many for me. Doc. Peets tells him himse'f one day he's plumb wrong.

"'Your'e nacherally a sombre, morose party,' says Doc. Peets this time, 'an' nothin' jocose or jocund about you. Your disp'sition, Jaybird, don't no more run to jokes than a prairie dog's.'

"'Which I would admire to know why not?' says Jaybird Bob.

"'Well,' goes on Doc. Peets, 'you thinks too slow—too much like a cow in a swamp. Your mind moves sluggish that away, an' sorter sinks to the hocks each step. If you was born to be funny your intellect would be limber an' frivolous.'

"'Bein' all that is personal to me,' says Jaybird Bob, 'I takes leave to regard you as wrong. My jokes is good, high grade jokes, an' when you talks of me bein' morose you're barkin' at a knot.' And so Jaybird goes on a-holdin' of himse'f funny ontil we has him to bury.

"No; Jaybird ain't his sure-enough name; it's just a handle to his 'dentity, so we all picks it up handy an' easy. Jaybird's real name is Graingerford—Poindexter Graingerford. But the same is cumbrous an' unwieldersome. so when he first trails into Woodville we all considers among ourselves an' settles it's quicker to call him jest 'Jaybird Bob' that away. An' we does.

"It's on the spring round-up this Jaybird first develops that he regards himse'f witty. It's in the mornin' jest as we all has saddled up an' lines out to comb the range round about for cattle, there's a tenderfoot along whose name is Smith, an' as he's canterin' off Jaybird comes a curvin' up on his bronco and reaches over an' tails this shorthorn's pony.

"What's tailin' a pony? It's ridin' up from the rear an' takin' a half-hitch on your saddlehorn with the tail of another man's pony and then spurrin' by and swappin' ends with the whole outfit; man, hoss, an' all.

"It's really too toomultuous for a joke, an' mebby breaks the pony's neck; mebby the rider's. But whether he saves his neck or no, the party whose pony is tailed allers emerges tharfrom doshevelled an' wrought up, an' hotter than a wolf. So no one plays this yere joke much; not till he's ready to get shot at, in fact.

"As I says, this Jaybird watches Smith as he rides off. Being new on the range Smith don't ride easy. A cow saddle ain't built like these yere Eastern hulle, nohow. The stirrup is set two inches further back, for one thing, an' it's compiled a heap different other ways. Bein' onused to cow saddles, an' for that matter cow ponies, this Smith lops over for'ard an' beats with his elbows like he's a curlew or some thing flyin', an' I reckons' it's sech proceedin's makes Jaybird allow he's goin' to be funny an' tail Smith's pony.

"As I explains, he capers along after Smith an' reaches over an' gets a handful of the pony's tail; an' then, wroppin' it around his saddlehorn, he goes by on the jump an' spreads Smith an' his bronco promisc'us about the scene. This yere Smith goes along the grass on all-fours, like a jack-rabbit.

"Which Smith, I reckons, is the maddest and hostilest man in Southern Arizona. Before ever he offers to get up, he lugs out his six-shooter an' makes some mighty sincere efforts like, he aims to shoot up Jaybird. But he's slow with his weapon, bein' spraddled out on the grass that away, an' it gives Dave Tutt an' Enright an' some more of us a chance to jump in between an' stop the deal.

"We all picks Smith up an' rounds up his pony—which scrambles to his feet after bein' tailed an' is now cavortin' about likes its mind is overturned—an' explains to him this yere is a joke. But he is moody an' relentless about it; an' it don't take no hawk to see he don't like it nor forgive Jaybird Bob a little bit.

"'Tailin' a gent's pony,' says this Smith, 'is no doubt thrillin' amusement for folks lookin' on, but thar's nothin' of a redeemin' nature from the standpoint of the party whose pony's upheaved that away. Not to be misunderstood at this p'int,' goes on this Smith, 'I want to announce that from now for'ard life will have but one purpose with me, which'll be to down the next gent who ever tails a pony of mine. The present incident goes as a jest, but you can gamble the next won't be so regarded.'

"That sorter ends the talk, an' all of us but the cook an' the horse-hustlers bein' in the saddle by now, we disperse ourselves through the country to work in the cattle, an' proceed with the round-up we're on. We can see, though, that tailin' Smith's pony is not to be attempted again with safety.

"It's when we all rides away that Doc. Peets—who's out with the round-up, though he ain't got no cattle to brand himse'f—tells Jaybird he's not a humourist, like I already repeats.

Digitized by Google

"But, as I suggests, this Jaybird Bob can't believe it none. He's mighty sure his jokes is excellent good jokes, an' while it's plain Smith ain't got no confidence in him, an' distrusts him complete since he tips over his bronco that mornin', it looks like Jaybird can't let him alone. An' these misdeeds of Jaybird's keeps goin' on ontil by the nearest mistake—for it's sure an accident if ever one happens in the cow country—this yere tenderfoot shoots Jaybird an' kill's him for good.

"It looks afterward to us like it's a speshul providence to warn folks not to go projectin' about engaged in what you might call physical jokes. Still, this yere removal of Jaybird didn't take place till mighty near the close of the round up; an' intervenin' he's goin' round stockin' the cards an' settin' up hands on the pore shorthorn continuous.

"One of Jaybird's jokes, 'one of his best,' Jaybird calls it, results in stampedin' the herd of cattle we was bringin' along at the time—bein' all cows an' their calves—to a brandin' pen. Which thar's 2,000, big an' little, in the bunch; an' Jaybird's humour puts 'em to flight like so many snowbirds, an' it takes two days hard ridin' for the whole outfit to bring 'em together agin'.

"Among other weaknesses this Smith imports from the States is, he's afraid of snakes. Rattlesnakes is his abhorrence; an' if each is a disembodied spirit he couldn't want 'em further off. He's allers alarmed that mebby, somehow a rattlesnake will come pokin' in under his blankets nights; an' camp with him while he's asleep. An' this yere wretched Jaybird fosters these delusions.

"'About them serpents,' I overhears Jaybird say to him one evenin' while we're settin' round, all but Moore an' Tut who's riding herd, ''bout them serpents; a gent can't be too particular. It look like they has but one hope, which is to crawl into a gent's blankets an' sleep with him. An' if he moves or turns over, they simply gives a buzz an' grabs him. I knows of forty folks who's bit that away by snakes, an' nary a one lives to explain the game.'

"'Be rattlesnakes thick in Arizona?' I hears Smith say to this Jaybird.

"'Be they thick?' answers Jaybird, 'Well, I shore wishes I had whiskey for all the rattlesnakes thar is yereabouts. I don't want to go overstatin' the census to a gent who is out playin' for information, an' who's learnin' fast, but I s'pose now thar ain't none less than a billion snakes in Southern Arizona alone. If I could saw off the little passel of cattle I has on this range, you can gamble I'd pull my freight to-morry. It's all right for such old Cimmarons as Enright an' sech parties as that sawbones Peets to go bluffin' about their bein' no rattlesnakes to speak of; an' that they couldn't p'ison you to death nowhow; but you bet I ain't seen forty of my nearest friends die of snake bites an' not learn nothin'. An' almost every time it's a rattlesnake as comes slidin' into bed with 'em while they're locked in dreams, an' who gets hot an' goes to chewin' of 'em, jest because they want to turn out before the snake does. Rattlesnakes that away wants to sleep till it's fourth drink time an' the sun's 'way up yonder. An' when a man goes to rollin' out of his blankets say at sun-up, it makes 'em monstrous angry to be disturbed; an' the first he knows of where they be an' how they looks on early risin', their teeth's in him up to the guard, an' before night there's one man the less to cook for, an' an extra saddle rides along in the grub waggon with the blankets when they moves camp.'

"Of course, all this is a heap of impressive to this Smith; an' while Enright an' Peets both tells him this Jaybird's havin' fun with him, you can see he's mortal afraid every night when he spreads his blankets, an' he makes a circle about where he sleeps with a horsehair lariat he's got from a Mexican; an' who tells him it will tickle the snakes' necks when they goes to crawl across it, an' makes 'em keep away.

"The way this Jaybird manages to stampede that time is this away; Jaybird comes ridin' in from the cattle about three hours before sun-up to turn out Tutt, who is due to take his place on herd. Jaybird's got a rawhide rope he's been draggin' about in the grass which makes it damp an' cold. As Jaybird rides up to camp he sees this Smith rolled up in his blankets snorin' to beat the band.

"Of course Jaybird's out to be joyous in a second. He rides up close to this helpless shorthorn as he lays asleep, an' throws a coil of his wet rawhide lariat across his countenance where it's turned up in the moonlight. Jest as it settles down cold an' startlin' on Smith's skin, Jaybird yells:

"'Snakes, Smith! Thar's a rattlesnake on you bigger'n a dog.'

"Jaybird says afterwards as how this Smith behaves tremendous. He boils up into the atmosphere with a yell like a wolf; an' grabbin' a blanket in each of his hands he starts out over the plains in a state of frenzy. Which the worst is he goes headlong towards the herd; an' what with them shrieks he volunteers, an' the blankets flappin' an' wavin' thar ain't a cow in the bunch who stays in her right mind a moment, but springs to her feet an' takin' her offspring along, goes surging off towards the hills for good. You couldn't turn or stop 'em then. It's the completest case of stampede I ever turns out to behold.

"No; this Smith never learns the rights of the epeesode. He's that peevish an' violent by nature no one tells him it's Jaybird, Enright stands in to cap the game himse'f; an' puts it up in confab with this Smith the next day as how he sees the rattlesnake, an' that it's mighty near the size of a roll of blankets.

"'It was shore,' says Enright when he an' Smith is conversin' thereon, 'the most giant serpent I ever sees without the aid of liquor. An' when he goes streakin' off into the gloom, bein' amazed an' rattled by your cries, he leaves so far as I am concerned a trail of relief behind. You can gamble, I wasn't interruptin' of no sech snake; nor makin' of no pretext for his detention.'

"'What for was his rattles like?' says Smith; an' he gets pale at the mere sound of Enright's talk.

"'As to his rattle,' says Enright, like he's thoughtfully tryin' to recall 'em to his mind, ''as far this reptile's rattles; it was that dark that while I sees 'em I couldn't but jest say. So far as I notes anything they looks like a belt full of cartridges; sorter corrugated an' numerous.'

"Now this yere which I relates, while no doubt burnin' experiences to Smith, is after all harmless enough. An' to people not careful about the basis of their glee it might do some to laugh at. But it all closes upon a play, with nothin' gay nor merry in it; leastwise, not for Jaybird Bob.

"This yere finish joke of Jaybird's transpires one evenin' just as the cook's startin' in to rustle us some chuck. The grub waggon's been stopped in the mouth of what's called Peeled Pine cañon. Every man's in the camp but this yere tenderfoot Smith. Enright, who's actin' as round-up boss for the outfit—for everybody's cattle bein' worked in younison, that away, like we allers does—has sent Smith peerin' round for cattle, way off up the long deep valley into which the Peeled Pine cañon opens. This shorthorn's due to be back any time now. 'cause it's only a question of how far up the valley does he go. He don't run no show to be lost, for nothin' less aerial than a goat could climb out of the cañon he's in, an' tharfore he's bound to find our camp.

Digitized by Google

"Of course, knowin' every man's station in the day's ridin', we're plenty aware that this tenderfoot Smith is some'ers above us in the valley. None of the rest of us is turnin' our minds to him probably, except Jaybird Bob. All of a bump like a buckin' pony it strikes Jaybird that he's missin' a onusual chance to be buoyant.

"'What for a play would it be,' says Jaybird, rousin' up from where he lay watchin' of the cook slice salt hoss for fryin'. 'What for a game would it be,' says he, 'for a passel of us to lay up the draw, an' bushwhack this ontaught person Smith as he comes ridin' down to camp? We all could hop out at him, a-whoopin' an' shootin' an' bein' all of us wropped up in blankets, he'll allow it's shore Injuns an' go plumb locoed.'

"'You'll kep harrowin' away at this yere Smith party, Jaybird,' says Enright, 'ontil you arises from the game loser. Now I don't reckon none I'd play Apaché, if I was you. Thar's too much effort in bein' an Apaché, that way. I'd lay yere an' think up some joke which don't demand so much industry, an' ain't calc'lated to scare an innocent chap to death.'

"But Jaybird won't listen. He falls into admiration of his scheme, and at last Tutt an' Jack Moore allows they'll go along an' play there aborigines with Jaybird an' note how the tenderfoot stands the racket.

"'As long as this Jaybird's bound to make the play,' says Jack Moore to Enright, talkin' to one side, 'it's a heap better to have the conservative element represented in the deal. So I puts it up, it's a good sage move for me an' Tutt to stand in. We all will come handy to pull Jaybird an' this Shorthorn apart if they get their horns locked in the cause of these witticisms.'

"Enright takes the same view; so Jaybird an' Moore. an' Tutt goes off up the cañon a mile, an' lays in wait surreptitious to head off Smith. Moore tells me the story when he an' Tutt comes ridin' back with the corpse.

"'This is how we does,' says Moore. 'Me an' Tutt, an' deceased—which last is Jaybird all right enough—is ensconced in a bunch of oak bushes, an' behind a p'int of rocks. Jaybird's got his blanket 'round him so he looks like an Injun. It ain't long when we hears the tenderfoot comin' down the cañon: it's likely he's half a mile away.

"'He's runnin' in on to us at a road gait, an' when he's about two hundred yards off, Jaybird turns out a yell to make you shiver; shakes a load or two outen his gun; goes surgin' out from around the p'int of rocks, an' charges straight at this unthinkin' tenderfoot. It is due to trooth to say me an' Tutt follows this Jaybird's suit; only not so violent as to whoops.

"'Does it scare this tenderfoot? Well, it shorely alarms him some. He takes Jaybird for a savage an' makes no question; which the same is no wise strange; I'd took him for a savage myse'f, only bein' in at the deal that away I know it's Jaybird. So as I remarks it horrified the tenderfoot no end, an' at the first sight of Jaybird he whirls his pony an' goes back up that valley like an antelope.

"'Nacherally we all follows; Jaybird leadin' a whoopin' an' a shootin' an' throwin' no end of sperit into it. It is a success, this piece of wit is up to this p'int, an' Jaybird puts a heap of zest into it.

"'The weak spot in this piece of humour is because of the ideas this tenderfoot's been gainin' an' the improvements he's been makin' while straggling about in our company. I onhesitatingly states that if this yere joke had been pulled off by Jaybird when this gent Smith first enters our midst it would have been the victory of his life, an' somethin' to be proud of. But Jaybird defers it too long. This tenderfoot has acquired a few Western ways, jest enough to sp'le the fun, an' send poor Jaybird a-curvin' to his home on 'igh.

"'This is what the shorthorn does which teaches me he's learnin'. While he's humpin' off up the cañon fit to distance a storm-wind; an' me an' Jaybird an' Tutt is stampedin' along in pursoot, the fugitive onlimbers his six-shooter an' without even turnin' his head, or lookin' back at us, he onhooks the entire bundle of lead our way.

"'Which the worst feature of it is, this backhanded blind shottin' is a success. The very first shot gets Jaybird plumb the head, an' he goes off his pony without mentionin' a thing about it to either Tutt or me.

"'That's all thar is to report. Dave an' me pull up our broncos, abandons the joke at this crisis, lay Jaybird across his saddle like a sack of corn, an' returns to state the case.'

"'Whatever did you all do with the frightened stranger?' asks Enright.

"'Which we never does nothin',' says Moore. 'The last I sees of him, he's flying up the valley, hittin' nothin' but the high places. An' assoomin' his project's to get away he's succeedin' admirable. As he vanishes I should jedge from his motions he's reloadin' his gun; an' from the luck he has with Jaybird, Tutt an' me is led to believe that's no real object in followin' him further. I don't press my society on nobody; shorely not on some locoed tenderfoot who's pulled his gun, an' is blazin' away erratic, without purpose of aim.'

"'Don't you an' Tutt know where he is at all?' demands Enright.

"'Which we shorely don't,' says Moore. 'If his horse holds out an' he don't swerve none he's p'intin' out in when he fades from view, he's goin' to be over in the San Simon country by to-morry mornin' when we eats our grub; an' that's half-way to the Borax desert. If you wants my impressions,' conclooded Moore, 'drawn from a-seein' his depart, I'm free to say I don't reckon you're goin' to see this tenderfoot soon.'

"An' that's about the size of it, Moore jest about calls the turn. Jaybird's last joke scares this tenderfoot Smith plumb out of Arizona; an' that ain't one of us ever sees hair, hide, horn nor hoof-mark of him no more. An' he takes with him, this Smith does, the best pony in our bunch."

ON OPPOSITE PAGE is shown on a reduced scale the beautiful design for the cover of the New Musical Magazine. The first number will be issued on February 29th for March 1st. "MELODY" will consist of 48 pages of vocal and instrumental music by the best and most popular composers, and will be printed on stout paper, music size. Price Sixpence nett. It will appear monthly. Please ask your newsagent to order a copy for you.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

The Story of a Shameful Crime.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

Something Tangible!

Forgery—flight!

Those two words were the theme, the burden, the essence of all Richard Sheldon's thoughts, as, one week after the discovery of the White God as an empty god, he sat at his desk in the library and bent his head on his hands, hollow-eyed, pale-faced, haunted with dread, rage and disappointment.

They had been tricked, cheated, baulked! Once the crushing, appalling dismay of their discovery had passed, and they found only the impress of stored treasure inside the idol—not a particle of the treasure itself—they examined it more closely. The cutaway section in the back showed that recently—within months, perhaps weeks—some intelligent hand had opened it, rifled it. Whose? Was this the vaunted vengeance of the Aztec high priest, Medeiras?

It mattered not. The treasure had eluded their grasp; it was lost to them for ever more; they had been cheated of their prey, and, as the first shock of the bitter disappointment passed away, like two birds of evil omen, they looked over the field for new victims.

The White God had been presented to the Exhibition—already it was being prepared for a place in the Mexican exhibit at the famous World's Fair. The donation had been made in a depressed, half-hearted way, but the publicity given to Sheldon through the gift helped his credit, augmented his schemes; and credit and schemes were all the capital he now possessed to bank upon.

He was in a tight fix—a bad predicament, a close corner. If Golcondas went up, he was all right; but Golcondas had persisted in a contrary course. It had gone waywardly down, down, until no one would even take the stock as a present, fearing it might drag them down with it.

"It's ruin—sheer, blank ruin!" he had told Colonel Lytle desperately. "Five years of luxury and then a famine! I can't, I won't endure it! I can't go back to the crusts and the old starving life!"

"Then better it!" had sprung to Lytle's ready lips.

"How?"

"Your credit is good."

"Yes."

"Borrow all you can—use your friends to the last available limit of cash accommodation. Bulk all your operations for a near future date and then——"

"Bolt?"

"Exactly. I fancy you and I could enjoy a hundred thousand at Paris, or Baden-Baden, or in sunny Italy. Come! is it a bargain?"

"Yes."

"And I'll help you. There's nothing but beggary promised here—the Ringold fortune is lost to us. Be speedy, politic, cautious. With your eminent qualifications as a financier and your superb credit as a successful business man, even a quarter of a million wouldn't be an impossibility, and"—with a sinister smile—"when legitimate endorsements are exhausted, you are an apt penman, Sheldon!"

Forgery! Flight! That was how Richard Sheldon arrived at this conclusion—a conclusion that had serious obstacles in its way, he decided, as he sat moping at his desk that afternoon.

He looked up eagerly and relievedly as a visitor was announced—Colonel Lytle—and he greeted him gladly.

Colonel Lytle was natty, agile, neat as ever. The gleaming straw-coloured sun-stone still blazed in his snowy shirt front, but his manner was a trifle more nervous than usual; the crow's feet had deepened about his eyes, and he had the restless glance of a man easily frightened at shadows.

"Well, Dick," he spoke familiarly, and with a cheery assumption as he lit a cigar and faced his associate, "how goes it?"

"The money?"

"Yes."

"All right. In one week I shall bulk a clear hundred thousand down on the bank, discount, deposit; cheque out to you, and—"

"Slope!"

"That's it," assented Sheldon; and then mechanically he relapsed into his previous engrossed silence.

"See here, Dick!" began Lytle, after watching his companion studiously and curiously from the corner of his eyes for some time, "what's the matter with you lately?"

"Eh! me?" repeated Sheldon, with an embarrassed start.

"Yes. You are concealing some secret from me—some serious trouble."

"Well, you are right," admitted Sheldon. "Lytle, I'm frightened! Shall I tell you why? That detective we lured—"

"Dean?"

"Exactly."

"What of him?"

"He's shadowing me."

"Nonsense!"

Digitized by Google

"No, it is no nonsense. It is the actual fact. He's been watching me for over a week past. I've caught constant sight of his figure lurking about the house here, at the office, in the street. What does it mean?"

"A new and larger bribe, to be sure!" jeered Lytle reassuringly. "He's repented his repentance. Now, don't you get flustered. Hurry up your arrangements, and let us get away before he approaches you again. He can prove nothing, only he might stumble over our new plot."

"I wish I knew the true motive of his actions," murmured Sheldon, half persuaded. "I say, Lytle, will you do me a favour?"

"Certainly."

"Get some one to watch him in turn, and keep him from getting too closely on our track."

"I will, but I think it vain trouble."

"And try and find out something tangible, Lytle!"

"Something tangible? Very good," assented Lytle graciously.

The two men parted—the merchant to decide on hastening his preparations for flight, the other to deepen the traces of care on his hard, cynical face by reflecting deeply, as he left Sheldon's house.

They were at odds, these two men; one was deceiving the other, though neither suspected it.

Richard Sheldon had other fears than fears of Detective Dean alone.

The previous night, closing the inside blinds of the library, a man skulking under the windows had glared in at him, and abruptly disappeared.

It gave him a dreadful shock, the more so as, in that momentary flash of the lurker's eyes, he seemed to go back five years, and recall the awful look of accusation and reproach dead Adrian Burgoyne had bestowed upon him as he was marched from the prisoner's dock to serve an unjust sentence at penal servitude.

How those eyes haunted him!—how they revived the past! how he seemed to discern the hand of the dead in the abstraction of the dead man's treasure! This it was that made Richard Sheldon moody and unsocial and abstracted; and he was ashamed to confess his "vagaries" even to his accomplice.

Colonel Lytle was a little better actor, but he had far more reason to dread than his ally; he had more to conceal, too.

A week previous he had made a very startling discovery. The girl, Patrice Ringold, had escaped from the charge of the woman who had been her gaoler during his sojourn in Mexico. She had, the woman said, made close inquiries about his (Lytle's) present movements and place of residence, and the woman had unsuspectingly given her the desired information. That same evening Patrice disappeared. The ensuing day a veiled female had called at his apartments, had insisted on awaiting his return, had sat in his little parlour for an hour or more, had grown weary of waiting, had departed, and the next discovery the dismayed Lytle made was that a certain valuable packet of documents concerning his dealings with Richard Sheldon was missing from a cabinet.

Could his visitor have been Patrice? Could she have been the thief? Scarcely. Once free, she would hardly venture once more within the reach of the tiger's claws. As to the papers—they might have been destroyed accidentally. All the same, he worried over all this, but he deemed it unwise to reveal the truth to his accomplice. It would distress the merchant, and Sheldon needed all his nerve for his bold financial exploits just now.

Another source of concern for Lytle was the fact that he was being "shadowed," as well as Sheldon. Twice he had caught sight of a sinister form near his home. Were the detectives on his track? For what? He laughed at the presumption. He was too clever to leave any incriminating traces of crime down the sinuous path he had trodden so triumphantly.

He went to the theatre after leaving Sheldon. He tried to forget his hopes and fears alike by mixing with the gay crowds and watching the actors, but it was a failure.

"Sheldon must hurry up his plans," he murmured as he stepped into a cab wearily, and hurried for home later that same evening. "I don't feel right. There's danger in the air. I have a presentiment of disaster. Ah! who was that?"

Who? indeed! The same lurking form that he had seen near his home two nights previous. The mysterious stranger glided past the cab, directed one glance in at the window full at Lytle's startled face, and then vanished.

But such a look! The fierce, glittering eyes seemed to reflect the basilisk glow of the yellow sun-stone; they seemed to mock, menace, devour, all at once.

"Fancy!" grated out Lytle irritably, as the cab drove on. "To imagine those eyes resembled those of the fanatic priest, Medeiras! Sheldon must get the money together, and leave here. I'm getting nervous. One good thing, I put a private inquiry agent on the trail of our trailers this afternoon. He'll report something tangible by to-morrow."

"Something tangible?" Those were Sheldon's anxious words. For "that something tangible" to allay his disordered fears the merchant sat waiting the following afternoon.

"Lytle will soon be here," he murmured; "our plans are nearly ripe; the hundred thousand will soon shape themselves."

He waited one hour, impatiently; two, in a fever of suspence; three, in an unreasoning, fault-finding rage. He might have waited till doomsday for that "something tangible" for all Colonel Lytle would ever again bring him the information he so craved!

For at No. 8, Roosevelt Mansions, Colonel Lytle's handsome bachelor apartments, the shades had not been raised, although it was afternoon, and the handsome ormulu lamp burnt brightly, although the sun blazed fiercely without.

The long shadows began to fall, they groped over the blank wall below the closed windows; they tried to creep through the blinds, tightly shut.

Baffled, they sank lower to the court below, giving up a task that needed the aid of light, not of darkness.

For, lying across the costly Wilton carpet, his blank face reflecting the delicate hues of the luxurious draperies, his eyes staring fixedly at the gold-fretted ceiling, was stretched the owner of all this magnificence.

The eye of straw flame that blazed in his immaculate shirt-front the evening previous, so like the eye of the lurker who had haunted his footsteps near the theatre, was no longer in place. Instead, an ugly rent showed, as if the sun-stone jewel of the White God had been forcibly wrenched from its sacrilegious possessor.

That white shirt-front bore a new object of contrast now—a red-dabbled blur, and above it was a curiously-carved knife-handle, bearing the Aztec word—"Medeiras!"

And there he lay at rest!—at rest so perfect for lip and brow, that only the judgment trump would ever awaken him—Colonel Lytle, aged forty-seven, stabbed to the heart by an unknown assassin—or avenger!

And by his side, tracing weird outlines on the costly carpet, dabbling the fluffy rugs, dashing the marble-tiled fireplace with fantastic splatters, was——

"Something tangible!"—blood!

CHAPTER XXIX.

Resurgam!

The Sunday succeeding the return of the £2,000 to Richard Sheldon, Mr. Detective Dean went to church—the first time in ten years. Thereafter he began to read his Bible morning and night.

He was a changed man. What he had undertaken, through the promptings of remorse, as a penance, now became a sacred duty—a calm, satisfying obligation. He began to feel more manly and energetic. He had done a great wrong; he intended to right it, so far as lay within his power.

Digitized by Google

Dean had a basis to proceed on. From the overheard conversation between the two plotters in the library of Sheldon's house, he realised that they had undertaken some great theft, and had been baffled in their efforts. Furthermore, he knew that they were plotters, in possession of property wrongfully wrested from others. But how to prove that? All this would come out later. He was more anxious to prove the innocence of Convict 407 than settle the question of the guilt of Richard Sheldon and his confederate, Colonel Lytle. The one would hinge on the other.

Convict 407, Adrian Burgoyne, was alive. Not for a moment did he doubt that fact. The tablet bearing those soul-harrowing words, "Murdered by the law," had been written by Adrian Burgoyne. He knew the handwriting perfectly. The mock tombstone had received its startling epitaph nearly a week after his supposed death.

Where, then, was the man he sought?

Not a clue, not a trace, could be gleaned from the most persistent investigation and search, and, for want of some progress more satisfactory, Dean set himself to watching Richard Sheldon.

Upon the evening of the day that witnessed the last interview between Colonel Lytle and Sheldon, the detective was shadowing the merchant's house. He saw Lytle come out and go down the street. Sheltered by a tree, he saw, too, the anxious Sheldon seated, writing, in the library. And then, of a sudden, every professional instinct of caution and shrewdness was aroused to the keenest exercise, as he saw a form cross the little garden plot of the house, linger in the shadow of a bush, survey the merchant critically, and glide furtively to the street.

"Someone else on the trail!" ejaculated Dean, startled. "It's no department man. I never saw that face before, but —oh! impossible! impossible! and yet——"

What was it in the straight, athletic form, in the graceful, steady poise of the man who had just left the precincts of Richard Sheldon's home, that carried Berwyn Dean's mind back to the scene at the Exhibition grounds, to Dormitory D, to the mad dash for liberty, to the personality that had filled his thoughts, to the exclusion of all other themes, for a week past?

There was a motive for Adrian Burgoyne's shadowing of Richard Sheldon. They were enemies. The one was the victim of the other. It was an erratic venture to deem the prowler the escaped convict, but that idea took entire and forcible possession of the mind of the officer, and, as the lurker started down the street, he started after him.

The object of his attention led him quite a long and a brisk chase. When he halted, finally, it was at a second-rate hotel in a retired street. This the man entered, secured a key at the clerk's desk, and ascended the stairs to his room.

Two trifling occurences had intensified Dean's eagerness, as he followed the lurker. He noticed a barely observable halt in one foot—a last, lingering memento of the penitentiary lock-step, which hangs to a convict for years after his release. The man he had pursued had certainly, at some time or other in his life, "done time" in a prison.

Again, as the latter opened the door of the hotel he had held it to allow a man to pass, and he held it just in the manner a convict would in the prison, when according to custom, he stood ready to be locked into his cell.

Dean had also entered the lobby of the hotel, and safe among the idlers there, eagerly watched every movement of the man he was shadowing. He kept his eye on the black figure-checks which sprang up into place as the key was removed, and, approaching the desk as the other disappeared, he observed that it was "47"—corresponding to the room occupied by the possessor of the key.

"The gentleman in number forty-seven?" he spoke carelessly, to the clerk.

"Yes."

"Is not his name Brown?"

"No, Warren. Let me see—E. G. Warren; no, here it is —R. E. Warren. Know him?"

"Fancy I do," returned Dean, and then, with wild eagerness he inspected the name which the clerk had indicated on the hotel visitors' book.

"It's him!" fairly panted the excited Dean.

Yes; no need to guess, or theorise, or investigate further. The man he had followed from Richard Sheldon's home was no other, could be no other, than Convict 407, Adrian Burgoyne!

For, R. E. Warren or any other fictitious name, the handwriting was unmistakably that of Adrian Burgoyne—unmistakably, too, the same as that contained upon the pencilled mock tombstone now reposing in the officer's inner pocket.

Detective Dean had found his man. It augured well as a recompense for his honest endeavour. His heart warmed to genuine joy. He was up the stairs in a twinkling, and at the door of room 47.

Tap—tap—tap!

"Come in!"

The detective turned the knob. He crossed the threshold, pushed the door shut again, and, leaning against it, looked fixedly at the single occupant of the apartment.

A barely perceptible quiver crossed the form of the other. Then, rigid as marble, posed to studied dignity and steadiness, he said coldly:

"What do you want?"

"You!"

The detective stretched forth a hand impressively.

"You, Adrian Burgoyne, Convict 407," he said rapidly. "You know me—Detective Dean? But not as a prisoner, a fugitive from justice—but I want you, Adrian Burgoyne!"

The other came straight up to him. Straight into the detective's eyes he looked, never quailing, never moving a muscle of his face.

"Mr. Detective Dean," he said calmly, "you call me Adrian Burgoyne. You call me Convict 407. Prove it!"

Almost in vindictive triumph, he stood there to afford the other a full view of his face. Prove it, indeed! The detective realised the extraordinary change in this man's personnel since last he had seen him, and comprehended the full integrity of that bold challenge.

"I do not wish to prove it," he announced simply. "On the contrary, I wish to aid you in hiding, in keeping your new identity a secret, because——"

He paused. The other had regarded his utterances with amazement.

"If I wished to prove it to my own satisfaction, however," continued the officer, on a new line of thought, "I would simply consult this!" Dean, as he spoke, drew forth the mock wooden tombstone.

Overwhelmed, the other fell back. From the very grave the dead past had arisen to confront him.

CHAPTER XXX.

ON THE TRAIL.

"MURDERED!"

A cold horror seized the heart of Richard Sheldon, and its icy fingers seemed searching for his own vitals, as he learnt, for the first time, the reason why Colonel Lytle had not brought him that tangible information he had desired.

The intelligence was awarded him by a low-browed man of shabby garb and shifting eyes, who answered to the name of Davenant, and who appeared at the home of the merchant at dusk, the day after the tragedy.

"I was employed by Colonel Lytle to do some secret inquiry work," he vouchsafed to Sheldon. "He told me to report to you, or to himself, as was most convenient under the circumstances."

Digitized by Google

"I understand," murmured Sheldon, little dreaming what was coming.

"I went to his house this afternoon——"

"And he not being at home?" interpolated Sheldon suggestively.

"But he was!"

"Ah! and sent you here?"

"No, he will never direct me again, and that's why I hurried to you, fearing some complication. His landlady had not seen him leave his room since morning, so we peered in. The lamp was burning, although it was broad daylight. We broke in the door. He lay where he had lain since yesterday—across the carpet—dead!"

"Murdered!" gasped Sheldon, white, and sick at heart. "You don't mean to tell me that——"

"Yes, sir. In his heart a dagger—Mexican make. From his window dangled a horse-hair rope—that's how the assassin got in—Mexican make, too."

"Anything missing? — his valuables? — the motive robbery?" chattered the horrified Sheldon.

"No; the motive is hard to guess. The only thing missing, we could notice, was a certain great straw-coloured diamond he wore in his bosom. That had been wrenched violently from its place."

"Don't speak to me! I am sick at heart, shocked, overcome!"

Richard Sheldon waved the man to silence, and bent his ashen face in his trembling hands.

Mexican rope and dagger—the motive—unknown—the yellow diamond missing!

Ah! he knew the motive—personal revenge! In a flash, he recalled the story told to him, jarringly, jeeringly, by the bravado-inspired Lytle of the theft of the White God of the fierce, fateful threat of Medeiras.

The vengeance of the Aztec high priest had been swift! He was no idle boaster. The man who had so ruthlessly invaded the sanctuary of his deities, had rifled the blue marble pedestal of the famous idol, and had left a trail of blood along his heedless, reckless course, had paid the penalty of his temerity!

Medeiras had struck the blow—had avenged his insulted deity, had secured the eye of yellow flame, the sun-stone jewel, to blazon anew in the cave of Bureldo.

Was that all? With an uneasy shudder, Richard Sheldon realised that the fanatic would never rest until he had secured the White God as well. Would he trace it to him, and hold him responsible? He dared not put the police on the trail of the assassin. That would bring out all his own infamy in the conniving at a wicked theft; would raise up a scandal that would deter the execution of his plans. No, if Medeiras passed him by scathless, he would not assail Medeiras. He had lost an ally; one by one, his mainstays of security were leaving him. Well, the end was near! A week, at the farthest, and he would fly the country, and all this peril, uncertainty and terror.

He summoned up courage at last to accompany Davenant to Lytle's apartments. As the best friend of the murdered man, he provided for his burial, took charge of his papers, blindfolded the police, while feigning the utmost anxiety to apprehend the murderer, and tried to hurry the tragic episode into obscurity. He knew that the researches of the detective would end in darkness, would terminate in failure complete at the blank wall of "No clue!"

He hastened his plans all he dared. It was now Wednesday. On the Monday following, if nothing happened to defeat his designs, he would leave the country.

Three occurrences changed his plans, however. They came so disastrously, so unexpectedly sudden, that he could barely analyse one event ere another trod closely upon its heels.

On Friday evening he received a letter from his banker. It announced, formally, that the bank refused to make the loan he required. Funds were short, the money market was tight. He must look elsewhere.

The letter turned Richard Sheldon's face white to the lips. It scared him. What did it mean? What could it mean, except that some enemy had given the bank a hint of his insolvency? Ah! "That accursed detective, Dean!" This was his work. Was a net forming to ensnare him? He fluttered like a caged bird already. The uncertain, the vague, the unknown, terrified, enthralled him.

Bah! he would not give up the fight. His handbag packed, the £2,000 returned by Dean safe in his pocket, the schemer was ready to fly. Half a loaf was better than none. As he realised, however, that phantoms conjured by his own guilty conscience were alarming him, that the law had no tangible hold upon him, he resolved to wait a day or two longer, at least. Golcondas looked more promising. They might go up a few points. He could borrow a few thousands of friends. He would sell off some of the costly plate and pictures of his house for ready cash. He decided to wait a few days. He timed his flight to catch an Antwerp steamer on Tuesday evening. That was six days ahead. Four forged notes came due then. Yes, he was safe until Tuesday noon.

The second discovery was a report from the special agent, Davenant. He had accidentally found the missing Patrice Ringold.

Next, he had shrewdly, unsuspectedly, shadowed Mr. Detective Dean. He told in detail of the movements of the man-hunter, and, putting this visit of Dean to the bank with that call upon a broker, the merchant gnashed his teeth, as he realised that his former employé was now fighting against his interests.

He pricked up his ears, his lips began to quiver, a "nasty" look came into his wicked eyes as the agent proceeded to state that Dean was given to frequent visits to a man at a retired hotel—to frequent consultations, as well.

"He's a young man, but an odd-looking fellow," explained Davenant. "I think his Malay-like complexion and lashless eyelids and strange appearance are part of a disguise."

"What is his name?" asked Sheldon curiously.

"Warren, on the hotel books. Last night, however, I got into the corridor where his room is. I tilted a transom in an adjoining apartment. I heard them talking. I heard, too, the detective call him by what I suppose is his right name—a slip of the tongue quickly checked, but twice unconsciously repeated."

"And what was the name?" queried Sheldon, little dreaming of the powder-mine his curiosity was to set aflame.

"Burgoyne," came the prompt reply.

Richard Sheldon had been watching the man and listening to his report with his arm leaning on the desk before him, his hand shading his eyes.

At the mention of that name—a name potent to unlock the door of a grave, and set loose a thousand hideous emissaries of augury, doubt and dread—the merchant started so violently that his twitching elbow sent a cut-glass inkstand crashing to the carpet.

He heeded not that the gruesome liquid formed a marring, uncouth rivulet. His eyes staring, he gasped out, hoarsely:

"Say that again!"

"Burgoyne."

"You are sure of this?" came in a swift, tumultuous breath from the plotter's lips.

"Yes, I couldn't mistake it. They talked. I only heard a word here and there, but the Burgoyne fellow is a convict, and——"

"I wish to see that man!"

"Eh!—the detective?" queried the other, in some surprise.

"No—Burgoyne; the man calling himself Burgoyne. Oh,

Digitized by Google

impossible!" muttered Richard Sheldon to himself. "It cannot be the same—the convict! He is dead—drowned, in his grave these months ago!"

"I can arrange it," announced Davenant.

"Very good."

"So you can not only see him, but watch him, for an hour, a day—all the time, if you like."

"Excellent! It may mean double pay for you if you can."

"You see," continued Davenant, "Dean is like an eel, slippery, active; flitting here and there, all the time. At the hotel where his friend is stopping, however, he is stationary for an hour or two every evening; so I concluded to camp next to them. I engaged room 48. Burgoyne has number 47, next door. Through the transom you can look and listen."

"I understand," interrupted Sheldon peevishly.

"There's the key."

"Thanks. I shall not forget your shrewdness and fidelity. You can find out more about the whereabouts of the girl, Patrice, and report to me to-morrow. I will undertake to watch the Dean end of the case for a day or two."

Two hours later, well muffled up, and wearing a false beard, that very fairly concealed his identity, Richard Sheldon repaired to the hotel where Adrian Burgoyne was staying.

He reached room 48, and let himself in. It was dark and chill, but he moved about with caution, for, through the clouded glass of a transom in a connecting door, he could make out a light in the next apartment.

Stealthily he approached the door, set a chair against it, mounted the chair, peered through the small interstice formed by a slight tilt of the transom, and looked again, his whole sinister soul in his eyes.

At a table, in an attitude of expectancy, sat a man—Adrian Burgoyne. He had taken off his glasses, and his eyes were in a line of direct inspection. A thousand times would Richard Sheldon have passed him on the street, and never would have so much as thought of a resemblance to Adrian Burgoyne, but now, his suspicions tinged with positive certainty, he recognised the inmate of room 47 as the lurker who had stared in at his library window; he traced the same expression of face that convict 407 had worn in his reproachful, accusing eyes, that far day in the long ago, when his influence and the perjured evidence of his allies had sent Adrian Burgoyne to a living tomb—the prison.

"Ah, at last!" suddenly ejaculated the man he was watching, springing to his feet as a quick step sounded in the hall without.

"It is he—Adrian Burgoyne! I know the voice. From the dead!—he is here!" muttered the startled watcher.

The door of the room opened. Bright-faced, buoyant, waving aloft a little square parcel, Mr. Detective Dean stepped into the apartment.

"What success?" projected Burgoyne palpitatingly.

"The best in the world! I've been down to Lynde; I saw Mrs. Loring; I've secured a clue, a precious, a solitary one, and upon that hinge all our hopes."

Dean drew the object he bore from its paper covering, and placed it against a book on the table, so that the lamplight irradiated its surface brightly.

Peering curiously, the eager Richard Sheldon saw that it was a photograph, and the innocent, wild-rose face looking up at the rapt Adrian Burgoyne was that of missing Patrice Ringold.

(To be continued.)

POSTAL RATES.

SHORT STORIES will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Pearson's Weekly.

THE BIGGEST, BRIGHTEST, AND BEST PAPER IN THE WORLD.

£100 COUPON PRIZE.

A "PEARSON'S WEEKLY" BICYCLE

(£14 14s., including accessories).

A CHANCE TO WIN A £5 NOTE.

THERE is appearing in PEARSON'S WEEKLY at the present time a stirring war story from the facile pen of Mr. Louis Tracy. This story is one of absorbing interest. It deals with what may be justly regarded as the most momentous question of the hour. Can England afford to be isolated? In the event of war breaking out, could we withstand the combined attack of other Continental powers? A love story runs through the novel, and so readers of every disposition are catered for. The first great battle is fought off Worthing, where the combined French and German forces attempt to effect a landing. Britain succeeds in resisting the attack; the great foreign fleet is shattered; all danger of invasion is for a time over. A terrific engagement between the Mediterranean fleets takes place off Gibraltar, and again Great Britain asserts her rights as Mistress of the Seas. The Suez Canal is made impassable. Britain takes the initiative. An English force lands at Havre and another in the North of Germany. Both of these have Paris for their goal. Whether they reach their destination or not, future issues will decide.

TO EARN £100

Collect as many coupons as you can from SHORT STORIES, PEARSON'S STORY TELLER, and PEARSON'S WEEKLY. Keep them till the end of the year, and then send them along to Henrietta Street. The person who forwards the greatest number gets the £100. The SHORT STORIES' coupon is on the second page of cover, at the left-hand bottom corner.

TO EARN £250

Buy a copy of No. 2 of PEARSON'S MAGAZINE, and turn to page 232A.

A BIG BANK ROBBERY!

The issue of SHORT STORIES dated March 14th next will contain the opening chapters of an exciting serial story, entitled:

THE GREAT

MIDDLEWICK BANK ROBBERY:

THE STORY OF A MAN HUNT.

We give you ample notice of its appearance that you may put an order with your newsagent for a copy of this and subsequent issues.

Printed and Published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON, at "Pearson's Weekly" Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

HAVE YOU A POST CARD?

If not, please obtain one, and send it to the

PEARSON POTTERY CO., HANLEY,

with your name and address on the back, and you will receive by next post full particulars of the most wonderful package of crockery the world has ever seen.

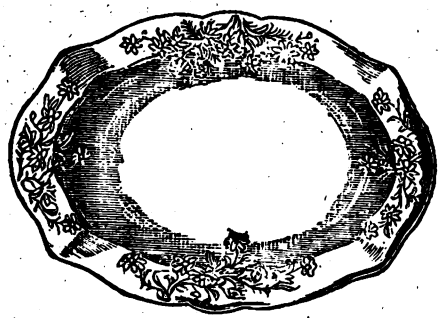
100 PIECES FOR £1 1s.

100 PIECES FOR £1 1s.

A Dinner Service of 50 pieces is included, which is guaranteed to be worth the guinea alone, and a China Tea Service of 28 pieces, finished in gold, together with a lot of useful kitchen crockery.

The Secret of the Success.—The Pearson Pottery Company are manufacturers, not middlemen, like many other advertisers. The Pearson Potteries have nearly 2,000ft. frontage to the town of Hanley.

Thousands Sold All Over the World. Everybody not only satisfied but amazed at the quantity and quality given.



Hundreds of these packages are applied for as WEDDING or BIRTHDAY PRESENTS. And what more useful present can be given? Every item is useful.

Post Cards and Letters to be addressed to the

PEARSON POTTERY CO., HANLEY, STAFFS.

VIOLIN MADE EASY.

The "CARRADOS TUTORETTE" (patent) saves years of practice and pounds in tutors' fees. Positions and Shifts learnt at once. Post free, nickel plated, 1s. 6d. (P.O. only). FINCH & CO., 6, Garfield Rd., London, S.W. FITS ALL VIOLINS.

RED NOSES

Caused by INDIGESTION, etc. All who suffer from this disfiguring complaint should write for DR. HOWELL'S RENOWNED REMEDY, 22, Glasshouse Street, London, W., who guarantees a cure in a few days. 2/6 a box.

ALL FAT PEOPLE

Readily Reduce Weight and Cure Corpulency Permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are very agreeable, harmless, and never fail to PRESERVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of diet. Reduction begins immediately.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably." Send 2/6 to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, Pinsbury Pavement, London, E.C.

HAIR DESTROYED

permanently and absolutely by an entirely new and harmless self-treatment, total destruction guaranteed. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope. Prof. F. T. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

BLUSHING

Permanently cured. A Pamphlet giving sound practical advice and particulars of a successful treatment for a rapid, simple, and inexpensive home-cure, forwarded free to all upon receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—Prof. B. L. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

TO THE DEAF.

A Gentleman who cured himself of Deafness and Noises in the Head after fourteen years' suffering, will gladly send full particulars of the remedy post free.—Address, H. CLIFTON, Amberley House, Norfolk Street, Strand, London, W.C.

THIN BUSTS

Quickly transformed and a good figure permanently obtained by a perfectly harmless, simple, and inexpensive self-treatment. Success guaranteed. For particulars, free, send stamped envelope in confidence to "Madame B. J.," Oriental Toilet Co., 37, Strand, London.

RED NOSES

Permanently cured in a few days by a simple, inexpensive self-treatment. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope to Dr. A. M. CURTIS, York Chambers, Adelphi, London, W.C.

TOO STOUT

Dr. Grey's FAT REDUCING Pills.

A safe, rapid, and permanent reduction and improvement in health and breathing guaranteed. A special preparation kept for stubborn cases (either sex) which have resisted other treatment.

ABDOMINAL OBESITY A SPECIALTY.

2/9 and 4/6 per box, plain wrapper, post free to all parts. Dr. O. GREY, 57, Weymouth St., Portland Pl., London, W.

1896 PROCLAMATION.

THE "SUPER-EMINENT" PIONEER REDUCTION SALE

By Messrs. F. HODGSON & SON, the well-known Carpet Manufacturers of the City of Leeds.

To the Influential Readers of "SHORT STORIES" and may not appear again.

Important announcement of Gigantic Reduction in the price of our Manufactures WILL TAKE EFFECT ON SIGHT of this advertisement, and is of great importance to parties furnishing.

REMARKS.—A lady customer writes complaining that we send out too large a carpet for the money. Be this so or not, we send out no Carpet measuring less than 6ft. by 9ft.—even for 2s. 11d.

TEST THEM. THEY WILL SURPRISE YOU. EXTRAORDINARY REDUCTIONS.

100,000 "ALARM" CARPETS (Reg.)

Sale Price 2/11 Each.

GUARANTEED GENUINE BARGAINS. This Gigantic Offer is a Special Contract made with Readers of Short Stories only. WE WILL FORWARD DIRECT FROM THE LOOMS TO ANY ADDRESS ON RECEIPT OF AMOUNT, A GENUINE, WOVEN, SEAMLESS, REVERSIBLE CARPET, THE LARGEST EVER SOLD AT THE PRICE.

Suitable for Sitting-room or Bedroom, Bordered and Woven in Art Colours, large enough to cover any ordinary-sized room, as an advertisement for our Goods, thus saving any Middle Profits. Remember these are woven, not printed, and are made of a material almost equal to Wool. Thousands of these Carpets and Rugs have already been sold at almost double the above prices. A Rug sent with Carpet, 10d. extra.

SPECIAL OFFER—2 Carpets and 2 Rugs, 7s. 3d.

Value unequalled in the Annals of Advertising. As a favour, kindly examine and compare these Carpets.

Hon. and Rev. T. Markham
Rev. Canon Henderson
Rev. Canon Barrett
Dean Carrington
Ven. Archdeacon of Kilmore.
Ven. Archdeacon Wright
Archdeacon of Aghadoe
Archdeacon Long
Archdeacon of Dromore, D.D.
Archdeacon of Ossory
Archdeacon of Wolseley
Rev. Canon Tate
Rev. Canon Whitford
Rev. Canon Upperton
Rev. Canon W. W. Kirby
Rev. Canon Kinsman
Canon Prothero
Rev. Dr. Nelson
Rev. Dr. Banks
Lady Clayton

THE 'QUEEN'S ROYAL' HEARTHRUGS, Registered.

IN THE HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE (CHANCERY DIVISION), HODGSON v. WEBB BROTHERS.—On the 18th day of July, 1890, his lordship, Mr. Justice Chitty, granted an interim injunction, restraining Messrs. Webb Brothers, of Hackney Wick, from infringing Mr. Fredk. Hodgson's Trade Mark "Eclipse," No. 93,774 (Leeds).

EXTRAORDINARY REDUCTIONS.

100,000 'ECLIPSE' CARPETS (Regd.)

GUARANTEED GENUINE BARGAINS.

Sale Price 3/6 Each.

This Gigantic Offer is a Special Contract, made with readers of Short Stories only. We will forward direct from the looms to any address on receipt of amount, A GENUINE WOVEN, SEAMLESS, REVERSIBLE CARPET, in our New (Reg.) Waterlily and Persian designs, suitable for Sitting-room or Bedroom, Bordered and Woven in Art Colours, large enough to cover any ordinary-sized room, as an advertisement for our goods, thus saving any Middle Profits. Remember these are Woven, not Printed, and are made of a material almost equal to Wool. Thousands of these Carpets and Rugs have already been sold at almost double above prices. An "Eclipse" Rug sent with Carpet 1/- extra.

Sale Price 3/6 Each.

Kilkea Castle, Mageney, co. Kildare, 7th August.

LADY EVA FITZGERALD writes: "The 'Eclipse' Carpets supplied by Messrs. F. Hodgson & Son—her ladyship is much pleased with them."

SPECIAL OFFER.—Two Carpets and Two Rugs 8/-, or Four Carpets and Four Rugs 15/6.

Value unequalled in the Annals of Advertising. As a favour, kindly Examine and Compare these Carpets.

SATISFACTION GUARANTEED. Do not miss this opportunity. It may not occur again.

OUR NEW VENTURE!

Yes. Two Different Pattern Hearthrugs or Carpets for the Price of One! (Copyright.)

Prodigious Sale of the "PRUDENTIAL"

REVERSIBLE CARPETS (Reg.)

Reversible, with a different pattern on both sides, woven throughout with handsome border to correspond; richly blended in several colours to suit any furniture. Made in 12 sizes only. These carpets are the production of much care, labour, and forethought, and are made in handsome and elaborate patterns (which are protected by registration). They combine on one side the rich blended colours of the Turkish and Persian, and on the reverse the elegant designs of the Wilton. These goods cannot be distinguished from real Brussels when laid down, and cannot be excelled in durability.

REDUCED SALE PRICE.

	Each.		Each.
6ft. by 9ft.	... 4/9	9ft. by 15ft.	... 12/6
7½ft. by 9ft.	... 5/11	12ft. by 12ft.	... 12/9
9ft. by 9ft.	... 7/6	12ft. by 13½ft.	... 14/6
9ft. by 10½ft.	... 8/6	12ft. by 15ft.	... 15/9
9ft. by 12ft.	... 9/6	12ft. by 18ft.	... 19/6
10½ft. by 12ft.	... 11/6	12ft. by 21ft.	... 22/6

When ordering, please mention if for Bed, Dining, Drawing, or Sitting Room, and any particular colour preferred.

Blairquhan, Maybole, N.B., August 3rd.

Lady Hunter Blair writes: "Will Messrs. F. Hodgson & Son send her another 'Prudential' Carpet, same as before, crimson and gold, dimensions 9ft. by 10½ft. Cheque inclosed."

Baroness de Linden
Baroness de Ponmoyrie
Baroness de Rottenburg
Dow. Lady Abercrombie
Dow. Lady Aylesford
Right Hon. Lady Martin-Keane
Countess Kearney
Countess Cowley
Countess Lintzow
Countess of Westmeath
Countess of Mayo
Viscountess Torrington
Viscountess Molesworth
Viscountess of Hereford
Rev. Canon Hirst
Rev. Canon Thornton
Rev. Canon Mather
Rev. Canon Cooper
Rev. Canon Hamilton
Rev. Canon Tottenham

THE 'QUEEN'S ROYAL' CARPETS, Registered.

A Reversible "Prudential" Hearthrug (Regd.), to match above Carpets, sent for 1/6 extra, size 2yds. long and 1yd. wide. Special Offer, Three Hearthrugs for 4/3, or Six for 8s., or Twelve for 15/6.

P.S.—When this "Eclipse" Design (registered) is wanted in Carpets or Hearthrugs, as above, kindly quote No. 268,491.

P.S.—When this "Prudential" Design is wanted in Hearthrugs or Carpets, as above, kindly quote Registered No. 268,495.

We Rely upon Spontaneous Repeat Orders from our Clients for the Maintenance of our Trade. Established nearly a Quarter of a Century. All orders dispatched same day in rotation as they arrive by post. Cheques and P.O.'s payable to

"SHORT STORIES" CARPET COUPON, 22/2/96.

On receipt of this Coupon and P.O. or Stamps for amount, we guarantee to send any goods as above to your address in any part of the United Kingdom. (Signed) F. HODGSON & SON.

Cash returned in full if not satisfied.

F. HODGSON & SON,

Manufacturers, Importers and Merchants,

WOODSLEY RD., LEEDS.

Telegraphic Address: "ECLIPSE, LEEDS," Telephone No. 948. N.B.—Foreign Orders executed and packed free, and shipped at lowest rates.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

NO. 374. FOR WEEK ENDING FEBRUARY 29TH, 1896. [ONE PENNY.

1896 PROCLAMATION. THE "SUPER-EMINENT" PIONEER REDUCTION SALE.

By Messrs. F. HODGSON & SON, the well-known Carpet Manufacturers of the City of Leeds.

To the Influential Readers of "SHORT STORIES" and may not appear again.

Important announcement of Gigantic Reduction in the price of our Manufactures WILL TAKE EFFECT ON SIGHT of this advertisement, and is of great importance to parties furnishing.

REMARKS.—A lady customer writes complaining that we send out too large a carpet for the money. Be this so or not, we send out no Carpet measuring less than 6ft. by 9ft.—even for 2s. 11d.

TEST THEM. THEY WILL SURPRISE YOU. EXTRAORDINARY REDUCTIONS.

100,000 "ALARM" CARPETS (Reg.)

Sale Price 2/11 Each.

GUARANTEED GENUINE BARGAINS. This Gigantic Offer is a Special Contract made with Readers of Short Stories only. WE WILL FORWARD DIRECT FROM THE LOOMS TO ANY ADDRESS ON RECEIPT OF AMOUNT, A GENUINE, WOVEN, SEAMLESS, REVERSIBLE CARPET, THE LARGEST EVER SOLD AT THE PRICE.

Suitable for Sitting-room or Bedroom, Bordered and Woven in Art Colours, large enough to cover any ordinary-sized room, as an advertisement for our Goods, thus saving any Middle Profits. Remember these are woven, not printed, and are made of a material almost equal to Wool. Thousands of these Carpets and Rugs have already been sold at almost double the above prices. A Rug sent with Carpet, 10d. extra.

SPECIAL OFFER—2 Carpets and 2 Rugs, 7s. 3d.

Value unequalled in the Annals of Advertising. As a favour, kindly examine and compare these Carpets.

Hon. and Rev. T. Markham
Rev. Canon Henderson
Rev. Canon Barrett
Dean Carrington
Ven. Archdeacon of Kilmore.
Ven. Archdeacon Wright
Archdeacon of Aghadoe
Archdeacon Long
Archdeacon of Dromore, D.D.
Archdeacon of Ossory
Archdeacon of Wolseley
Rev. Canon Tate
Rev. Canon Whitford
Rev. Canon Upperton
Rev. Canon W. W. Kirby
Rev. Canon Kinsman
Canon Prothero
Rev. Dr. Nelson
Rev. Dr. Banks
Lady Clayton

THE 'QUEEN'S ROYAL' HEARTHRUGS, Registered.

IN THE HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE (CHANCERY DIVISION), HODGSON v. WEBB BROTHERS.—On the 18th day of July, 1890, his lordship, Mr. Justice Chitty, granted an interim injunction, restraining Messrs. Webb Brothers, of Hackney Wick, from infringing Mr. Fredk. Hodgson's Trade Mark "Eclipse," No. 93,774 (Leeds).

EXTRAORDINARY REDUCTIONS.

100,000 'ECLIPSE' CARPETS (Regd.)

GUARANTEED GENUINE BARGAINS.

Sale Price 3/6 Each.

This Gigantic Offer is a Special Contract, made with readers of Short Stories only. We will forward direct from the looms to any address on receipt of amount, A GENUINE WOVEN, SEAMLESS, REVERSIBLE CARPET, in our New (Reg.) Waterlily and Persian designs, suitable for Sitting-room or Bedroom, Bordered and Woven in Art Colours, large enough to cover any ordinary-sized room, as an advertisement for our goods, thus saving any Middle Profits. Remember these are Woven, not Printed, and are made of a material almost equal to Wool. Thousands of these Carpets and Rugs have already been sold at almost double above prices. An "Eclipse" Rug sent with Carpet 1/- extra.

Sale Price 3/6 Each.

Kilkea Castle, Mageney, co. Kildare, 7th August.

LADY EVA FITZGERALD writes: "The 'Eclipse' Carpets supplied by Messrs. F. Hodgson & Son—her ladyship is much pleased with them."

SPECIAL OFFER.—Two Carpets and Two Rugs 8/-, or Four Carpets and Four Rugs 15/6.

Value unequalled in the Annals of Advertising. As a favour, kindly Examine and Compare these Carpets.

SATISFACTION GUARANTEED. Do not miss this opportunity. It may not occur again.

OUR NEW VENTURE! Yes. Two Different Pattern Hearthrugs or Carpets for the Price of One! (Copyright.)

Prodigious Sale of the "PRUDENTIAL"

REVERSIBLE CARPETS (Reg.)

Reversible, with a different pattern on both sides, woven throughout with handsome border to correspond; richly blended in several colours to suit any furniture. Made in 12 sizes only. These carpets are the production of much care, labour, and forethought, and are made in handsome and elaborate patterns (which are protected by registration). They combine on one side the rich blended colours of the Turkish and Persian, and on the reverse the elegant designs of the Wilton. These goods cannot be distinguished from real Brussels when laid down, and cannot be excelled in durability.

REDUCED SALE PRICE.

		Each.			Each.
6ft. by	9ft.	... 4/9	9ft. by	15ft.	... 12/6
7½ft. by	9ft.	... 5/11	12ft. by	12ft.	... 12/9
9ft. by	9ft.	... 7/6	12ft. by	13½ft.	... 14/6
9ft. by	10½ft.	... 8/6	12ft. by	15ft.	... 15/9
9ft. by	12ft.	... 9/6	12ft. by	18ft.	... 19/6
10½ft. by	12ft.	... 11/6	12ft. by	21ft.	... 22/6

When ordering, please mention if for Bed, Dining, Drawing, or Sitting Room, and any particular colour preferred.

Blairquhan, Maybole, N.B., August 3rd.

Lady Hunter Blair writes: "Will Messrs. F. Hodgson & Son send her another 'Prudential' Carpet, same as before, crimson and gold, dimensions 9ft. by 10½ft. Cheque inclosed."

Baroness de Linden
Baroness de Ponmoyrie
Baroness de Rottenburg
Dow. Lady Abercrombie
Dow. Lady Aylesford
Right Hon. Lady Martin-Keane
Countess Kearney
Countess Cowley
Countess Lintzow
Countess of Westmeath
Countess of Mayo
Viscountess Torrington
Viscountess Molesworth
Viscountess of Hereford
Pev. Canon Hirst
Bev. Canon Thornton
Rev. Canon Mather
Rev. Canon Cooper
Rev. Canon Hamilton
Rev. Canon Tottenham

THE 'QUEEN'S ROYAL' CARPETS, Registered.

A Reversible "Prudential" Hearthrug (Regd.), to match above Carpets, sent for 1/6 extra, size 2yds. long and 1yd. wide. Special Offer, Three Hearthrugs for 4/3, or Six for 8s., or Twelve for 15/6.

We Rely upon Spontaneous Repeat Orders from our Clients for the Maintenance of our Trade. Established nearly a Quarter of a Century. All orders dispatched same day in rotation as they arrive by post. Cheques and P.O.'s payable to

"SHORT STORIES" CARPET COUPON, 29/2/96.

On receipt of this Coupon and P.O. or Stamps for amount, we guarantee to send any goods as above to your address in any part of the United Kingdom.

(Signed) F. HODGSON & SON.

Cash returned in full if not satisfied.

F. HODGSON & SON, Manufacturers, Importers and Merchants, WOODSLEY RD., LEEDS.

Telegraphic Address: "ECLIPSE, LEEDS," Telephone No. 948. N.B.—Foreign Orders executed and packed free, and shipped at lowest rates.

Digitized by Google

THE JOHN NOBLE

HALF-GUINEA COSTUMES

Direct from the Largest Firm of Costume Manufacturers in the world, have secured beyond a doubt the ADMIRATION OF THE WORLD. Being Absolutely Without an Equal Anywhere for Stylish Appearance, Durability, and Actual Money Value. 10/6

TWO GOLD MEDALS AWARDED.

These Costumes have received the highest praise from the leading journals of the day, and are justly regarded by all purchasers as Even Better than Advertised.

Each Costume scientifically cut, tailor-made, and beautifully finished in an exceedingly smart mode, as illustration. The design consists of full wide Godet skirt with belt, also very neat bodice with full front and broad box-pleat down centre, trimmed bold silk cord and three large buttons. Collar and cuffs outlined silk cord; saddle and sleeves lined.

Price complete only 10/6, safely packed and sent carriage paid for 9d. extra.

Sizes in stock fit any figure up to 38ins. round bust under arms, skirts being 38, 40, and 42 ins. long in front; larger or special sizes made to measure, 1/6 extra.

THE JOHN NOBLE

☛ COSTUMES FOR YOUNG MISSES are made in the John Noble Cheviot Serge, and trimmed military braid as illustration. A large box-pleat down the centre of the lined bodice, and a fancy pocket at each side of the skirt, complete a charming design at these prices: FROM 8/6

Lengths	35	38	42	46	50 inches.
Prices	8/6	9/6	10/9	12/-	13/6 each.

Each costume safely packed and sent carriage paid for 9d. extra.

KNOCKABOUT FROCKS FOR GIRLS are also supplied in the John Noble Cheviot Serge, with saddle top, long full sleeves, and pocket, at following prices: FROM 1/6

Lengths	21	24	27	30	33	36	39	42	45 ins.
Prices	1/6	2/-	2/6	3/-	3/6	4/-	4/6	5/-	5/6 ea.

Postage 4½d. extra. Lengths stated above are from top of neckband to bottom of skirt in front.

COLOURS: Any of the above garments can be supplied in Black, Navy, Brown, Myrtle, Bronze Green, Electric Blue, Ruby, Dark Cinnamon, Fawn, or Grey.

The JOHN NOBLE CHEVIOT SERGE in which the above garments are made is a fabric of world-wide fame and durability, measuring 52ins. wide. The full Dress Length of Six Yards can be supplied for 7/6, or any length at 1/3 the yard. Colours as above. 7/6

PATTERNS, also FASHION SHEETS of numerous other designs in Ladies' and Children's Costumes, etc., sent Post Free on application. Please mention "Short Stories" when ordering.

JOHN NOBLE LTD., Brook St. Mills, MANCHESTER.

MRS. JACKSON

An artist's wife, residing at Norton, near Malton, states: "I am deeply grateful to you for the good received through taking your Wind Pills I suffered severely from

INDIGESTION, SPASMS,

and LIVER COMPLAINT. The doctors gave me up as incurable, nor did I think it possible for me to recover. I scarcely dared to eat any food, fearing suffocation. Seeing an advertisement of

Page Woodcock's Wind Pills,

I resolved to try them. After taking a few small boxes I lost all the painful symptoms, and now enjoy good health. Publish my statement as you please."

All sufferers from INDIGESTION, LIVER COMPLAINTS, WIND on the STOMACH, SICK HEADACHE, BILIOUSNESS, etc., should avail themselves of this most excellent medicine.

☛ The Wind Pills being purely Vegetable, Tasteless, and Mild, and Tonic in their action, may be taken with perfect safety by the most delicate of either sex.

Of all Medicine Vendors, at 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. Post Free for P.O. or Stamps from PAGE WOODCOCK, LINCOLN.

TOOTH-ACHE

CURED INSTANTLY BY

BUNTER'S NERVINE

Prevents Decay. Saves Extraction. Sleepless Nights Prevented. Neuralgic Headache and all Nerve Pains Removed by BUNTER'S NERVINE. All Chemists, 1s. 1½d.

"JUNO" CYCLES

Are the Very Best.

JUNO Safeties. Roadsters, 28lb.; Racers, 22lb. JUNO Lady's Safety a Specialite.

Send at once for JUNO Catalogue, sent post free to any part of the world, interesting and valuable to all. METROPOLITAN MACHINISTS' CO., LTD., 75 and 76, Bishopsgate Without, London, E.C.

N.B.—Every JUNO Guaranteed. MENTION PAPER.

EPPS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

COCOA

TRILENE REGD TABLETS

THE ONLY CURE for STOUTNESS Registered by GOVERNMENT Price 2/6

ALL FAT PEOPLE

Readily Reduce Weight and Cure Corpulency Permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are very agreeable, harmless, and never fail to PRESERVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of diet. Reduction begins immediately.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably." Send 2/6 to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C.

SULPHOLINE LOTION

For clearing the skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness, giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance.

SHILLING BOTTLES.

KNOW THYSELF!

YOUR CHARACTER, APTITUDES, and CAREER marvellously described from Handwriting by distinguished Graphologist. Business Guidance. Success ensured. Fee 2s.

Professor CARONA, F.B.I.M.S., 126, Ledbury Road, Bayswater, W.

WE GIVE AWAY

Free of all cost, Hosiery, Dress Skirts, Printed Blouses, and Complete Dress Lengths. Every woman should write for particulars and the most Marvellous Dress Guide, which are sent free on receipt of a Post Card. ADDRESS: Shakespeare Manufacturing Co. (Dept. 19), Milk St., Manchester.

RED NOSES

Caused by INDIGESTION, etc. All who suffer from this disfiguring complaint should write for DR. HOWELL'S RENOWNED REMEDY, 22, Glasshouse Street, London, W., who guarantees a cure in a few days. 2/6 a box.

S.S. S.S.

PEARSON'S

£100

COUPON.

No. 9

Feb. 29, 1896.

S.S. S.S.

HAIR DESTROYED.

A doctor's widow knows of a simple, inexpensive remedy that permanently destroys the roots, and will forward particulars free to all those afflicted sending stamped envelope. Address Mrs. B. D. WOOD, 4, DUKE STREET, VILLIERS STREET, LONDON, W.

ARE YOU LITTLE?

If so, wear the "A D" Invisible Elevators (Regd.). Will increase your height up to four inches; the only approved means; detection impossible; simple, inexpensive. Send stamped envelope for particulars to the ORIENTAL TOILET CO. (B 5 Dept.), 87, Strand, London.

HAIR DESTROYED.

A lady who has permanently destroyed Superfluous Hairs on herself, will be happy to forward free, to all similarly afflicted, full particulars of a simple, inexpensive and harmless self-treatment. Send stamped addressed envelope in confidence to Mrs. "T. D.," 87, Strand, London.

TO TOBACCONISTS COMMENCING.

£20 See Illus. Guide and Catalogue (239 pages), 3d. "How to Open a Clear Stores, from £20 to £2,000." TOBACCONISTS' OUTFITTING CO., 186, Euston Road, London. (Over 50 years' reputation.) Manager, H. MYERS.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON

No. 374.] For the Week ending February 29th, 1896. [ONE PENNY.

THE CHARM IN ESTHER'S EYES.

SIX men were seated round a table at dinner. They had been discussing the Jews in London.

Stanwood was a specialist on the subject. "I know what I am talking about," he remarked somewhat irritably, for the men had been laughing at his theories. "There's not a man in this room who will go into six old-clothes' shops in the East-end that I can show him, price an overcoat, and come away without buying one. As I said before, I will wager a dinner on it."

"I don't see where the difficulty comes in," said Rochester. "I'll take the bet."

The following morning the six men were driving from Piccadilly to the East-end. Stanwood was directing the route. Presently, when they came to the Jewish quarter, they left the carriage, and walked down a bye-street. Mr. Rochester, as the morning was cold, was dressed in a rough travelling suit. He hailed from the country.

"Here we are," said Stanwood, and five men crossed the street, where they could watch Rochester unobserved.

* * * * *

Rochester has just passed under the arcade of trousers and vests in front of Funkenstein's when a little old man with a grey beard and sharp eyes seized his arm.

"I know vot you vand. You vand a shpring ofercoad, ain't id?"

"Have you got any spring overcoats?" asked Mr. Rochester.

"Haf I? Der finest in der vorld. Gome insite." And they went inside.

"Vot price?" asked Mr. Funkenstein.

"I'm not particular. I want something that will not show the dust."

"Rebecca, get down dem goods and don't be loafin' dere," said the vendor sharply. "I vouldn't show 'em to eferybody, my frient. (In a theatrical whisper.) Dese vas send to a frient py der Brince of Vales. Dey vas too schmall for him, und he gafe 'em to his man vat sold 'em. You don't gif it avay!" said Mr. Funkenstein, suddenly checking himself and staring suspiciously at Rochester, fearing that he had told too much.

"I will not," said Rochester.

"Dere now. Chust see dot," said the vendor admiringly, as he exhibited an overcoat which, in the dim light, looked perfectly new. It was faced with ostensible silk, and was of the latest cut.

"How much is it?" asked Rochester.

"£2 10s., vort £5 if it's vort anything."

Had it not been for the bet the bargain really would have been tempting. Mindful of his mission, however, Rochester shook his head and edged away.

"Holt on; vait a minid. I got all kinds of shpring ofercoads. Tventy dozen here and tventy cases upstairs. Maybe you don't like der colour? Vat colour you like? Prown? Veepin' Rachel, you ought to see der prown vons." And in a second he had conjured three from somewhere in different shades, and had one over Rochester's right arm and two in his hands.

"Take der middle vun. Fits your comblexion vonderful. Nefer seen vun fit a man's comblexion like dot. Chust your size."

Rochester found himself encircled with a tape round his chest.

"Vell! vell! vell!" cried Funkenstein, astonished.

"Vat ees it, Isaac?" screamed Rebecca, startled.

"Oh! vot a shplendid chest! Oh, coot cracious! You was a brize fighder, my frient. I tink so when you come in. Rebecca, is dot a brize fighder's ofercoad you got dere? Dry it on, my frient, dry it on."

Before Rochester could protest his arms were half way in the sleeves, and Rebecca and Isaac skilfully slipped it over his shoulders.

Rochester looked sheepish. He wished he was out of it. He seemed to be under some kind of an obligation to purchase an overcoat that he had not foreseen. He felt fatally sure that if he didn't get that overcoat off his back he would buy it. All this ran through his mind in the dark little shop while Isaac was bunching it up in the back and saying critically:

"Nefer seen anyding like id. Fits like it vos mate to orter."

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

"Like der shkin on a sossitch," echoed Rebecca.

Rochester acted with decision. He took half-a-crown from his pocket, and said:

"Here, I—I have an appointment. This will pay you for your trouble."

He stripped off the coat, and fled in the temporary astonishment he had caused.

"Vy didn't he take der coat vit him?" said Rebecca, grinning at Isaac as she looked at the coin.

But Isaac was already outside, and had hooked another fish.

* * * * * *

Rochester felt that he needed time for reflection. He did not dare look in the direction of the five broad grins, which he felt sure were a short distance away. He lit a cigar and ruminated. He must keep the overcoat away from him; that was evident. This was the only conclusion reached when a voice said:

"I got id—£2."

It was Motzenhauser. Motzenhauser was pointing to an overcoat on a dummy. Motzenhauser had watched all the Funkenstein proceedings except the finale. He had agreed with Mrs. Motzenhauser that Rochester was from the country, and planned accordingly.

"Gome insite," said Motzenhauser.

Rochester hesitated. He wished to refuse, but it was part of the bet to enter.

"I had a son go oud to trade," said Mrs. Motzenhauser.

Rochester is polite to all women.

"Indeed," said he.

"Chacob Motzenhauser vos his name. He sold cowlar puttons und stud links; put now he has a pig shop. You know Chacob?"

Rochester thought he had met several Chacobs in his travels. But still denied it. He did not know what subtle logical sequence might lie between acquaintanceship with Chacob and buying a coat.

"Try dis on," said Motzenhauser, himself and wife grabbing the customer's hands.

He knew the dodge, and stepped backwards just in time.

"Thank you. I won't try it on," he said. "It's too—too light," he added, at a venture.

The mates to it in six darker shades were instantly forthcoming. Rochester felt that he had put his foot in it. He didn't know what to say.

"I mean it's too thin for the weather."

They held up their hands in astonishment, and waved them horizontally from the wrist-joint above their shoulders.

"Sufferin' Lazarus. Too thin?. Vy, you vear sometings heffier as dot and purn to a grisp."

"I'm not going to be in London," said Rochester.

"Vere you goin'?"

"To—to Greenland!"

He rushed out without more words.

* * * * * *

Motzenhauser and his wife stared at Rochester from the doorway, and made some kind of a sign to the street, for the street was watching intently wherever it was not occupied "inside." The sign meant that he was a crank. The street nodded, but still watched. The crank was going into Katzenyammer's. What would Katzenyammer do with him? That was the question.

Katzenyammer was the acknowledged king of the street. He would sell a suit of clothes to a wooden figure. He would sell a man a tin watch at the top price, and make him think he had got the Strasburg clock with the cathedral thrown in. What would Katzenyammer do with him? That was the question in which the street and five club-men were deeply interested.

But Katzenyammer's place showed no signs of life. It was either unheard of carelessness or a bold stroke of genius. The historian is able to state that it was the latter. Katzenyammer had not missed a point of the preceding encounter, and had his own theory. Rochester saw the neglected doorway, and argued favourably. He would not be very much bothered in that place, and he entered with a sigh of relief. It was half lighted like all of them. Katzenyammer was seated quietly smoking a long pipe. Two young men and a women were seated about, to bolster him up.

"I want to price an overcoat," said Rochester, thereby fatally committing himself.

"A sphring ofercoad?" asked Katzenyammer indifferently.

"Yes."

Katzenyammer did not move.

"Vot brice?" asked he.

"Anything under £3."

Katzenyammer smoked.

"Vat colour?"

Rochester was a little nettled. "Any neutral colour," said he. "Something that is light and will not show the dust."

Katzenyammer considered. "I don't tink," he began doubtfully, "you vouldn't come in here foolin' vit a man and takin' up his dime ven you didn't vand to puy no ofercoad, vould you?"

"Of course not," said Rochester angrily.

"Sow der chentlemen a coad, Simon," said Katzenyammer.

There were twenty-seven coats all answering the description Rochester had given, and all his size. He examined one and refused it. With another he did the same. Another would not do. Each time he had to find the faults. Each time he was looked at with suspicion. His ingenuity was taxed beyond its limits. He was at his wits' end. There were twenty-four overcoats still to battle with and pretend to find fault with. Rochester is conscientious. That is his weakness. He turned to silent Katzenyammer.

"I have changed my mind, and will not buy an overcoat to-day. I will, however, pay you for your trouble and time. How much is it?"

Katzenyammer knew it all the time. He smoked indifferently. His feelings were hurt.

"Vat's der brice of der coad, Simon?"

"£1."

Katzenyammer nodded at Rochester. Some people would not have done it, but Katzenyammer would have found a weak spot in them, as he did in Rochester. The latter handed him a sovereign, and then went meanly out.

* * * * * *

The street was amazed. Katzenyammer had missed him—wonder of wonders! The quintet was uneasy. Rochester's staying powers were a marvel entirely unexpected. Next door, however, all was excitement.

It was the chance of a lifetime, and Hammerschmidt rose to it. The sale was nothing. The prestige was all.

"K-vick! K-vick!" the old man cried in his excitement, as he drove the representatives of four generations into the back room. All depended on Esther. She alone could take the trick that Katzenyammer even had failed in.

Digitized by Google

This door, too, was unattended. Rochester, with many misgivings, passed in.

As he stared about the half-lighted place his eyes fell on those of a girl of seventeen, who sat under a row of bell-bottom trousers hanging on the wall. They were beautiful eyes that met his view—large, lustrous, loving, and sad—the historic eyes of the Jewess of romance.

"I wish to price an overcoat," said Rochester gently.

"My father is not here, and I don't know the goods," said Esther with a troubled look.

"Oh, I expect you can find me something," said he relieved. "I'm not particular."

"Is it for winter?" she asked.

"Yes; such as they wear at the play. Do you ever go to the play in the winter time?" asked Rochester.

"I never have been, but I should like to go," said Esther.

She smiled. Her teeth were even and white. She was undeniably pretty. She walked well. Heredity had been kind to her. Twenty generations of pedlar's packs had curved her back not in the least. He watched her, for Rochester is artistic, as she fumbled among some overcoats. That red shawl and that head certainly formed a picture.

"Will you try this on?" she asked gently, holding it out to him.

It was the critical moment. Hammerschmidt was peeping through a crack in the door, and giving momentary bulletins to his wife. Every knot-hole in the ceiling had an eye to it, and there were several knot-holes. Funkenstein, Motzenhauser, and Katzenyammer, were all ill at ease, notwithstanding they had not all done badly. The street was in a painful state of suspense, and the quintet were betting wine in a trying state of doubt.

"If you will put it on for me," said Rochester tenderly.

Hammerschmidt's long breath of relief was audible in the shop, though foolish Rochester heeded it not. The agony was over. Esther would never let him get that coat off again. If she did he would disinherit her.

Dimpled hands raised the overcoat to his shoulders; warm fingers pressed it forward about his neck, and as they did so touched his cheek. Esther's purchases in the perfumery line were not imported, but as she buttoned the top button it seemed as if it was "Brisas de las Pampas" in the dark, heavy folds of her hair.

"Will it do?" she asked timidly. "I never tried before."

"Of course," said Rochester gallantly. Then he stopped. A look of consternation crept over his face, and he ground his teeth.

"Of course," he repeated, smothering the thought and smiling on the beautiful girl. "How much is it?"

Esther, with some difficulty, found the card on the starboard coat-tail, and said: "£3." Esther was not slow herself. He gave her the money and she thanked him gracefully.

"You say you'd like to go to the play this——"

"Esther-go-und-see-vat-time-der-teakettle-will-be-done-alreaty-don't-be-vaitin'-round-here-ven-dere's-no-tea-Esther-be-kvick-aboud-it!" yelled Hammerschmidt all in a breath, as he burst into the front shop.

She went like the startled fawn. Hammerschmidt did not look like an invitation to dinner, but had the inhospitable and biassed expression of a meat-axe. He looked as if he might have a great deal to say, but Rochester did not care for conversation. He bowed and went hurriedly out.

* * * * * *

As he came into the broad daylight with the overcoat on a yell sounded down the street. Five men roared, and slapped their thighs, and laughed like lunatics. The street looked at them in amazement. As Rochester went towards them they laughed harder and harder.

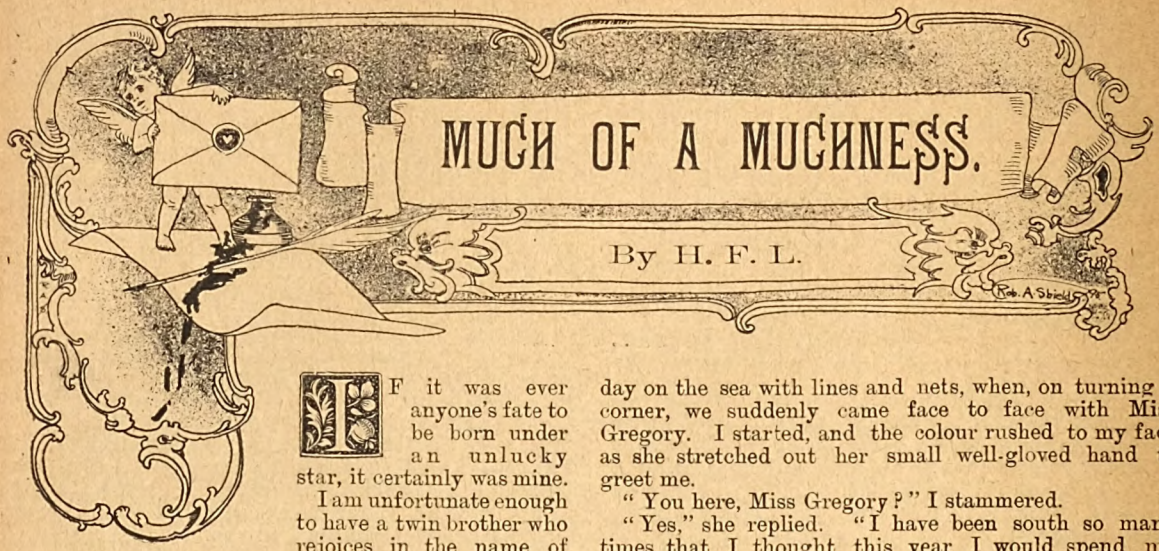
He had on an old melton overcoat, pale-green under the collar, faded grey in various shades in the skirt. It was frayed at the cuffs, worn out and sewed up at the buttonholes, and had a small patch on one of the sleeves.

"You needn't laugh," he said, with suppressed anger. "In fact, I won't have it," he added hotly. "I've lost the bet, and that's enough said."

They stopped laughing, but looked very queer. Now and then they inspected him furtively out of the corners of their eyes, as he took the lead, scowling. But there was imminent danger of explosion all the way back to the club.

H. J. W. D.

Digitized by Google



MUCH OF A MUCHNESS.

By H. F. L.

IF it was ever anyone's fate to be born under an unlucky star, it certainly was mine.

I am unfortunate enough to have a twin brother who rejoices in the name of William. We are alike as two pins—at least, so everybody tells us. I don't think so, however, for William is a happy-go-lucky sort of fellow, no good at anything, and always getting into scrapes for which I invariably get the blame; you can therefore naturally understand that I do not look upon it as an honour to be taken for my brother, although he has not the slighest objection to being mistaken for me.

As a matter of fact, I am slightly the taller, but the colour of our eyes and hair are the same, our faces have the same expression, and the tone of our voices is barely distinguishable.

In spite of the difficulties I used to get into through William's idle freaks and gossip, a strong feeling of brotherly love existed between us, and I am proud to say that feeling still exists to this day, in spite of the severe tests to which it has been put.

After leaving college we separated. My brother was articled to a firm of solicitors, and I started a weekly periodical in the south of Wales, which I am proud to say obtained a very fair circulation, and brought me in a very comfortable little income.

The ridiculous likeness between us seemed to increase year by year as time went on, instead of decreasing, and in self-defence I at last determined to cultivate a beard and moustache, and thus save myself from having the sins of my brother visited upon my own head.

We both welcomed the month of September, for it was then we took our holidays. We always spent them together, and enjoyed talking over the many jokes of the past which we had been able to play both at school and college, on account of our remarkable likeness to each other. William was therefore not at all surprised to receive from me one morning a letter, arranging for a trip to Scotland as soon as he could get away from his duties.

Three weeks later we might have been seen standing on one of the platforms in Edinburgh railway station, waiting for a train which was to convey us and our baggage to a small town on the east coast of Scotland, between Aberdeen and Montrose.

Late one evening, about a week after we had arrived, we were wending our way back to our hotel, carrying between us a large basket of fish, the result of a long day on the sea with lines and nets, when, on turning a corner, we suddenly came face to face with Miss Gregory. I started, and the colour rushed to my face as she stretched out her small well-gloved hand to greet me.

"You here, Miss Gregory?" I stammered.

"Yes," she replied. "I have been south so many times that I thought this year I would spend my holidays in Scotland; but I certainly never expected to meet you here. You never told me you were going north."

Miss Gregory and I had for some time past been very good friends, and it was only for my brother's sake that I was sorry I had come across her.

That evening after dinner I told my brother as nicely as I could that he was not to mind if I did not give up all my time to him, and the various excursions we had planned, as I had not calculated on coming across Clara. He grumbled a good deal at first, and made a few unkind remarks, which I do not for the moment believe he meant—something about his company not being good enough, and also about Clara, adding how thankful he was that I had not introduced him—for he had left us talking at the corner of the street, and had walked on to the hotel alone, taking the fish with him.

The following day was Thursday, that particular Thursday in September when the inhabitants of the small town repaired en masse to the large flat field north of the town to witness the Highland games and sports.

Of course, I took Clara, leaving William to look after himself, and succeeded in obtaining very good places inside the ring.

It was a glorious day; the sun shone brilliantly, and the strapping pipers in their many coloured plaids, drew forth stirring music from their bagpipes, and as each champion achieved some victory, or performed some great feat of strength, the applause was deafening, which proved the onlookers to be in high spirits.

I was thoroughly contented, basking in the sun by the side of Clara who was chattering away as only women can. Suddenly my eyes fell on a familiar figure, it was that of my brother Will, yes, there was no doubt about it, it was Will strolling about with a young girl who had lovely golden hair, which the sun seemed to turn into threads of that precious metal.

Had it not been that his face was turned towards me, and I saw it was clean shaven, I might have thought it was my ghost, for we each had on our College blazers, with ribbons on our white straw hats to match, and white flannel trousers, which had only that morning come back from the wash.

Digitized by Google

I was about to point him out to Clara when I found he had disappeared in the crowd.

It seemed to get hotter and hotter, and I was glad to get what shade I could from the parasol of an old lady who was sitting behind me. The men selling iced drinks were doing a roaring trade, and I determined at the risk of losing my place to get some for my charge. so making some excuse about being cramped and rather stiff, I left her, thinking that refreshment would be all the more acceptable if it came as a surprise.

The crowd round the ice vendors was tremendous, and it was some time before I succeeded in obtaining what I required. I was successful at last, however, and then proceeded to make my way back, with an ice in one hand and some delicious looking fruit in the other, but it was not such an easy task as I anticipated.

The sports were still in full swing, and the throng round the inclosure seemed thicker than ever.

I well remember how fearfully pushed about and elbowed I got: everyone seemed to put themselves in my way. They would not give me a chance; in fact, they seemed to think that I was trying to push myself in front of them on purpose to obscure their view.

The ice soon melted, and to make matters worse some clumsy idiot pushed my arm and spilt the pink liquid—for it was originally a strawberry ice—all over my hitherto spotless white trousers, this annoyed me exceedingly, especially when I was informed on remonstrating that it was all through my own carelessness.

When at last I did get to my seat, I had only, besides the empty ice-glass, a squashed peach left, this I was with many apologies about to offer Clara when to my dismay, I observed her seat was empty, and that she was nowhere to be seen.

I searched up and down, and made inquiries, but no one could tell me what had become of her, and at last, the sports having come to an end I was, with the crowd, swept out of the field.

It was not long before I was at No. 19 T—— Street, where I knew my little woman was staying, I rang at the bell, and sent up my card. Imagine therefore my surprise when the servant returned with a message to say that Miss Gregory would not see me, and that she would be glad if I would not trouble to call again.

I met my brother in the hall of the hotel as I entered, he was in high spirits, and began discussing the events of the afternoon, but I pretended not to hear, and pushing past him, went up to my room.

It was at dinner that evening the truth suddenly dawned upon me. Clara must have become impatient while I was away getting the refreshments and have left her seat to look for me. She then in all probability caught sight of my brother walking about with Miss Wilson, to whom he had been introduced by a friend, and had mistaken him for me, though had she seen his face she would have perceived her error, for he boasted of no beard or moustache.

I endeavoured to console myself by explaining to my brother how matters stood, but he only laughed, and looked upon the whole affair as a first-rate joke. Seeing, however, that I was annoyed, he good-naturedly undertook to do anything in his power to help me, and I promised that should an opportunity occur, I should not fail to avail myself of his offer.

How many cigarettes we smoked that evening, trying to find a way out of my difficulty, I should not like to say, but Will finally decided that, as it was indirectly through him that I had lost my lady love, it should be through him that I would get her back again. I did not see how the affair was going to be managed, but being assured by him that it would turn out all right, I left the matter in his hands.

Next morning, by Will's orders, I packed up my goods and set out by the 10.30 train on my return journey to Wales, vowing never again to set foot in Scotland.

It was about a year after the event recorded above that, on looking through my paper one morning, my eye was caught by the announcement of an engagement between Miss Gregory and my brother Will. I could scarcely believe my eyes, and in my rage took the next train to London, and hunted up my brother.

I found him in his rooms, he having just got back from his office, and at once demanded an explantion from him. I was in a towering rage.

"Calm yourself, my dear fellow," he began; "I am simply working to fulfil my promise that as it was through me you lost Clara, it should be through me you regained her."

"I do not understand you," I stammered; "your marrying her will make it practically impossible. How am I to ever hope of winning her when she is your wife?"

"My what?"

"Your wife."

"My dear fellow, I am not going to marry her. I never had the least intention of doing so."

"I don't understand you," I gasped. "What does this mean?" and I handed him the paper which contained a notice of the engagement.

"That? Why that's the announcement of your engagement—not mine."

And then he explained how he had won her for my sake, and that all I had to do, if I wished to marry her, and free him, was to shave off my beard, and change my name from Henry to William.

* * * * * *

A month later I was married to Clara. To this day she believes I am William, and I am not going to shake her belief.

My brother is proud of having kept his word, and also of the beard and moustache which he has lately cultivated, and he tells me—I believe to console himself—that he would not change places with me for all the Claras in the world.

Digitized by Google

WHEN THE BIRDS BEGIN TO SING.

By WINIFRED GRAHAM. Author of "Through the Valley," "Six First-Class Passengers," etc.

SUMMARY.

Philip Roche marries Eleanor Grebby, daughter of a farmer, and they spend their honeymoon on the Continent. On their return to Richmond, Eleanor becomes friendly with a frivolous widow, Mrs. Mounteagle, against her husband's wishes. She is introduced to Carol Quinton, who fascinates her. Her husband is heart-broken, and consults his cousin, Erminie Henderson, who comes to stay with them. Eleanor's parents come to spend a day or two with her, and disgust Mrs. Mounteagle with their homeliness.

CHAPTER IX.

HEART SICK AND WEARY WITH THE JOURNEY'S FRET.

"You must not go to-day," declares Eleanor emphatically, addressing her parents. "I want to take you to Mrs. Mounteagle's party this afternoon. I am sure she won't mind, we are such great friends, and two more will make no difference in a tea and coffee, four-to-seven squash."

"Is it a real grand party?" asks Mrs. Grebby.

"Oh, yes; no end of people have been invited, and Giddy's affairs are always so chic—that meaning stylish, smart—all sorts of grand dresses and bonnets. The good, innocent-minded girls wear big hats, with huge brims and fluffy feathers, and the wicked married women have the tiniest bonnets, sparkling with jet or passementerie, and their veils fastened by diamond stars."

Mrs. Grebby gasps in wonderment. "I will lend you two jewelled pins for your head gear, Ma—one of turquoise and another in the shape of an olive—that Philip bought abroad, and declares is only paste."

"Well, we shall be swells," says Mr. Grebby, grinning, "and my word, what a lot we'll have to talk about when we gets 'ome."

"Yes, and you will sit with Farmer Briggs till goodness knows how late," replies Eleanor, "smoking and drinking, and chatting, till he is blue in the face with astonishment, and his eyes nearly dropping out of his head."

"Telling of Ma going into Society," he continues, "and me dressed up as a toff, conversationalling with Lady MacDonald."

"What a lovely idea!" cries Eleanor. "I will write at once to Giddy, and tell her to expect you."

The intense happiness these old people have brought into Eleanor's life is quite pitiful to see. Old memories re-awaken, the gaiety of childhood is hers again as she plays with Rover and talks with "Dad."

Oh, the wild excitement of showing them her treasures, rummaging in the plate-box, and spreading every ornament from her jewel-case on her blue silk quilt, and trotting Mrs. Grebby panting from the cellars to the attic.

It is exhilarating, delightful! Philip, too, is kind and hospitable, never smiling at the odd mistakes the good-natured Grebbys are apt to make.

"There," says Eleanor, shutting down an envelope and ringing for Sarah, "I have written the note to Giddy."

She whistles Rover through the window, who is scratching up the lawn, with splendid energy.

He bounds in and leaps on the sofa. Eleanor proceeds to scratch his back comfortingly with a little ivory hand on the end of a long horn stick. Then she calls for a comb, which Sarah produces, and fluffs at his coarse hair, which is stiff, wiry, and grey.

"Mrs. Mounteagle has called to see you," says a voice in the doorway, when Rover's toilette (which has occupied a full half-hour) is eventually completed.

"Oh! show her in."

"But," with a glance at Mr. and Mrs. Grebby, "if you please, ma'am, she asked to speak to you alone."

"I hope Herr Wieder, the violinist, has not failed. He had an affection of the bronchial tubes last week, but that does not sound on the violin."

Eleanor closes the folding doors between her boudoir and the library.

"You stay here, darlings," she says in a soft, cooing voice, "and I

Flaunts it to Giddy's presence.

Digitized by Google

will see Giddy in the next room. Come on, Rover—down, old boy—your wet paws have done damage enough to my gown for one morning."

Still whistling, Eleanor saunters into Giddy's presence, her eyes as radiant as stars, her lips parted in joyous greeting.

"You dear thing," she cries, "to come and see me, when you must be so busy, pinning bits of drapery over your doors, and heaping flowers into enormous vases. Can I come in and help? I am splendid at decorations, you know," remembering Giddy's cynical remarks on her artistic efforts, and laughing merrily.

"No, dear, all is prepared," speaking in funereal tones. "But——"

"Well?"

Giddy's eyes shift uneasily. Then she speaks straight out: "I can't have your people! My dear child, it would be madness—positive madness, both to yourself and to me. There, there, don't look so blank; one would think I had suggested murdering good Mrs. Grebby and her dear fat husband. Can't you see it, Eleanor? You have a good position in Richmond, and you want to take it and fling it into the river, as it were. You want to flaunt your parentage at my party before everyone."

"Yes," says Eleanor firmly; "I am not ashamed of them, it is not in me to be ashamed. What is wrong with them?"

Giddy's mouth curves, her little foot taps impatiently on the floor at Eleanor's defiant attitude.

"You must see, or are you utterly blind—utterly imbecile? Now, child, take my warning—shunt the old people at once—trundle them off the London junction—send them puffing back in a slow train to the country—tell them never to enter Lyndhurst again—keep them out of Richmond. It was terrible yesterday—a scene I shall never forget. Lady MacDonald was so sweet over it, though I could see she was petrified."

"I don't understand you," mutters Eleanor, pale and trembling. "If you have come here to insult me——"

"Tut, tut! Don't be silly. But I am bitterly disappointed in you. I have taken so much pains over your social education. But you are like a girl in iron stays, the moment you remove the support (which is my guiding hand) you go flop! Now don't turn rusty, or cry," as tears of passion well into Eleanor's eyes. "I want you at my party—I want youth and beauty, for I have a reputation for producing lovely women, good-looking men, and distractingly sweet girls. Carol has promised to come early, now, for one, you would not like him to see your relations."

"Yes, I should," she replies. "He would not mind, he is a gentleman!"

"I cannot have them, anyhow," declares Giddy firmly. "You may be offended, for I have spoken plainly——"

"A great deal too plainly," retorts Eleanor fiercely. "You have not spared my feelings. You think yourself very grand, but my parents would not have hurt anyone as you have hurt me to-day! You sneer at them—hold them up to ridicule—while they are worth all the dressed-up Lady MacDonalds you toady to!"

Her voice has risen shrilly; she forgets the folding doors.

"Enough!" says Giddy, tossing her head. "I suffered at your hands yesterday. Pray spare me the effort of argument. Remember I have to entertain, and must reserve my strength. Besides, it is so vulgar to quarrel."

Eleanor walks haughtily to the door and flings it open.

"If I talk any more I shall stifle," she says.

Giddy gives a low laugh.

"You will agree with me when you get over your temper," she declares, passing out.

Eleanor sinks on her knees, and buries her head on Rover's shaggy coat. She is alone, and the faint sound of buried sobs throbs upon the silence of the room.

The dog licks her hands and whines. Slowly the folding doors push open, and the old couple stand upon the threshold.

Mr. Grebby's round face is pale, Mrs. Grebby's cheeks wet with fast falling tears.

"Oh! dearie, dearie," she cries, folding Eleanor in her arms. "We ought not to 'ave come, we didn't know. But she was right, dearie, and we will go away, and you shall have your party and your friends. Oh! we was wrong, all wrong."

"Oh, dearie, dearie!"

"Don't talk like that," moans Eleanor, realising they have overheard. "She is a wicked snob—a—a—"

"There, dearie, be calm, don't fret."

"I will never forgive her," Eleanor stammers. "I love you and I hate Giddy."

She kisses Mrs. Grebby's damp cheeks, talking between her sobs. "It was not true, not one word of it, she just said it all to be disagreeable. She likes me to be miserable. I don't believe she ever had any parents of her own—I mean, not what you call parents. Some say she was born in a workhouse, a caravan, or an east-end doss. Though how she managed to be what she is they can't explain. I thought she was nice, mammy. I called her my friend. I tried to be like her," shuddering at the recollection. "Oh! don't go away," taking them each by the hand.

"Thank you, my girl, thank you," murmurs Mr. Grebby, "but Ma and I are better at Copthorne. We are not fit for Society; some day you will come back to the old 'ome and see us, won't you? and we'll all be happy again together."

Eleanor and Mrs. Grebby dry their tears, while Mr. Grebby pats them both on the back cheerily. Rover fawns round, barking and wagging his tail.

Philip, who is staying late from town this morning in honour of his guests, enters the room. "What is the matter?" he asks, looking at Eleanor's wistful face.

Digitized by Google

"I am not going to Mrs. Mounteagle's party," she says.

"Well, never mind. You can send your frock round," he cries jokingly, "and ask her to put it on a chair with a label: 'This is what Mrs. Roche would have worn had she been here.'"

But his chaff is received in silence. Then he notices for the first time the red rims round her eyes.

"Why, little woman, you have been crying!"

"Yes," murmurs Eleanor, "I have quarrelled with Giddy."

Then between them the three explain as best they can what has happened.

Philip is deeply interested.

"It was all our mistake," whimpers Mrs. Grebby. "We are that sorry; we wouldn't 'ave come. We really didn't guess what an upset it would make—parting friends, and bringin' trouble on our darling."

"Do not regret it," says Mr. Roche, taking her hand. "Such friends are not worth having, and Eleanor is well rid of them."

Secretly he blesses the Grebbys for their timely appearance, and resolves to write to Erminie and inform her of the fact.

"We are goin' back this morning," continues Mrs. Grebby. "Harriet expects us, and is reserving a front room in her lodging house. There, dearie," as Eleanor protests, "don't take on; we'd best go."

"Yes, Ma's right, my girl; Ma's always right," adds Mr. Grebby, with an admiring glance at his wife.

There are more tears before the final parting, when Eleanor watches them drive away with her husband, who has promised to escort them to town, and put them safely in a cab.

"Mind you see they go comfortably to Cousin Harriet's," she says before he leaves. "No wandering about seeking omnibuses, carrying bags, and leading Rover."

They wave farewell. Giddy sees them from her window driving down the terrace.

"My words have carried good weight," she thinks. "Eleanor has shunted those objectionable bumpkins after all."

When they were gone Eleanor puts on her hat and cloak, and sallies forth in the chill wintry air.

She enters the telegraph office, and addresses a form to Carol Quinton.

"Don't go to G's party this afternoon. Come to Lyndhurst instead.—E."

Then she walks back up the hill, a strange thrill of exhilaration rushing over her.

"Good looking men at her parties," she says to herself. "Carol has promised to come early, has he? We shall see.'

A little bundle of sad silk drapery.

The house seems dull and depressing without the old people or Rover. Philip is sure to stay late in the City, having spent most of the morning at home, and since she has no engagement. Thus Eleanor eases her conscience and waits expectantly for Carol.

Her drawing-room with its bright log fire looks cosy in the extreme as Mr. Quinton enters it that afternoon.

Eleanor is curled up on the sofa, a little bundle of sad silk drapery. Her eyes are wistful, her tea-gown is black.

The dim light reveals not the slight soupçon of powder paling her features. She barely rises to greet him, only moving to a sitting posture, her feet still tucked under her, holding out a trembling hand. As the door closes, he grasps the pink fingers and presses them to his lips.

"Don't," with a reproachful glance from under her long fringed lashes, "that is not kind."

"But they are such tempting fingers," he whispers apologetically.

"Come, draw up that chair and sit beside me like a doctor, only I want you to heal my sorrows. I have got such a horrid wound here," pressing her heart. "But first of all, was I wrong to telegraph? Are you angry, Mr. Quinton?"

"It was delightful of you," he murmurs, looking down on her with all his eyes. "Dear Mrs. Roche, I thank you from my soul. Only let me be your confidant—your friend!"

"Have you been to Giddy's?" she asks eagerly.

"No, what do you take me for? Was I not commanded to come here instead?"

"Giddy is no longer my friend; she has treated me abominably—snubbed and insulted me in my own house, simply because I wanted to bring my parents to her stupid party. They are the dearest old people from the country, not gifted with her false Society airs. I was only a farmer's daughter, you know. She taunted me with meeting you at her house and being ashamed of my parents. Bah! it sickens me."

She flung her head back with an air of offended dignity, her eyes flashing at the remembrance of Giddy's stinging phrases.

"The impudent little fiend!" mutters Quinton through his teeth. "How dare she?"

"Oh, she dares very well. I am in mortal terror of her tongue. We are utterly at the mercy of our friends; these people call themselves friends, though they deal us the bitterest cuts, the cruellest contumely."

"How dare she?" he repeats again, a fierce expression clouding his brow. "To attack a poor little thing like you, and for such a reason——"

"It was very hard—it made me cry," nodding her head and gazing earnestly upon him.

Digitized by Google

"How bewitching she looks in the slim black robe," he thinks. It clings round her elegant figure, and contrasts with her fair hair and delicate colouring.

"What can I do to comfort you?" he says, drawing nearer.

"Stay away from Giddy—take my part. Stand up for me when you hear her or Lady MacDonald laughing over Mrs. Roche's relatives."

"They would never dream of taking your name in vain while I was there to defend it!" he cries. "Don't you know I would do anything in the world for you? Can't you see how I would willingly be your slave? Will you accept me as such? Use me as you will! When in trouble, call me; I shall be always ready. No woman has ever exercised the influence over me that you have done. I would give my whole life to serve you for a moment—to tie the lace of your shoe—to sit at your feet—and adore——"

His lavish devotion pleases Eleanor. A flush of pleasure peeps through the white skin, her eyes droop, her breathing quickens.

"I think my life will be better, brighter, nobler, for the knowledge of such unselfish friendship. I can be but a poor friend to you, I am neither influential nor particularly attractive. Only a very simple little woman living very much in herself."

"Mr. Roche is a good deal away, isn't he?"

"Yes, especially in the day time. I am very lonely sometimes. But how dark it is growing. Shall I ring for a light?"

"No," with an imploring gesture, "this is the hour to dream, and to see more clearly into other natures, to reveal secrets that cannot be left unknown for ever."

He grasps her hands, and kneeling beside her buries his head in the folds of her long black sleeves.

"Oh! love—my love!" he gasps.

CHAPTER X.

Falser than all Fancy Fathoms.

"What are you going to do to-day?" asks Philip, kissing Eleanor before he leaves.

"I must run up to town to have my dress fitted," she replies.

"What, more new frocks?"

"Only a very simple evening rag, dear," speaking nervously. "I am rather anxious about it, because it is the first I have had since my trousseau without Giddy's supervision. She always designs them, and does the talking."

"And pockets the commission," says Philip drily. "Do not regret that lost acquaintance, little one. If Mrs. Mounteagle opened your eyes, don't you allow her to shut them again."

"You will lose your train if you stand talking."

Philip drives away down the hill, and Eleanor thinks regretfully of the pleasant times she used to spend chatting with Giddy.

Now she must go to town alone. Eleanor is quite weary of her own society by the time she arrives at Madame Faustine's in Bond Street.

She wonders if Carol received the little note she penned in such trepidation yesterday, imploring him to spare her the passionate scenes in which he indulged the previous evening. She asked him in the most pathetic terms never to cross her path in life again, because she was only a weak little woman, and ended by saying she would be at 19, Bond Street, the next morning, and hoped not to run across that horrid Mrs. Mounteagle.

As she is bowed out by an elegant maiden in black satin, a hand is laid on her arm, a sense of exhilaration possesses her, while Mr. Quinton's melodious voice whispers "Eleanor" in her ear.

"I asked you not to," she says feebly, ill concealing her pleasurable surprise.

"But you laid temptation in my way, and it was strong," he answers.

She recalls his passionate words breathed in the firelight,

"Oh! love—my love!"

the words that held her paralysed, and seemed in a single syllable to divorce her from her husband.

"What are we going to do?" asks Carol.

"We! I must return to Lyndhurst and boredom. An old lady at Twickenham Park has asked me to tea this afternoon, and I have to interview a kitchen-maid at half-past two."

Her voice is a little hard, there is a ring of sarcasm and rebellion in it that is strange to Eleanor.

"Have you ever been to the Savoy?"

"No."

"Let us lunch there; it is past one," urges Carol Quinton.

He hails a hansom, though Eleanor is reluctant.

"I really can't," she whispers.

"There is no harm, dear," he replies persuasively.

The cabman is watching her; she feels confused, uncertain.

Then his influence is too strong, and Eleanor succumbs.

Where is the harm? She is a married woman, she can go if she pleases.

He helps her into the hansom, and they spin away.

"Do you remember last time we drove together," he asks.

"Yes, from the Butterflies' Club."

"It was dark then, Eleanor."

Her eyes droop, an embarrassed flush dyes her cheek.

"I am Mrs. Roche," she stammers.

"But 'Eleanor' is such a beautiful name, so queenly. You have poisoned all my happiness since the fatal night when I first saw you."

"I would willingly give it back, every shred of shattered joy, if I could."

"You could if you would."

"How?"

"By being kind, by taking me back to favour, and forgiving me."

"It looks as if I had done that already."

"But only in a hesitating, half-hearted manner."

"It is far easier for me to forgive," says Eleanor, "than for you to accept my forgiveness and not err again."

Digitized by Google

There is silence between them for some moments.

"If I could think you cared for me just a little, Eleanor, I would be a better man."

"No," she said, biting her lips, and struggling with intense emotion; "you must reform without my aid—it will be harder, and therefore nobler. I do not 'care' for you."

He sees the efforts these words are costing her.

"I don't believe that, Eleanor."

"Then in disbelieving me you put me on a par with a common liar," she says hotly.

"Oh, no," he replies with his wan smile; "it is one of 'the social lies that warp us from the living truth.'"

They are turning into the Savoy courtyard.

Eleanor alights, half pleased, half frightened at her daring.

She feels very strange as she enters the huge restaurant with Carol.

It is a full day, and he points her out several celebrities as they pass to their table.

"This is the one, sir," says the waiter, "for two," removing an engaged card on Eleanor's plate.

"How was this table reserved for us?" she asks Mr. Quinton. "We seemed expected."

"I wired for it this morning," he answers tenderly. "I knew you would be in town, and I meant you to come!"

"It is very wrong of me," she sighs, and her eyes glisten as if washed by still rains under her lashes. "Do you know, I have a calendar in my room, and every morning I pull off a leaf to read the motto. I have just remembered the quotation for to-day."

"What was it?" he asks

Eleanor bends her head over her hors d'œuvre.

"The stately flower of female fortitude—of perfect wifehood."

Eleanor alights.

"Ah!" he sighs, "Tennyson."

"Yes," says Mrs. Roche.

Her eyes glance round the room.

How many bright eyes glisten over their champagne, and merry tongues joke and laugh away the hours!

"I like to look at people and make histories of them," says Eleanor.

"That girl with the flaxen hair, next to the dark man on your right, was a ballet girl before she married Sir Frederick Thurston. Everybody prophesied that her high kick would lift her into the aristocracy when she first gained favour. Her name was Poppy Poppleton, and people think she poisoned her husband and let another woman swing for it."

"Why do you tell me these horrible things," murmurs Eleanor. "They are not conducive to appetite."

"Forgive me, but you started by being morbid, quoting at me in fact, and you look so distractingly lovely when you are shocked."

"To tell a woman she is lovely is to criticise her openly to her face. Please do not make such a careful perusal of my expression."

"Unfortunately I am endowed with the critical faculty."

The very intonation of Quinton's voice is a caress.

His eyes seem to reveal, as they gaze on her, their power of insight and analysis. Their look is appreciation, their sympathy with her every utterance boundless.

To him she is not only a character study, but a woman to love, to worship, for a day, an hour.

To her he is an object of fascination, an accomplished man of the world, one who can make himself utterly irresistible by reason of his tenderness, chivalry, courtesy, and devotion.

A magnetic attraction rises between them. Eleanor forgets her surroundings. She only remembers him.

At last her eyes fall on the door, and remain transfixed in that direction.

Giddy Mounteagle, in a costume of wide black and white stripes and leopard's skin cloak, followed by her youthful fiancé, enters the restaurant.

"Bad luck!" exclaims Eleanor, turning to Carol; "look!"

He re-echoes her deep sigh as Giddy advances.

"I hate her seeing me here with you," Mrs. Roche declares. "She is a bad enemy, and now that we are hardly on speaking terms I dare not think what horrible stories she may not spread against me."

"Why not make it up, for the sake of our friendship, Eleanor? She could often help us to meet, you know?"

"Never, after the way she treated me!" declares Mrs. Roche, drawing herself up as Mrs. Mounteagle approaches.

"Hulloa! you here?" she cries in rather a bantering, insolent tone, and raising her finely pencilled eyebrows till they are lost to view under her fringe. She pats Carol playfully on the shoulder, pretending not to notice the stiffness of Eleanor's bow.

Bertie shakes hands with Mrs. Roche, and they seat themselves at the next table.

Eleanor turns her back, and becomes deeply interested in what Carol is telling her. They talk loudly on politics for Giddy's benefit.

"How spiteful she looked," whispers Eleanor at last.

"Oh, I don't know. You see you gave her the cold shoulder a bit."

"Do you think she noticed it?"

"Rather. She is as sharp as a needle."

"I think her hat is atrocious. It makes me tremble when I remember how I relied on her taste. Those enormous black and white feathers, pinned in crazy fashion with paste brooches, are horribly vulgar."

"Do you see that red-headed man just coming in?" says Carol.

"Yes. Who is he?"

"Eccott—a tremendously wealthy man, and a great financier. I expect your husband knows him."

"Eccott—why, of course! I have often heard Philip speak of him. The name is quite familiar to me, and now

Digitized by Google

"Phillip Roche is here!"

I come to think of it he is living here at the Savoy. Philip often dines with him."

"And lunches?" asks Quinton hastily.

Eccott is speaking to the head waiter, and evidently looking for a friend.

Eleanor can see down the long passage. Suddenly her heart sinks; the palms of her hands grow cold.

"Philip is there!" she says under her breath.

"What will you do?" whispers Quinton.

"I—I don't know."

"Tell Giddy," he urges; "make the quarrel up now, take her into your confidence, pretend you are together."

"Place myself in her hands? Oh, Carol, it would be too humiliating!"

Involuntarily she calls him by his Christian name.

"Self-justification is so embarrassing and unsatisfactory, and some excuse must be made for our appearing here together, unless you take my advice. He has not seen you yet, there is still time."

Thus Quinton urges the unwilling Eleanor to follow his suggestion.

"But I can't," she declares, half crying. "What will Giddy think of me? What will she say?"

"Shall I speak to her for you?"

"Oh! if you only would."

Philip is still talking outside in the passage to Mr. Eccott.

Carol rises, leans over the back of Mrs. Mounteagle's chair whispering hurriedly:

"Philip Roche is here. I don't want him to see his wife with me. Take her under your wing. I will make it worth your while."

Giddy takes the cue instantly. Such compromising situations are not new to her. She is a Machiavelli in petticoats.

"Here, Bertie," she says, "slip into Eleanor's chair, and stop at that table with Mr. Quinton."

She turns, smiles benignly upon Mrs. Roche, and motions her to take the empty seat.

"There, my dear," she murmurs, as Eleanor, confused and ashamed, obeys. "Let bygones be bygones, you are with me to-day. I brought you up to town."

"No, you met me by chance at Madame Faustine's, and we came on here together. Oh! Giddy, how good you are."

"A friend in need, eh? Finish Bertie's fruit salad. Good gracious, you are drinking whiskey and soda. Pass me his glass, it won't matter for me."

Eleanor hands it over with trembling fingers.

Philip is well in the room now, and any moment may see them.

"Would it not look well to attract his attention; sign to him? He is bound to spot you in a minute. Here is the waiter, we will send him. Waiter! go and ask that tall gentleman to come here. Say two ladies wish to speak to him."

Digitized by Google

Mr. Roche advances in surprise. He is vastly annoyed to find his wife again in company with Mrs. Mounteagle.

"You did not expect to see me, Philip," she says, assuming an air of gaiety to cover her confusion.

"I discovered your wife at our mutual costumier in Bond Street," cries Giddy. "I know she always starves herself when shopping alone in town, so persuaded her to make a good lunch with me. I have known her exist a whole day on prawns and ices, or Bath buns with lemonade. So you owe me a debt of gratitude, Mr. Roche. We are lucky in having run across you, and two other friends," as Philip's eyes fall on Carol Quinton, and the insipid Bertie. "We are simply gobbling our food whole, as we are going to the International Fur Store. I want to try and get a muff of leopard's skin to match my cape, for which, alas! I have still to write a cheque. But we are keeping you standing, and Mr. Eccott is waiting for his guest."

"Don't be late home, Eleanor," he says, "it gets very cold and foggy, and you still have a cough."

The two women watch him move away, then their eyes meet.

"You are a brick, Giddy," gasps Mrs. Roche, squeezing her hand under the table. "What makes you so splendidly loyal to me?"

"Life is so short, dear, it is well to be kind when we can. Besides, I am very fond of you though we did quarrel. I think it will draw us closer together."

"She lied to me—you lied to me!"

"I shall never forget what you have done for me to-day."

As the four friends leave the restaurant Carol Quinton bends over Giddy, and says sincerely:

"Bravo! and thanks a thousand times. You acted to perfection."

"Glad you think so," she replies in an undertone; "and, my friend, you can go to the fur store now, and settle my little account."

She pointed to her cloak as she spoke, and added saucily:

"The muff can stand over till the next time."

* * * * * *

"So you have made it up with the Mounteagle woman," says Philip that evening, pulling fiercely at his moustache.

"Well, you see, it was so difficult not to, meeting at the dressmaker's. I can't describe to you how awkwardly I was placed. I have felt more uncomfortable to-day than I have done for years. She practically took me by storm, and was so kind and nice it quite touched me. I have gone back to my old opinion of her. She may be a little hot tempered, but means well."

"It is a thousand pities. I hoped you had done with her for good. I don't like you going to the Savoy with her dressed up in that gaudy fashion. She looks quite remarkable and unladylike. Besides that fellow Quinton is always at her heels, and I have heard some strange things about him. But then he is just the style of man people like the widow affect."

"What have you heard about Mr. Quinton?"

"Oh, never mind; nothing for your ears, my dear."

"Here is the post," says Eleanor with a sigh of relief. She is glad for the introduction of letters to turn the subject.

"Only one for me," turning the envelope over. "I really dare not open it."

"Why? Who is it from?"

"That insatiable Madame Faustine. It will be the bill for my black tea-gown and the blue silk blouse that you admired so much, Philip, dear. Now you may have this letter, and pay it yourself if you are awfully good," laughing merrily. "I will give you the number of sovereigns in kisses."

She looked so pretty as she handed it him that he tore it open leniently, but no bill fell out.

The letter ran thus:

MADAM,—I am writing to ask you a personal favour, with regard to Mrs. Mounteagle, who kindly introduced me to you. I was prevented mentioning it to you to-day by the presence of my assistant. Could you induce Mrs. Mounteagle to remit me a portion, at least, of her long outstanding account? She has not been lately to our establishment, and I cannot get my letters answered. I thought perhaps you might use your influence, and oblige me very greatly.

Yours respectfully,

LOUISE FAUSTINE.

"A thousand devils!" cried Philip, crushing the letter in his hand. "She lied to me—you lied to me!"

(To be continued.)

6d. Pearson's Magazine. 6d.

No. 3 ON SALE FEBRUARY 29TH.

HERE ARE A FEW OF THE MANY INTERESTING FEATURES IT CONTAINS:

Stories by Stanley J. Weyman, Robert Barr, F. Frankfort Moore, etc., etc.; "The Bravest Deed I Ever Saw," by Lady Henry Somerset; Leaders of London Society, Illustrated by Photographs; The Chapel of Bones; First Attempts at Photography, etc., etc.

THE NUMBER IS LUXURIOUSLY ILLUSTRATED THROUGHOUT BY THE BEST ARTISTS OF THE DAY.

Digitized by Google

A Judas Kiss.

THE northern plains of Siberia were experiencing a far more vigorous winter than usual, even for that latitude. The snow, fanned by a strong northern gale, fell in wild, curling eddies across the ice-bound, desolate plains, wrapping the wooden houses of the convict mining station of O—— in a feathery mantle of immaculate white.

In one of these houses nearest the mine dwelt the head of the settlement, by name Nicholas Ozaski, and his daughter Feodora. The latter, when our tale opens, was sitting beside a roaring fire in her home, while on the opposite side of the hearth was a young Cossack lieutenant, tall and strikingly handsome, so much so, indeed, that his face had won for him the cognomen of Handsome Boris.

Boris Xerinka had been at O—— for the space of one week only, and yet Feodora had become to him what the pipe is to the habitual smoker, viz., he could not live without her; such was the result of five days' reasoning with himself, but Feodora, who was quite accustomed to receive homage, did not or would not understand that he expected her to offer him any; moreover, for some unaccountable reason, she had conceived a rooted antipathy for him, a dislike which at first was generated by a shifty expression which seemed to lurk behind his bright blue eyes, as well as by the downward curve of his handsome mouth, which would have better graced a woman's face than that of a man.

For some time the two occupants of the room had remained silent, watching the glowing embers, then Feodora, raising her head, glanced at Boris, and said:

"My father told me that another band of those poor wretches was expected here to-day. Is that so?"

"Yes," replied Xerinka, "it is true, Feodora, and they ought to have been here eight hours ago!"

"Doomed to the mines," she cried in a dull voice, as though speaking to herself. "Poor creatures! I wonder their hearts do not stop beating when they hear their sentence; but yet they live on, only dimly conscious of the worse than death which awaits them. The tales of those who have escaped from this Russian prison land cannot portray the fearful fate into which they march. But alas! when they arrive they experience the grim realism of those tales. Ah, how I wish I had never left St. Petersburg."

A moment's silence followed this heartfelt ejaculation, then Boris said gently:

"Feodora, would you be pleased if you knew you were about to return to Russia's capital?"

"Pleased!" She rose from her chair in surprise. "Pleased were but an empty name for the joy I should experience. Are—are we leaving here?"

"Well, your father has not quite decided," was the answer. "I have received orders which recall me to St. Petersburg eight days hence, and—Feodora, you could leave here as my wife!"

For a second she looked coldly at him, and then in a loud voice she said:

"Do you jest?"

"No, by Heaven, I am in deadly earnest! Feodora, I have not known you long, but just a week—and yet when I received my orders this morning I cursed them, for it would necessitate my leaving O—— and you! but I must obey the Tsar, and I cannot bear to part, perhaps for ever, with you!"

She relented on hearing his earnest tone of voice, and said more gently:

"Have you thought of my father?"

"He has consented."

"Indeed! It is very kind of him to do so, I am sure," she continued sarcastically. "But what if I in my turn say no?"

Boris clutched the arms of his chair and stared aghast at her for a moment, then, giving a sigh of relief, he continued in a reassured tone of voice:

"For a second I thought you were in earnest; it was a cruel jest."

"What if I say I do not jest?"

"Ah! stop these cruel questions in mercy. You would not have let me call you Feodora if you—you did not entertain some regard for me."

"In Siberia one forgets conventionality."

"What!" exclaimed Boris in a dazed voice, rising to his feet. "Do you——"

"Hush!" interrupted Feodora. "Hearken to my tale, and then you will know one of my reasons for refusing you. Four years ago I was in St. Petersburg

Digitized by Google

there, at a ball, I met a young Russian noble; we fell in love with each other, and in two months we were engaged. By some unlucky occurrence my father quarrelled with him, broke off the engagement, and brought me with him here, despite my pleadings and those of my aunt (with whom I was staying), in order that I should not see him again. How can I marry you, as I am engaged? Go to St. Petersburg, forget me, and wed some other who would be better able to appreciate you than I should."

"If he were dead would you marry me?" asked Boris, laying his hand on the hilt of his sword. "Say yes, and give me his name and address; I will insult him—he will be forced to challenge me then——"

A bugle call rang out at this moment, followed by hoarse orders and the neighing of horses.

"The convicts!" cried Feodora, as she walked swiftly towards the window followed by Boris, just in time to see them file past.

They were a motley band of men, women, aye, and children, too; manacled, footsore, haggard, and with despair imprinted on their faces. They marched on through the driving snow, urged forwards ever and anon by the lash. It was a sight to cause the hardest heart to quail.

"Well, Feodora, what is your answer?" cried Boris, as he looked out of the window.

She did not reply, for her gaze had rested on the tall soldier-like figure of one of the convicts, who started when he saw her, and stood still in surprise until a soldier riding up raised his whip, the next instant it descended, curling round the prisoner like a writhing snake.

Feodora cried out in sympathy, while the convict once more moved haltingly onwards.

"Come away," said Boris, "your heart is too tender to behold such sights as these, although the curs deserve their treatment."

"Deserve!" cried Feodora, turning her flashing eyes on him. "By what right do you set yourself up as a judge of your fellow men?"

"They have been condemned by Russian law," hazarded Boris.

"Condemned by Russian law," she echoed with a bitter laugh. "But there—go! I feel faint—go!"

"Your answer, Feodora! Do not say——"

"You will have it in a week," she replied; then she continued: "But go—leave me—alone."

There was such an accent of pleading in her voice that Boris left her presence without uttering a word. As soon as she was alone she buried her face in her hands and cried in a voice broken by sobs: "Alexis! oh Alexis, to think that you should have come to this." Then, clenching her fists, she exclaimed, rising from her chair:

"But you shall not work in the mines, for I will save you! Ah, but how?" she cried in agony. "I am only a woman, alas! but what strength cannot accomplish cunning must."

With a groan of despair she returned once more to the window. Towards her from the road to the mine advanced four men under the guard of Boris. Strangely enough, the tall, soldier-like figure was amongst them. Once again he halted, when Xerinka, drawing his sword, struck him with the flat side of it so furiously as to stretch him almost senseless to the ground. It was then for the first time that the young lieutenant became aware that he was in front of Feodora's house, and that she had witnessed his action. He bit his lip with vexation.

A moment later Feodora, regardless of the biting cold, was in the street. Darting a furious glance at Xerinka, she knelt down in the snow beside the prostrate convict, then turning her flashing eyes on Boris, she bade him leave her presence. Scarcely knowing what he did, he obeyed, and marched a good six yards away with his three prisoners. It was not far, yet the swiftly falling snow blotted them out from her gaze; then, taking the man's head on her knee, she whispered in his ear:

"Alexis!"

The convict opened his eyes, and exclaimed in a low voice:

"Feodora, dearest, you recognised me!"

"Could I not penetrate any disguise! I have come to save you!"

"Save me?" he echoed dully. "Who can be saved from the mines?"

"Hush!" whispered she. "Do you know where you are to be lodged of a night?"

"Yes. The usual prison being full, we are to be placed in a little hut just outside this hamlet for a short time, until a band of the prisoners here are sent back to Tobolsk en route for elsewhere."

Feodora uttered a low glad cry on hearing this intelligence, and replied in a low, excited whisper:

"Be ready to fly on the fifth night from now—to fly with me!"

"But how——"

"Hush! Don't question me, dearest, but trust all to me; only be ready on the fifth night; and now pretend to be recovering from a faint, for here they come."

She spoke the truth, for Boris, realising that he had no right to leave a convict unguarded, was returning. Feodora rose, and with well simulated wrath, cried:

"So you have come to fetch your prisoner. It is no thanks to you that he has recovered consciousness." Then, taking him on one side, she exclaimed, as Alexis staggered to his feet: "Should it come to my ears that you have struck another convict as brutally as you did that man, I will never give you my answer!"

A happy smile irradiated his face, and, calling to some soldiers who had just come up, he bade them conduct the convicts to their prison. As soon as they had gone Boris cried passionately:

"Feodora, I implore you to give me your answer now."

"In five days you shall have it."

"But why this delay—why keep me in this cruel suspense?"

"As a punishment for your barbarity," she replied coldly; then she added: "and also to test your courage, for it is whispered here that you are but a coward at heart."

"Set me any task, however perilous it may be, and you will see if I cannot give the lie direct to the circulators of such a rumour."

"You know the tale of that convict who was kicked to death, whose spirit, it is said, haunts the house in which he died? Well, my father told me that the prisoners are going to be kept there."

"Only those four," interrupted Boris.

"If you keep guard alone there on the fifth night from now, I will give you my answer. This is the task I set you."

Like most Russians, Xerinka was superstitious. He would not have feared to meet a mortal foe or brave a danger, but to meet perhaps the spirit of the convict whose death some laid at his door made him draw back—he hesitated to accept the challenge.

Digitized by Google

"So this is the way you give the lie direct to those who, it appears, speak the truth," she said sneeringly, and moving away. "Coward!"

"Stay!" cried Boris, laying a detaining hand on her arm, "do not accuse me of cowardice before you have heard my answer."

"And it is?"

"That I shall be there!"

* * * * *

It is midnight, and the convict station of O—— is wrapped in repose. No sound disturbs the stillness, for the snow deadens even the footsteps of the sentries outside the common prison, and those of Lieutenant Xerinka, who, armed with bayonet and rifle, keeps his strange vigil outside the hut wherein the four convicts are imprisoned.

For the hundredth time Boris strives to pierce the gloom to see if she whom he awaits comes; in vain, Feodora is late in keeping her tryst.

A sudden fear chills his heart as the idea flashes across his brain that she may not come, but a rustle of garments quiets his fears. In an instant he was on guard and had challenged.

"It is I—Feodora."

"You, dearest! I almost feared you would not come," he exclaimed, flinging down his rifle.

"Not come, Boris?" there was a wondering tone in her voice. "Did I not say I should; how did you get permission for keeping guard?"

"They thought I was mad," he answered, as she approached him, "but they granted my request though. Colonel Stanuff had a good laugh at my expense, and now having granted your strange demand, darling—what—what is your answer?" The question was asked haltingly.

"I have been thinking and reasoning for five days, as you know, Boris, and have at last arrived at my decision."

"And that is——?"

"Yes."

"Ah, Feodora, what an angel you are!" he cried impetuously, "and what relief you have brought to my mind." Then suddenly checking himself, he added: "But how can I tell you are not amusing yourself at my expense, as you have so often done?"

A moment's pause, during which her hand sought the hilt of a dagger at her girdle; then throwing back her furs, she said softly:

"Let my first kiss be the seal of the truth of my answer!"

She flung herself into his outstretched arms, and raised her face to his. The instant their lips met a foot of steel at the same moment was driven to its hilt into his heart, and Boris fell without a groan at his deceiver's feet.

With nervous fingers she took the keys from his girdle, his blood staining her white fur gloves as she did so, and with trembling hands she unfastened the door of the hut.

A few seconds later the manacles fell from Alexis' wrists, and he was free, his release being followed by that of his companions.

"Oh, Feodora, my darling!" he cried, taking her into his arms, and kissing her passionately. "One may hear of men who have dared all for those they love, and yet how little one hears of the heroism and devotedness of your sex. How can I and my comrades, who are free from every taint of guilt, thank you who have so haply saved us—poor victims of the bureaucracy?"

"By following me, dearest," she said in a low, hurried voice. "All is prepared, a sledge awaits us outside the village; my old servant Moutcha drives, so don't be afraid when you see him."

Once more he kissed her flushed cheek, and then his three companions in turn took her gloved hand and held it reverently in dumb gratitude and respect.

Outside the hut they halted, and, perceiving the body of the dead lover of Feodora, Alexis exclaimed:

"Of a truth, my love, you have a clever little head, but you have forgotten one thing."

"And that is?"

"To divest him of his weapons," he continued, doing so himself as he spoke.

Five minutes later they were speeding noiselessly westwards.

* * * * *

But little remains to be told. After countless dangers the party reached England three months later. Two of them were subsequently pardoned and returned to Russia; a third lives in Paris; while Count Alexis Pattowa and his lovely wife live within two miles of Hyde Park, and often when alone in their drawing-room the Count imprints a kiss on his wife's fair brow, whispering as he does so the sinister word:

"Siberia!"

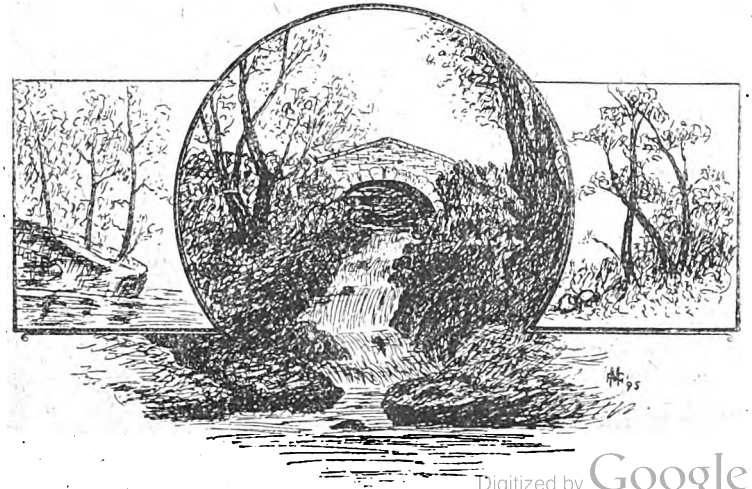
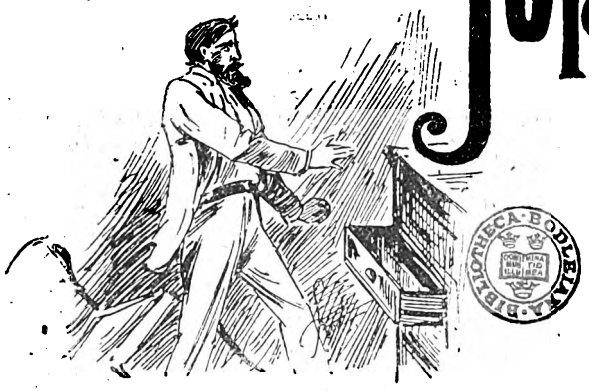
Tristam Monke.



Digitized by Google

The Gods of Jules Hirschler



Jules Hirschler made his money diamond mining in South Africa. His connection was with a firm in Hatton Garden, and his knowledge of diamonds in the rough being unequalled, he soon became a wealthy man.

All the Kaffir's thieving propensities were well known to him. He was a sharp master, keen-witted, though quick-tempered, feared, yet respected.

Every precaution against robbery that could possibly be devised, had been taken by Hirschler, and even the one Kaffir servant whom he almost grew to trust, was never allowed to be tempted.

Still his master commissioned him to keep a sharp look out for the other thieves, and on more than one occasion his services had been invaluable.

Of late Jules Hirschler's fortune had been accumulating rapidly, the last stone which came into his possession being one of the most valuable he had ever seen. He gave the large sum of £10,000 for this precious rough jewel, knowing he should get five times that amount for it when cut.

He was seated at his desk examining the stone, his heart swelled with gratification, as he laid it down, and gazed with admiring eyes at what would one day be a thing of rarest beauty and most lustrous light.

It had been carefully under lock and key until this minute, but was now about to be taken by Hirschler to the bank for safe conduit to England.

No previous gem had given him the wild delight, the feverish exultation, with which his present prize inspired him. That cloudy crystal seemed to fire his brain, sap his reason. He was like a heathen gazing on his gaudy god, in mental adoration. So wrapped was he in contemplation, that for a moment he did not hear the stealthy footsteps of Joe, his Kaffir servant, enter the room. As his eyes caught the man's reflection in a mirror on the wall, he clutched the stone involuntarily. The feel of its cool surface in his heated palm was sweet.

Joe's head was turned in the opposite direction, he was looking evidently for his master in the verandah beyond.

"Joe has not seen," thought Hirschler, "it is quite safe."

He hastily slipped the stone in a side drawer of his desk for temporary cover, and called to Joe.

"Want anything?"

The Kaffir advanced.

A man with fine stones had come to see the "Boss," and was seeking entrance of Joe.

The intelligence was welcome to Jules Hirschler, he never lost the opportunity of a deal.

Bargaining, and the making of profits, was his second nature, dear to him as the life blood in his veins.

He ordered Joe to show the man in, and was soon eagerly scrutinising the contents of his pocket-book.

They were undoubtedly good specimens. Jules Hirschler examined the gems with knowing eyes—crossing to the window, the light of which was needed to see and value them. Some slight argument ensued between the two men, while Hirschler drove the bargain, which engrossed his whole soul.

Eventually the deal was carried through to the satisfaction of both parties, for Jules was fair, and offered a good price.

"I've something there in my desk which I must show you," he said, his eyes sparkling as he turned from the window, and the man strapped up his empty pocket-book. "You will appreciate it, you are a connoisseur like myself. I had it out just as you arrived, and slipped it in here for the time being."

The stranger watched him stoop down, open the drawer with a sigh of conscious pride, then stagger back with a smothered oath.

"The dickens! it's gone!"

His knees knocked together, he clutched the chair for support.

"Gone! impossible! We have not left the room."

Jules drew himself together, rearing his head like a tower of strength, in which his eyes gleamed dangerously. His white lips and even teeth were clenched, the breath came hotly like fire through his nostrils. He had been robbed of his chief idol, the smaller gods were there, but all of them put together could not pay for the loss of that superlative treasure.

"Joe, my Kaffir servant," he hissed. "The only man that has been in the room, yet how, and when?"

"He must have shown consummate skill in extracting it," replied the merchant, "probably when our backs were turned a moment, at the window; these fellows are sharp, one never knows!"

"I'll get it back if it costs me——"

But Jules did not finish his sentence, or the stranger missed it, as the outraged man rushed in a frenzy from the room, calling loudly for Joe.

The voice resounded like thunder, vibrated with intensity. It was that of a being unhumanised by fury, yelling here, there, everywhere, for the servant that answered not.

Digitized by Google

The diamonds he had bought rattled in the depths of his pockets, as he hastened madly through the grounds, still with the name of Joe on his frozen lips.

At last he reached the Kaffir's hut, and entered breathlessly, to find the man bending over a white child. It was a nameless infant, born of some unknown parentage, which a year ago had been left on Hirschler's doorstep, and commended by him to the care of his servant.

The baby was moaning pitifully, while Joe, endeavouring to check its screams, appeared engrossed in the plastering up of a wound in its leg.

Jules grasped him by the throat.

"Come here, you dog," he cried, dragging him to the door. "Give up the diamond, or you are a dead man. Quick!" drawing a revolver, and pointing it in the Kaffir's eyes. "Where is it?"

Joe fell on his knees, and grovelled at Hirschler's feet, vowing his innocence, beating his brow, and kissing his master's boots.

The child, he said, had been heard screaming, having cut his leg, for which reason he left the house. He knew nothing of the diamond—nothing!

Thus he swore again and again, while Jules still threatened him with his revolver if he would not disclose.

"No one entered the room but you," he said sternly. "If you prevaricate you die!"

Still the wailing of the child within re-echoed round the hut.

Gradually Jules Hirschler's temper was mastering him; Joe's denial lashed his rage to madness. The thought of the lost fortune tortured his money-loving nature—one word from this whimpering cur might give it back, but he was obstinate as the stones on which he crouched, disclaiming all knowledge.

A volley of curses broke from his lips, his desperate fingers pulled the trigger, and Joe rolled over on the threshold, dead.

As he watched his servant's blood trickle under his feet, dyeing the soles of his boots a dull red, he drew back with a shudder.

Jules' ungovernable temper had overruled his better instincts, which were not by nature brutal.

The sight of the stiff body on the ground revolted him. Yet still he thought chiefly of the lost diamond.

Calling all his men, Jules personally superintended the searching of the hut, which they ransacked high and low, but with fruitless results. Finally the body of Joe himself, now strongly suspected of being the receptacle, was put to the test, yet still in vain, the stone was not there.

The seeds of remorse, which always followed a violent fit of temper, were springing up in Hirschler's heart.

He saw the staring eyes of the dead looking reproachfully at him, and heard in fancy the cry of innocence break afresh from lips that could speak no more.

Then in the presence of that ghastly mutilated form, the wailing of the child in pain reached Jules Hirschler's ears.

He found it with its leg carefully bound and plastered by the foster father's clever hands, and regret mingled with his pity.

The waif ceased crying as Jules bent over it, and held out two chubby arms, dimpled and sunburnt, to the red handed murderer.

"Poor little chap!" said the man, lifting the infant carefully not to hurt its injured limb.

"I suppose I must take you home with me, now Joe is dead!"

He walked slowly to his house, bearing the white child against his heart, with a strange thrill of sentiment, new to Jules Hirschler.

It was the only way he could atone for the life he had taken that day.

* * * * * *

As time wore on, no sign of the stolen diamond!

The memory of it lingered painfully in Hirschler's mind, some people said he never quite got over its loss.

No such stone again fell in his way, and the precious brilliant, lost to the world, would probably lie till doomsday in its undiscovered hiding-place.

The child grew healthy and beautiful. Jules, a self-made man, with deep-seated admiration for blue blood, marvelled at the aristocratic features and apparent good breeding of the boy, whom he adopted for his son.

The wound in his leg healed rapidly, and to outward appearances seemed well enough, yet in after years Walter often complained of the pain it gave him.

"Yes, I still suffer from the old cut," he would tell Hirschler, when questioned on the subject. "From time to time it's pretty bad, and then I can't feel it for months. It's a good thing I am not lame, but it never affects my walk."

Walter had heard the story of poor Joe's untimely end and the missing diamond frequently, but he loved old Hirschler none the less for his hasty temper, which always remained his bane.

"You know, my boy," he told Walter, "the diamonds are often called my 'gods,' but sometimes I think they must be my devils, when I remember poor Kaffir Joe."

At the age of twelve Jules took his adopted son to England, and sent him to Cheltenham college, himself settling in the old country to enjoy the fortune his gods had brought him.

He was proud of the handsome lad, and had great ideas already concerning his future.

Walter was an immense favourite wherever he went—passed easily into the army from Sandhurst, and rejoiced Jules Hirschler's heart with his polished manners and gentlemanly bearing.

"He's the right sort, he is," Hirschler confided to a colonial chum. "Walter does me credit, and I'm grateful to him for it. I like to see him in his swagger regimentals, hobnobbing with all the swells. I mean him to make a grand match, as my heir he will be gilded enough for a duchess. He's not a bit carried away with it all, but just as frank and open and affectionate to his old dad as when I nursed him on my knee in his infancy. He knows, too, what I most desire, and will remember my wishes as sure as I stand here. 'Marry into the aristocracy, my boy,' I said. 'That is what I expect; now you know how you can please me.'"

"And he will do it, too," replied Jules' friend, "if I know the stuff he's made of."

Walter would have gladly have realised any reasonable expectations of the man who brought him up and launched him on the seas of life. But it happened at this time that he found himself strangely attracted by Mabel Forest, an impecunious country parson's daughter, with the softest grey eyes, and the sweetest voice he had ever heard. Walter had met many society dames and ballroom coquettes, but none of them quickened the pulses of his heart.

Lady Susan with the seraphic smile and brilliant teeth, amused him for an hour, he rode with her sisters, and dined her father at his club. He met the old aristocratic family of B——'s from Staffordshire, and sent the prettiest daughter half-a-dozen bouquets. But beyond the casual civilities, the little attentions of life, Walter troubled himself but slightly, and gave scant worship at the shrine of these proud beauties.

Digitized by Google

Mabel Forest.

Not until Mabel Forest came into his vision did passion, in its true and most forcible sense, possess the young man's being.

She was gentle, lovable, all that seemed best and purest in his eyes; her virtue and freshness, her dowry, her lack of fortune her only vice.

Jules Hirschler, his ideas and ambitions were forgotten. In Walter's opinion a mariage de convenance had always been distasteful.

He went in his blind rapture to Mabel Forest, poured out the tale of his love, felt her warm lips meet his own, and knew he was victorious. Yet that Mabel should love one so utterly unworthy amazed, bewildered him! He could hardly believe his good fortune in winning such a prize!

His happiness seemed almost too great to last, and like a cloud on a fair sky, the thought of Jules Hirschler swept over his mind.

"Marry into the aristocracy, my boy. That is what I expect."

The words came back with unpleasant force, the only return that Hirschler asked for all that he had given this nameless waif and stray. It smote upon his conscience, even as he held Mabel to his heart, and felt the delirious ecstasy of love's first passion. He would give up all, if need be, for the sake of a woman. What will men not do, when the madness is upon them.

He basked in the light of her lustrous eyes, he swore fidelity till death, and left her in the seventh Heaven of bliss, with a prayer of thankfulness for the treasure God had given him.

Then Walter returned to his reputed father's house in Piccadilly, where he was greeted with the ever-ready welcome, dined in first-rate style, and generally made much of.

During the evening he broached the subject of his marriage to Jules Hirschler.

"I have met the only girl I can ever love," he declared, gazing adoringly through a cloud of smoke, as if he saw her face.

A thrill of expectation ran through Hirschler's veins.

"At last!" he said with a sigh of approval, never dreaming Walter would disappoint him. "Well my boy, who is she?"

He leant forward eagerly, with the look in his eyes that Walter had only seen when Jules was examining a very fine diamond in its rough state. They glistened like crystals, and were expressive of intense excitement.

"Mabel Forest," stammered the young man, growing red under the anxious scrutiny.

"Never heard of her," declared Jules, involuntarily turning to the peerage; "got a handle to her name, eh?"

"No," retorted Walter, with a toss of his handsome head. "Plain Mabel Forest of Brackgreen Vicarage. Her father is a clergyman, they have no money," speaking defiantly, "nor title, but they are good simple people. There is nothing against them."

For the moment Jules Hirschler was speechless, while the evil temper, as fierce and uncontrollable in age as youth, welled up. At last he found his voice; it shook with elaborate disdain.

"A country parson's daughter!" he sneered. "So this is your grand match, your duchess!" with a low laugh, "this the wedding that was to connect you with the upper circles, and give us both a footing in Society. It was the one thing I stipulated for when I put you in the Lancers, and made you my heir. A pretty show of gratitude!"

"Oh! father," he cried, but the old man sprang to his feet and checked the words on Walter's tongue.

"No excuses, no explanations. If you regret your foolhardy conduct, give her up, I'll pay to get you out of it."

These words roused the young lover's ire.

"Pay Mabel!" he thundered, "what do you take her for?"

"A scheming minx who is after your money."

The words seemed blasphemous to Walter. He quivered with indignation.

"Nothing on earth shall come between us," he muttered with set teeth. "If I have to break stones on the road to buy my bread."

And knew he was victorious.

This sounded to Jules like a challenge.

"You need not look to me for help," he cried, the purple hue upon his face, indicative of his worst mood. "If you marry this girl you won't get my money, not a farthing of it, sir! Please understand that!"

For a moment Walter looked stunned, standing

Digitized by Google

speechless, staring at the angry light in Hirschler's eyes.

Then he bowed his head in assent.

"You pig-headed young idiot!" roared Jules, hoarse with suppressed passion. "Can't you see what an ass you're making of yourself, ruining your career, hurling yourself against a brick wall?"

"Thank you," replied Walter, drawing himself up, with a curl of lip. "I have chosen Mabel Forest, and I mean to stick to her."

He walked to the door proud and erect.

Jules Hirschler shook his fist threateningly at the retreating figure.

"It's ridiculous! it's infernal impudence!" he cried. "Get out of my house till you come to your senses."

Walter paused, scanning his foster father from head to foot disdainfully.

"Yes," he said, "I'll get out of your house, but I'll go to Mabel Forest!"

Then he turned and slammed the door, while Jules Hirschler staggered back into his chair with something like a groan.

* * * * *

A strange loneliness crept over the house in Piccadilly the night that Walter left.

Jules Hirschler, stubborn and relentless, heard his footsteps in the hall, the footman's whistle for a hansom, and then the closing of a heavy door.

He started to his feet, and creeping, as if ashamed, to the window, peered round the corner of the blind.

The numerous vehicles confused him, he could not tell in which the boy he had loved as a son was driving away.

All he knew was that he had gone, hounded from his home by a storm of hasty words, for the love of a simple woman. The thought sickened Jules Hirschler, he felt as he had done on the day when he shot Joe, and carried the child home in a fit of remorse and self-reproach. These evil tempers always left him feeling faint and ill. He rang for brandy and soda, and flung aside a half-smoked cigar that had turned like hay to his taste.

He sank on to the sofa wearied by the tempest, limp as a man who has wrestled against a mighty wind.

"Thank you," replied Walter.

The reaction from fiercest choler to calm was always rapid in Jules Hirschler's case, and left him the more unnerved. But his pride was such that, after the attack, he would not own to his irascibility. Nothing could induce him to hold out the olive branch unasked, though even before daylight broke over the great city he yearned to undo the night's work.

Walter spent the sleepless hours pondering over his future.

To find himself suddenly cast adrift was desperately hard just when he most needed money with which to make Mabel happy.

Yet he was young and strong, full of throbbing life and burning activity. The up-hill road might surely be climbed with perseverance and persistency, by one ready and willing to work and prove himself worthy of a good woman's love.

Of course, he must leave his regiment, renounce the luxuries of wealth, and fight the battle unaided against poverty.

So sure did he feel of success, that the sting of loss, and his sorrow for Jules Hirschler's injustice faded to insignificance.

His eyes were heavy, however, from a restless night; he looked pale and haggard when the warm morning sunlight crept through his window in his club bedroom.

"It will never do to look like this," he thought, glancing at his drawn features in the glass. "If you are down in your luck, it is no good publishing it to the whole world."

So he sent round to the stables to order the new charger he had just bought from Captain Lingard of the 16th.

"It's a perfect living demon," he had told him frankly, at which Walter smiled, and handed him his 200 guineas without question. You must pay for blood, and Lingard's horse had been the talk of the regiment.

"A gallop in the Row will be just the thing to freshen me up," said Walter to himself, not forgetting the unpleasant work that lay before him.

He looked admiringly at his latest purchase as it stood outside the club door stamping its feet and tossing its head. The black coat shone like satin, and Walter wondered, as he sprang into the saddle, whether this would be the last time he should ride it before Lingard's "Demon" passed from its new owner's hands into others.

Sad at heart he entered the gates at Hyde Park Corner, with the long stretch of tan before him already peopled by riders and their steeds. Many eyes were turned enviously in the direction of "Demon," who, true to his name, gave Walter more trouble than he would have cared to own.

Beads of perspiration stood out on his brow, for "Demon" was full of corn and high spirits, and nearly wrenched his rider's arms from their sockets, when he reined him in from a gallop. As he sped up the incline, great lumps of earth flew high into the air from the animal's hoofs; more than once he bolted, and his devilry seemed inexhaustible.

Perhaps Walter was weakened from mental care, for the horse played with him like a child, finally succeeding in unseating his rider, and kicking him in the leg, just above the old wound, which had been paining him that morning.

He was carried to St. George's Hospital, where the doctors appeared somewhat puzzled by the sudden inflammation which had set in.

"What sort of an injury was the old one?" they asked him.

Walter could afford them no sort of information.

"I'm afraid we shall give you some pain," said one. "The wound must be probed and opened to discover the cause of irritation."

Walter agreed.

"Be as quick as you can," he said, clenching his teeth.

Digitized by Google

He was conscious of a sickening agony, and burying his head in a pillow, tore the cover with his teeth.

Gradually he began to feel easier, and finding they were binding up the wound with wondering faces, asked them the cause of their evident amazement.

"It is most extraordinary," said a voice at his elbow. "A large stone was extracted—looks like some uncut jewel."

Walter held out his trembling fingers to grasp the prize.

They gave it to him, stained with his own blood.

"The lost diamond!" he cried. "Joe's hidden spoil."

* * * *

Jules Hirschler was sitting alone in his study.

Oh! if only Walter would return, and by some word, some sign, give him a loophole to relent.

He was too reserved to make the first advance, yet he pined for the lad he had grown to love, with all a father's yearning.

As if in answer to his thoughts a message came that Walter had returned, and asked to see him.

The old man's heart leapt with joy.

"Bring him here," he replied, scarcely able to conceal his relief before the servant.

Walter had come back penitent, he should have his blessing!

"God bless you, my boy."

The door opened, and his all but son limped in.

Mr. Hirschler did not speak, but gazed with ineffable tenderness upon Walter.

What would he say?

The supplication for forgiveness that Jules had expected came not. Only a deferential bow, and the ordinary tones of a courteous visitor.

"I have come on a matter of business," he said.

"Oh!" replied Hirschler, as if a sudden douche of cold water had been flung over him. "Won't you sit down?"

"Thanks. It is rather painful standing, I have had an accident to my leg."

Jules looked concerned, but checked the anxious words that rose involuntarily to his lips.

"What have you to say?"

"You remember the diamond that Joe stole and concealed?"

The question came like an electric shock to Hirschler.

"The diamond—yes—could I ever forget?"

"It is found," replied Walter slowly.

The old man leapt to his feet with a half-smothered scream.

"Found!"

He trembled so violently that for the moment Walter feared he would fall down in a fit.

"Yes, I am glad to say that I have the privilege of returning it to you, as a slight token of the gratitude I feel for all your past goodness to me."

The young man's voice shook slightly. As he spoke he held out his arm, spread open his fingers, and revealed the chief among Hirschler's gods, lying in his palm.

The old man grasped it with a yell of triumph, and falling on his knees, beside himself with joy, grasped Walter's hands, showering kisses upon them.

"God bless you, my boy," he exclaimed excitedly, "how did you find it, when and where?"

He briefly explained, the colour rushing back to his face, while the old familiarity revived between them.

"And all these years you have carried that treasure about in your flesh," said Jules Hirschler. "My poor boy! what a burden it has been for you. No, no, my lad, not my diamond," as he pushed his god towards Walter. "That shall be my wedding present to you and Mabel Forest."

W. G.

Digitized by Google

Melody! Melody!! Melody!!!

SIXPENCE MONTHLY.

- - THE NEW MUSICAL MAGAZINE. - -

THE FIRST NUMBER WILL BE PUBLISHED ON

February 29th for March 1st,

AND AMONGST ITS CONTENTS WILL APPEAR:

A NEW SONG.
By Ch. Gounod (posthumous work).

BERCEUSE DE JOCELYN.
For Violin and Piano. By Benjamin Godard.

NEW PATRIOTIC SONG.
By J. M. Coward. Words by Clement Scott.

MEDITATION FOR ORGAN OR HARMONIUM.
By Professor Bridge.

NEW WALTZ, "SPIRIT OF THE STARS."
By May Ostlere.

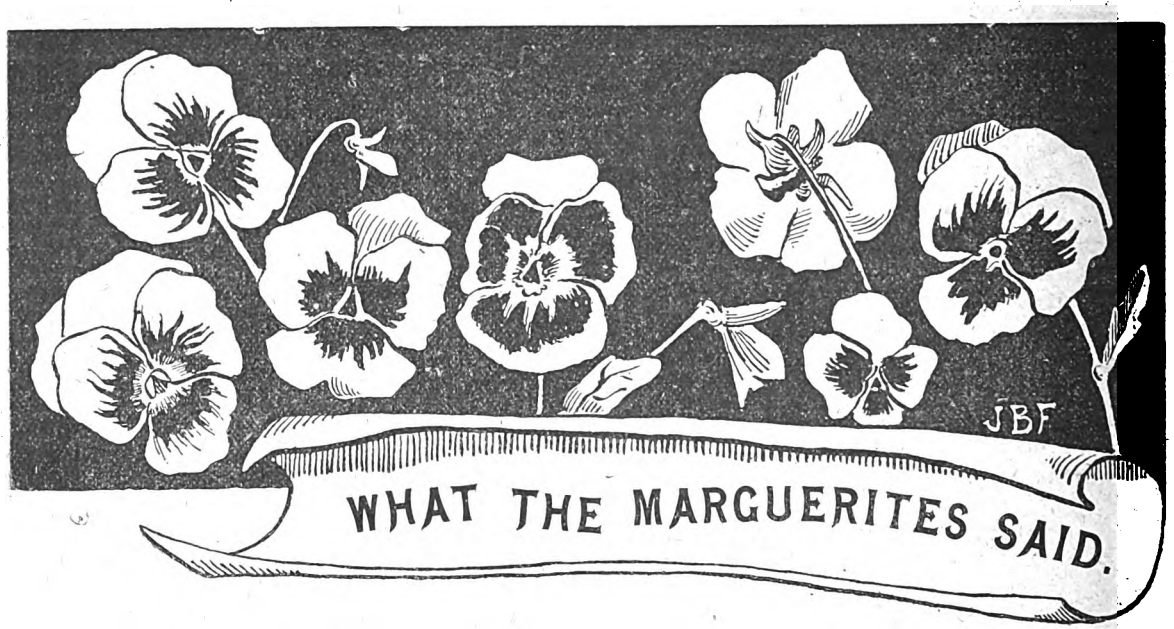
AND COMPOSITIONS FROM TITO MATTEI, G. H. CLUTSAM, A. GORING THOMAS, A. G. CROWE, (COMPOSER OF SEE-SAW WALTZ,) A. J. CALDICOTT, LAWRENCE KELLIE, GABRIEL FAURE, ETC., ETC.

A literary interest is given to the Magazine by contributions on "Musical Happenings," by Mr. R. S. Hichens, and by some valuable criticisms of current and recent musical works by Mr. Joseph Bennett.

From the above list of contributors it will be seen that the very best talent only is represented, and the aim of the promoters of MELODY will be to provide for Sixpence a selection of vocal and instrumental music such as could never before have been purchased even for One Hundred Sixpences.

MELODY will consist of 56 pages, sheet music size, and will be inclosed in a stout cover, bearing on its front page a design of most striking beauty.

Digitized by Google



Charavelle is a pretty village which I particularly admire, and so would you if you knew its little church, a chiselled jewel, its old château with its walls cracked and mossy, but above all the location of the village, which clings to the side of the mountain like a nest fallen from I know not where.

In this corner of the world, not mentioned in the geographies, lived some years ago an old woodcutter and a rich farmer. Everybody in the country knew old Pierre and his miserable hut in the edge of the wood, and when they met him with a load of faggots on his back, or with his axe raised against the trunk of a tree, they all gave him a friendly "good-day." He was a good man who had never harmed even a fly, so everyone said, and having passed the better part of his life in the solitude of the forests, preserved, in spite of his great age, a pure and honest heart.

Everyone also knew the rich farmer, Michael Merieux, but no one liked him. He was avaricious and sullen, and, moreover, superstitious, like those who are not sure of their reckoning. He loved money passionately, and every means of increasing his wealth appeared to him to be legitimate and proper. It is useless to say that he did not spend it freely. No one ever saw him at the wine shop. He never gave a sou to the beggar who held out his hand on Sunday as they came out from mass, and his door was never opened, or his heart either, to the wayfarer in quest of a bit of bread or a cup of wine.

And yet he was the richest farmer near Charavelle, having vines, fields of wheat and meadows yielding rich forage, which he always sold at the highest price. He was old, without children or family that anyone knew of, and it was a mystery to everybody what he would do with the fortune which he increased day by day.

A strange idea one morning entered the head of the old woodcutter to go and borrow some money from the rich farmer. It was true that long ago Merieux had said to Pierre, after a service he had rendered him: "When you have need of me do not hesitate. One good turn deserves another." Well, now he had need of his help, and notwithstanding the sordid avarice of the old farmer, the woodcutter, with the artless trust that characterised him, went to Merieux and said:

"You can relieve me of a great trouble. My boy writes me that he is ill and in need of a little money. I haven't it now, but in October, when I have finished cutting down the side of the wood which they have marked for the new road I shall be able to pay you, if you will lend it to me to-day."

"I have no money to lend," said the farmer. "Times are as hard for me as well as for anybody else."

The woodcutter shrugged his shoulders.

"Say, rather, that you will not lend it," said he, "for you have plenty. You could save me a great deal of trouble."

"I repeat to you—I cannot!" said Merieux gruffly.

"Then I must remind you of what you said to me one day: 'One good turn deserves another; when you have need of me do not hesitate.'"

"Bah, that is too long ago," said the farmer. "What are you talking about?"

"Yes," said the woodcutter, "it was a long time ago, but, all the same, I risked my life to save yours, when I carried you out of Jacques' house which was burning while you slept. I do not say this to reproach you. I have never spoken of it to anyone. I would not speak of it now if it were not to remind you of your promise, for you see my son's sick, and he relies upon me to help him. It will be a great service to me." And he added in a low tone, as if ashamed to be persistent: "You will save his life perhaps, and I risked mine to save yours."

"Life, life," growled old Merieux. "When I lend, it is my money. I do not risk it or my life."

And old Pierre went away without the money that he came to borrow. Another, however, had pity on the old man, who, for the first time in his life felt bitterly towards a human being.

He sought a means of avenging himself on Merieux without doing him serious harm. At last, after mature reflection, one night as the moon shone as bright as daylight, he went out towards the wheatfields of the rich farmer. It was in March; the grass was just beginning to sprout, and at the top of the trees were a few shivering buds to show that Nature was ready to come forth radiant and charming at the first call of spring.

Digitized by Google

The woodcutter went to the middle of the field, and there, in the midst of the wheat which would soon be up, he traced with a stick some light furrows of strange and irregular forms, then throwing something into the furrows he covered them with earth and quietly returned to his hut. The following night he did the same thing in another field of wheat, and for several nights following that until he had been in all of Merieux's fields.

And in the morning, being very sure that he had not been seen by anything but the stars, nor heard by anything but the crickets, he would go to his work in the woods where the little nestlings were just beginning to chatter.

* * * *

Time passed, and the warm season made the wheat and the flowers grow. One morning a great caravan of people came from Charavelle and the surrounding villages to see a strange phenomenon in the fields of Farmer Merieux, who had been ill for some time and knew nothing about it.

What was his surprise, his terror, to see when he went out for the first time, the word "Miser" traced in gigantic letters of flowers in the midst of his wheat. Yes, marguerites, whose beautiful blossoms speak so sweetly to lovers, rose up on their stems in thick clusters accusing the old skinflint. "Miser," again the blue cornflowers in other field; "Miser," repeated the crimson poppies in another, and the people he met called to him "Miser! Miser!"

All night long he seemed to see before his eyes and to hear buzzing in his ears that terrible word. What did it mean? How did this accusation, at first whispered by those who knew him, spring forth so openly in his fields? Was it because he had always refused to give a straw to the poor of the country?

The old woodcutter.

As he was very superstitious and not very strong in his head it came near driving him crazy.

"You cannot defend yourself now," said the old woodcutter, who came to see him one day, "for even the flowers, whose souls are so tender and pitiful, have accused you in the sight of heaven! Truly, you must be a great culprit!"

"I—I—am not—a miser."

"You are the only one who thinks so. After all that has been shown you, if some misfortune happens to you after this warning——"

"Some misfortune?" said Merieux. "Do you think——"

"Listen," said the woodcutter. "There has been, you know it well, a kind of evil spirit in the country; no one has seen it, but it exists all the same. Now, to conjure it away, I know what I would do."

"What would you do?"

"This—and not take four roads about it—this year I would give all the money from the wheat to the poor-box of the country."

"Never, never! You must find some other way."

"There is no other way," said Pierre; "the letters sprang up at the same time as the wheat—that was meant to direct you."

"How do you know?" asked the farmer.

"That comes of itself. Reflect! Why did the flowers write that name in your fields?"

In a word, so well did the woodcutter work on his fears that the first time in his life old Merieux made a large donation to the poor.

Everybody commented upon this strange occurrence, but only the woodcutter knew how it came about—that he, in the clear nights of March had sown in the fields of the old farmer some seeds of marguerites, cornflowers, and poppies, without being seen by anyone but the stars overhead, and heard by none but the crickets.

Ethel Dicey.

Digitized by Google

The Knotted Rope.

IT is night—black, tempestuous, oppressive, abnormal. The thick, gloomy clouds have gathered all day long over the fair valley, green and smiling, and their dark shadow has so steeped in darkness the landscape that its vivid sub-tropical hues have seemed painted over with a wash of deeper colour, dashed wide and thick by vandal hands. Later on, they have massed together heavily and of their own weight have sunken low, with a downfall of rain in torrents.

With this the wind has risen—that cold tremendous wind that blows straight down from the volcanoes; a wind so sharp, so keen, so entirely beyond the resistance of man's endurance, that the clear-eyed Aztecs, quick, like their descendants, to catch the salient characteristics of any matter, were wont in their picture writing to represent its deadly force by the significant symbol of a human skeleton, pierced through the chest by an arrow.

All day long the light rustling blades of the cane fields lay inert and silent under the weight of the oppressive atmosphere; but now, caught in the impalpable finger of this ven tarron, they are shaken and twisted, rattling until their sound is like the clashing sabres of a mighty army in battle. Other noises, too, come through the darkness, untraversed by a gleam of tropic lightning, that makes itself felt as tangibly as a pall.

That dense, thick blackness presses against the little panes of the windows with so ominously aggressive an effect that we close the little wickets, trembling with a very genuine terror. Every now and again some high, shrill sound, like the shriek of a dying man, penetrates to where we sit cowering together. Is it the cry of birds, driven by the storm from their nests in the nooks of this old hacienda monastery? Is it the frightened howl of the bloodhounds, confined in a vacant room off the corridor near us? Or must we seek farther than material earthly sources for the origin of those blood-curdling cadences?

Of a sudden we start to our feet with cries of terror as a loud knocking sounds hard and fast on the panels of the double door between us and the corridor. It comes again with the sound of human voices; this visitation is nothing unearthly. Still reluctantly enough we open, and the light shines out on the wrinkled brown face of old Romualdo, the patriarch of the hacienda, leaning on the arm of the major-domo. José Cortina looks careworn and haggard—troubled, even frightened.

"Señor Alvarez is dying," he says, with lips that are purple; "will it please you to participate in the last scene?"

"Pues, si, senores," old Romualdo croaks, as the other ceases, "we have brought candles for you, and the holy man is waiting."

We look at each other perplexed! the proposition seems uncanny. But our companion, who knows the country, interposes.

"It is customary," he says, "in event of a death, to invite all beneath the roof to assist at the sacramentos. We must go. To refuse would be to manifest ill-will towards the dying and indifference to the repose of his soul."

A gust of wind swoops in at the door, and blows out the candle. We grope our way to the corridor, and battle along it to the chamber of the dying man. At last we arrive, breathless, at the little ante-room, a servant hands us lighted candles, and we steal into the bed-chamber where the centenarian is dying.

He has been a powerful man, this Don Cipriano Alvarez, and even now he looks no feebler, no older, than many a man of half his years. Around his bed are gathered the entire household, less those who now come in with us, and they and we take our places, kneeling, bearing the lighted candles.

"Do ye believe"—the priest looks round upon us as if convinced of our heresy—"in the Blessed Trinity: Father, Son, and Holy Ghost?"

And "We do believe," we answer. And so on through Credo, and to the administration of the Communion.

Then the priest bends above the sick man with the holy wafer. Don Cipriano Alvarez suddenly sits up in his bed, and pushes away the hand of the minister.

"Away with your bread and your wine!" he orders, and his voice is deep and resonant; "you have shrived me as one in the grasp of death and beyond confession, and therein have I fooled you. I held my peace, for that I did not wish to answer. I heed not your prate of repentance nor of absolution. Why should I? The same motives that prompted me then are strong within me, and will burn in my heart past the doors of the Inferno or of Heaven. See here! When new times and new surroundings freed me from the execution of that old-time decree, ye thought I had lost all feeling in the lethargy of old age. Now what is this, I pray thee?" He throws open the breast of his bedgown, and we can see, trailing across his dark, hairy bosom, that is still full and massive, a rope that is knotted about his neck, inside the collar.

A cry bursts forth from all of the retainers. "The halter! Ah! He is still wearing the halter!" And old Romualdo, with the tears in his dulled eyes, mutters: "It was for this, then, that he would no longer have my service."

"Hark ye!" cried Don Cipriano, "listen! Do ye hear the voice of Andronica, and the hoof-beats of the steed on Cubilete? Open the window, that I may hear it clearer! Open, I bid ye! Open!"

He is leaning forward towards the window, his swarthy face alight, impassioned. But the servants huddle together, frightened either at his gruesome manner or at his impiety, and no one moves to obey him. Then he makes as if he would throw himself from the bed and hasten to the window, but old Romualdo catches and holds him feebly, and cries to us: "I beg ye, masters, open, lest he go mad before us!" The window is thrown open. At the same moment, the tempest seems to lull from its vehemence, and borne on we know not what stratum of silence comes from afar, as if echoing down the steep sides of Cubilete, the thunder of a horse dashing along the rocky road, and mingling therewith, ringing shrieks of a woman.

The centenarian raises himself again and looks about him with an air of triumph, as if the sound were sweet as music to him.

Digitized by Google

"Ye hear? After all the years 'tis still the same. I do not free her. I am master." As he speaks the words he lifts his hands to the rope about his neck as if it burnt him, gasps, shudders, and falls back on his pillow lifeless, as the priest makes the sign of the cross above him.

We watch by the corpse the rest of the night, for the people of the hacienda are so much shocked and terrified by the closing scene in this dark life that they will not even hold the usual duelo. And from the priest and old Romualdo, crouched on the floor beside the bed of his master, we hear the dead man's story.

* * * * *

Cipriano Sota Alvarez was a Spaniard, a Castilian, reared and educated in England, for the better acquisition of thorough business habits, that he might manage and dispatch the affairs of the sugar plantations of Amatla. In those days—it was a decade before the achievement of Mexico's independence of the Spanish yoke, or rather it was the year before the patriot priest, Hidalgo, incited his countrymen to attempt that independence—in those days Amatla was a monastery of Carmelites, and the revenues of the hacienda were enormous. Friar Blas Alvarez, uncle of Cipriano, was at the head of this brotherhood, and he, growing aged, was more than relieved to turn over the questions of sales and accounts to the young man.

Young Alvarez was a man of passions as deep and intense as they were fiery, and the extent of his power at the monastery hacienda did not tend to teach him self-denial. Of all exterior matters he was virtually master. True, he dwelt within the monastery walls, and its discipline was rigorous. But his days were spent abroad, riding from one section to another of the broad domain, and if his comings and goings were irregular, he was allowed licence on the score of zeal in the worldly benefits of the community.

It was in one of his wild rides about the country, on the business of the plantation, that he first saw Andronica Valles. Far up the mountain Cubilete, which was an outpost of the greater of the volcanoes, as it were, a stepping-stone to its vastness—far up, so far that it lay already among the pine trees, there nestled in a clayey hollow a little hamlet, called, from the character of the soil there, El Barral, the place of clay, the clay-bank.

Here dwelt a handful of simple people who moulded and baked the great earthen hormas or shapes in which the arroba-weight cones of sugar were charged at the plantations. It was not a profitable calling, for the vessels sold for the merest pittance; but it was a steady one, for the demand was always active. So the simple villagers turned and baked the earthen vessels, and carried them down the steep mountain road into the smiling valley, to Amatla and the other plantations.

Andronica Valles dwelt at El Barral; she was the daughter of a horméro, and the day that Cipriano Alvarez saw her first she was descending the steep and rocky roadway, with half a score of the moulds loaded upon her shoulders. She stepped painfully aside to let the horseman pass by her, nor raised her glance to see him. But Cipriano Alvarez was struck by some suggestion of youthful litheness in the slight figure bent under its burden, all shrouded as it was in the disguising coarse blue woollen skirt and huipil, and he reined in beside her with some imperative challenge as to her name, her abiding place, and the destination of her hormas.

"I am called Andronica Valles, most humble of your servants," she said, after the accepted formula, and as to the lord of the manor. "I am daughter to Toribio Valles. We dwell at El Barral up yonder, and I am carrying the hormas to Santa Lucia."

Dark with the rich, soft brownness of her people, with the warm blood mantling in waves under her skin of velvet, her beauty was luscious and tempting as the sunlit downiness of a peach in a southern orchard. Here was no haughty type of an oppressed or captive Indian princess, but the soft, timid, gentle air of womanhood that has been a temptation and a stimulant to hot-blooded man since ever the world was.

"Thou wilt not take the hormas to Santa Lucia," said Cipriano Alvarez; "but rather to Amatla—these and all thou shalt have in the future. And thou wilt tell my steward to give thee another peseta on the dozen, by my orders."

He put spurs to his black horse, Satanas, and rode away down the mountain side, as if he were already ashamed or repented of the interest he had shown in a peon girl. Andronica laboured onward. Heavy as were the burdens laid upon her, they had not yet deadened the supple grace of her young limbs, any more than labour and privation had affected the seducing sweetness of her countenance, that might later become the leathery, unhuman mask that comes with even middle age to most women of her race and order.

When she went up the steep, cobble-stone incline, and in through the great vaulted gateway to the despachoin, a dim, dusk, high-arched corridor, it was with steps that flagged and wavered, not so much from fatigue as from misgiving. She had come seldom to Amatla with her hormas. There had been some altercation between her father and the steward—a question of a few coppers that the poor Indian claimed had not been paid for his wares, while the other raged at the imputation, and had thrown Toribio Valles thence with violence. The Indian, all meek and humble as he was, had gone no more to Amatla, and Andronica also had passed by to the farther hacienda of Santa Lucia, save on the rare occasion when there was no consumption yonder, or when her overtasked physical forces failed her.

But to-day the steward looked upon her with smiles of honey, praised the excellence of the wares she brought him, and gave her the additional peseta of which Cipriano Alvarez had spoken. But Andronica was ill at ease. She could but perceive that all this attention and solicitude was something abnormal, and she was acutely conscious of the presence of the young man, swarthy and dark bearded, sitting behind the tall desk by the window, who heard intently, she was sure, all that passed between her and the steward.

She turned the coins irresolutely in her hand when she received her money. "I do not know," she stammered, "this other money—it is too much—my father will be angry."

Cipriano looked up, and the steward scanned her curiously. Spaniards both, accustomed to the easy acceptation of pauperism in the whole world, they could not understand how one of her humble position could hesitate to receive a gift of money, from whatever source it should come. At a look from his master, the steward spoke to her with words of reassurance, insinuating, of kindly import. But Andronica shook her head, and laid the money upon the desk before her.

"My father would be angry—and—and I fear that Marcos would reprove me."

A flash of distrust and jealousy leapt into the deepest black eyes of Cipriano Alvarez. He glanced at the steward.

Digitized by Google

"And who may be this Marcos?" said that worthy, with condescension.

"Marcos—he is my novio," said the girl, a deep blush burning over her face; and drawing her huipil about her, she leapt down the incline, and sped out upon the road like some wild creature, scarce pausing even for reverence before a little squad of the monks that was entering.

The steward looked at Alvarez with a grin of malice. "For peona, she is ungrateful. Better give it up, mi amo."

Cipriano muttered something into his black beard: "I will give it up—never. So long as she lives—nay, so long as I live, for I am likely to survive her—will I keep before me the thought of vengeance on the jade who has mocked me with her Marcos!"

From that day on, Alvarez seemed to have but one object in life—the pursuit of Andronica Valles.

Thus it befel that he rode up to El Barral, one sunny morning, meaning to settle the matter at once and for ever to his satisfaction.

Cipriano Alvarez flung his horse's bridle to the mozo riding behind him, and entered the poor jacál of Toribio Valles.

"I have come here for your daughter," he said, without any preface.

The hormero left the lathe upon which he had been working, and stood up before the other. Notwithstanding his Spanish name, he was, if not of pure Indian blood, of a strain almost unmixed, and generations of servitude and degradation had not yet defaced the noble type of his ancestry.

"For twice a hundred years," he said, with impressive slowness, "we have been slaves to the Spaniards, and we have, too, many of us, learned to kiss the hands that smite us, to wade in the filth of our masters, to imitate their vices, and to pander to them, to worship their false gods, even. Some few there are among us who keep to the old traditions. We live simply, miserably, toiling like beasts, that we may live, but we live purely. Every day we watch the light kindle yonder on the great white brow of Popocatepetl, the Smoking Mountain, and hope whispers sweetly to us that that day's dawn may herald the coming of Quetzacoatl, the Fair God. And his own coming, this time, not that of false pretenders, worshippers of gold and silver. But, for that our eyes may behold him clearly, for that our feet may follow to the kingdom whither he will lead us, we must have led sober lives, and clean, and honest. Some among us have lost hope and fallen, as I tell you. But some among us still are steadfast and enduring. Such of us do not sell ourselves, nor do we sell our children."

He swung aside the rush mat that served as door between the two poor rooms of his dwelling.

"Andronica, come hither."

The girl came into the room; she was shivering with shame and anger, and Alvarez could but see that, however exaggerated might be the beliefs of the father, the daughter shared them fully. None knew better than he how doggedly the Indians cling to their ancient faith, and how persistently they practise their old rites, shrewdly cloaking the truth, for the most part, with a very fervour of apparent zeal and blind devotion to the faith of the conquerors.

"Will your worship speak to the girl?" said Toribio Valles; "she is free as the humming birds down in the valley, free as the silk of the ceiba when the pods burst open. If she will, she may go with your worship to the life of ease and dishonour that you offer."

Cipriano Alvarez turned silently, sullenly, to Andronica. For the life of him, he could not have spoken to her of the end to which he had destined her, braving, as he must, the indignant flashing light of those great eyes, erstwhile so tender and timid, and the fine scorn that curved her gentle young lips.

She threw back her head, so little while ago under ignominious burdens, like a stag that snuffs a taint on the sweet air of morning.

"There is no longer the hope of tending the fire on the teocallis," she said, "and so the life I would best love is hopeless to me. But Quetzacoatl comes—or soon, or late—and his kingdom will lack people, for our nation is degenerate and unworthy to enter in it. What then can I do better than to rear for him brave sons and honest daughters, that his new realm shall be populous. But shall you be their father? You!"—there was unmeasured disdain in her voice, as she looked at Alvarez—"No! never! me likes not the sort of man who covers his mouth with beard, to conceal the weakness of it. Now there is one over the Guerrero way—he is like me—of the Yndios."

But her father, more wise than she in reading the hearts and the passions of men, laid his hand upon her lips. "Thou art a foolish babbler. Thou hast dreamed an ideal lover, in the semblance of Quetzacoatl. Señor, you have your answer. Leave us now, I pray you." For the gathering rage in the face of the Spaniard was a thing to see and tremble at.

For all answer, Alvarez raised his hand, that dark and strong right hand that had ere now thrown by the horns a charging bull in the meadows, and—oh! eternal shame to him!—with one blow on the temple struck down the Indian, old and feeble. Stock still, where she stood, Andronica looked at him for an instant, as if with horror and incredulity of his impious cruelty. Then she sprang straight at the throat of Alvarez, rounding her hands before her lips as she came, to utter a strange, wild call that echoed weirdly through the pine trees. In an instant, her fingers were clasping the Spaniard's throat like little hands of steel; her hot wide eyes flamed upon him.

Ashamed though he was to struggle with a woman, as he had not been ashamed to strike down a weak and infirm old man, he yet found himself in self-defence, compelled to strive with the hands that were choking him relentlessly. But the carrier of burdens had the power of her training and her free forest life, and it might not have proved so easy a matter for the Spaniard to free himself had his man not come to the rescue and helped to force Andronica aside. And when she would have returned to the attack she swayed slightly with the impetus of the thrust the man had given her, and her feet touched her prostrate father. All the tigress in her died out in an instant. Her face trembled into anguish and she fell on her knees beside the injured Indian as the two intruders leapt into their saddles. It was time they were away, for the hut was beginning to fill with stealthy-footed shapes that had hastened together there at the call of Andronica.

That night Toribio Valles lay in his jacál dying. The blow Alvarez had given him and the general shock to his frail, ill-nourished body had been more than his strength could bear, and his life was a question of days only. His people were about him, for this had been a man of distinction among them. His natural ability, his strength of character and singleness of purpose, together with his knowledge of the Spanish tongue, among those who knew only their native dialect, had made him a natural leader.

Digitized by Google

He waved them all aside, now, with one word, "Andronica." His daughter rose from her knees, and came to stand beside the reed mat he lay upon.

"Thou must leave me, my own, my dearest," he said, in the soft tongue of his people, "this is no place for thee. Thou must go—at once, to-night, over yonder to the mountains of Guerrero, where, near the great caverns of Cacalmanilpa, lives an aunt of thy dead mother. Prepare thyself, my little one, for the journey."

"Nay, father mine," said Andronica, "I cannot leave thee. I will wait until thou goest also."

"It will be many days ere I shall be able to go with thee," said Toribio Valles, disguising his mortal strait from the child of his heart, "and thou must not delay—that were fatal. Nay, no protest. Dost thou forget the laws of our gods of obedience to parents? Then do not vex me with objections."

Andronica ceased to demur, and shortly knelt before her father once again for his blessing ere her departure. More than one of their people made ready to accompany her, but she refused their offers.

"It is better that I go alone," she said, "for thus I may more readily escape the danger that threatens. They will not dream I go alone—for are not women timid? It is here that they will seek. Does a daughter desert the sick bed of her father?" she said almost bitterly.

"Have done, my child, with vain complaints and repinings," said Toribio Valles. "The gods speed thee upon thy journey and see thou pause not until thou reach Cuernavaca, for it is thus the interlopers mouth the name our people gave the city of Quauhahuac, for that it is near the beautiful hills. Go there to the arbolario, and the herbalist will send thee on to the caverns. It may be the gods have called thee thither, for that is the land of the young lad Donato."

So, with her father's knowledge of human nature lovingly brought into play to soften the pangs of parting, Andronica set forth on her journey. She must descend at least part way to the valley to skirt along the base of the mountains, and so she took her way down the steep, shelving sides of the Cubilete that she had traversed so often with her burdens. She was but a short space from her house when her quick ear caught the sound of horses' hoofs ascending, and a moment later, from around a sharp bend in the road, there flashed upon her the unexpected light of a lantern held in the hand of a mounted mózo, who threw its light on the path before Cipriano Alvarez.

With a bound like the leap of a deer she sprang upon a rock by the roadside; but too late—the men had seen her, and Alvarez, snarling like a wild beast, spurred Satanas forward.

"Where are you going, ingrate? What have you done that you steal away like a thief in the night?"

"I have done no wrong," she answered, "save that of belonging to a race despised and down-trodden—the race you and others regard only as chattels, to be beaten or played with as suits your superb convenience. And I am going—ah! where you dare not follow! I am going to the strongholds of my people, to the mountains of Guerrero, where burrow the great caverns, and where dwells the youth Donato. Ay! but he is noble; mi Yndito! he is a man! He is one a woman might die—or live—for."

She was wild with the spirit of wrong, she was elate with triumph in the sense of escape and change, and she was sixty feet away from and above Cipriano Alvarez. But from a silver ring among the trappings of his splendid saddle hung a coil whose line was twice that long—a cunningly-braided lasso of black and white horsehair; and while she spoke, Alvarez unbound the leather points that held it, and as she ceased, it hissed through the air and settled down over her head, her neck, and her shoulders, binding her arms to her waist, as bands of steel might have bound them. Then she was jerked roughly from her foothold, and pulled swiftly down to the roadway, and then—oh! sweet Heaven!—the black horse was spurred to madness, and went dashing down the steep sides of Cubilete, while a woman's shrieks rose on the night, loud and shrill at first, but all too soon becoming fainter and dying.

Meanwhile, farther up the mountain, near the hut where Toribio Valles lay dying, an owl hooted mournfully from the pine-trees, and the Indian opened his heavy eyes, and murmured to the watchers the refrain that amounts to a prophecy among his people: "*Canta el tecolote, el Yndio mucrd. The Gods be with my daughter." Then the attenuated frame gave one great convulsive shudder, the stern patient face grew rigid, and father and child went together.

* * * * *

Friar Blas Alvarez wielded great influence in that part of the country, and the life of an Indian more or less was nothing as compared with a scandal in a monastery, yet even so the nephew of Friar Blas was tried for his monstrous crime and sentenced. But deference to the churchly influence modified the penalty, and Cipriano Alvarez was condemned to be hanged in his ninety-ninth year, wearing, meanwhile, about his neck a noosed rope, that all should recognise in him a condemned murderer.

Within the decade broke out the war of Mexican Independence, and the times were sorely troubled. Later, when the Laws of Reform were enacted, the church had to yield up her broad domains, and to Cipriano Alvarez came, by heritage, the great hacienda of Amatla, which had been held as individual estate by his uncle, Friar Blas. Other times bring other matters.

Under the new rule and order of things the old story was forgotten, its scene lying as it did in a remote and then, before the era of railways, somewhat inaccessible region. So that when the time came for the execution of his sentence, the crime and the sentence of Alvarez were buried in records long reduced to ashes in one or another of the country's epochs of warfare, and its memory was buried in the hearts of a few of his oldest retainers, who were unlikely to recall it, and Cipriano Alvarez died in his bed, at the ripe old age of a hundred years.

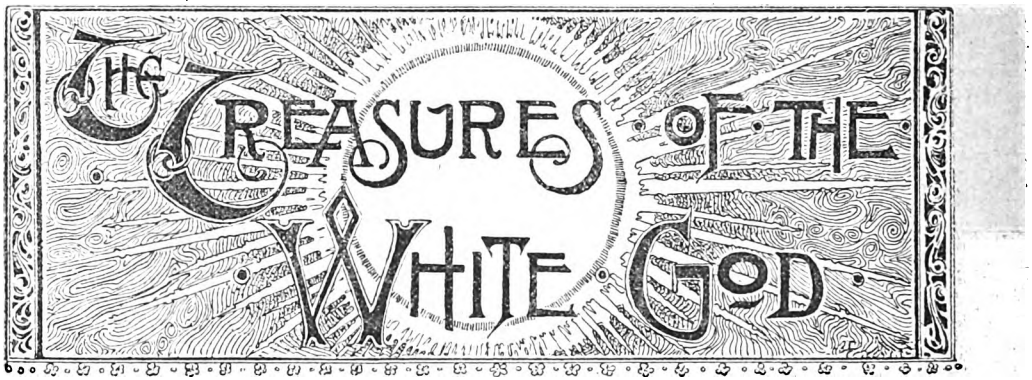
* * * * *

"But it seems but yesterday it happened," mutters old Romualdo; "and to think he has worn the rope that he might still remember! He must have loved the Yndito truly, if fiercely. And he has never loved a woman since then. Oh! the dull blows of her soft body on the rocks! and the thunder of the horse's hoofs down Cubilete! and the wild, wild screams of Andronica, as he dragged her onward! Just as to-night you heard them—I, who know, I tell you! Si, señores! for I was servant then to Don Cipriano. God rest his soul!"

Y. H. Addis.

* "When hoots the owl, the Indian dies."

Digitized by Google



The Story of a Shameful Crime.

CHAPTER XXXI.

THE AZTEC TREASURE.

WITH eyes of devout affection, esteem and pity, Adrian Burgoyne devoured the counterfeit of the fair young girl he loved.

The possession of that picture marked the climax of as strange and dramatic a coalition of emissary of the law and adjudged criminal as ever yet was ratified.

Upon that fateful evening when Mr. Detective Dean intruded upon the solitude of Burgoyne, it was to prove that his earnest protestations of friendship and devotion were sincere.

He narrated his pitiful story as might a culprit of the via dolorosa to a father confessor. From first to last he depicted his half-hearted honesty as a detective officer, his acceptance of a bribe, his shame, his remorse, his contrition, and its atonement.

"I live but for one object—to clear the tarnish of bribe-taking from my record," he told Burgoyne earnestly. "I know you are an innocent man. Richard Sheldon and Colonel Lytle stand, self-accused, as perjurers and conspirators, in their overheard conversation, only I must secure positive proofs ere we menace them openly, ere you reveal your true identity."

So these two clasped hands over the yawning abyss of obscurity and fear, and the swift, clever proceedings of the veteran officer soon began to cast a cheering radiance over its dark depths.

The murder of Lytle shocked Dean, but it did not turn him from his close shadow of Sheldon. The latter was "up to some new scheme," and he guessed its import—flight. It was he who warned the bank, it was he who had placed a score of obstacles in Sheldon's course of flight.

"He aims to secure a large sum of money, and depart," he stated to Burgoyne. "We can only delay him—we dare not arrest him yet. Lytle's death complicates affairs, for he might have been frightened, cajoled or bribed into betraying his accomplice. As it is, I am daily weaving a close net of circumstantial proof about the unwary Sheldon."

"But the girl! Patrice!" was the burden of Burgoyne's constant, fervid cry. "Find her. She may be in poverty, in peril. Her safety must be precedent to every other consideration."

"Yes, to find her—to have her evidence concerning her years of tacit imprisonment, would form a strong claim against Sheldon. She is probably in hiding somewhere—in terror of these villains, perhaps in disguise, working at starvation wages to keep herself alive. An advertisement in the papers would be construed by her to emanate from these plotters. She may hopelessly consider you dead. Ah! I have it!"

And the result of a further consultation led to the culmination that the lurking Sheldon had just witnessed.

"I found Mrs. Loring at Lynde—the woman with whom Patrice Ringold lived for so many years," narrated Dean. "She happened to have that single photograph of the girl."

"And of what special value is it to us in a search for her?" queried Burgoyne curiously.

"You shall see to-morrow. I will then take that photograph and have a hundred copies of it made. I will send one to every police official in the city. From it they may identify the girl and recognise her if found. I know the skilful methods of the department—none better."

"Oh, you give me hope!" exclaimed Burgoyne fervently, with an affectionate glance at the picture of his lost love.

"Once we find her, I shall take her affidavit, yours and my own, and present them to a magistrate. This case of conspiracy, kidnapping and fraud against Richard Sheldon will be complete. I shall arrest him. The only fear I have is regarding the disproval of your guilt in the anarchist murder."

"Never mind me!" cried Burgoyne vehemently. "Find Patrice, punish the villain, Sheldon, and, once I restore to her the fortune I secured in Mexico, I am willing to go back to my lonely prison cell, proud, thankful that I have righted a great wrong!"

"The fortune—Mexico!" The listening Richard Sheldon started wildly, and his sordid heart gave a great leap of avaricious joy.

"By the way, Burgoyne," spoke the detective again, "that is a point you did not fully explain to me. You rescued the treasure contained in the White God, then?"

"Yes, anticipating Lytle, sealing up the idol afresh, escaping from the cave and bringing it north in safety."

"And it is really valuable?"

"It consists of precious stones mainly. I have it hidden in a safe place—not here. I shall to-morrow, as a sure precaution against accident, put it in some safety deposit vault, subject to your order or mine."

"I would. Its loss would be a calamity, after all your trouble. Come, you dare venture a little stroll with me.

Digitized by Google

We can continue our discussion of our plans in the outer air."

The two men left the room. Richard Sheldon drew back from his place of espionage, with a face one void of amazement, concern, cupidity.

He was menaced—direfully, fatally. The detective, Dean, was working day and night to convict him of crime.

But—he was warned! Ah! he would elude them. They should close the entangling net too late—the groping hands of justice should never claim him as a victim.

He was enlightened; the Ringold treasure was in the possession of Adrian Burgoyne.

With the morrow it would be unearthed from its secret hiding-place and transferred to a more secure spot.

"It shall never reach its destination; Patrice Ringold shall never be found by these men!" muttered the schemer determinedly.

He set to work briskly, as new and forcible ideas entered his mind. He resolved that for the next twenty-four hours Adrian Burgoyne should not leave his sight for the space of a single moment.

For an hour Sheldon worked with a slender piece of wire, reached through the transom, to secure the one clue to the identity of Patrice Ringold—the photograph. He pushed it to the floor, and then, though the lower crack of the door dragged it finally into reach. Then he lay down on the bed in the apartment, to watch, listen and await developments.

Adrain Burgoyne returned alone to his room. His first thought was of the photograph. It was gone. In consternation and alarm he searched for it, feared it had been blown through the window by the wind, and, after a persistent quest in the stone-paved court below, came to the conclusion that Dean must have taken it with him to secure copies.

At nine o'clock the next morning he left the hotel. A cautious form shadowed him—that of Richard Sheldon.

Burgoyne reached a rickety-looking house and entered it, and Sheldon awaited his return outside.

It was here that Burgoyne had stayed upon his first return from Mexico, and here, in the attic, he had secreted the treasure he had found in the Aztec idol.

When he came down to the street again he carried a bag in one hand.

He started briskly back towards the business portion of the city.

"It all works my way," chuckled his tireless shadower. "That is the Ringold treasure. He has unearthed it; he purposes taking it to some safety deposit vault, as he announced to Dean. Now, then, for a final, a decisive move!"

The merchant quickened his pace. Just as Adrian Burgoyne reached a street corner, and was about to turn into a new thoroughfare, there was a rapid step at his side.

He thrilled to sharp dread and excitement as a firm hand clutched his arm and an ominous voice sounded in his ear.

"One moment, Mr. Adrian Burgoyne," it spoke—"I know you!"

CHAPTER XXXII.

For Love or Gold!

"I know you!"

The words rang out prophetically and with direful menace upon the startled hearing of Adrian Burgoyne, so full were the tones in which they were uttered of triumph, resentment and ferocity.

A glance betrayed the speaker, despite his disguise. For a moment the two men looked into each other's soul, and Richard Sheldon never relaxed his grasp of Burgoyne's arm.

"Release me!" breathed the latter finally, trying to break loose from the clutch of his vindictive captor.

"No!" spoke Sheldon resolutely, "make no scene, no resistance, if you are wise!" he hissed. "Do you see that cab approaching us?"

He indicated a vehicle rapidly nearing them as he spoke.

"What if I do?" demanded Burgoyne, debating resistance, an assault, flight, in his mind.

"I shall hail its driver."

"What is that to me?"

"Liberty—life!" replied the other, with swift impressiveness. "I shall get into that cab; you will precede me."

"No!" spoke Burgoyne determinedly.

"And I say, yes!"

"Wait and see!"

"We shall. Hey, cabby!"

The driver turned to the curb and halted there.

"Engaged?"

"No, sir."

"Get in," spoke Sheldon, in a menacing undertone, to his companion.

"I have no desire to accompany you."

"It is not a matter of inclination, but necessary. I will wait ten seconds. If you do not step into that cab at the termination of that time, I shall act."

"How?" Burgoyne quivered restively.

"By calling the police, and delivering you over to justice as an escaped convict."

That meant disaster, the firing of a mine not yet prepared for an explosion. He hesitated.

"And if I go with you?" asked Burgoyne temporising.

"You will give me an hour of your time, listening to what I have to say. Then you shall be free to go where you will. I swear it!"

"You swear it!" fired up Burgoyne, hotly and contemptuously. "Your past dealings——"

"Never mind the past! Ten seconds! Is it yonder police officer, or the cab?"

With a perturbed face, Adrian Burgoyne stepped into the vehicle.

The merchant slammed the door, and mumbled a direction, his residence, to the driver.

"You said an hour, I believe?" spoke Burgoyne.

"I said an hour. You will not regret the interview."

Then perfect silence—glum suspicions on the part of the one, grim forboding with the other—prevailed, until ten minutes later, Adrian Burgoyne found himself face to face with Richard Sheldon, in his sumptuous library.

"I will come to the point briefly," spoke the merchant. "I thought you dead. It was a trick of Dean's. I know your plans. By acting first, and before your kind designs to convict me are ripe, I fortify my case. I can touch an electric button at my hand, and summon an officer of the law. I have a bargain to make with you."

"A bargain?" repeated Burgoyne suspiciously, never taking his hand from the bag he carried, nor his eyes from the furtive, watchful face of his host.

"Yes."

"Name it."

"I relinquish all prosecution or betrayal of your identity, for a certain consideration."

"What?"

"That handbag at your side and its contents!"

With a vivid start, Burgoyne rose to his feet.

"Never!" he cried, with resolute eyes. "It is not mine. It is a sacred trust. Arrest me if you will. The law will restore it to its rightful owner—not to you."

"We shall see!" hissed the baffled and malevolent schemer.

"I shall defend it with my life," avowed Burgoyne aggressively, placing his hand to his breast, and revealing the end of a weapon.

"Oh! I shall not try force," sneered the other lightly.

"You refuse?"

"Decidedly!"

"Then you are free to go."

Digitized by Google

He pointed to the door as he spoke, Burgoyne hesitated. Was a trap awaiting him at its threshold? There was a latent, sinister menace in the manner of the merchant that he did not fancy.

"You will not arrest me?" he questioned.

"Not now."

Burgoyne backed to the door, still keeping close watch and word over the precious fortune in his possession.

"Only——"

He halted.

"Well?" he queried.

"You doom the woman you love!"

"Patrice!" cried Burgoyne, in a revelation of anguish. "Ah! wretched man! I understand you now!"

"I thought you would," gloated Sheldon. "Listen to me, Adrian Burgoyne. I am no vain plotter. You have the best of me, but not at this hour. The girl, Patrice!—I know where she is. In a single hour I can reach her—convey, compel her to accompany me to a foreign place, put her out of the way—by accident!"

His listener shuddered at the cold-blooded emphasis employed on those two last words.

"Speak, miscreant!" he gasped, in a frenzy of horror. "What do you want?"

"Patrice Ringold's fortune, in exchange for Patrice Ringold's liberty and life!"

"TAKE IT!"

In the strength of a mighty love, in the glamour and fidelity of a devotion that enwrapt soul and mind, all sordid considerations vanishing to nothingness. Adrian Burgoyne sprang to meet the price exacted.

"Take it!" he cried, in fevered suspense. "Her life, her safety, is all in all. Take the gold; it has brought nothing but wreck, blight, and ruin. Fill your false, craven heart with it, and sink to perdition! The girl, Patrice! Give her freedom—send me to her. Love will find a way to wreath her path with wealth!"

Fairly amazed, the plotter caught up the bag as it landed with a crash on the desk before him.

"Truth for truth, fairness for fairness," he spoke finally. "I will not deceive you. Read that."

He flung a letter to his visitor. The latter perused it eagerly.

It was from the matron of a reformatory in the city, and it acknowledged the receipt of one week's board in advance for his niece, Patrice.

"And that," continued Sheldon, scrawling a few lines and tossing the document to Burgoyne.

It was an order for the release of Patrice, "niece of Richard Sheldon," and was signed by the latter.

"Are you satisfied?"

"Yes."

"One other thing——"

"What is it?"

"I make no move against you, if you leave me to my fate."

Burgoyne was silent. He had found Patrice, but at what a cost!

He walked from the library, conning the directions on the order. Patrice—Patrice! What was gold, vengeance, to her bonny love?

Richard Sheldon hastened back to the library, once his visitor was gone.

In feverish haste, he tore open the hand-satchel.

Zounds! what royal tribute, what a glaring mass of riches!

Gold—a heap of it—pearls, diamonds, emeralds! He was an expert in the value of gems.

"A million!" he gloated. "Oh! surely that! Now for Europe—Amsterdam—a castle in Italy. Ah! I have won my prize at last!"

He crammed some clothes into a portmanteau. His mind was fixed on a plan of flight—by the rear door, to the nearest suburban railway station by a cab, the direct city trail broken, an east-bound train!

At the door, a man coming in confronted him. Sheldon uttered an exclamation of impatience.

"Davenant?" he muttered.

"Yes. I wanted to see you. A plausible story about your pretended niece being a wayward, troublesome girl, will hold her in safe hands until your further orders."

"Yes! yes!" interrupted Sheldon quickly. "Never mind that now. What do I owe you?"

"Two hundred, you promised."

"There is more." And Sheldon handed the astonished secret inquiry agent a large roll of notes.

"Thank you; but does this mean that I am dismissed?" queried Davenant, in a dissatisfied and injured tone.

"No, but I am going away."

"Oh! When you return, I may be of service to you. Oh! Mr. Sheldon!"

About to leave the house, Davenant halted.

"Well, what is it?" demanded Sheldon, irritated at the delay.

"The Golcondas?"

"The mining stock?"

"Yes."

"What about it?"

"You bade me make some inquiries."

"Yes; but don't trifle about it now. I am in a hurry."

"Trifle!" ejaculated Davenant "Why, sir! it's run up forty points."

"What!"

"Yes, sir. The shares took a turn on the stock exchange yesterday afternoon—new lode struck—big pay is in sight. It closed at 60. It started at 78 this morning. They predict par by noon."

Par? Golcondas at par! The excited Sheldon made a rapid mental calculation. He hesitated, and the man who hesitates in such a fateful situation as his own, is lost.

To sell meant ten thousand pounds, hard cash—small fortune in itself—ready money in abundance until he sold the jewels.

But he could not go to the stock exchange himself. No! He would trust to no man's honour. For all he knew, Adrian Burgoyne was preparing to accuse him, to stop his flight even now. If not, Mr. Detective Dean certainly would when he learnt of the reckless bargain of his protégé.

Still, he coveted that ten thousand pounds. While he was about it, he might as well make a clean sweep he decided, and success made him bold.

He took from a compartment in the desk a package of bonds he had concluded to abandon as so much waste paper.

"Golcondas," he explained to the agent. "Here is my authority to sell."

"At par?"

"No, at whatever the market rules. A two per cent. commission ought to make you anxious to make a good bargain!"

"I thank you for your liberality and confidence, Mr. Sheldon."

"Sell as soon as you can."

"And report here?"

"No. Let me see."

Sheldon consulted a time-table. Then he pencilled an address.

"I will await your coming to that place until six o'clock this evening," he said.

"I will be there long before that."

"Don't bring a cheque."

"No, sir—the ready cash."

"In notes of large denomination."

"Your instructions shall be carefully executed."

Davenant left the house. The merchant left it, too, a few minutes later.

He skulked through the rear court, reached a retired street, took a tram, then a cab, changed twice to other vehicles, and finally reached a surburban station on the line of an eastern railway.

Digitized by Google

Here he sat down to wait for the express, due at 6.27 p.m., and for Davenant, and the proceeds of the bonds.

He was self-satisfied, triumphant, sanguine of a safe and speedy flight.

He had come to the city, seven years previous, a scheming, penniless pettifogger.

He was leaving it, treasure-rich, laden with splendid spoil, assured of a future of luxury and opulence—the possessor of a cool million, in rare, glittering jewels!

CHAPTER XXXIII.

For Friendship's Sake.

"Patrice!"

That was the beginning, the end, the all in all of Adrian Burgoyne's fervent thoughts, as he left the home of Richard Sheldon.

He had staked everything on the issue of the moment. He had acted independently of the designs of Dean; he had bartered gold for love.

The marplot of his destiny would fly, enriched; Patrice would live, a pauper; but oh! what mattered it all—the prison servitude, the difficult struggle for pelf, the sordid victory of Sheldon, so that he, Burgoyne, won the pearl of precious price—Patrice!

The place that the order Sheldon had written named was near the southern edge of the city. The presentation of the document would insure immediate release of Patrice.

He longed for wings to fly to her side, to tell her how love had inspired a mighty sacrifice. He knew she would sanction his reckless bargain.

He ran along half-a-dozen streets, intent on taking a tram to reach his destination. Of a sudden he halted as he passed a building. It abruptly occurred to him that the rooms of his friend Dean were in that structure. The latter had told him to report at his own hotel every hour, as something might occur requiring his co-operation. His present plan involved several hours' time. He would run up to the detective's apartments, and report.

Dean was just leaving, as he tapped at his door. He scanned Burgoyne's excited face questioningly.

"What has happened?" he demanded. "Your manner tells me that you have made some discovery."

Burgoyne hesitated.

How would this uncompromising emissary of the law take the intelligence he was in honour bound to divulge?

He blurted out the plain, practical facts of the case. Dean stood transfixed.

"Gave up the treasure!—bargained with that soulless scoundrel!" he gasped, fire in his eye, stored-up wrath in voice and gusture. "Man! you have played the coward!"

"For her sake!" pleaded Burgoyne.

"For her sake? Why! in twenty-four hours we would have found her. You have bartered justice for love, when you might have had both. Don't speak! I am boiling over. I did not think it of you. You have spoiled everything. Wait here, Adrian Burgoyne, as you value liberty, happiness, stay here, in this room, till I send for you or come to you."

"But Patrice?" demurred the anxious lover.

"Do you understand me?" roared Dean, bristling with rage. "Either you obey me and help me undo your wretched work, or I wash my hands of the whole case!"

"I will remain—I will obey you," murmured Burgoyne, fairly subdued at the energetic wrath of his companion.

"To think of compromising with that unscrupulous scoundrel, Richard Sheldon, when the rope was fairly dangling for him; to consider yourself, the girl, love, when my reputation as a shrewd police officer was at stake! Burgoyne, I didn't think it of you!"

Abashed, wretched enough, Adrian Burgoyne sat alone in the detective's apartments, to reflect dubiously over the mistake his impulses had led him into. He had time to reflect now. Judgment and emotion at war, he was minded one moment to hasten to Patrice, at all hazards, without loss of time; the next instant he was overwhelmed, as he realised that, in interfering with the delicate machinery of Dean's plans, he had really placed the intrepid officer at a disadvantage.

Mr. Detective Dean puffed down the street like a steam engine, talking to himself, gesticulating energetically, angry at his client, and sorry for him, at one and the same time.

He stopped at the first telephone office he came to. Ringing up the nearest police station of the department, he soon had the transmitter to his lips, giving his instructions.

They were delivered to the lieutenant in charge of the detectives, and, with the celerity of a commander giving orders to his subordinate officers on the battle-field, Dean notified one officer to watch the departing trains, another to haunt the docks of the steamship lines, a third to watch the merchant's residence, a fourth to guard the vicinity of his business office.

The order all along the line was terse and emphatic: "Arrest Richard Sheldon on sight!"

Only too well the detective knew, that now, possessed of a vast fortune, Sheldon would flee the city promptly. He hailed a cab and drove to the merchant's home, but it was purely a visit of formality—the man he sought had departed.

Next, his office; no Sheldon there. Then Dean made a flying trip through the brokers' offices near the stock exchange. No one had seen Sheldon for two days. He seemed to have retired from active dealing; but a broker, overhearing the question of the detective, said:

"I don't know if Sheldon is about or not, but he's selling this morning."

"Selling what?" asked Dean curiously.

"Bonds. I see his name on the official blackboard—Golcondas, at eighty-three."

To the stock exchange the detective repaired. Amid its wild din of men selling and buying the stocks of the world, he soon made out coherency.

One man was more active than the others—a young broker, a newly-fledged Napoleon of finance—who was accompanied by a sleek-looking but anxious-faced man, who bore a handful of bonds, and who seemed to be giving him instructions.

An intelligent look came into the eyes of Dean, as he recognised this man.

"A private detective man," he murmured, "and the same one I have seen so often in confab with Sheldon of late. I understand—Sheldon has authorised him to sell some stocks. Here is my clue. Where the jackal is the lion cannot be far away. This man will lead me to my quarry."

Dean went into a cigar shop near by, and perfected a new disguise. Then he set to pertinaciously shadow the man whom Richard Sheldon had deputed to sell the mining stock, Davenant.

The latter was all business—all leisure, too. It was fully three o'clock in the afternoon before he closed out the last share of stock. It was four when he settled up with the purchasers, on a cash basis.

With ten thousand pounds in his pockets he went to a restaurant, ate a hearty meal after his engrossing labour of the day, consulted his watch, and then ordered the waiter to send in one of the cabmen whose vehicles lined the curb outside.

At an adjoining table the disguised Dean listened eagerly to eve ry word he spoke.

"I want to reach —— Station by six o'clock," he announced to the driver.

"Yes, sir."

"How long will it take to get there?"

"Forty minutes."

"Very good. Wait for me outside for half-an-hour. Consider yourself engaged."

Digitized by Google

Then Davenant prolonged the luxury of a royal lunch, topped off with expensive wines, and settled down to a further enjoyment of the novel situation of possessing a small fortune, for a few hours at least, while Dean glided from the restaurant.

He secured a cab, and drove to his rooms. There, dejected, consumed with impatience, he found Burgoyne.

Dean forced him into the vehicle. Briefly, pointedly, he withheld his discoveries and his theory that Sheldon was waiting at the suburban station for Davenant to deliver the proceeds of the bond sales.

They were delayed twice on their drive—once by a block, once by a broken trace. It was dusk when they reached the vicinity of the little suburban station. Dean halted the cab some distance away from it. Then, alighting, he gave Burgoyne his orders.

He was to approach the station from the north; Dean would close in from the west. The latter would take the initiative, and an agreed-on signal was to announce a discovery or peril.

Adrian Burgoyne neared the station just as a porter was lighting the lamps in its waiting-room. Near the platform stood a cab. He peered through the end window of the station.

There stood Richard Sheldon. He was just receiving a bundle of bank-notes from a companion — Davenant, the private detective.

These he stored in the handbag he carried. Then he figured on a slip of paper, counted out some money, tendered it to Davenant, and walked over to a time-table impatiently.

Davenant proceeded to the cab. About to step into it, he started, peered down the dusk-haunted platform, and hurried back into the station again.

The lurker at the end window bent his ear eagerly, as he addressed the merchant:

"Mr. Sheldon!" he spoke sharply and excitedly.

"Yes—what is it?" demanded Sheldon, wheeling abruptly.

"Outside!" quavered the other.

"Well?"

"Dean!"

"The detective?"

"Yes."

"You don't mean it?"

Richard Sheldon turned pale. A low unhurried consultation took place, at the end of which Davenant returned to the cab, and departed with the words:

"The express stops at the level crossing, four hundred yards along the line. You can catch it there."

Richard Sheldon's free hand sought his side coat-pocket, and a grim look settled over his face, as he started down the line, Burgoyne keeping close at his heels.

An open space prevented the latter shadowing his man, except at a distance. In order not to lose sight of him, he ran back, and then crawled under the open platform, gaining the line near a pile of boxes.

Just at that moment Richard Sheldon came into view. His nerves were all a quiver. He knew what was coming, but he did not quail. He was prepared for it.

From a crouching attitude behind a box, Detective Dean suddenly sprang up to confront him.

"Richard Sheldon, I want you."

The officer expected to see his prospective prisoner come to a halt with a shock, from sheer consternation. Not so, however. He, too, made the serious mistake of extending a pair of handcuffs, instead of a revolver.

Quick as a flash, Sheldon sprang forward. He saw his advantage, and pursued it promptly. He gave the box a push. It swung back, and the disconcerted Dean with it. It toppled and fell. The next moment it crashed to the platform, with the reckless detective under it, one arm and one leg being pinioned beneath it.

The fugitive financier directed a swift glance towards the station. No one was in sight. At the crossing directly north a shrill whistle cut the air, as the express thundered down to a stop.

He drew a revolver, glaring demoniacally at his helpless foe. Then he pocketed it again, drew forth, instead, a long keen-bladed knife, and, with a savage growl, sprang at the prostrate Dean.

"I'll seal your lips, meddler, traitor!" he hissed. "Noiseless death, the best! Take that!"

The knife was poised. Its baleful gleam told the shrinking and helpless detective what he had to expect.

Just then, however, was an interruption. Just then the appalled Burgoyne crept from under the platform.

"Hold!" he gasped, "or I fire——"

A cry of dismay completed the sentence. He found himself unarmed. In crawling under the platform he had lost his only weapon—a revolver.

"You, too!" hissed the ferocious Sheldon. "This one first. Your blood be on your own heads!"

Toot—toot!

The train at the crossing was starting up again. He had no time to spare. He made a powerful sweep with the knife.

It descended.

But not upon the figure of his intended victim.

Flinging himself forward, Adrian Burgoyne interposed his form as a shield for his imperilled friend.

One keen, searing contact, a gush of blood, a thousand darting pains, and the knife sank deep in his unsheltered breast.

With fading glance, he saw the assassin speed away towards the approaching train.

With fluttering senses, as he realised that he had saved the life of his companion at the peril of his own, the majestic words seemed to permeate his soul like a balm of peace and satisfaction supreme:

"More than this can no man do for his friend—that he give up his life to save him."

(To be concluded.)

Have you a Brain?

ASSUMING you are equipped with one, we ask you: Does it not require pleasant exercise at times,—in the shape of mental gymnastics?

Certainly.

THEN the finest thing possible is to join The Brain Gymnasium in The Story Teller.

There is no entrance fee.

The prizes are many, and their aggregate value £25.

Full particulars appear in the issue of The Story Teller dated February 22nd (1d. every Wednesday), which also contains a complete story by Mrs. George Corbett, and instalments of serials by Joan Barrett, Gertrude Warden, and Ida Deahl.

POSTAL RATES.

SHORT STORIES will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON, at "Pearson's Weekly" Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

HAVE YOU A POST CARD?

If not, please obtain one, and send it to the

PEARSON POTTERY CO., HANLEY,

with your name and address on the back, and you will receive by next post full particulars of the most wonderful package of crockery the world has ever seen.

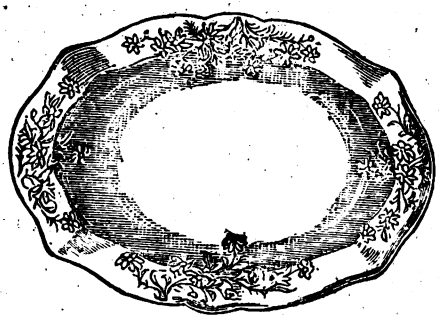
100 PIECES FOR £1 1s.

100 PIECES FOR £1 1s.

A Dinner Service of 50 pieces is included, which is guaranteed to be worth the guinea alone, and a China Tea Service of 28 pieces, finished in gold, together with a lot of useful kitchen crockery.

The Secret of the Success.—The Pearson Pottery Company are manufacturers, not middlemen, like many other advertisers. The Pearson Potteries have nearly 2,000ft. frontage to the town of Hanley.

Thousands Sold All Over the World. Everybody not only satisfied but amazed at the quantity and quality given.



Hundreds of these packages are applied for as WEDDING or BIRTHDAY PRESENTS. And what more useful present can be given? Every item is useful.

Post Cards and Letters to be addressed to the

PEARSON POTTERY CO., HANLEY, STAFFS.

HAIR DESTROYED

permanently and absolutely by an entirely new and harmless self-treatment, total destruction guaranteed. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope. Prof. F.T. Holt, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

BLUSHING

Permanently cured. A Pamphlet giving sound practical advice and particulars of a successful treatment for a rapid, simple, and inexpensive home-cure, forwarded free to all upon receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—Prof. B. L. Holt, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

TO THE DEAF.

A Gentleman who cured himself of Deafness and Noises in the Head after fourteen years' suffering, will gladly send full particulars of the remedy post free.—Address, H. Clifton, Amberley House, Norfolk Street, Strand, London, W.C.

DOUGLAS, HUNGERFORD, AND WILLIAMS.

Profits Paid during 1895.

Jan. 2, £8 per cent., Feb. 1, £6, Mar. 1, £5, April 1, £8, May 1, £7, June 2, £10, July 1, £9, Aug. 1, £9, Sept. 2, £8, Oct. 1, £8, Nov. 1, £7, Dec. 2, £7.

Total for 12 months £92 per cent., an average of nearly £8 per cent. per month.

Profits Paid during 1896.

Jan. 2 ... £6 per cent. | Feb. 1 ... £7 per cent.

OUR NEW ILLUSTRATED MANUAL mailed free upon request, showing how these profits may be made WITHOUT SPECULATION. Cheques for profits mailed promptly 1st of each month, and for withdrawals of capital on 2nd and 16th of each month. Trial investments of £5 and upwards may be made.

We have not a dissatisfied Client.

DOUGLAS, HUNGERFORD, & WILLIAMS, 5, Copthall Avenue, London, E.C., and 11, Place de la Bourse, Paris.

THIN BUSTS

Quickly transformed and a good figure permanently obtained by a perfectly harmless, simple, and inexpensive self-treatment. Success guaranteed. For particulars, free, send stamped envelope in confidence to "Madame B. J.," Oriental Toilet Co., 87, Strand, London.

RED NOSES

Permanently cured in a few days by a simple, inexpensive self-treatment. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope to Dr. A. M. Curtis, York Chambers, Adelphi, London, W.C.

TOO STOUT

Dr. Grey's FAT REDUCING Pills.

A safe, rapid, and permanent reduction and improvement in health and breathing guaranteed. A special preparation kept for stubborn cases (either sex) which have resisted other treatment.

ABDOMINAL OBESITY A SPECIALTY.

2/9 and 4/6 per box, plain wrapper, post free to all parts. Dr. O. Grey, 57, Weymouth St., Portland Pl., London, W.

Digitized by Google

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

Bilious & Nervous Disorders,

SUCH AS

Sick Headache, Constipation,
Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion,
Disordered Liver & Female Ailments.

ANNUAL SALE SIX MILLION BOXES.

In Boxes, 9½d., 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

THE PROPRIETORS OF

The Illustrated London News

Beg to Announce that they have Purchased from CAPTAIN THATCHER the SOLE COPYRIGHT of his MSS. and SKETCHES describing and depicting

THE EXCITING

DASH INTO THE TRANSVAAL

BY

JAMESON'S TROOPS

A SPECIAL NUMBER

Containing CAPT. THATCHER'S NARRATIVE

Will be Published on TUESDAY, FEB. 25.

In addition, several Illustrations from Sketches by Mr. MELTON PRIOR, our Special Artist in the Transvaal, and an Original Portrait of DR. JAMESON, never before published.

PRICE ONE SHILLING.

Office: 198, STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

MASON'S

EXTRACT OF HERBS

For the Immediate Production of

BOTANIC BEER.

A Nine-gallon Cask of Alcoholic Beer from a Brewery will cost you 10/6, but Eight Gallons of Beer made from

Mason's EXTRACT of HERBS

Can be obtained for 6d., plus a pound or two of Sugar and a little Yeast.

THE FINEST BEVERAGE IN THE WORLD.

Inventors and Manufacturers:

Newball & Mason,

HYSON GREEN WORKS,

Nottingham.

If unable to obtain it in your neighbourhood, send 9 stamps for sample bottle; or samples of both Wine Essence and Extract of Herbs, post free for 15 stamps.

"THE NIMBLE 9D."

Great Reduction in price to 9d. per lb. in order to reduce stock, but

QUALITY GOOD AS EVER.

NEARLY 100,000 BEDS ALREADY SOLD

TO THOROUGHLY SATISFIED PURCHASERS.

NEWHAM'S LINCOLNSHIRE FEATHER BEDS

THESE BEDS are warranted doubly purified, dusted, and perfected in our own extensive factory at Boston, Lincs., made in strong linen bordered tick. The quality, sweetness, and purity of every bed guaranteed. These beds ALWAYS GIVE SATISFACTION, and many thousands of purchasers have sent us flattering testimonials and other orders for beds. Note following prices, which are 25 per cent. less than our recently advertised prices.

No. 1—Single Bed, Bolster and Pillow, 6ft. 3in. by 3ft. 6in., weighing 40lbs. 30/-

No. 2—Double Bed, Bolster, and Two Pillows, 6ft. 6in. by 4ft. 6in., weighing 50lbs.... ... ... 37/6

No. 3—Double Bed, Bolster, and Two Pillows, 6ft. 6in. by 4ft. 6in., weighing 55lbs. 41/3

No. 4—Extra Size Bed, Bolster, and Two Pillows, 6ft. 6in. by 6ft., weighing 65lbs. 48/9

Any sized Bed only 9d. per lb., Carriage Paid, to any station in the United Kingdom. FEATHERS ONLY 9d. PER LB. The trade supplied. All orders must be accompanied by cheque or P.O.O. (which, as security to purchasers, may be post-dated ten days). Send for samples of Feathers and Ticks, Price Lists, etc., which will be sent Post Free and need not be returned. A great reduction on three or more Beds. Please mention this paper.

S. S. NEWHAM & CO., Boston, Lincolnshire.

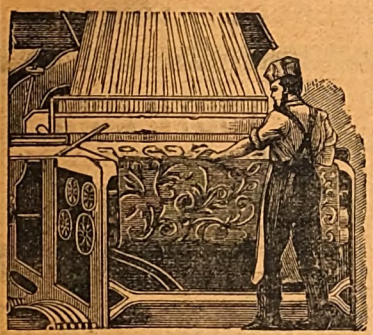
SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 375. FOR WEEK ENDING MARCH 7TH, 1896. [ONE PENNY.

BE SURE TO CUT IT OUT.

10,000 RUGS GIVEN AWAY.



THIS PHENOMENAL OFFER is made to the readers of Short Stories. On receipt of this advertisement, accompanied by Postal Order for 6s. or 74 stamps, we will forward DIRECT FROM OUR LOOMS to your address one of our genuine SEAMLESS, WOVEN, REVERSIBLE CARPETS, suitable for Drawing-room, Dining-room, Bedroom, etc., handsomely bordered and woven in thirty different patterns and art colourings, to suit all requirements, and LARGE ENOUGH TO COVER ANY ORDINARY-SIZED ROOM.

With every Carpet we shall ABSOLUTELY GIVE AWAY a very handsome RUG to match, or we will send two CARPETS and two RUGS for 10s. 6d.

MONEY WILLINGLY RETURNED IF NOT APPROVED.

The Queen says: "Decidedly stouter and handsomer than any of the kind, the price being the astounding part of the matter." Schoolmistress: "For style, durability, and cheapness they cannot be beaten." Penny Illustrated Paper: "Is one of the most surprising bargains I have seen." Church Bells: "Truly wonderful value."

Thousands of Testimonials, similar to the following, and Repeat Orders have been received from our customers.

Knowle, Bovey, South Devon.
"MRS. NUSCOMBE GOULD received on the 29th ult. the Carpet from the British Carpet Weaving Co., and writes now to thank the firm for their prompt attention to her small order. Also to express her satisfaction and astonishment at the smallness of the price for so good and pretty an article as the Carpet received."

21, South Oak Street, Burton-on-Trent.
Mr. T. GREENE writes: "I received the Carpet and Rug quite safely, and am pleased with them. They are very handsome colourings, just suitable for my purpose, and I have never seen anything to equal them. Shall show them to all my friends."

This offer is made to the readers of this paper only, and may NOT BE REPEATED. All orders despatched the same day as received. Cheques and Postal Orders to be crossed "Union Bank," and made payable to J. Hargreaves, Sec. Established 1872. ADDRESS: THE

BRITISH CARPET WEAVING CO.,
31, OLD STREET, LONDON, E.C.

NOT APPEAR AGAIN.

"STRONGEST AND BEST."—Health.

FRY'S
Pure Concentrated
COCOA

Awarded Highest Honours. | Over 130 Gold Medals and Diplomas.

Purchasers should ask specially for FRY'S PURE CONCENTRATED COCOA to distinguish it from other varieties manufactured by the Firm.

"THE NIMBLE 9D."

Great Reduction in price to 9d. per lb. in order to reduce stock, but

QUALITY GOOD AS EVER.

NEARLY 100,000 BEDS ALREADY SOLD

TO THOROUGHLY SATISFIED PURCHASERS.

NEWHAM'S LINCOLNSHIRE FEATHER BEDS

THESE BEDS are warranted doubly purified, dusted, and perfected in our own extensive factory at Boston, Lincs., made in strong linen bordered tick. The quality, sweetness, and purity of every bed guaranteed. These beds ALWAYS GIVE SATISFACTION, and many thousands of purchasers have sent us flattering testimonials and other orders for beds. Note following prices, which are 25 per cent. less than our recently advertised prices.

No. 1—Single Bed, Bolster and Pillow, 6ft. 3in. by 3ft. 6in., weighing 40lbs. 30/-

No. 2—Double Bed, Bolster, and Two Pillows, 6ft. 6in. by 4ft. 6in., weighing 50lbs.... ... ... 37/6

No. 3—Double Bed, Bolster, and Two Pillows, 6ft. 6in. by 4ft. 6in., weighing 55lbs. 41/3

No. 4—Extra Size Bed, Bolster, and Two Pillows, 6ft. 6in by 5ft., weighing 65lbs. 48/9

Any sized Bed only 9d. per lb., Carriage Paid, to any station in the United Kingdom. FEATHERS ONLY 9d. PER LB. The trade supplied. All orders must be accompanied by cheque or P.O.O. (which, as security to purchasers, may be post-dated ten days). Send for samples of Feathers and Ticks, Price Lists, etc., which will be sent Post Free and need not be returned. A great reduction on three or more Beds. Please mention this paper.

S. S. NEWHAM & CO., Boston, Lincolnshire.

Digitized by Google

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,

SUCH AS

Sick Headache, Constipation,
Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion,
Disordered Liver & Female Ailments.

ANNUAL SALE SIX MILLION BOXES.

In Boxes, 9½d., 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

MRS. JACKSON

An artist's wife, residing at Norton, near Malton, states: "I am deeply grateful to you for the good received through taking your Wind Pills. I suffered severely from

INDIGESTION, SPASMS,

and LIVER COMPLAINT. The doctors gave me up as incurable, nor did I think it possible for me to recover. I scarcely dared to eat any food, fearing suffocation. Seeing an advertisement of

Page Woodcock's Wind Pills,

I resolved to try them. After taking a few small boxes I lost all the painful symptoms, and now enjoy good health. Publish my statement as you please."

All sufferers from INDIGESTION, LIVER COMPLAINTS, WIND on the STOMACH, SICK HEADACHE, BILIOUSNESS, etc., should avail themselves of this most excellent medicine.

☛ The Wind Pills being purely Vegetable, Tasteless, and Mild, and Tonic in their action, may be taken with perfect safety by the most delicate of either sex.

Of all Medicine Vendors, at 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. Post Free for P.O. or Stamps from PAGE WOODCOCK, LINCOLN.

EPPS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

COCOA

TRILENE REGD TABLETS — THE ONLY CURE for STOUTNESS Registered by GOVERNMENT Price 2/6

ALL FAT PEOPLE

Readily Reduce Weight and Cure Corpulency Permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are very agreeable, harmless, and never fail to PRESERVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of diet. Reduction begins immediately.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably." Send 2/6 to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C.

KNOW THYSELF!

YOUR CHARACTER, APTITUDES, and CAREER marvellously described from Handwriting by distinguished Graphologist. Business Guidance. Success ensured. Fee 2s.
Professor CARONA. F.B.I.M.S. 126, Ledbury Road, Bayswater, W.

S.S. S.S.
PEARSON'S
£100
COUPON.
No. 10
Mar. 7, 1896.
S.S. S.S.

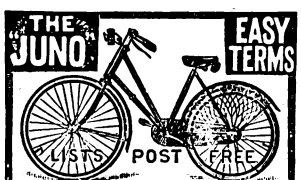
HAIR DESTROYED.

A doctor's widow knows of a simple, inexpensive remedy that permanently destroys the roots, and will forward particulars free to all those afflicted sending stamped envelope. Address Mrs. B. D. WOOD, 4, DUKE STREET, VILLIERS STREET, LONDON, W.

ARE YOU LITTLE?

If so, wear the "A.D." Invisible Elevators (Regd.). Will increase your height up to four inches; the only approved means; detection impossible; simple, inexpensive. Send stamped envelope for particulars to the ORIENTAL TOILET CO. (B 5 Dept.), 87, Strand, London.

"JUNO" CYCLES Are the Very Best.



JUNO Safeties. Roadsters, 28lb.; Racers, 22lb. JUNO Lady's Safety a Specialite.

Send at once for JUNO Catalogue, sent post free to any part of the world, interesting and valuable to all. METROPOLITAN MACHINISTS' CO., LTD., 75 and 76, Bishopsgate Without, London, E.C.

N.B.—Every JUNO Guaranteed. MENTION PAPER.

WE GIVE AWAY

Free of all cost, Hosiery, Dress Skirts, Printed Blouses, and Complete Dress Lengths. Every woman should write for particulars and the most Marvellous Dress Guide, which are sent free on receipt of a Post Card. ADDRESS: Shakespeare Manufacturing Co. (Dept. 19), Milk St., Manchester.

TOOTH-ACHE

CURED INSTANTLY BY

BUNTER'S NERVINE

Prevents Decay. Saves Extraction. Sleepless Nights Prevented. Neuralgic Headache and all Nerve Pains Removed by BUNTER'S NERVINE. All Chemists, 1s. 1½d.

SULPHOLINE LOTION,

For clearing the skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness, giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance.

SHILLING BOTTLES.

RED NOSES

Caused by INDIGESTION, etc. All who suffer from this disfiguring complaint should write for DR. HOWELL'S RENOWNED REMEDY, 22, Glasshouse Street, London, W., who guarantees a cure in a few days. 2/6 a box.

HAIR DESTROYED.

A lady who has permanently destroyed Superfluous Hairs on herself, will be happy to forward free, to all similarly afflicted, full particulars of a simple, inexpensive and harmless self-treatment. Send stamped addressed envelope in confidence to Mrs. "T. D." 87, Strand, London.

TO TOBACCONISTS COMMENCING.

£20 See Illus. Guide and Catalogue (259 pages), 3d. "How to Open a Cigar Stores, from £20 to £2,000." TOBACCONISTS' OUTFITTING CO., 186, Euston Road, London. (Over 50 years' reputation.) Manager, H. MYERS.

ONE PENNY

SHORT STORIES.

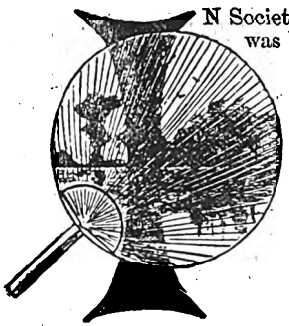
EDITED BY

C. ARTHUR PEARSON

No. 375.] For the Week ending March 7th, 1896. [ONE PENNY.

Was He a Coward?

Translated from the French of Guy de Maupassant.



IN Society they called him "Adonis Querne." His name was Viscount Gontran de Querne.

An orphan, and master of a large fortune, he made quite a figure, as they say. He had style, readiness enough to appear witty, a certain natural grace, a proud, well-bred bearing, a fierce moustache, and a gentle eye—the combination women like.

He was invited everywhere, was in demand as a partner at a dance, and inspired men with the smiling unfriendliness that a strong face usually begets. He was suspected of a few love affairs that go to make a bachelor interesting. He was happy, calm, and self satisfied, known to be an expert swordsman, and a good shot.

"If I ever fight a duel," he used to say, "I shall choose pistols. I shall be sure then of killing my man."

One evening he went to the theatre with two ladies and their husbands, and after the play invited them to go to Tortoni's for an ice. When they had been seated there for a few minutes, he observed that a gentleman at a neighbouring table was keeping his eyes obstinately fixed on one of the ladies of de Querne's party. She seemed troubled and uncomfortable, and held her head down. Finally she said to her husband:

"That man is staring at me. I don't know him, do you?"

The husband, who had seen nothing, looked up, but said at once: "No, not at all."

The young wife continued, half smiling, and half annoyed:

"It's very provoking; that individual spoils my ice for me."

Her husband shrugged his shoulders: "Pshaw! Pay no attention to him. If we took notice of every loafer we met there'd be no end to it."

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

But the Viscount rose abruptly.

He would not permit a strange man to spoil an ice of his offering. The insult was to him, since it was by his invitation that his friends were at the café. The thing devolved upon him to settle.

He approached the man and said to him:

"Sir, I cannot tolerate your manner of staring at these ladies. I beg you will desist."

The other replied:

"Do you want to make a row about it?"

The Viscount set his teeth and continued: "Be careful, sir, or you will provoke me beyond bounds."

The man answered by a single word, a vile name that rang from one end of the café to the other, and had the effect of a spring on every one at the tables.

Everyone turned round, the three waiters spun on their heels like tops, the two dames du comptoir jumped and then leant forward to see, and a great silence fell. Then all at once a sharp sound cut the air. The Viscount had struck his adversary in the face. Everybody rose to interfere. The two men exchanged cards.

* * * * *

When the Viscount reached home he walked up and down his room, too agitated to reflect. The single idea of a duel hovered in his mind, but without awakening the smallest emotion. He had done as he ought; shown himself as he wished to be. He would be talked about, approved, congratulated.

He repeated aloud as we often speak when the mind is wrougl t up: "What a brute that man was."

Then he sat down to think. In the morning he must find his seconds. Who should they be? Men of position and standing! He finally chose the Marquis de la Tour-Noire and Colonel Bourdin, a great lord and a soldier; their names would look well in the newspapers. He felt thirsty and drank three glasses of water, one after the other: then he began to walk up and down again. He felt very determined. If he showed himself bold and resolute, insisted on rigorous conditions, and demanded a serious duel, a duel to the death, probably his adversary would withdraw and apologise.

He took up the card he had drawn from his pocket and thrown on the table and read it, as he had already read it at a glance in the café and in the cab coming home by the light of every street lamp:

George Lamill,
51, Moncey Street.

Nothing more.

He examined the way the letters followed each other. George Lamill! Who was he? What did he do? Why had he stared at the woman? How revo'ting that a stranger, an unknown man, should trouble the course of your existence suddenly, because he chose to look insolently at a woman. The Viscount repeated aloud:

"What a brute!"

Then he stood motionless awhile, in a sort of trance, his eyes fixed on the card. Rage was awakening in him against the piece of pasteboard, a rage mingled with hate, and with a strange feeling of uneasiness. The whole affair was idiotic! He took an open penknife and stuck it into the printed name as if he were stabbing somebody.

So he was going to fight a duel! Should he choose swords or pistols, for he considered himself the insulted person. With swords he ran less risk, but by choosing pistols he had the chance of making his adversary withdraw. A duel with swords is rarely fatal; mutual prudence keeps the combatants too far apart. With pistols he seriously hazarded his life; but he might also get off with all the honours of the situation and without any meeting.

He spoke aloud:

"I must be firm. He will be frightened."

The sound of his voice made him shiver, and he glanced round. He felt very nervous. He drank another glass of water, undressed, and went to bed.

In bed, with the lights out, he closed his eyes and began to think:

"I have all day to-morrow to attend to things. I must go to sleep now, so as to have my head clear."

The covering seemed oppressive; he could not fall asleep. He turned over and over, lying five minutes on his back, then on his right side, then on his left.

He felt thirsty again. He rose to get a drink. Then a genuine anxiety seized him:

"Am I afraid?"

Why did his heart beat so wildly at all the familiar sounds in the room? When the clock was going to strike, the little click of the spring made him start, and he was obliged to open his mouth to breathe for several seconds after, he felt so oppressed. He began to reason with himself on the possibility of such a thing:

"Am I afraid?"

No, assuredly he could not be afraid when he had just announced himself resolved to push the thing to extremity, when he had such a determination to fight. But he was so deeply moved that he said to himself:

"Can one be afraid in spite of one's self?"

And the doubt grew upon him—an anxiety, a dread; if a force stronger than his will overcame him, what should he do? He would go to the place of meeting, because he willed to appear there. But if he trembled? If he lost consciousness? And he thought of his position, his reputation, and his name.

He felt a compelling wish to see his own face in the mirror. He lighted a candle. When he saw his reflection in the polished glass he hardly recognised it, it was like one he had never seen. His eyes looked enormous, and he was pale; he was certainly very pale.

He stood there before the mirror. He even looked at his tongue to see if he were feverish, and all at once the thought shot through him:

"The day after to-morrow, at this time, I may be dead."

And his heart began to beat furiously again.

"The day after to-morrow this, that I see in the glass, may be no more. I am here, I look at myself, I feel that I am alive, and in twenty-four hours I may be laid on that bed dead, my eyes closed, cold, inanimate, ended!"

He went back towards his bed, and could see himself stretched out on his back on the very sheets he had just left. His face had fallen in like a dead man's, and his hands were leaden as if they would never move again.

He hated his bed, and in order not to see it went into his smoking-room. He mechanically lighted a cigar and began to walk about. He felt chilled, and was about to ring for his servant, but he paused with his hand raised above the bell:

"The fellow will see that I am afraid."

He did not ring, he built a fire himself. His hands trembled a little with a nervous recoil when they touched anything. His mind wandered; his confused thoughts began to grow fleeting, broken off, and painful; fumes clouded his mind as if he had been drinking.

Digitized by Google

He repeated continually:

"What shall I do? What will become of me?"

His whole body vibrated, shaken by chills; he rose, and going to the window, opened the curtains. Day was breaking—a summer day. The flushed sky warmed the roofs and walls of the city. A long beam of light, like a caress from the rising sun, wrapped the awaking world, and with the light swiftly, and almost with the pain of a shock, hope sprang up in the Viscount's heart! What a fool he was, to be overcome with fear before anything was decided, before his seconds had seen George Lamill's, before he even knew there would really be a duel.

He dressed, and left the house with a firm step. He repeated to himself, as he walked:

"I must be very decided. I must prove that I am not afraid."

His seconds, the Marquis and the Colonel, consented to act, shook hands with him, and discussed the conditions.

The Colonel asked: "You are in earnest about the character of the duel itself?"

The Viscount replied: "Thoroughly in earnest."

The Marquis added: "You insist upon pistols?"

"Yes."

"Leave us to settle the rest."

The Viscount pronounced with dry, jerky articulation: "Twenty paces, at the word of command, raising the weapon instead of lowering it. Shots exchanged till there is a serious wound."

The Colonel remarked that they were excellent conditions, the Viscount was a good shot, and all the chances were on his side.

Then they went away, the Viscount returned home to wait for them. His agitation, which had lessened for a time, now increased every moment. He could feel that chill running along his arms, his legs, his chest, shaking his whole body. He could not sit still. There was not a trace of moisture in his mouth, and he continually made a little clacking sound with his tongue as if to moisten his palate.

He wished to breakfast, but could not eat. Then he thought drinking would give him courage, so he sent for a bottle of brandy, and drank six small glasses in succession. A burning heat rushed over him, accompanied by giddiness.

"I have it now," he thought, "this is the thing!"

But at the end of an hour he had emptied the bottle, and his agitation had become intolerable. He felt an insane desire to roll on the ground, to scream, to tear something with his teeth.

A jingling at the bell so excited him that he had not the strength to rise and receive his seconds.

He did not dare to speak to them, for fear they would guess all from his altered voice.

The Colonel spoke: "Everything is settled according to your own conditions. At first your adversary claimed the privileges of the offended person, but he yielded almost immediately and accepted everything. His seconds are two army officers."

The Viscount said: "Thank you."

"Excuse us if we only come in to go directly away, but we have a thousand things to arrange. We must have a good surgeon, as the duel goes on till there is a serious wound, and you know cold lead is no joke. We must find a place for the meeting near some dwelling, where the wounded man may be carried, if necessary, and so on. At least we have two or three hours to do it in."

Again the Viscount said: "Thank you."

The Colonel asked: "Are you all right? Not shaky?"

"Not at all, thank you."

The two men went away.

* * * * *

When he was alone again he believed he was going mad. The servant had lighted the lamps, so he sat down at the table to write letters. Having traced "This is my will" at the top of the page, he sprang up and walked down the room, feeling himself incapable of writing two ideas, of taking any resolve, or deciding upon anything.

What was it all? He was to fight a duel. He wished it, it was his settled intention; and yet he knew, in spite of every effort of his will, every assertion of his mind, that he was not going to have the necessary strength even to go to the place of meeting. He tried to fancy the duel, his own attitude, and his opponent's bearing.

From time to time his teeth chattered in his head. He took up Chateauvillard's duelling code and tried to read it. Then he asked himself:

"Has my adversary practised in shooting-galleries? Is he known? Has he reputation? How could I find out?"

He remembered Baron de Vaux's book on noted shots with the pistol, and went through it from beginning to end. George Lamill was not mentioned. But if the man was not an expert he would not have accepted at once that dangerous weapon under mortal conditions.

He opened a case of pistols, took out one and stood up as if to fire, raising his arm. He trembled from head to foot and the barrel wavered in every direction.

Then he said: "The thing is impossible. I cannot fight a duel like this."

He examined the little black hole in the end of the barrel that spits out death, and thought of disgrace, whispers in clubs, sneers in Society, women's contempt, allusions in the newspapers, insults from cowards.

He kept examining the weapon, and pressing back the trigger suddenly saw a cap under it like a little red flame. Through neglect the pistol had been put away loaded. It gave him a confused, inexplicable pleasure.

If he could not stand up before that man with calm, unblenching front, he would be lost, branded, outcast. He was not capable of assuming or keeping that impassive front, he knew it, he felt it. But he must be a brave man, because he wished to fight a duel! He must be brave since—the thought did not even shape itself clearly in his mind; he opened his mouth, put the barrel of the pistol down his throat and pulled the trigger.

When his valet rushed in, attracted by the report, he found him dead, lying on his back. The blood had splashed the white paper on the table and made a great red blot under the four words:

"This is my will——"

Digitized by Google

I.

"What a lovely face!" murmured Ernest Moore.

He was an artist to his finger-tips, and certainly the girl was charming. She was sipping her tea in the shade of a palm and the painter's trained observation noted that the glove that held the Sevrès cup had seen service on many days, and that she was the most plainly-attired woman in the fashionable crowd that thronged his cousin's drawing-room.

Lady Cameron caught the phrase in passing and smiled.

"I am glad you admire Helen. She is one of my pet protégées—a school-friend of Vera, you know. Her people lost their money a few years ago and they are horribly poor, I am afraid. It is positively dreadful when one thinks that a girl with her appearance should be obliged to go about in a last season's gown. It is such things," said her ladyship solemnly, "which make one wonder at the ways of Providence!"

Moore laughed.

"Do you want to be introduced?" she asked.

"What a question! Of course I do."

A moment later he had drawn a chair to the girl's side and was making himself agreeable to her with the tact of a well-bred man.

She must have known she was beautiful, and yet there was no trace of self-consciousness or affectation about her; the face lent her, in his mind, an added charm. Once, looking up suddenly, she flushed to find his eyes upon her face. He apologised quickly.

"You must think me an awful bore to stare at you so," he said. "Pray forgive me, Miss Winyard; I don't mean to be rude. The fact is I am a painter, and yours is just the type of face for a picture I have in my head. I would give ten pounds to find a model like you."

The conversation grew more personal after that, and unconsciously their voices dropped, so that they were practically tête-à-tête in a crowd.

She questioned him about his profession, and soon he found himself confiding to her more of his hopes and ambitions than a man usually confides to an acquaintance of half-an-hour.

When she rose at length to take leave of her hostess he shook hands with visible regret.

He was hard at work in his studio the next morning when a visiting-card, bearing her name, was brought to him.

His first sensation was pleasure, his second surprise. When she entered, and he noted that her lips were trembling with an embarrassment she could not conceal, his perplexity increased.

She gave him no time for conjecture anent her visit, but plunged into an explanation straightway.

"Mr. Moore," she said, with a nervous tremor in her voice, "I have come to ask you a favour. I dare say Lady Cameron has told you that we are very poor. My father is an invalid, and my brothers and sisters are young, so I am unable to leave home, although I am very anxious to earn a little money. Yesterday you said that you would give ten pounds to find a model like me. Mr. Moore, I am in urgent need of precisely that sum, so I have put false pride in my pocket, and come to ask you to let me be your model. If you did not mean what you said, and I can be of no use to you, don't mind telling me so. It is purely a business proposal that I put before you."

He spoke quickly, earnestly.

"I shall be delighted to paint you. I wish I could find words in which to thank you for offering me the chance. When would you give me a sitting? Would to-morrow, at eleven, suit you?"

"Oh, yes," she said; "all days are the same to me."

When she had gone he took up his brush again; but Mr. Moore's work for the rest of that morning was represented by three square inches of background, which he subsequently found cause to remove with a palette-knife.

He attributed his lack of appetite to overwork. Mr. Moore was mistaken; he was in love.

II.

The picture was nearly finished, and it was the best thing he had done. He knew it, and rejoiced as he lingered tenderly over the last touches.

"It's good," he told Helen. "I'm sure of it, though I say it who shouldn't. It would be strange, wouldn't it, if my chance meeting with you should prove a stepping-stone to success?"

She didn't reply, and he stifled a sigh as he bent lower over the canvas.

It was not the first time that her lack of responsiveness had chilled him. Of late she had shown no trace of the sympathy which had charmed him on the day of the introduction.

"She dislikes me," he thought bitterly, "and she wishes me to see that our intercourse must remain on a business footing. When the picture is finished she will go away and forget me, and I—I shall remember her all my days."

She was to come to the studio the next morning for the last time, and when she had left him, the consciousness of it oppressed his spirits with a leaden weight.

Returning homeward he found a crowd and a couple of fire-engines in the street where he lived, and a cry escaped him, for the fire was at the studios, and his picture—the best work of his life—was in jeopardy, if not destroyed.

Digitized by Google

A fire-escape was forthcoming, and as he gained the outskirts of the crowd, a cheer arose, and a woman was borne in safety to the ground. In the flickering flames he saw her face distinctly.

"Helen!" he gasped. "Good Heavens! Helen!"

In an instant he had forced a passage to her side and thrown his arms about her. She was very white, and her trembling limbs seemed glad of his support.

"I've saved the picture for you," she murmured. "I called to tell you that I couldn't come to-morrow, and I knew how much you valued it, so I ran up and let it down from the window."

"Confound the picture!" he cried fiercely. "All the canvases in creation wouldn't console me for a burn on your little finger."

His voice deepened almost to a sob.

"Oh, my darling, you risked your life for me, and I thought you didn't care!"

"And I thought that you were so devoted to your art that the woman was forgotten in the model."

"We've been making ourselves miserable for nothing," he said, "but, please Heaven, we'll make up for wasted time."

Their lips were very close together. But perhaps it was only the flickering light that made it seem as though they touched. B. S. K.

Told by the Marquise.

THE room blazed with light; the air was heavy with perfume; the orchestra, behind its screen of flowers, softly droned the minor strains of a stately minuet.

"No, Jean, my friend," returned the Marquise sadly, "discretion is not, as you say, silence only. True discretion is renunciation of self—self-sacrifice in every emergency, no matter how terrible, that carries it even, always unsuspected, to the point of heroism. Listen. I've a story to tell you.

"You have heard people talk of him—Colonel Robert de Gedres; of his tall form, his handsome face, his indomitable bravery, and unswerving loyalty——"

"And between whom and yourself, if I mistake not, Marquise," Jean interrupted, "there was a talk of marriage till that unfortunate duel between his brother and your cousin Rocheverte created an impassable barrier between the families?"

Madame de Logerolles hesitated a minute, then shrugged her shoulders lightly.

"You know that, then?" she said. "Eh, bien, it does not matter. The story, I continue it. It was summer, near Rouen, where Robert de Gedres, then commandant of one of the regiments of the Garde, was in garrison, and when the better portion of the city's inhabitants, flying from the heat of the town, sought relief and freshness in the many superb villas and mansions abounding in the environs.

"One of the handsomest of these properties belonged to a household that I shall designate, for convenience of recital, M. and Madame de Lucenay. They were not Rouenais people or yet Parisians, only M. de Lucenay was a rabid sportsman, and the vicinity of Rouen, at that time gorged with game of every description, had seemed to him the place of all others to instal himself each year from July to November.

"If it pleased M. de Lucenay to run the woods with its keepers and dogs, and watch over its boars, rabbits, and goats, it did not give the same pleasure to the lady who bore his name. She cared but little for ragouts and solitude, an ennui shared by the better part of her neighbours, who, forced to depend upon each other for company, ended by becoming almost as one community. All day long, united in one or another of the many houses, they killed time together, and spent their evenings in precisely the same way in all the traditional amusements of the country.

"Towards dinner time the husbands arrived from Rouen, bringing with them always a number of guests, whose strongest contingent was drawn from the circle of Rouen officers, among whom the most brilliant and popular was incontestably Robert de Gedres.

"One evening, after a little impromptu ball where he, the Colonel, had danced a great deal with Madame de Lucenay, and she, after bidding her guests adieu, had returned to her chamber to prepare for bed, she was as astonished and startled both when the door brusquely opened and her husband hurriedly entered, clad in shooting garb and gaiters, and with a fowling piece swung over his shoulder.

"'Two wolves, my dear,' said he, 'two wolves just reported that all summer long have been eating up my lambs and goats, and for which I and Renard here have to-night laid and baited a trap. Sleep well; don't worry or look for me before morning. I'm late as it is, you know.'

"And with a hasty kiss upon his wife's brow and a call to the garde, arrayed like his master, and hat in hand awaiting his pleasure, the door banged to again, and M. de Lucenay, all haste and excitement, was off on his wolf hunt.

"The heat was stifling. Madame de Lucenay threw off her ball dress, slipped into a loose white gown, and passed to the balcony to look at the night and breathe the air awhile before going to bed. No breath of breeze, however, stirred the leaves, motionless and sad, and no sound rose from the plain and wood below but the dull, droning hum of nocturnal insects.

"Still heated and excited from the exertion of the evening and disinclined to sleep, it occurred to Madame de Lucenay presently that a walk in the garden, in the midst of the flowers and the clear light of the moon, would perhaps refresh and soothe her overstrained nerves.

Digitized by Google

"To reach the garden you traversed a broad conservatory opening directly into the salle-à-manger, itself separated from the salon by a wide arch draped with a heavy portière, and so arranged that when space demanded it, as on this evening, the three chambers could be thrown into one."

"Peste! What precision of detail! You know the house, then, Marquise?" Jean again interrupted with a slightly significant smile.

"Certainly," returned the Marquise, and resumed her story.

"Madame de Lucenay," said she, "opened the heavy iron-bound door of the greenhouse, and passed into the shadow of a broad alley of chestnut trees that led around the house and skirted the terrace in front of it.

"She had scarcely taken a dozen steps, however, when she stopped, trembling convulsively. A low, supplicating voice had called her name. She turned; Robert de Gedres stood before her.

"'You!' she cried stupefied, 'and at such an hour! What brings you here, then?'

"'To see you,' responded he passionately. 'Nay, do not cry out, Germaine; God is my witness that two hours ago I did not dream of doing what I am doing now. On leaving you I walked on at random through the country. Suddenly from a cross-path, I saw your husband passing in hunting garb and with his garde and dogs, and a mad idea seized me. I turned, came back, and climbed the wall of the garden, without knowing what I was doing, and for nothing in the world but to be near you one moment, to regard only the windows behind which you slept.

"'Then all at once, you yourself stood before me—you, the phantom of my shattered happiness; and you would bid me still be silent, still shut in the heart that beats only for you the secret that stifles it! I cannot! It is impossible! Speak I must, Germaine!'

"Madame de Lucenay, stupefied by Robert's appearance and his passionate avowal of a love that now, through circumstances beyond their control, it was a crime even to remember, much less to speak of, had, step by step, recoiled from him, till both of them stood inside the greenhouse door. Scarcely, too, had the words left his lips, when she feverishly seized his arm.

"'Hear, hear!' she said breathlessly, bending her ear to listen.

"Through the silence of the night the sand of the lower alley crunched under the firm, alert step of a man—a man walking leisurely, and whistling a hunting air.

"'My husband,' murmured she, in a strangled voice. 'Ah, madman that you are, Robert, you have ruined us both!'

"'No,' said he briefly. 'He will enter the salon steps. I still have time.'

"'Yes, yes, perhaps; but go—go quickly, I beseech you!' Madame de Lucenay returned wildly.

"And pushing him towards the still open conservatory door, she brusquely closed it upon him, and staggered back through the salle-à-manger. It was time. M. de Lucenay was entering the salon.

"Naturally, at the sight of his wife, all pale and trembling, too, he stopped astonished. She explained hastily as well as she could. She was so warm, and coming down for a little air, his step had startled her somewhat; nothing serious, it would soon pass.

"'But you, Armand—what means this speedy return?'

"'The fault of those cursed wolves,' said he; 'there was no drive at all; they were in the trap of their own accord when Renard and I arrived. We killed them at once, without a second shot even. But you were going for air, you say, dearest; come, take my arm. We'll go out together for a little while.'

"'Willingly——,' began his wife, then stopped short, and sank half swooning into a chair beside her.

"The moon, flashing suddenly from the clouds that covered it, had shown her plainly through the greenhouse door, an instant lighted up, the pale, anxious face of Robert de Gedres. One instant visible, the next moment lost in the night, as again the moon was veiled by the clouds.

"Behold what had happened.

"At the moment when Madame de Lucenay, terrified by the situation and the coming of her husband, pushed to the heavy, iron-bound door of the conservatory upon the Colonel, she had closed it so quickly and firmly that she had caught between it and the frame the index finger of M. de Gedres' right hand.

"At that moment M. de Lucenay entered the salon. In spite of his agony, Robert de Gedres had strength enough to restrain a cry, though suffering a torture that for a moment made it seem as if he must swoon outright. As soon as he could for the pain and faintness, he sought to extricate his hand and return as he had come.

"But, alas! a more cruel pang still warned him that he was not free to go; that the iron mountings of the door clung still by a strip of flesh to his broken finger and held him a prisoner.

"Again, at the same moment, the raised voice of M. de Lucenay, proposing to lead his wife to the garden, reached him through the glasses, and, by the dim light burning in the salon brackets, he saw him extend his arm and his wife rise to accept it.

"In one blinding flash all the consequences of his mad act were seared upon his brain, all the drama that was going to pass, the horrible scandal, the right to justice that the husband would demand for a fancied outrage; and this woman, this irreproachable wife, whom with all his soul he loved in spite of the barriers between them, would be ruined, scandalised, possibly killed through him, who would willingly have died to save her.

"To save her! Ah, a thought had struck him—he could, he would save her!

"Fumbling feverishly in his pocket he drew out his knife, opened it with his teeth, and with one swift, unhesitating cut, the crushed bone and flesh were through, and Robert de Gedres, the bleeding stump wrapped in his handkerchief, disappeared in the night.

"Next morning, at roll-call, instead of the Colonel, a messenger arrived from the doctor, bringing the intelligence that M. de Gedres had greviously wounded himself that morning cleaning his revolver, and had gone, by his orders, to recover from the accident, to his country seat of Loupe Solange."

* * * * * *

Madame de Logerolles stopped. Jean wiped his moist brow.

"Zounds, Marquise," cried he, drawing a long breath to relieve the tension of his feelings, "that's a creepy story of yours, but if, as you say, De Gedres was so discreet, how did you come to know so by the card all the peripatetics of this adventure?"

The Marquise stood up briskly and smilingly.

"Jean, my friend," said she, "the cotillon and my story both are ended. Profit by it; be discreet, ask no question; and, above all, in thy love affairs never let thy finger be caught by the door." Aubrey L'Orr.

Digitized by Google

When the Birds Begin to Sing

By Winifred Graham. Author of "Through the Valley," "Six First-Class Passengers," etc.

SUMMARY.

Philip Roche marries Eleanor Grebby, daughter of a farmer, and they spend their honeymoon on the Continent. On their return to Richmond, Eleanor becomes friendly with a frivolous widow, Mrs. Mounteagle, against her husband's wishes. She is introduced to Carol Quinton, who fascinates her. Her husband is heart-broken, and consults his cousin, Erminie Henderson, who comes to stay with them. Eleanor's parents come to spend a day or two with her, and disgust Mrs. Monteagle with their homeliness. Nelson Lane and Erminie are engaged. Each is led to think the other rich, but the deceit is mutual. In order to right themselves in one another's eyes, they each, unknown to the other, speculate in mining shares.

CHAPTER XI.

Slow and Sure Comes up the Golden Year.

Eleanor's face is seared with weeping.

For the last three days Philip has hardly spoken to her.

She has stayed indoors and avoided Giddy, but now a message comes from the widow commenting on her non-appearance.

She pulls forward a sheet of paper, bites the end of her quill, and cries great drops of tears on the blotting-book. In a straggling hand she addresses an envelope to Mrs. Mounteagle, placing therein that unlucky letter from Madame Faustine.

In as few words as possible she relates the scene on paper to her friend.

"I am disheartened, dispirited, disevery thinged," she writes in conclusion. "As Dick in 'The Light that Failed' says: 'I am down and done for—broken—let me alone!'"

"Poor little wretch!" thinks Giddy, reading the sorrowful epistle. "I must tell Carol. He shall see this forlorn-looking scrawl." She sighs at the thought of some people's folly. "No sooner met, but they looked," she quotes to herself, apropos of Eleanor and Mr. Quinton. "No sooner looked, but they loved; no sooner loved, but they sighed. Ah! me, it's very natural, very plain!"

* * * * *

Erminie and Nelson Lane are returning from their honeymoon. They sought flight from their sorrows, but carried the burden of uneasy consciences throughout the tour.

Erminie has written to Philip to inform him of their return, and beg him to let her know if there is any rise in the "Klerksdorp" shares.

"Sometimes," she writes vaguely, "I have hunted in the papers to see them quoted, but never hit upon them. My anxiety is terrible. I begin to fear Nelson suspects I have something on my mind. He, too, has fits of depression, probably caused by my ill-concealed uneasiness."

"What is Erminie writing about?" asks Eleanor timidly, seeing Philip reading her letter.

"Only a business matter," he replies shortly, collapsing into silence.

"Is she back from her honeymoon?"

"They arrive to-night. You might go and see her to-morrow, Eleanor, for me, and take an important letter. Drive straight to Earl's Court and back; you can keep the carriage waiting." He speaks severely.

Eleanor agrees.

"I should like it very much. I have been so dull the last few days." But their latest quarrel is still so recent that Philip takes no notice of the remark.

Yet they are scarcely more wretched than the devoted couple who arrive that same evening in Trebovir Road, Earl's Court.

Notices her pallor, and kisses her.

The following morning Erminie looks longingly for a letter from Philip, and her heart sinks heavily as she runs her eyes over her correspondence.

Nelson notices her pallor, and kisses her tenderly.

"The journey has tired you darling," he says. "You should have breakfasted in bed."

"Oh, no!" she cries with a strained smile. "I feel quite bright and frisky, thank you. But, Nelson dear, you look horribly knocked up."

Her husband pulls himself together. "It is only coming back to chilly England after the sunny South. I feel rather nipped, that's all."

He is thinking of the bitter task before him, for this is the day he has planned to return from the city a ruined man. He is going to his stockbroker to learn if any company has come to utter grief during his absence, in the success of which he will declare his whole fortune was at stake.

The lie grates on him, galls him, tortures him, though as yet it has not been uttered.

He feels like a criminal unworthy to look his fellows in the face—a traitor to his wife—a scoundrel, a hypocrite!

"Yes, I am all of these," he inwardly declares, "and more!" The sting of self-contempt is burning into his soul. He kisses Erminie hurriedly, and rushes confused and ashamed from the house, to reap the whirlwind of bitterly repented deceit.

Digitized by Google

Mrs. Lane scarcely perceives his strange demeanour. She thinks he is not very well, but her own mind being harassed by tormenting doubts, she lets him go without a murmur. It is well to be alive when the brain is burning with fiery suspense.

She dares not go out, for any moment a telegram may come from Philip deciding her fate.

She paces the room, with racking head and tingling nerves. Surely her sin is repaid a thousand times by the wretchedness of these waiting hours.

She searches the morning papers with trembling fingers, but finds nothing. Tears blind her eyes. The news must be bad, or Philip would have let her know.

"What demon possessed me?" she cries, wringing her hands. "What devil prompted me to that one false step—that base deceit?"

She shudders at the recollection of the gradually sloping path which led to the deep abyss.

The bell rings.

"A telegram!" she thinks hopefully.

The door opens. Mrs. Roche is announced.

"Mrs., not Mr.!" Again the misery of waiting floods her soul, for Eleanor knows nothing of the Klerksdorp Mine.

"Good-morning, dear," she falters. "It is kind of you to come and welcome me home."

Eleanor kisses her affectionately.

"Dearest Erminie," she sighs, "how happy you must be. I've thought of you so often since the wedding. I expect you had a lovely time."

"Oh, yes; but," looking at Eleanor's wistful little face, "are you in trouble dear?"

Mrs. Roche sinks upon the sofa, and gazes tragically into the fire.

"Yes. My home life is wretched. We don't get on at all, Philip and I."

There are tears in her voice as she speaks.

"And I will try to help you, dear."

"I suppose it is all my fault. I am fond of amusing myself, and once I deceived him in a little matter. He found me out, Erminie, and was furious. It has all been quite different since."

Erminie's sympathetic nature yearns to comfort her little friend. The word "deceived" awakes a fellow feeling. She forgets her own grievances, and gathering Eleanor in her arms, kisses away her rising tears.

"It is so nice to be petted again," sighs Mrs. Roche, holding Erminie's hands. "What a dear, soft thing you are. I wish I always had you to console me."

"I shall come and see Philip very soon, and try to make you friends again. I dare say he is sometimes a little hasty without meaning it."

"We were so happy when you and Mr. Lane stayed with us. But things began to go wrong directly you left. I believe you are my mascotte, Erminie. You see Philip is very jealous and suspicious, and there is a friend of mine whom he especially abhors."

"Then why allow him to be your friend?"

"Oh, because he is so nice, and I like him."

"Then don't," says Erminie decisively.

"But I can't help it. We cannot regulate these things. They are like the weather, utterly beyond our control. We have to put up with hatred or love. I sometimes wonder which is the worst evil. If a married woman is only to have her husband for her friend——"

"And lover," puts in Erminie, looking Eleanor straight in the eyes. "Ah!

Digitized by Google

child, I see the root now of all these dissensions. You could kill it, dig it out, cast it from you, with an effort of strong will. It is so easy to be weak—so splendid to be strong! I am not one to preach, for I have sunk low enough."

"You!" gasps Eleanor.

"Yes. I gave way to conceits and follies. I stooped to deceive, and I am suffering, and must suffer, in consequence. There, dear, don't sympathise; it makes me feel lumpy here," pressing her throat. "The least said the soonest mended."

"It seems as if no one could really be happy," says Eleanor dolefully.

"Oh, indeed they can, if they are good. Only the frail ones must endure the consequences of their errors. That is why I want you to draw up in time, not to let a passing fascination wreck the happiness of your home."

"You mean I ought never to see this man again," compressing her lips, and forcing back her tears.

"Not if he brings misery upon you and upon Philip."

"Why are the wicked people so much the pleasantest, the nice things wrong, the sweets indigestible, and the nasty uninteresting porridge wholesome? I have seen so much of the 'porridge' of life—the deadly respectable, the limited propriety. Erminie, I am afraid I was born bad. I am one of those natures that fall, and cannot help themselves. Bah!" rising and staring down at her friend with frightened, bloodshot eyes. "It is those poisoned arrows again—the air is full of them. Do you know what I mean by poisoned arrows? They are the sins that stick into you, and leave their venom before you can wrench them out. They get through the chinks of your armour, though you think you have buckled it on ever so safely. Once they have stabbed your flesh you are never the same again—always sick and uneasy, fretful, reckless, dissatisfied. I have not got one, but a thousand. Oh, Erminie, what am I saying?"

She sinks on the hearthrug, buries her face in her hands, and sobs.

"You are excited and overwrought," says Erminie, raising her gently.

"It does me good to speak out to you," cries Eleanor, like a weary child.

"And I will try to help you, dear. Together we will cure those ugly wounds—fight the temptations, and lay them low. Whenever you have these feelings, just come and tell them to me. It is not so black and impossible as your poor little brain imagines. You will be a far better woman for having been put to the test and tried. I know you can conquer the arrows of sin, and it will widen your character, strengthen your virtues; for though there are dark shadows on the earth, its lights are stronger in the contrast."

"I like to hear you talk so," says Eleanor, smiling through her tears. "It gives me confidence. I believe I shall go back and do better. I feel quite fortified when you put your arms round me so lovingly, and tell me to be good. Oh, Erminie, don't let me go to the bad! I am so young yet."

The pitiful ring of sincerity in Eleanor's voice touches Erminie more deeply at this point.

She holds her tighter to her heart, whispering words of encouragement.

"I shall have to go and see your husband this afternoon on business in the City, unless I get a telegram from him," says Erminie, when Eleanor is calmed and happier.

"Oh! I forgot, dear," feeling in her pocket. "I have a letter from him for you. That is really why I came. Only I was so miserable I forgot all about it."

Erminie's heart stops beating as she takes the envelope. For a moment she dares not open the longed-for missive. What if its news is ill?

The room swims round as she breaks the seal. Her hands are trembling, her teeth chatter.

The words dance up and down before her eager vision.

DEAREST ERMINIE,—Let me congratulate you. Your shares in the Klerksdorp Mine have gone to 30s. apiece. What do you say to that?

Yours relievedly,
PHIL.

Erminie makes a quick calculation, the letter falls from her hand with a cry of joy, she leaps to her feet, and skips around the room.

And skips around the room.

"What is the matter?" asks Eleanor wonderingly.

"Oh, nothing—nothing very much," she laughs exultantly. "Don't think me too horribly mercenary, but I've had such a stroke of luck it has nearly turned my brain. I put £2,000 in the Klerksdorp Estate Mining Company. I got 10,000 shares at four shillings each, and they have become worth £15,000."

"How lovely!" exclaims Mrs. Roche. "Oh, Erminie, I am so glad!"

"I can't believe it, I fear to wake and find it all a dream. You don't know what this money means to me, how I have prayed for it, longed for it, watched for it!"

"Really!"

Eleanor's tone of surprise brings Erminie back to her senses. They really are shattered for the moment with the joy of the shock.

"I ought not to have told you," she says.

"Why?"

"Because no one is to know, not even my husband."

"Don't you approve of speculations? Were you doing it under the rose?"

"Yes, that is it," laughs Erminie gaily. "I am so dreadfully goody-goody that I look on the Stock Exchange as a gambling den not to be encouraged. Now promise me, dear, on your word of honour, never to mention my Klerdsdorp spec. to Nelson."

"Of course I won't if you don't wish it, but the sight of your pleasure has put me in quite high spirits. I shall go on my way rejoicing."

Digitized by Google

"And no more tears, mind!" says Erminie. "Won't you lunch with me?"

"No, thanks, dear. The carriage is waiting, and I did not intend to stay so long."

"Come and see me very often, whenever you feel inclined for a little lecture and a little love. I shall always understand!"

As Eleanor drives away, Erminie rushes out and buys an armful of flowers to decorate the house for Nelson's return, sends an ecstatic wire of gratitude to Philip Roche, and gives the crossing-sweeper half-a-crown.

In the meanwhile, her husband is with his stockbroker, talking casually about shares, with the object of discovering a reason for his ruin.

"How have things been lately?" he asks vaguely "Any big venture gone smash since my absence?"

"No; everything has flown up like wildfire. Never knew such times. We have all been making our fortunes."

Nelson sighs.

"I wish I had."

"Take for instance," continued his broker, "the Golden Link Mine—look at that! Why, those shares——"

"Eh! What?" asks Nelson, sitting bolt upright, and staring at the man before him. "Did you say the Golden Link Mine?"

"Yes, those shares were bought by some people for 2s. 6d. Only think of it—half-a-crown apiece!"

He shrugs his shoulders at the recollection, but does not see the nervous excitement suddenly paralysing Nelson Lane.

"What are they now?" he asks, when he has breath enough to speak.

"Eh! What?" asks Nelson.

"Why, £5 a share! It is positively sickening. And I might have been in it!"

During moments of great excitement Nelson turns to stone. He cannot show his inward joy by the outward signs of other men. He has one of those peculiar natures that reserve the best things for their own appreciation, never flaunting them before the world.

His very soul surges with untold delight, his spirits leap within him, his head swims.

Then he rises from his chair, saying in his most ordinary tones:

"Really! That is good hearing. I shall have made £40,000."

* * * * * *

Erminie hears his light step in the hall.

"Darling, has the day seemed long?" he cries, clasping her to his heart.

His eyes are intensely bright, his lips smile.

Erminie laughs merrily.

"How well you look!" she says.

"I thought you would like to go out to-night, dearest," he replies, "so I bought a box at the Lyceum."

"How delightful of you! The same idea struck me, and I took two stalls for the Gaiety."

"Never mind, we'll do both, the first act of a heavy tragedy, and wind up with a chorus, and dancing, and jollity."

* * * * *

"Nelson will never know," thinks Erminie gratefully. "Oh, how much I have to be thankful for!"

As she prays on her knees that night her prayers are all thanksgiving for the good fortune that has been hers.

* * *

"Thank Heaven I can look my wife in the face and feel that she will never suspect, never know!" sighs Nelson, as he, too, murmurs a heartfelt prayer in the silence of his soul.

CHAPTER XII.

If we only knew! If we only knew!

Eleanor is not going out this afternoon, though the air is mild, the sun shines, and all the world smiles.

She has more than one call to return, which should have been done to-day, yet she sits alone in her pretty boudoir, neither reading, working, nor writing.

Her expression renders her face even more beautiful than usual in the subdued light. For a ray of winter sunshine, heralding the spring, has quite dazzled Eleanor's eyes, till she draws the blind, and settles in a cosy corner at the side of the fender.

In her hand is a letter, brief, yet to its owner teeming with news, so significant the simple wording seems.

"Why this silence? Stay at home to-day. I must see you."

It is neither commenced nor signed, but written in Carol Quinton's familiar hand.

Surely there is something imperative about that "Stay at home to-day." No "please," or "will you?". Merely the bare command. True the must is underlined, and the question savours of anxiety as to her reticence in writing or meeting him again.

Well, he shall come, since this is to be the end.

Better face the matter out; it is dangerous dodging poisoned arrows. She will try how her shield works, that is to glance them aside.

Determination is in her heart, and courage in her eye. Erminie's words still ring in her soul. "It is so easy to be weak, so splendid to be strong!" Eleanor is worked up into a fever of virtuous indignation at the remembrance of all she has allowed Quinton to do and say in the past. This is to be the turning point in her life. She will be loyal to her husband, and her first pure love, she will show him that she is capable of sacrifice, a woman to be trusted, looked up to, reverenced. Carol Quinton shall never enter her doors again after this call, never see her, hear from her, speak to her. She will fade from his life, as a shadow, a phantom! The sting of sorrow, the bitterness of thus casting a love she treasured to the wind, is subdued in a measure by a sense of exhilaration, at the thought of her good resolve.

Digitized by Google

Already "virtue's own reward" seems in her grasp, her heart is lighter, her spirit does not quail. She is tasting perhaps a shred of the martyr's joy, when they suffered in the cause of right, she is battling down that weaker nature and gaining a victory in advance.

She is impatient for the moment to arrive when Carol shall stand before her to learn his fate, his isolation, from her lips. No pity, no glimpse of feeling, no suspicion of sentiment is to creep into this day's farewell. He will leave her for ever with the ordinary hand-shake of a casual acquaintance. Yes, she is nerved, strong, sure!

It has taken Eleanor three nights of sleepless vigil to overcome her love and stamp it out. She has not reached this point without a struggle.

She listens eagerly for him to come, longing for the interview to commence and end, while a spirit of heroism is upon her, laying her lower nature in the dust.

"Down! you shall never rise again," she cries. "Oh! why is he so long? I want him now. I could do it now. After to-day I shall have swept the temptation from my path, and made it impossible for Carol Quinton to be my friend."

The bell rings—the outer bell. She staggers to her feet.

The brown chrysanthemum in her belt falls to the ground and lies unheeded.

How she trembles! Her face, too, is deadly pale, revealed in the mirror opposite. She sways like a flower blown in a gale. There is a prayer on her lips, an angel knocking at her heart.

The door opens, and Sarah enters with the tea-tray.

Eleanor sinks on the sofa, the reaction leaving her faint and powerless to speak.

She watches the tea-table brought forward, the hot scones placed by the fire.

At last she regains her composure.

"Who was that at the front door, Sarah?"

"Mr. Quinton, ma'am."

"Mr. Quinton! Why did you not show him in?".

Eleanor leans forward breathlessly, looking Sarah up and down.

The maid crimsons, and replies:

"If you please, it was master's orders. He told me to say 'not at home' when Mr. Quinton called."

A moment's pause, during which Mrs. Roche struggles with her self-control.

Then in a calm voice she says:

"Very well, Sarah; that is all."

She raises the teapot with an effort, pouring out the brown fluid jerkily.

As the door closes, she covers her face with her hands, rocking to and fro.

"He does not trust me," she cries fiercely, all that is evil kindling to life within her. "He slights and insults me, lowers me before my own servants. He dares to shut his doors against my will, to the man who is my friend. He treats me like a captive, a slave. Oh! Philip, you do not know what you have done to-day? You do not guess how much this want of faith may cost you.

"I was so strong, till you threw me back, so sure, till you treated me like this!"

Eleanor realises how the shock of Philip's order has been the death-blow to her good resolves. A sudden hatred of her husband leaps in to her heart and brain, choking her.

She feels like a hunted stag.

"A little confidence, a little love," she murmurs. "They are small things to ask at Philip's hands, yet he holds them from me in his cold reserve and suspicious dread."

Her eyes are dry and bright, her throat is parched, her forehead burns.

What will Carol think? Carol will be sorry, but not angry, Carol is always kind, considerate, forgiving. The dangerous fascination of imagination steals over her. Carol is at her side in a waking dream, but the scene is very different to the one she had contemplated. She fancies he is kneeling as once before by the same sofa, murmuring again those wild, impassioned words. She bends to grasp his hands and raise him from the grovelling adoration to her own level. They are just a man and woman—soul to soul, clay; ah! yes, of the earth earthly.

She breaks into a low laugh which ripples round the room, and seems to die away in something like a sob.

What is this rising tumult in her heart?

She cannot analyse her mood, it seems as if a certain knowledge has broken in like a flood of light upon her dim reason.

"Who can prevent me loving him, who can hold me back if I will it, if I choose?"

The door re-opens. Sarah enters with one of Mrs. Mounteagle's little scented notes upon a salver.

DEAREST ELEANOR,—If you are in, just toddle round to tea like a darling. I have some delicious toasted buns, and I want you to come and eat them. Don't put on gloves.

Your all impatient,
GIDDY.

It is intolerable sitting in alone, fuming over her wrongs and acting a drama with her imagination. Philip detests Giddy. She will pay him out and go.

Digitized by Google

Glad of anything to divert the current of her thoughts, she snatches up a small fur cap in the hall, which rests becomingly on Eleanor's wealth of waving hair. Flinging a long red cloak around her, she slips out of the house, and rings at the widow's door.

"I hope she is alone. I don't feel in the mood to compass Bertie's inane conversation," thinks Mrs. Roche as the flaxen maid shows her in.

The twilight has gathered, but there is no lamp, as Giddy rustles forward in a lavender tea-gown to greet Eleanor.

"You are a very bad child," she says, holding up her finger, "but we've found you out, and shown you up most shockingly. What right have you to break hearts, as if they were only bric-à-brac, and say 'Not at home' when you were probably gourmandising over that huge Buzzard cake we ordered in town?"

Eleanor cannot speak, for Carol Quinton rises, and looks reproachfully into her eyes. She feels like a hunted stag, and yet she is glad—relieved.

"There! now you are in a hole," continues Giddy, laughing, "with no time to invent a plausible excuse. But come and sit down and ask forgiveness. I dare say Carol will get over it."

As yet Eleanor has not spoken. She walks like one in a trance to the quaint old chair.

Mrs. Mounteagle draws forward. She sits down mechanically and gazes at the colours in the carpet, just as she did once before at the Butterflies' Club.

"What a poor little world it is!" she thinks; "just like a muddy, narrow lane, through which its puppets drive or run, with the dirt thrown up in their faces at every turn."

"Come! do not look so glum over it," coos Giddy, removing Eleanor's cloak. "Carol knows as well as I do what a row you have been in, and how rusty Mr. Roche has turned. We are both most terribly sorry for you. I am sure I don't know how you stand him. It does so remind me of my late husband, from whom I was separated by mutual agreement two years before his death. Our quarrels began much in the same way.

"I preferred a will of my own, and meant to have it. He would have treated me like the chickens cooped up in the yard—a useful addition to his table, only their part was the most enviable. I should not have minded being cooked and roasted, for there my sorrows would have ceased."

"Death must be very pleasant," says Eleanor slowly, her head turning lightly to the alluring charms of suicide.

"No doubt, when you are old and ugly. But at present life is what you have got to consider, my dear."

"Life and buttered buns," replies Eleanor drily, as Mrs. Mounteagle hands the dish. "No, thank you, Giddy. I don't want any tea."

Her voice trembles with agitation, as Carol, who has never taken his eyes off her, draws a little nearer.

"If you won't eat anything, dear," murmurs Giddy, "at least you must drink something just to settle your nerves. Suction is so much more romantic than mastication."

But Eleanor shakes her head.

"I am going to play peacemaker," declares Mrs. Mounteagle, "and leave you two to make it up. I have an important letter to write, which must catch the half-past five post. You owe Carol an apology, and that is always difficult in the presence of a third party."

Eleanor is about to demur, when she catches Mr. Quinton's expression, and his look withers the words on her tongue, and forces them back.

She only stammers: "Don't be long," and collapses into silence.

Giddy's important letter is addressed to the Fur Store. She orders the muff.

* * * * * * *

If things have been going badly at "Lyndhurst" before the day on which Philip makes his fatal error, they do not bear comparison with the bad times that follow.

Even Erminie's sweet influence cannot bring peace to the ill-conditioned home. True she does her best, coming frequently, and spending long days in Eleanor's society. But though Mrs. Roche entertains her charmingly, she refuses to discuss Philip, and flees from good advice with the clever tact that can conceal rudeness and yet repel in a breath.

Philip turns away and wipes his brow.

"I don't know why," says Philip one day, in confidence to Erminie, "but though I do all in my power to win back my wife's love, it seems I have lost it for ever."

Erminie knows the reason, and so does he, only he dares not own it.

"She has tried me a good deal at times," he continues, "yet I love her just as madly, and that is what makes me seem to her fiendishly cruel occasionally, when the spirit of jealousy robs me of reason. I can't bear it, Erminie, to see her restless and dissatisfied in my presence, to feel her shudder from my kiss. An insurmountable barrier is rising between us. Can you guess what it is?"

"Yes."

Erminie's answer startles Philip.

"Then you, too, have noticed—all the world sees it? That man who is trying to steal my wife from me is the curse, the foul fiend, the shadow, the shame. I met him in the City only yesterday. He tried to bow, but I looked him in the face and cut him dead. He paled and shrank away."

"Then, perhaps," suggests Erminie hopefully, "Eleanor has broken with him?"

"Not so long as she is in Giddy Mounteagle's clutches. For a while I let my business alone, I stayed at home day after day to guard and watch her. She divined

Digitized by Google

the reason, and chafed against her cage, like a bird bereft of song, whose wings are cut. Things went badly for me on the Stock Exchange; I found I was losing hundreds, thousands, through my absence. Finally I returned, and Eleanor's face grew brighter—she had seen him again!"

"How do you know?"

"Don't ask me."

Philip turns away and wipes his brow. Erminie's true heart bleeds for him as she thinks of the perfect sympathy and confidence reigning between herself and Nelson.

"Your cloud may lift in time," she says, somewhat lamely seeking to console him.

"It may deepen," he answers lugubriously.

"Supposing you were able to persuade Eleanor to go home for a visit; it would be pleasant at Copthorne now the spring has come. Her parents are good, honest people, the country life a healthy one. It might strengthen her in body and mind, awaking memories of youth and innocence, your courtship, her marriage! There is no tonic for a diseased mind like fresh air and green fields. She said she longed to see the dear old farm again only yesterday. It would put her beyond the reach of Giddy Mounteagle, and you might run up and down several times in the week."

"I will suggest it," says Philip.

The idea delights Mrs. Roche beyond measure when later on her husband mentions it. She has frequently met Carol Quinton of late, and the ardour of his passion, and her own over-powering love, have frightened her at last.

The thought of escaping to the country to seek forgetfulness and avoid temptation appeals to her.

She puts her arms softly and half timidly round Philip's neck, resting her cheek against his, as she has not done for weeks.

He snatches her to his heart with a cry, smothering her face in kisses. "Eleanor, can't we be better friends?" he whispers.

The tears course down her cheeks, the guilty love she is trying to crush rises before her—jeering, taunting.

"I will try, Philip," she falters. "Only let me go home for a while, and see the old scenes, the familiar faces."

He still holds her to him, his pulses thrilling at her softened tone, as he answers: "Yes."

"I am really going back to the farm, Giddy," she says the following day, "to vegetate, and grow young again among the primroses and violets. The lawn will be yellow with crocus flowers, and I can almost smell the hyacinths. I promised them faithfully I would return, when the birds began to sing!"

"Can't we be better friends?"

"You must give me your address," says Giddy. "I should like to write."

Eleanor looks at her shrewdly.

She has never quite forgotten the "Lady MacDonald" or "the party" episode. It is the recollection of this that makes her state, with a certain pride, the pleasure she feels in visiting her people.

"I will give it you on one condition," she replies.

"And that?"

"Promise me faithfully on no account to pass it on to Carol Quinton."

"Why not?"

"Because I have gone too far, Giddy. I want to get away from his influence. You know he dogs my footsteps, tracks, and haunts me. I dare not trust myself. I am going away for a course of discipline, simple living, and country pursuits. I know if you promise, I can trust you."

She holds out a paper on which her address is written, but keeps her palm over the letter till Giddy shall make the promise.

"I swear," says Mrs. Mounteagle.

(To be continued.)

SIXPENCE] MELODY. [MONTHLY.

THE NEW MUSICAL MAGAZINE.

THE CONTENTS OF No. I. INCLUDE:

A New Song. By Chas. Gounod. (Posthumous Work.)

Berceuse de Jocelyn. (For Violin and Piano.) By Benjamin Godard.

New Patriotic Song. By J. M. Coward. Words by Clement Scott.

New Waltz, "Spirit of the Stars." By May Ostlere.

Also Compositions from Tito Mattei, A. G. Crowe, A J. Caldicott, Gabriel Faure, e.c., etc.

Literary Contributions by Mr. R. S. Hichens and Mr. Joseph Bennett.

56 PAGES.] No. 1 NOW ON SALE. [6D. NETT.

Digitized by Google

A BITTER REVENGE.

Peradventure I was wrong. Wiser men than I have gone astray over a subject far less intricate than a woman. Maybe it was a pang of jealousy that shot through my already wavering heart and turned the admiration I had hitherto held for her into curiosity not unmixed with hatred. And that jealousy was not without good and sufficient basis.

From the time that she joined our company Ira Cleon was the idol of both men and women. All the men worshipped her, and all the women admired her.

I say all the men, but it was not so. There was one who prided himself on his ability to read the woman off on sight; who discovered, or imagined he discovered, traits in her character that were hidden from the rude gaze of the world; who more than once, by the careful wielding of the power he possessed, succeeded in bringing forcibly before the unhappy woman her inmost thoughts and wishes, laying them bare in the air which surrounded her. I was that person.

Ira Cleon appeared amongst us when The Feud was about to be produced for the first time at Norman's Theatre. She came as leading lady. Our manager had picked her up in America, but she was not an American. She spoke several languages, but no one knew her history.

She was very beautiful, and I cannot do justice to a description of her. Yet with my blunt pen and dull wit I will make the attempt.

Her eyes were large, blue, and overhung with long, silky lashes; her soft cheeks were tinged with the rosiest red; the full, rich lips, the pearly teeth, the short curly hair, the white dimpled arms, the form of suppleness and grace—combine the whole with a strange union of masculine force and womanly sweetness, and you may be able to catch a glimpse of our lady through the misty and all too clumsy veil of prosaicness that I in my incapacity have drawn around her beauty.

Thus, in such a form she is as near perfection as mortal woman could hope to be.

But listen to her talking, watch her stride, note the vile cigarette between those dainty lips, and hear in amazement the coarse jests that emanate from the small clouds of smoke that rise around her curly head.

Then you will, perhaps, get an insight into the character of this fair lady.

She rises from the box on which she has been sitting—carelessly, legs crossed—and strides over to the manager anxiously scanning a roll of manuscript. She claps him on the back with a loud "Ha! Ha!" that makes him start. It amuses her, but the reprimand that is on his lips is dispelled in a moment, for he knows full well she can give him back all that he is worth.

Again, she passes on to an actor, a pale-faced, black haired youth, madly in love with her, whose obsequious courtesies she repudiates with scorn. Sometimes, however, she smilingly encourages him, raising his hopes to ecstatic bliss, then, out of mere wantonness and pleasure at seeing him suffer, dashes him down to grovel at her feet, by an expression of displeasure, or the shadow of a frown.

She is in a playful mood to-night, and the sickly boy rejoices at her winning smiles, hoping against hope they are meant for him, and him alone.

"Ah, poor Turmole!" she cried nonchalantly, flinging aside the stump of her cigarette, and preparing a fresh weed. "You seem in good spirits to-night. Not quite so confoundedly groggy." And she laughs gaily as the gas jet, at which she obtains a light, radiates on the cruel, lovely face.

"'Tis but natural," comes the reply, with a dramatic flourish of the thin, white hand, "that I should feel the glamour of your presence, even as the world looks bright and cheerful beneath the warm and fruitful rays of King Sol."

"Then it's comforting to know I have a different effect upon you to what the moon has," she replies with a slight dash of sarcasm, moving towards her next victim.

"Oh, pray, you misunderstand me," gasped the love-sick one, stretching out his hands supplicatingly after her in vain. He sinks back dejected, miserable, realising in its intensity the bitter fact that this woman he adores despises him.

And so she passes from one to another, treating them in much the same way, knowing all the time what pain and anguish she is causing the love-sick fools, and revelling in her heartlessness.

She loved her profession; her whole heart was on the boards. She may have been good at the bottom; sometimes I almost fancy she was, and that I was too harsh in criticising her little excesses. More than once she told me I had no right to do so as a fellow actor.

"Let Society be my judge," were her words; and Society went mad over her, though beyond its kindly criticisms she cared nothing for Society.

She always assumed male rôles and few were able to bring out so fully and powerfully the features that characterise the stage hero.

Digitized by Google

There came a time, some months after she appeared amongst us, when the piece, which had met with a most successful run, was to be supplanted by another of an equally thrilling nature, the cast of which meant the addition of another member to the company.

This person took the form of a man named Ralph Masser, a tall, splendidly built fellow, with a forcible and determined cast of countenance.

I shall never forget the night of the first rehearsal. How we all watched every movement of that lithe and muscular body, listened to the sound of that rich, deep voice, and applauded with genuine admiration as he stepped to the back of the stage at the conclusion.

I was near Ira as he finished, and she just clasped her hands in rapture, while a soft "bravo!" escaped her lips. Somehow or other I could not keep my eyes off her face, and I noticed that as she caught sight of him when he turned towards us a deathly pallor overspread the features, while a gasp of amazement and terror issued from the white lips. It was soon over. But I am an observant man, and my suspicions were aroused. She must have known him before.

On one occasion I told her so. But she strenuously denied it. Then I became so positive that she admitted the truth of my assertion.

It so happened that Ira and the newcomer shared the honours of the celebrated duel scene in the new play. And she never acted so well as when with him, treating him with marked familiarity.

I watched them narrowly. No one else did; no one else had any reason for doing so. I had. True, every male actor in our company was madly jealous, but, after a time, resigned himself to fate, and gave up all hope of ever winning that love so palpably offered to another.

If tender actions may be taken as a sign of tender feelings in these matters, little doubt could be entertained as to whether or not the two loved.

He was ever by her side, whispering soft words to her willing ears, driving her to and from the theatre, championing her cause in her absence. She, too, laughed less often when he was near, never gave way to coarse jokes, accepted the little favours from him that she had refused of others, and flushed slightly at his approach. These signs all came under my notice, and I had many opportunities of observing them.

Still, there seemed to me to be an occult something existing between them. They had reached a point in their love beyond which it appeared impossible to extend.

Once, at a morning rehearsal, I chanced to stumble unobserved into the green-room. There they sat, together, on a lounge, her head resting on his shoulder. She was speaking, and as I turned to go, the words:

"My love, my only love!" fell upon my startled ears.

Then, as days went by, her smile came less often, and the eyes became encircled with dark rings, her step was less sprightly than of old, while sometimes she became dazed and bewildered, losing all control of her movements and the thread of her discourse.

The manager saw and noted all these developments for the worse in her disposition, and said that she studied too hard. No one could in common fairness gainsay that. She had worked hard ever since we had known her, and certainly a change would do her good.

Rather than lose permanently so valuable a member of his company, he decided to finish up the run and send her off to America for a time with Masser. To this both agreed.

On the last night I was standing in the wings, awaiting my cue, when I heard them approaching. She was staggering slightly, with pale face and quivering body. He was supporting her. Some strange incident had taken place between them, of that I felt certain. When they got quite close to me she was better, though very white.

Ira went on first, and I had never seen her look more beautiful. The house fairly shook with rolls of applause, which burst out afresh as he entered from the opposite side.

With a small peaked cap set jauntily on the mass of golden curls, a light blue cloak hanging caressingly over her shoulders, and her shapely limbs encased in a pair of white breeches and top boots, our leading lady represented to perfection a champion of the age of chivalry.

By her side hung a small sword—a mere plaything—bright, glistening, and harmless. This she drew at the conclusion of a blusteringly delivered speech, and swung round her head, crying to the ruffian who stood before her:

"Defend yourself!"

With a well-practised, swift movement, his rapier leapt from its sheath, and steel clashed with steel.

How the people applauded! They were splendidly matched, these two, his six feet scarcely lifting him above her plume-covered cap.

At last, as in all such battles, the hero, by a dextrous movement, sent his opponent's sword springing across the greensward.

"Enough!" she cried, holding her weapon aloft, then flinging it away with a gesture of contempt.

She approached him, and, as a hundred times before she had done, would have clasped his hand. But at that point she hesitated. A thrill seemed to pass over the delicate frame. The whole theatre was hushed in silence. A white hand was ungloved and thrust beneath the light blue cloak. Another second, and Masser lay unconscious on the stage, while a thin, blue smoke curled unnoticed up and up till it vanished in air.

* * * * *

Masser was not mortally wounded; he recovered from the effects of his wound, and left the country before Ira came back to health and strength.

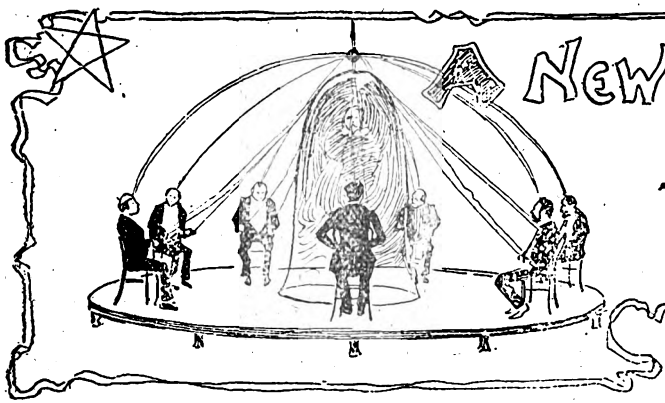
It was all explained a few months afterwards.

She was a Corsican, and had sworn to avenge her brother's death. Such was the issue in the battle between love and duty.

Masser had known her motive all the time; had known that she would attempt his life, sooner or later. And the strangest part of the whole thing was his connivance at it.

F. J. L.

Digitized by Google



New Theosophy.

The Recent Startling Manifestations of the Pentagram Club.

I have frequently had occasion to visit a certain new and commodious building in Market Street, many of the chambers of which are yet untenanted, and as my business took me to a somewhat remote quarter of the building, I had sometimes, when the lift was not running, to pass along not a few of the lengthy corridors on my way to my destination. There was one door which always piqued my curiosity as I passed it. Instead of having the name and business of the tenant emblazoned on the panelling as is usually the custom, this particular door had upon it nothing but a plain, silver star.

I do not know why it should have been so, but my curiosity was nettled. What did it matter to me, I asked myself, who composed any of the many clubs, social, political, or otherwise, with which the city abounds? Perhaps the star upon the door had something to do with it, for it had not escaped my attention that this star was of the five-pointed variety; it was, in short, neither more nor less than the mystic pentagram, which has, from the earliest times, been associated with all that is esoteric and occult. Be this as it may, I mentally resolved to fathom the mystery, if mystery there was, for there was nothing to indicate anything of the kind as yet, and accordingly I went systematically about it.

Face to face with a well-known member of the Union Club.

I had, as I have said, never seen anyone going in or out of the apartments in question. But my business in the building had always called for my presence in the daytime, or early evening—never at night. The logical inference to be drawn from this was, that I should be more likely to get the desired information by being in the neighbourhood of the apartments in question at night.

I accordingly put this idea into practice, and for several nights—three, as a matter of fact—I arrived at the main entrance of the building about eight o'clock, ascended to the fourth floor, and sauntered leisurely about the deserted corridor, always, however, keeping in mind the object I had in view.

On the third night I got tired of my unfruitful vigil. I looked at my watch—it was a quarter past eleven—and then walked briskly down the corridor towards the main staircase. I had hardly reached it when I heard footsteps on the stairs, and, as I reached them, found myself face to face with a well-known member of the Union Club, in evening dress and overcoat, smoking a cigar. The light from the street was strong enough for me to recognise objects which would have been too obscure for recognition had not my eyes been rendered supersensitive by their long watch in the darkness.

As it was, the gentleman in question did not recognise me, or if he did, made no sign of recognition, though our acquaintanceship was one of no recent date. I felt, however, that explanations were not in order at the moment, and though I could not help connecting his presence with the club-rooms that had grown so mysterious in my eyes, I recollected the old adage, noblesse oblige and with a feeling somewhat more akin to shame than I had yet experienced in my self-instituted investigations, passed hurriedly on and descended the stairs.

Before I had reached the second storey I met another clubman—a well-known broker and member of the Ocean Club—dressed in evening costume, like the other, swinging his stick jauntily, and humming an operatic air as he tripped lightly up. He, too, took no notice of my presence, if indeed he saw me.

By this time I had come to the conclusion: First, that the apartments I had been regarding with so much mystery and suspicion were certainly the meeting-rooms of a club; secondly, that this club had been organised by a select coterie of well-to-do and reputable gentlemen for purposes of their own enjoyment; and, thirdly, that I had been wasting my time in a wild-goose chase towards the mystic and the occult, and had found instead a resort of a few gentlemen of leisure and fashion, who had no doubt selected these quarters as a quiet retreat from the conventionality and boredom with which they were afflicted at the more open and populous clubs.

Digitized by Google

In less than a minute I had reached the entrance, and was standing there looking and waiting for my particular 'bus, when another gentleman came along, and turned into the doorway. He, too, was well-known to me as one of the deepest thinkers and most laborious workers in his own special department of science that this portion of the world, or, for that matter, the world generally, boasts. Should I connect him, too, with an association arranged for mere purposes of relaxation and pleasure, such as I could well imagine the two gentlemen who had preceded him would have been in their element in? But then—dulce est desipere in loco—and, perhaps, who knows, Professor P—— was no exception to the time-honoured rule.

But this was not yet the termination of my ponderings. During the next four or five minutes in which I waited for one of those late 'buses, which give the amplest possible latitude to the laggard, three more gentlemen brushed past me, each by himself; one, a lawyer of unquestioned abilities, but somewhat questionable reputation; another, a divine whose reputation is as unquestioned as his attainments are varied and profound; and a third, who was unknown to me, but whose cultured face, thoughtful expression, and dignified bearing, at once convinced me that he was no common man, whatever the department of life he had selected or filled.

"And now I will tell you something about our aims and objects."

Scarcely ten seconds after the last arrival had passed in, who, of course, I could not help associating with those who had preceded him, as the hour precluded the idea of anyone having any special business of his own in the almost untenanted and deserted building, and the closeness of the arrivals arguing evident design, I caught sight of my friend, Dr. W——, who also turned in at the entrance. After we had shaken hands cordially, I made the remark:

"Doctor, do you belong to that club upstairs?"

"What club?" he asked, taken aback, as I could see, by the directness of the question.

"Why, that club containing such men as——" here I mentioned the names of the gentlemen who had passed by me on my way down the stairs and while I was standing at the door.

"Ah! then you know something about our club?" returned the Doctor musingly; "I should hardly have thought it possible, we are so recently organised, and—well, yes—our proceedings are kept so strictly private."

"On the contrary, I know nothing about it," I replied: "I merely conjectured from some circumstances that have come under my notice, and from the half-a-dozen gentlemen who have just gone upstairs, that there was a club in those rooms with the star on the door, and I thought I would ask you about it. Pardon me if I am too inquisitive. It is a matter of principle with me, as you know, to get as much information as I can about everything that is going on."

"Well," said the Doctor thoughtfully, "come to my office to-morrow, and I think I can tell you something that will make you open your eyes. And now you must excuse me, as I am already late," and he hastened upstairs after the others.

On my way home I kept wondering what sort of a club that could be which contained such seemingly heterogeneous elements as those I have described. What could such men as I had seen, supposing them to be fair samples of the general composition of the society, have in common? It was anomalous to say the least, and the following afternoon found me at Dr. W.'s office, at an hour when I knew he was at leisure, eager for an explanation.

"Yes," assented the Doctor, after we were seated, and I had referred to the anomaly which struck me as curious, "it does seem somewhat strange that men so different in tastes and aspirations should come together for any purpose whatever. And now I will tell you something about our aims and objects. Mind," he went on, somewhat more impressively than was his usual custom when speaking to me, "you may consider yourself specially favoured by the disclosures I am going to make, as we had not quite made up our minds that the time had come to make the matter public—for public, of course, it will now be made."

"Not necessarily," I remarked; "that is a matter that must be left entirely to yourself."

"Well, we eventually decided that it would be best to publish to the world a statement of fact, suppressing, however, for the present, all names. You know what the public is. It is always ready to set down anyone who sees or acts beyond its comprehension, or above its plane, as a fool or lunatic. We cannot change, and do not care to face, for the present, its adverse criticism."

I cordially agreed, and the Doctor went on:

"Our society, or club—we call it 'The Pentagram

Digitized by Google

Club,' perhaps you noticed the symbol on the door—originated about a month ago, and in a somewhat peculiar manner. Somewhat before that time a gentleman arrived from Vienna, whose name, famous as it is in the scientific world—you know it well, and, for all I know, may know himself—at once made him the recipient of marked attention from our leading people. He was, of course, introduced at all of our principal clubs, and speedily became the centre of a coterie of such of their members as pretended to anything in the shape of scientific tastes.

"It soon transpired that Professor C——, while the department of science in which he has attained pre-eminent distinction is of an eminently practical nature, was, nevertheless, a deep and enthusiastic student of that esoteric branch of science which has been termed theosophy. Many of our club men became interested in the subject through the masterly and graphic way in which the Professor treated it, and many were the discussions and conversations held by the little knot of interested listeners in private rooms, representing almost every walk in life, I myself being no infrequent attendant.

"One afternoon, about a month ago—the sixteenth or seventeenth of May, I think it was—one of these little knots was gathered round Professor C——'s chair in one of the rooms of the Union Club, two of them—Professor P—— and the Rev. Mr. M——, whom you saw yesterday night ascending the stairs leading to our club-rooms—attracted by an earnest desire for information upon the subject-matter discussed; to others—Judge S—— and myself—attracted, I think, rather by the intellectual gratification afforded by listening to a flow of eloquent language and polished diction, no matter what the topic may be; and two others—the broker and the club man whom you say you met first upon the stairs—having strolled in and joined the group, perhaps to kill time, perhaps out of mere curiosity, for they themselves would be the last to lay claim to any special intellectual or scientific aspirations.

"Professor C—— had been expatiating upon the differences between ancient and modern theosophy, a subject on which, I assure you, I am yet woefully ignorant, and for which, to tell the truth, I have not much predilection, when he suddenly broke off from the thread of his discourse, which had really been addressed to the representative of science and theology, in the persons of Professor P—— and the Rev. Mr. M——, the other four of us having drifted in, and become members of the group from motives I have already suggested, and addressed us all collectively:

"'Gentlemen,' he said, as near as I can recall his language, the manner of which was particularly grave and impressive, 'I am about to make what may seem a peculiar, not to say startling, proposition. I am led to believe from some facts I have noted, and experiments I have made within the last day or two, that I am on the eve of making the most important discovery in regard to the true relations existing between what we are pleased to call, in default of a better term, the spiritual and the material world, a discovery which, if it results, as I doubt not it will, in success, will set speculation at rest for ever regarding these relations, and supply the key that will unlock all the secrets of the unknown. Gentlemen, will you assist me in making a great, a grand experiment, and share with me the honour of a discovery which will make your names illustrious and honoured for all time?'

"None of us could fail to be impressed by the earnestness, sincerity, and dignity of Professor C——'s language, but neither did any of us, as I could see, realise what was required of us, a point which the Professor was not slow to appreciate, and he proceeded:

"'What I have to propose, practically, gentlemen, is this: We, now sitting here, number seven persons in all; we symbolise the mystic number seven. Nay, we do more. I think I am not mistaken in saying—for I have had the pleasure of being introduced to you all—that we symbolise in our several persons, the seven polite professions, and the seven different sorts and conditions of men, intellectually, socially, and—pardon me for speaking the truth—morally. On either hand of me'—here the Professor bowed courteously to Professor P——, and the Rev. Mr. M——, 'sit science and religion. In the front of me'—with a gracious inclination to Judge S—— and myself—'sit law and medicine. I also notice, with pleasure'—here the Professor smiled pleasantly in the direction of Mr. B——, the broker, and Mr. G——, the club man—'that my friends, law and medicine, are ably supported by my other friends, business and leisure.

"'Myself I shall modestly designate labour, as upon me will devolve the work of giving the theoretical principle of my experiment a practical shape, and I can assure you it will entail no little labour to do so. I shall, possibly, never be fortunate enough to chance upon the same combination again. I think I can say, with perfect truth, that we combine within ourselves all the elements and conditions necessary for success. The next question is, will you accord me your assistance? Briefly, what I propose is this: First, that we constitute ourselves into a Theosophical Society—call it a club if you will. Secondly, that we secure an apartment which will insure us privacy. Thirdly, that you spare me an hour or two of your time once a week. I will engage on my part, not to overtax your forbearance, and I think, nay, I feel assured that you will be richly repaid for your time and trouble. I shall be pleased to hear how my proposal strikes each one of you individually.'

"Again there was an awkward pause, and for a moment or two nobody spoke. Mr. B——, the broker, was the first to break the silence. Bowing to Professor C——, he said:

"'The proposition, gentlemen, strikes me as being an eminently fair one, and we should certainly lack in politeness to our guest if we failed to accede to it. As for the end aimed at, I am incompetent to speak. I do not know much about science in any of its branches, particularly the branch the Professor has been discussing. I shall, however, be happy to do my part, so far as in me lies, in the matter of attendance, providing that does not much exceed, as the Professor intimated, an hour or two once a week, and so far as money is concerned, I shall guarantee that the Professor's experiments shall not suffer for lack of that.'

"This speech, brief and to the point, was greeted with applause.

"Mr. G——, of the Union Club, next signified his adherence to the plan, reiterating in a degree the sentiments of Mr. B——. Judge S—— was the next to fall into line. Professor P—— and myself stated frankly that we were not deterred by any scruples but that of expense. We said we did not care to go blindly into any scheme without having some idea of what cost it would entail, while the Rev. Mr. M—— demurred to becoming a member of a theosophical society on the ground that it was unbefitting a minister of the gospel.

"'Being a man, however, of liberal ideas, he was eventually won over by the arguments of Professor C——, while as regards the prudential objections of Professor P—— and myself, it was shown that the necessary expense of renting and furnishing a club-room suitable for the purpose was insignificant, while with regard to whatever else was necessary in the way of apparatus, etc., Professor C—— said that as he alone knew what was necessary, he alone must be responsible for providing it. He also stated that four weekly meetings extending over one month would be sufficient to give his theory a fair test.

Digitized by Google

"Messrs. B—— and G—— were then unanimously elected a committee of ways and means, and these gentlemen are responsible for the elegant club-rooms, which our society enjoys, and to which, by the way, I am empowered to extend you an invitation by Professor C—— and the other members, for next Thursday evening at eleven o'clock, when you can judge for yourself of the aim and scope of our undertaking."

"And have the results you have achieved," I asked, after expressing my thanks and hearty acceptance of the invitation, "answered your expectations?"

"Yes and no," returned Dr. W—— sententiously; "in the first place, the society has as yet held only three formal meetings, which have been devoted to listening to very delightful addresses from Professor C—— upon such topics as 'Intercourse with the Superior Intelligences,' 'The Higher Life,' and so on; these discourses being followed by an exercise, or species of training, in what the Professor calls 'the art of concentration.' Most of them were inclined to smile, and some of us did laugh heartily upon the first occasion, at the peculiar apparatus which forms a part of this exercise, but the simple and sincere earnestness of the Professor, his logical explanation of the meaning of what we were called upon to do, and his immovable confidence in the efficacy of his methods to bring about what he aims at, namely, a real and tangible communication with the 'higher intelligences,' as he terms them, were sufficient to repress any disposition on the part of any of our number towards unbecoming levity.

"How it will all end, or anything will come of our meetings and exercises in the way the Professor hopes, I, for my part, more than doubt. To tell the truth, I am no believer in these new-fangled metaphysical theories at all, and were it not that we are in honour bound to give our guest all the assistance and countenance we can, for at least one month, most of us, I think, would have politely withdrawn from the society.

"At the next meeting, however, we are led to expect great developments. A certain appliance, we are told, which had to be specially constructed for the purpose, and which has been, since the formation of the society in process of manufacture, will be completed and put in place upon the occasion. You will then be able to see and judge for yourself of the whole business. Till then, good-bye. I see I have an appointment with a patient."

During the next week I had occasion, as usual, to pass frequently by the rooms of the Pentagram Club. In the early part of the week I noticed an unusual bustle in the corridor where these rooms were. Large packing-cases were lying about, one of which, indeed, was so large that a door had to be taken off its hinges, and the jambs and part of the partition wall removed, before it could be introduced into the apartments. The glimpse of the interior which I gained through this opening convinced me that theosophy need not necessarily be allied to asceticism, at any rate, when members of the sect happen to be capitalists or brokers.

Several minutes before eleven, on the following Thursday night, found me before the door bearing the mystic star, as I was determined that nothing should suffer through my tardiness. It had not occurred to me to make my presence known by knocking, as I heard no signs of life inside, and was not prepared for the remark of my friend, Dr.——, who was the first to arrive.

Before the door bearing the mystic star.

"Why didn't you knock?" he asked. "Professor C—— is inside, and you are expected. But come in, and I will introduce you."

We passed together into a very elegantly and tastefully furnished apartment, at a table in which a gentleman was reading. Professor C——, to whom I was then, for the first time, introduced, though I had known him for many years by reputation as one of the most, if not the most, distinguished savant in his particular sphere in the world, welcomed me cordially and said that he hoped, nay, that he felt confident, I would witness that night some of the sublimest phenomena it was possible to conceive. Our conversation was, however, interrupted at the outset by the arrival in quick succession of other members of the club, and after the usual few minutes allowed for the interchange of greetings had passed, the meeting was informally called to order by Professor C—— in the following terms:

"Gentlemen and fellow members, it gives me great gratification to inform you that the apparatus for which we have been waiting has been constructed according to order, and that it is complete in every particular. I have been for two days past superintending its disposition in our exercise-room, and if you are all of you ready we will now proceed to test it."

The Professor then led the way to the folding-doors communicating with the next apartment, and, pushing them aside, we passed through. Here a scene met my eyes which necessitates a somewhat close description.

This room was perfectly bare of decoration of any kind save a gas-chandelier suspended from the ceiling, all the burners of which were lighted. The uncarpeted floor exposed the hard wood boards of which it was made. In the centre of the floor stood a circular platform of some polished black wood, I think ebony, supported at a height of some ten or twelve inches from the floor by a series of stout glass pillows or pedestals, seven in number.

The circular platform, which measured, I should say, some sixteen or eighteen feet in diameter, was scored by a number of interlacing lines, stretching from one point of the periphery to another, along which some fine yellow powder, that looked like resin, had been strewn to the width of perhaps an inch. These interlacing lines formed a heptagonal figure drawn upon the principle of the pentagram, and at each of the seven angles of this figure, and close to the edge of the platform, stood an ordinary wooden chair.

Digitized by Google

In the centre of this heptagonal figure stood an object which arrested my attention. The construction of a heptagonal figure, on the lines of the pentagram, involves a central space left blank within the intersecting lines of the figure. Within this blank space lay a flat, polished disc of glass, some four feet in diameter, and several inches in thickness, and upon this disc rested a huge glass bell, shaped like the receiver of an air pump, some seven feet in height by, perhaps, three feet and a half in width. What struck me most, with regard to the size and general proportions of this bell, was that a full-grown man of large stature could have stood and moved comfortably within it.

From the apex of this bell issued a series of cords, which looked like insulated wires, the resemblance being further heightened by the fact that each of them ended in a metal handle, such as is used on galvanic batteries, two of which lay upon each chair. To complete the strange and mysterious accessories of the apartment, suspended from the ceiling by a line passed through a block, so that it could be raised or lowered at pleasure was a nondescript appliance which I shall endeavour to describe. From a brass ball, some inches in diameter, radiated seven curved brass rods, each of which formed the arc of a quadrant, and ended in an oval band of metal, the whole structure being so arranged that each of the terminal oval bands of metal hung suspended directly over one of the seven chairs.

A loud rapping was heard at the outer door, followed almost simultaneously by a report.

It was not long before I discovered the use and object of this strange contrivance. My eye took in at a glance what it has taken me several minutes to describe, and as soon as we had all filed into the room, the others stepped on to the circular platform and took their seats, evidently by preconcerted arrangement, with the exception of Professor C——, who released the line holding the suspended system of rods, so that it was lowered till each of the other six had fixed the oval metal band, in which each rod terminated, securely upon his forehead.

He then detached by means of a forked rod the brass ball from the line, so that the whole structure was free. Meanwhile, each of the six had taken in their hands the metallic terminals of the wires that issued from the apex of the glass ball. I had, meanwhile, settled into one of the two chairs remaining vacant, which stood in one of the corners left by the platform near the door, and towards which the Professor had motioned me on entering.

I must confess that the situation, at first sight, impressed me as somewhat ludicrous. The spectacle of six scientific, religious, hard-headed, reputable, and rich—as the case might be—gentlemen of the nineteenth century engaging in such a fantastical mummery as this struck me, as I say, at first as something supremely funny, and I could quite appreciate the sentiments of my friend the Doctor over his first similar experience. This disposition to ridicule disappeared, however, the moment Professor C—— began to talk. Ascending the platform, and standing in front of the chair he was to occupy in the circle, he delivered the following brief address, which I took down verbatim:

"While the fluids necessary to our experiment are collecting, gentlemen, and before it is necessary to concentrate, I will say a few words regarding the rationale of the methods we are now the first among human kind to employ to communicate with the higher intelligences. Theosophy, as generally understood, and more especially that branch of it which has sprung up in modern times, is an abstract science, its votaries living like the Neo-Platonists and early mystics in the realm of ideas.

"But, my friends, the new theosophy, of which I am the humble, but confident exponent and apostle, works by a surer method in its dealings with the beings with whom it desires to communicate. Suppose we admit that the spirit, for instance, after leaving the body, mingles with, and becomes lost in the illimitable Nirvana. The mission of the new theosophy is to draw that spirit thence, to reconstruct it, in fine, to condense it again from the Nirvana, or primitive element into which it has been absorbed into a quasi-material form, which shall be appreciable to one or more of our corporeal senses.

"The means, gentlemen, are before you, in you, and at your command. Your heads, the seats of your several intelligences, are connected together by these metal rods, terminating in yonder metal ball. Wires, again, proceed from your several hands to yonder insulated receiver standing in your midst, where they also meet in a common focus, namely, that other metal knob which you see in the apex of the bell. Thus there is a focus without, towards which you draw from the illimitable ether, and a focus within, towards which you concentrate. You constitute in effect a very powerful battery, though the fluid, or force, which it generates is more subtle and ethereal than that generated by ordinary chemical action.

"The next step, gentlemen," continued Professor C——, as he took his seat in the only vacant chair upon the platform, adjusted the metal band upon his temples, and grasped the handles of the remaining wires, "is to concentrate. Let us agree upon some intelligence—some notable being, let us say, who once lived upon this earth, for though that condition should not be, if my theory is correct, essential in practice, for all intelligences, I hold, that exist in the infinite Nirvana should be equally amenable to law, yet it commends itself as more suitable for a first experiment—and then let us exert our wills in silent invocation for its presence. If my theory is correct, the intelligence unanimously invoked will make itself known to us in yonder insulated receiver."

Digitized by Google

Several names were proposed as widely apart as Plato, Napoleon, Newton, Darwin, Shakespeare, the choice finally settling upon Shakespeare as a compromise, the question as to whether he was or was not the author of the plays not militating, Professor C—— said, against his availability as a subject.

Several badly-frightened gentlemen.

"And now let me caution you," said the Professor gravely, "against permitting your thoughts to wander from the matter in hand. It is not only that concentration is absolutely essential to the accomplishment of our aim, but for all I can tell—this is an untried experiment, as you are aware—any serious defect in this respect may be attended with danger. We are dealing, it must be remembered, with the most potent force in nature, and must be correspondingly cautious. If we preserve equanimity and act harmoniously, I am confident we have nothing to fear. But, above all things, let us keep our attention fixed upon the matter in hand. Now."

It was certainly a curious spectacle, as I sat in my chair in the corner and watched and waited. Seven gentlemen, some in evening dress, representing widely different circles in society, sitting on an insulated circular platform, their chairs ranged with mathematical precision in a heptagon, in their centre a vast glass bell, from which radiated a system of telegraphic wires, while from their heads rose a structure of metal rods, which towered above them in the centre, looking, with its curved sides and spherical apex, for all the world like a gigantic crown. The light from the chandelier threw the whole scene into vivid relief, and seemed perfectly in keeping with this exhibition of nineteenth century necromancy, if such it could be called, conducted on scientific principles and with one of the ablest savants in the world for its prophet and high priest.

I looked at my watch—it was not yet half-past eleven The minutes passed on as I watched the strangely-assorted figures on the platform, sitting silent and immobile at their fantastic employment. But my reverie was cut abruptly short. I became aware that something was going on in the glass bell. Yes, there could be no doubt about it, the bell seemed to be filled with a greyish mist slowly moving and convoluting upon itself, while upon the glass sides appeared those signs of of condensation one sees upon window panes on a cold day.

I could see by the excitement on the faces of those upon the platform that they were fully aware of the phenomenon also.

In a minute more, the drops upon the sides of the bell cleared away and an indistinct and shadowy form began to take shape.

As the seconds passed, it assumed greater distinctness and regularity. A human head, with broad, expansive brow, seemed to grow from a body of medium height and symmetrical structure. I caught a glimpse—it was only a glimpse, so riveted was my gaze by the spectacle in the glass bell—of the smile of triumph which irradiated the countenance of Professor S——; of the mingled awe and perplexity depicted upon the visage of the Reverend Mr. M——; of the look of keen analysis which overspread the face of Dr. W——; of some trembling arms and shaking limbs of figures sitting with their backs to me; and the next moment a loud rapping was heard at the outer door, followed almost simultaneously by a report like that of a small cannon, accompanied with a lightning flash, after which there was complete darkness. I felt a large body hurled against me, and by the time I had scrambled to my feet from where I had fallen, one of the burners of the chandelier, which had been extinguished by the explosion, again burst into light, and I saw Professor C—— standing in the centre of the platform in the act of lighting the others.

The glass bell was nowhere to be seen, but in its place a little heap of pulverised glass lay piled upon the glass disc which supported it. Several badly frightened gentlemen had now picked themselves up from various quarters of the room where they had fallen, looking ruefully ludicrous.

No one had been hurt, fortunately. Explanations followed.

It turned out that Dr. W——'s wife had been taken suddenly ill, and she, knowing where he was, had sent the servant after him.

Professor C—— maintains that the explosion occurred through the spirit of Shakespeare having been suddenly left without the moral support necessary for its corporeal maintenance, owing to the distraction of the minds of the members of the circle from their work of concentration, by the sudden knocking at the door, and had accordingly returned incontinently to the bosom of Nirvana and its place in the universal ether. He is triumphant, however, over the undoubted success of his experiment, and is backed up by all the other members of the club, in proof whereof a new bell has been ordered.

The most striking circumstances about the explosion, in my eyes, lay in the fact that no one was hurt, and that the glass bell crumbled into dust—not fragments—like a Prince Rupert's drop, and that not one particle of that dust fell outside of the glass disc that stood in the centre of the heptagon.

Robert Duncan Milne.

Digitized by Google

TWICE TEN YEARS.

I REMEMBER it as well as if it were yesterday. The carriage stood at the door that was to take me back to school for the spring term. My mother gave me innumerable instructions, smoothed my collar, and adjusted my cap on my head properly, then gave me a kiss and stood looking wistfully at me as I went down the walk and got into the carriage.

A month or two later—it was in June, I think—after a hard struggle one afternoon with some figures, all about a ship and a cargo and the profit and all that, I went out to join the boys. When I reached the playground they were gone, and there was nothing for me to do but amuse myself as best I could. I strolled about the house with my hands in my pockets (which my mother had told me distinctly I must not do), and suddenly remembering her instructions took them out again, then, for want of better amusement, I began to whistle.

Next to the school there was a pretty cottage separated from the school-house by a board fence. The two houses were not one hundred feet apart, and I could look right through under the trees, and there on the tennis-ground stood a girl a trifle younger than myself looking straight at me.

Now, when a boy suddenly finds himself observed by a girl, he feels quite queer. I remember that very well. My hands went right into my pockets, but remembering that was not the correct thing to do in the presence of a girl, I took them directly out again. Then I concluded that it would be a good way to show how little I was embarrassed by turning twice around upon my heel, a movement on which I greatly prided myself. After that I don't remember now—it was so long ago—what new capers I cut. But one thing is very certain. I was soon hunting for something I pretended to have lost in the grass beside the fence.

"If it's your knife you've lost," I heard a little voice say, "it isn't there. I picked up a knife there a week ago, but it was all rusty and no good."

"Oh, never mind," I said, looking up into two eyes peeping out from a sun-bonnet, "it wasn't much of a knife, and I've got another."

"Are you one of the boys at the school?"

"Yes."

"What form are you in?"

"The Fourth."

"Do you study geography?"

"Yes."

"What's the capital of Austria?"

I scratched my head.

"I don't remember that," I admitted reluctantly. "I'm first rate on capitals, but I can't recollect that one."

"Why didn't you go off with the boys?"

"I was behind with my sums. I expect they've gone to the river. I like the woods pretty well, they're full of squirrels."

"And lizards," she added. "I'm not afraid of lizards. I suppose you're afraid to go there."

"No, I'm not."

"If you want to go there now, and are afraid, I don't mind going with you, just to keep off the lizards and things."

She looked wistfully out at the wood. I can see her now leaning on her bat, deliberating—if such a process can be called deliberation where the conclusion is predetermined—the straight, lithe figure poised between the bat and one foot, one little leg crossed on the other—peering out at the forest. Suddenly, without any warning, she dropped the bat and started for the wood.

We were not long in crossing the field, and were walking in the dense shade when she stopped, and looking at me with her expressive eyes said:

"How still it is in here! It seems to me I can almost hear it be still."

"Yes, it is pretty solemn," I replied. "Let's go on; the river winds about down there, and we can see the water go over the dam."

I heard a distant voice calling "Julia." It was very faint; she did not hear it; I stood a moment hesitating.

"Come, let's go," I said, starting forward.

"Julia," I heard again, more faintly than before.

I hurried her on, fearing she would hear the voice and turn back.

Digitized by Google

Presently we emerged from the wood and stood by the river. I was familiar with the ground, and led my little friend directly to the dam.

"Most of the boys are afraid to walk out on that dam," I said.

"I'd be afraid."

"But you're only a girl: a boy oughtn't to be afraid." With that I started boldly out, occasionally standing on one foot, and performing sundry antics to show what a brave boy I was. Then I came part-way back and called to her to come.

"Oh, no," she said; "I'm afraid."

"Afraid! You little goose! With me to hold on to?"

Betwixt her fear and a disposition pliable to a boy older and stronger than herself, it was not long before I was leading her out on the dam.

"Don't you see it's nothing?" I said.

She shrank back as I led her along. I determined that she should go to a point where the water poured over a portion of the dam lower than the rest. I turned my back to step up on the post. It was but a moment. I heard a cry, and saw Julia in the flood. The expression that was in her eyes is to this day stamped clearly on my memory—an expression of mingled reproach and forgiveness.

I could scarcely swim a dozen strokes, but not a second had elapsed before I was in the water.

I swam and struggled and buffeted to reach her; all in vain. An eddy whirled me in a different direction. My strength was soon exhausted. I was borne down the river, sinking and rising, till I came to a place where I caught a glimpse as I rose to the surface of a man running along some planks extending into the river, and raised above the water on posts. My feet became entangled in weeds. I sank. I heard a great roaring in my ears, then oblivion.

When I came to I was lying on my back. I remember the first thing I saw was a light cloud sailing over the clear blue. There was an air of quiet and peace in it that contrasted with my own sensations. Then I saw a man on his knees beside something he was rubbing. I turned my head aside and saw it was a little figure—a girl, Julia. She was cold and stark.

My agony was far greater than when I had plunged after her into the stream. Then I hoped and believed that if she were drowned I would be also. Now I saw her beside me lifeless, and I lived.

Then some men came, and the man who was rubbing Julia said to them: "Take care of the boy; the girl is too far gone." They took me up and carried me away, and laid me for a while on a bed in a strange house. Then I was driven to the school.

The next day my father came and took me home. I was ill after that, too ill to ask about Julia, but when I recovered what a load was taken from my mind to know that by dint of rubbing and rolling and a stimulant she had been brought to and had recovered. I also learnt that the man who cared for us had seen Julia fall and had rescued her. When I saw him running along the planks it was to his boat chained to the end.

That summer my father removed with his family to Devonshire. He was obliged to wait some time for my recovery, but at last I was able to travel, and left without again seeing the little girl whom I had led into danger. I only heard that I had been blamed by everyone.

* * * * *

Ten years passed, during which I was constantly haunted by one idea; that was to go back and find Julia and implore her forgiveness. The years that I must be a boy and dependent seemed interminable. At last I came of age and received a small fortune that had fallen to me, and as soon as the papers in the case were duly signed and sealed I started.

It was just about the same time of the year and the same hour of the afternoon as when I first saw Julia that I walked into the old school grounds. I had fully intended to go in next door and call for her, but my courage failed me. I had heard nothing of her for years. Was she dead? Was she living? Was she in her old home, or far away? These thoughts chased each other through my mind, and I dreaded to know.

I was standing at the school entrance with my hand on the bell when I heard a door in the next house open and then shut. From that moment I could feel that Julia was near me. She came out of the house, a slender, graceful girl of nineteen, and picking up a tennis bat, commenced to knock the balls about. I wanted to make myself known, but dreaded the horror with which she would regard me when she should know who I was.

"I beg your pardon," I said, raising my hat, "can you tell me if the school is still there?" pointing to the house.

"It was moved some years ago," she replied, regarding me with the old honest gaze.

"I was one of the scholars."

"Indeed!" She spoke without any further encouragement for me to go on.

"I see the wood has not been cut away," I added, glancing towards it.

"No, it does not seem to be."

"Were you ever there?"

"Oh, yes, often."

"And is that old dam still across the river?"

"I believe it is."

She looked at me curiously. I went on without waiting for a reply:

"Would you mind showing me the way to it? It is a long while since I was there."

She drew herself up with a slight hauteur. Then thinking that, perhaps, I was unaccustomed to the conventional ways of civilised life, she said pleasantly:

"You have only to walk through the wood straight, at the back of the house, and you will come to it."

"Thank you," I replied, "but I hoped you would show me the way."

She looked puzzled.

"Miss Julia," I said, altering my tone, "I once met you when I was a boy here at school."

"I knew a number of scholars," she said, more interested; "who may you be?"

I dreaded to tell her. "If you will pilot me to the dam," I said, "I will inform you."

She thought a moment, then turned and looked out at the wood. With the quick motion with which she had made the same move as a child she started forward.

We walked side by side to the wood, through it out on the river bank. There was the water and the dam; everything as it had been.

"Did you ever try to walk out there?" I asked.

"Once, when I was a child, I came here with a boy, and we walked to where the water pours over. I met with an accident. I fell in."

"The boy overpersuaded you, I suppose?"

Digitized by Google

It was difficult for me to conceal a certain trepidation at the mention of my fault.

"No, I went of my own accord."

"He certainly must have been to blame. He was older and stronger than you."

"On the contrary," she said, with a slight rising irritation, "he jumped after me like the noble little fellow that he was."

I turned away on pretence of examining a boat down the river.

"At any rate he must have begged your forgiveness on his bended knees for permitting you to go into such a danger."

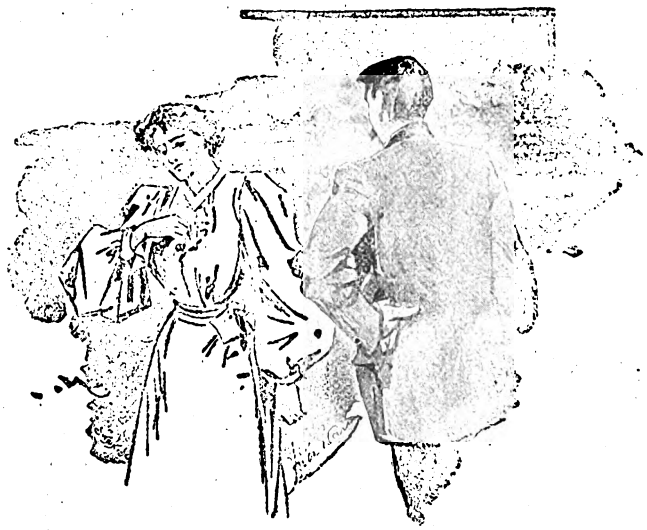
"I never saw him again. He went away."

I fancied—at least, I hoped—I could detect a tinge of sadness in her voice.

"I have often wished," she went on, "that he would come back, as the other scholars sometimes do, as you are now, and let me tell him how much I thank him for his noble effort."

"Julia," I said, suddenly turning and facing her. "This is too much. I am that boy. I led you into the wood. I forced you to go out on the dam with me. I permitted you to fall in."

"And more than atoned for all by risking your life to save me!"



"I knew a number of scholars," she said.

Ah, that look of surprised delight which accompanied her words! It was worth all my past years of suffering, of fancied blame; for in it I read how dearly she held the memory of the boy who had at least shared the danger for which he was responsible.

I do not remember if she grasped my hand or I grasped hers. At any rate, we stood hand in hand looking into each other's faces.

I blessed the Providence that ended my punishment; I blessed the good fortune that had led me to a knowledge of the kindly heart beside me. Of all the moments of my life I still count it far the happiest.

Then we walked back through the woods, over the intervening field, and stood together leaning against the fence between the old school and her home.

* * *

We did not part after that for another ten years. Then she left me to go whence I can never recall her. Yet there is a trysting place in the woods, through which we once passed as children and often afterwards as lovers. There I watch the flecked sunlight and mark the silence, and it seems to me that I can "hear it be still." More than that, I know the pure soul looks at me through the honest eyes.

Kate Rathmore.

In next week's SHORT STORIES will commence a new serial entitled, "The Great Middlewick Bank Robbery."

Have you a Brain?

Assuming you are equipped with one, we ask you: Does it not require pleasant exercise at times, in the shape of mental gymnastics?

Certainly.

Then the finest thing possible is to join The Brain Gymnasium in The Story Teller.

There is no entrance fee.

The prizes are many, and their aggregate value £25.

Full particulars appear in the issue of The Story Teller dated February 29th (1d. every Wednesday), which also contains a complete story by Reginald Baird, the first part of a thrilling narrative (complete in two parts) by Basil Burgoyne, and instalments of serials by Joan Barrett, Gertrude Warden, and Ida Deahl.

IN AN EARLY NUMBER

will commence a powerful story by Frederick Leslie, entitled, "Sindbad's Valley."

BE ON THE LOOK-OUT FOR IT.

PEARSON'S MAGAZINE.

THE March number of Pearson's Magazine, published on Friday, February 28th, is an even more marvellous sixpennyworth than the preceding issues.

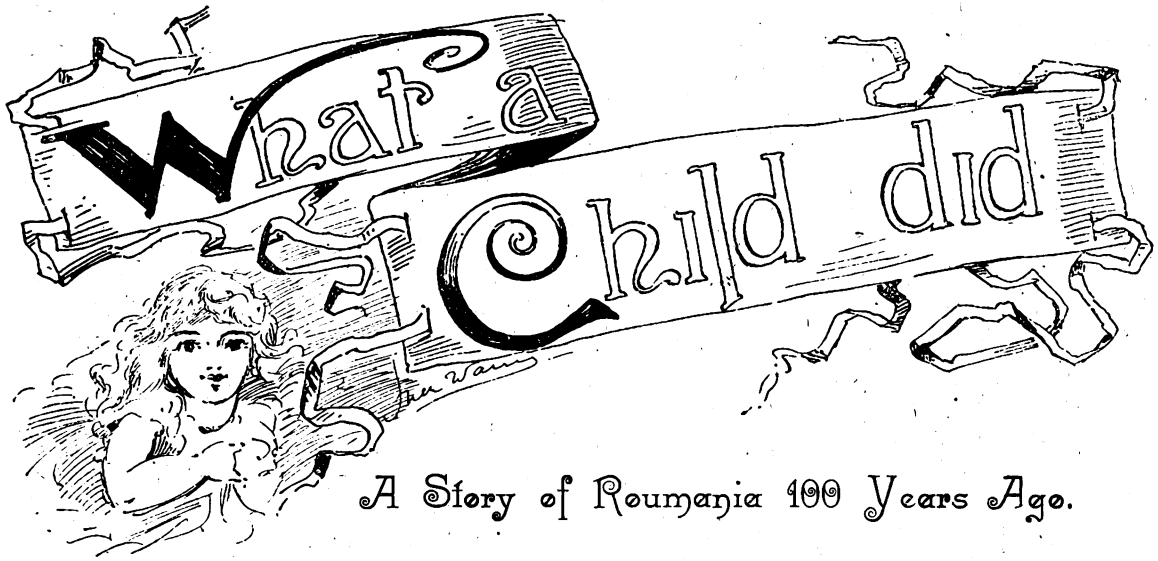
The series of notes and reproductions of famous pictures under the general heading, "Artists and their Work," continues to improve; while the five full-page plates by Abbey Altson, illustrating a poem by Norman Gale, are full of artistic beauty.

Lady Henry Somerset tells a pathetic story of the self-sacrificing act of a French Sister of Mercy, who saves the lives of her child-charges against a mad dog at the cost of her own, and the narrative is imbellished with illustrations by Mr. G. G. Manton. Mr. Allen Upward continues his "Secrets of the Courts of Europe" with an account of the tragic death of the Sultan Abdul Aziz.

Sir Walter Besant and Mr. W. H. Pollock continue their charming series of "Drawing-room Comedies"; and there are other stories by Mr. Stanley J. Weyman, Frankfort Moore, and Robert Barr. Other articles in this excellent sixpennyworth are: "What it Costs to Run the P. and O. Steamship Company"; "The Grave of a Nation's Honour," by George Griffith—being a full and truthful account of the condition of the Panama Canal to-day; another instalment of W. L. Alden's humorous reflections on topical subjects under the heading: "Wisdom Let Loose"; a vivid description of the Chapel of Bones at Malta, with reproductions of photographs; and "The Great Water Joke," by J. F. Sullivan.

6d. Published on the first of each month. 6d.

Digitized by Google



A Story of Roumania 100 Years Ago.

I AM decidedly fond of antiquities (I'm old myself now); that is to say, I am an amateur antiquarian. I am not quite sure that I should care to be a professional one. If I were rich and could devote all my time to antiquarian researches, it is quite probable that my love for them would cool; but as I have to pay strict attention to my business during the ordinary hours of labour, and can only ride my hobby during a small portion of the week, my enthusiasm increases rather than diminishes. I would go miles to see an old book, coin or vase; I am often at the British Museum; I have spent many a ten minutes gazing at the Needle; and if any magazine or book contains merely an illustration of something ancient, it fetches me at once. (Well! I've written it now, so I trust that I—an antiquarian!—may be pardoned for using so modern a term as "fetch.")

My firm does business in most of the countries of Europe, and as I have all the principal languages at my fingers' ends—it's quite a gift, of course—I do a good deal of the foreign correspondence myself. It's practice, you see. In the course of the past three years I have succeeded in scraping acquaintance (I believe that expression is sufficiently antiquated) with the principals of several foreign firms and have thereby been able to add to my museum. The head of a certain Roumanian firm, by name Licherdopol, is a man of tastes similar to my own, and as I was able to do him an exceedingly good turn a short time ago, we have become great friends. He would insist upon my accepting some token of gratitude, and last week I received a perfect treasure in the shape of a manuscript, yellow with age, and much worn and torn. It must have cost him a pang to part with it. I tell you it would take a lot of money to get it away from me!

As will be seen, the manuscript is the work of an eye-witness—an old man, with just enough learning to be able to write down, in a mixed language, what he saw, and his impressions thereon. The parchment being worn, there are gaps in the story, but Mr. Licherdopol's particulars happily enable me to supply what is lacking. In this form I place it before you.

* * * * * *

I am full of years, and the time cannot be far distant when I shall leave all this trouble behind. I have lived through terrible times, and I pray nightly that I may be spared the pain of passing through much more of this tribulation. Battle, robbery, murder, the arbitrary taking of life by those who have might on their side, the violation of all that is sacred—all this is of everyday occurrence. I am tired—oh, so tired of it! Yet to-day I have witnessed that which engenders within me the hope that all the goodness has not gone out of my fellow-man. Perhaps I am wrong; an old dotard, they would call me. Nevertheless, it is so different from what we see day by day that I feel impelled to make use of the little learning I possess to set down the events of this day. Learning! It will be a relief to put mine to some use; many a time have I cursed it, for it renders the feelings more acute, and has made me more unhappy in the midst of these troubles than those who cannot use the quill.

I will tell it just as it happened. Toudor Vladimiresco, the brave defender of Roumanian rights and privileges, after having driven back the hordes of Ypsilanti, had decided to fix his headquarters in our village for the winter. Of course, there was great excitement in the village. It is a grand thing to have valiant defenders of the Fatherland, but the pandours had gained a reputation which made the villagers ask themselves—and ask one another in whispers—whether it was worse to be pillaged by the enemy or "protected" by the pandours!

Toudor was against all such excesses as his men were known to have been guilty of, but he could not entirely stop them. He was a terrible disciplinarian, and strung up the men for the slightest act of disobedience, but outrages of all kinds were committed without the culprits being traced. On the march from Bucharest to Golesti he had ordered ten men to be hanged because he suspected that they had been concerned in a robbery and outrage which had been reported to him. This was such an arbitrary act that even his pandours, who were usually in mortal fear of him, began to murmur. His next act aroused a spirit of rebellion in some of his officers, and this led to what I alluded to at the beginning. Finding that his orders were disregarded by the men when there was the least chance of doing so without detection, he issued an order to his officers that he should hold them responsible for any offence committed by the men, and he demanded that they should sign a document accepting the responsibility. No doubt he thought that the officers would thus be compelled to look more closely after the men, but such an arbitrary step was quite without parallel, even for Toudor Vladimiresco, and there were many murmurs of resentment.

Digitized by Google

Marin's sweetheart struggling despairingly in the grasp of two men.

I was near a group of the men, trying to sell a few things, when Toudor's orderly approached the officer—a handsome young man—with a paper for him to sign, making him responsible.

I saw the young fellow's eyes flash indignantly as the orderly held out the paper and said something which I could not catch.

"If Toudor Vladimiresco wishes to haul us up to the nearest tree," the officer exclaimed in a voice of mingled scorn and anger, "he is able to work his will upon us without asking our permission. We are not bound to sign our lives away!"

He snatched the sheet from the hand of the orderly, tore it into small pieces, and threw them down.

Oh, it was a grand sight to see him standing there, a picture of manly dignity, his head thrown back and his piercing eyes fixed on the face of Toudor's messenger, who looked quite dazed at the audacity of Marin Tanase. But even as I gazed with admiration upon him my heart sank within me, for I knew the fate in store for him. Toudor Vladimiresco suffered no disobedience.

The messenger went away towards the house in which the leader had taken up his abode, while Marin left the men and strolled off in the opposite direction. My work required that I should go into the next village, but I could not leave the neighbourhood. I felt constrained by some unseen force to keep near Toudor's dwelling in order to see what came of the act of rebellion I had witnessed. My heart grew heavy with grief for Marin and his affianced bride, both of whom I had known from childhood; evil would come of it, I was convinced, and I would cheerfully have given my life to have saved him. Others were of the same opinion; they had had experience of Toudor's discipline, and they waited about expecting to see a guard sent out to fetch the rebel. But there was no movement.

As time went on and nothing occurred, I began to feel relieved. It was strange that Vladimiresco should take no notice of an act of insubordination, but I thought that it might well be due to the restraining influence of intercourse with his wife and child. For, having taken up his winter quarters, it meant rest from warfare until the spring, unless something unforeseen should cause the enemy to make a move in spite of the time of the year. So Toudor has sent for his wife and his three-year-old daughter—they say he is passionately fond of her, although he does not think much of her mother—and no doubt means to enjoy their society.

It was about four o'clock when I heard that Vladimiresco was holding a council or something of that kind in the Willow Walk. There is plenty of room for a large assembly of men in the Walk, it was close to his abode, and it would not be dusk till five o'clock, so that there was nothing extraordinary in the fact that he was holding a council; but my heart was seized with a sudden fear when Gianta, who told me the news, added that Marin, who had been walking with his sweetheart, had been specially summoned to attend.

I hurried to the Walk as fast as my old legs would carry me, and this is what I saw.

Toudor Vladimiresco with his chief officer standing in the centre of a circular clearing in the Walk; Marin with his back to a tree, his hands tied, and the noose of a rope around his neck, the rope having been thrown over a stout bough; Anica, Marin's sweetheart, struggling despairingly in the grasp of two men who were preventing her from approaching her lover; and the pandours forming a circle all round.

"Take her away!" I heard Vladimiresco cry, as (by the kindness of some of the men who knew me) I managed to get near enough to witness all. "We want no women here!" Then, as two other men were coming forward to assist, he suddenly changed his mind. "Let her stay, but see that she does not interrupt!" he said brutally. "She shall see how we punish insubordination!"

Anica, quite exhausted, fell upon her knees and hid her face in her hands. Marin's face was deadly pale and his lips twitched. I know it was not fear, because his eyes were blazing defiance; it was the suffering of Anica which upset him. I saw a spot of blood on his upper lip, and Donaro has told me that Toudor himself struck Marin for having called him a cur! So what could the poor boy do? He could only wait for death; to have asked Toudor to put an end to him quickly would have been useless, because Vladimiresco wished to inspire fear in the hearts of others who might have a desire to rebel against his orders.

"Tighten the rope a little!" ordered the leader. Two men drew the noose just tight enough to be irksome.

Digitized by Google

A moan of despair came from Anica, but Marin never flinched.

"Marin Tanase," said Vladimiresco, addressing the doomed man, "you have been guilty of insubordination, and must die."

He stopped for a moment, and then I saw just the shadow of a fiendish smile cross his face.

"There is one way of saving your life," he continued. "Down on your knees and crave pardon, and you shall go free."

Anica looked up at her lover half-expectantly. But Marin shouted "Never!" with a vehemence that was not to be mistaken.

"Then pray for your soul, for in thirty seconds you will be swinging from that branch," said Toudor savagely.

The men pulled the rope tight, in readiness for the order from the leader. Marin's lips moved slightly as if in prayer. We were all waiting to hear the word from Vladimiresco, when something unexpected happened.

A little girl of three, with a look of distress upon her face, Vladimiresco's daughter, came tripping forward into the clearing, looking this way and that way with the natural curiosity of an intelligent child. How did she come there? Was it the finger of Providence? Her attention was attracted in some way towards Marin. She walked up to him, and looked at him earnestly.

"Does it hurt you?" asked the child.

"Poor man!" said the little one with childish sympathy. "Is you ill?"

Marin could only stare at her. Anica sprang to her feet, her breath coming in pants.

"Does it hurt you?" asked the child after a pause, the treble voice betraying some anxiety.

Still no reply. Our glances went from the child to the father, who was staring in perplexity at the strange scene.

"Take it off!" continued the little girl. Then as Marin did not move, she said in a reassuring tone: "Me take it off for you!"

She reached up towards his neck, but finding that it was too high up, she pulled at him to drag him on to his knees. The men involuntarily loosened the rope and Marin, scarcely knowing what he did, knelt down in front of her.

Little Jeanne put her tiny fingers on the rope and made a childish endeavour to loosen it. I looked around instinctively and shall never forget the sight. I am not scholar enough to describe it. Marin, a slight flush on his cheeks, a gleam of hope in his eyes; Anica, her arms outstretched towards her lover and the child, held back by the two men; Toudor Vladimiresco, perplexed and uneasy; and the pandours watching expectantly.

"I can't!" exclaimed the little one, the tears starting to her eyes. She turned and ran up to her father. "Papa," she said, in the imperious tone of a spoiled child, "poor man ill. It hurts him. You take it off, papa! Come!" And she tugged at his tunic with all her strength.

His love for Jeanne was about the only soft spot in Vladimiresco's heart. He would have been inhuman indeed to have resisted that appeal. He followed the child—still tugging at his coat—to where Marin was still kneeling.

"This, papa. Take it off!" exclaimed Jeanne, pulling at the rope.

Toudor hesitated. The two men looked for a moment into each other's eyes. Then Vladimiresco loosened the noose, slipped it over Marin's head and threw it violently over the bough so that it fell in a heap on the other side.

"Your life is spared," he said abruptly. "Go away, and let me see you no more!"

He turned on his heel and strode away. Marin started to his feet, bewildered at what had taken place. Anica, released by her guards, rushed forward and hugged the child to her breast.

* * * * * *

And there the writing ends. It is rather an abrupt termination, but from the particulars given to me by Mr. Licherdopol, I am able to complete the story. Vladimiresco fell into the hands of the Greeks shortly afterwards, and was put to death without mercy. That is a fact.

Concerning Marin and Anica there is no absolutely authentic information, but tradition says that they removed to another part of Roumania, and married, Marin giving up soldiering, and becoming a farmer. After the death of Vladimiresco, and that of his wife a few months later, they adopted little Jeanne.

G. D.

Digitized by Google

Wanted—A Husband.

The following "personal" might have been seen all that summer on the fourth page of a prominent journal:

WANTED.—A young lady residing in the provinces, pretty and distinguished, with a dot of three hundred thousand francs, desires to marry a gentleman of about thirty-five years, one in the military or legal profession preferred, who resides in Paris. No agencies.—Address, Madeline T. T., Box 333, this office.

Not every statement in the above advertisement was perfectly true. Elodie Rabotteau, the party referred to, was a young lady to be sure, and is so still, more's the pity. She also resides in the country still, for her father is a judge at Saint Colomban, an obscure town in the Canton of Beauce.

But, between ourselves—first, she was not pretty; second, she was not at all distinguished; third, the above-mentioned three hundred thousand francs are principally expectations from her uncle—a bachelor, it is true, but scarcely forty years of age, and solid as a rock.

As to the "No agencies," that was a base deception. "Madeline T. T., box 333," was really Theodore Tardivel, whose trade it was to arrange matrimonial bargains; but he had recognised the fact that certain clients have an insurmountable prejudice against matrimonial agencies. There are people who for the world would not get into a hackney coach on account of the licence number on it.

"Tardivel has written me a long letter," said Judge Rabotteau to his wife, one morning of last autumn. "Here is his plan. The army manœuvres commence a week from now, and Saint Colomban has been designated to provide quarters for a half-battery of artillery. This half-battery is commanded by Captain Lecomte, and Captain Lecomte wishes to marry a young lady who has been brought up in the country. Now, don't think of anything but making the house look its best. To-morrow you must take Elodie to Chateaudun, and have a new gown made for her. At the same time you can send for a man to tune the piano. We must have a second girl, too, so that the cook will not have to wait at table."

"Goodness!" gasped Madame Rabotteau; "what an expense!"

"I do not deny that it is quite a considerable outlay. But do you, or do you not, want Elodie married? She's twenty-six now, and for the past eight years we have offered her to every bachelor in the country round, to say nothing of widowers. Now a chance offers itself, and we must profit by it. So, old lady, you must bestir yourself. I shall go and fix it with the mayor, so that they quarter the captain on us."

When the first of September came cannons sounded all the morning long through the vast plains that surround Saint Colomban, and towards four o'clock in the afternoon the approach of the half-battery was announced.

Presently the captain appeared at the whitewashed gate, that served as a boundary for Judge Rabotteau's terrestial paradise. The mise en scène had been arranged beforehand; Rabotteau, under the spreading acacia tree, was reading the Revue des Deux Mondes; his wife, not afar away, was cutting bunches of grapes from the yellowing trellis, and behind the white muslin curtains of the parlour window, Elodie, warned by a preconcerted signal, burst, with the energy of despair, into a love song.

At the sound of the horse's shoes clattering on the paved walk, the Judge put down his review and his wife abandoned her grapes.

The Captain stood before them, cap in hand.

"Madame," he began, with a bow, "allow me to introduce myself. I am——"

"You are known to us already, M. Lecomte. We were expecting you."

The officer bowed and smiled, and shook hands with Rabotteau. Then he was led to the parlour, to the great confusion of Elodie, who suddenly cut short her song, blushing as if she had been a hundred miles from suspecting that an artillery captain was to set foot, that day, within the limits of the canton in which her father administered justice.

The Captain discreetly suggested that he would take his meals at the hotel, but they soon made him understand that that would be an unpardonable insult.

"You must share our modest fare," Madame Rabotteau told him; "we shall not break an egg the more for you."

It is unnecessary to say that the dinner was a feast. By dessert the four people assembled seemed to have known each other for ten years, and the Captain made a conquest of them all.

At ten o'clock he asked permission to retire.

"Of course, dear M. Lecomte," said Madame Rabotteau, "after having such a fatiguing journey, I hope you will sleep well under our modest roof."

In the privacy of the nuptial chamber the husband and wife exchanged their impressions.

"It's just a dream!" the lady declared. "He has such an air of breeding and such perfect manners! Not the least bit like a noisy soldier. And I'm sure the man must have a fortune. He gave forty sous to the constable who showed him the way to the house."

"There is nothing surprising in that, my dear. One can see he is a graduate at the Polytechnic School. They are gentlemen—sober, serious, well-behaved. Did you hear that he had the good taste not to make the least allusion to his matrimonial intentions?"

In the morning, at four o'clock, when the Captain went down to mount his horse, the Judge was waiting for him to take breakfast. That evening there was new repetition of the follies of Balthasar. Lecomte politely asked the fair Elodie to play for him; then, in his turn, the young man was invited to sing. He accepted without hesitation, and he had a superb voice. Next he played one of Mendelssohn's "Songs without Words" with undeniable talent.

A couple of days later, Rabotteau discreetly brought up the subject of officers marrying, and pretended to decry it. Lecomte smiled significantly, and politely opposed his host's theories. He added that during the war the married officers had performed their duty better, if possible, than the others.

Digitized by Google

That night, not a member of the family slept a wink, Elodie least of all.

"Well, it ought to go through this time," Madame Rabotteau declared to her husband, "for according to my calculations, this week has cost us at least four hundred francs."

"You can't make an omelette without breaking eggs," the Judge replied sententiously.

He had secretly written to Tardivel:

Lecomte is charming. He suits us to a T. Is it necessary to give him a hint?

And Tardivel replied:

Pretend to know nothing about it. When he comes back, I will see him. I will manage the whole affair.

However, the last day of the manœuvres had come. That evening, the Rabotteau kitchen was nerved for a supreme effort, destined to all appearances, to be crowned with success. But, alas! at the accustomed hour the Captain's horse was brought back to the stable by his orderly.

Elodie, who was watching for the return of her future husband—they called him so already among themselves—from behind her blinds, flew to the garden and cried out in anguish:

"Merciful heavens! Is he wounded?"

"No, Mademoiselle," replied the orderly, with a peculiar smile. "The Captain's health is in statu quo. But you'd better tell your papa not to keep the soup waiting for him."

"Isn't he coming to dinner?"

"No, Mademoiselle; he is going to have dinner at the White Horse Inn, and will sleep there afterwards. I am to fetch his things as soon as I have unsaddled the mare."

Pale as a sheet, Elodie ran to inform her mother.

"Goodness!" cried the latter; "what a pity. That goose cost eight francs! But what is the matter? Shall we ask his orderly?"

"We shall do nothing of the sort, my dear," replied the Judge. "Thanks to the influence of discipline and the guardhouse, these military servants will do anything for their masters. You would learn nothing, and you might spoil everything perhaps. To-morrow I shall make inquiries."

The dinner of the trio was most melancholy.

Early the next day Rabotteau sought out the landlord of the White Horse, who was much flurried by the presence of a dozen officers of all grades.

"Can you tell me," the Judge asked, "if the artillery captain who was quartered at my house—— "

"He is in No. 8, Judge. The Captain is still in his room, for the manœuvres ended last night. Excuse me if I do not take you up myself—I am just worked to death."

Rabotteau ascended the stairs, and strode down the long corridor, on which opened several white doors, all alike except for the large numerals painted on them in black. He was just in the act of knocking at that which bore the figure eight, when suddenly he recoiled as if he had seen a tiger crouching on the mat. It was, by the side of a pair of top boots, still armed with spurs, a little pair of shoes, lined with rose-coloured satin; dainty, elegant, impertinent shoes; shoes of which one would say without fear of being mistaken: "The foot of a pretty woman was in that not long ago."

Yes, but for the time being the pretty woman was—somewhere else. Unhappy Elodie! Poor Madame Rabotteau! Fool of a Tardivel! Shameless monster of a Lecomte!

At that moment the key was heard to turn in the door of No. 8. The door was seen to open timidly, just the least crack. First a hand emerged, very small and very white, the hand that belonged to those shoes. Then the wrist appeared, round and slender, with a pretty bracelet. Then a plump arm, which grew longer and longer. Rabotteau had never in his life seen such an arm as that, and, if the other were like it, as all experience would indicate, this scoundrel of a Lecomte was a very lucky scoundrel indeed.

However, the arm, the wrist, the hand, and the shoes retreated in good order. The door was closed, and the Judge stood there, feeling very foolish, but there was nothing for him to do but to go back to his own house.

"Well?" simultaneously cried the two women, who were waiting for him on the way.

"That Lecomte is a scoundrel," he said between his teeth. "Go to your room, Elodie, I have something to say to your mother."

Then Rabotteau, with shining eyes—from anger, no doubt—recounted to his better half what he had seen.

"Oh!" gasped the good lady, "the idea of such a scandal! This is a pretty example for Saint Colomban! Whatever shall we tell Elodie? Poor child, she really liked the monster! And a pretty fellow is your Tardivel. That reminds me, a letter has just come from him by special courier."

On the table, indeed, the Judge found his missive:

I don't understand this at all. You pretend to have Lecomte there with you. But he writes me that he had broken his leg, and that one of his comrades had taken his place in the manœuvres. Pray send me some word of explanation.

"This is too much!" cried Elodie's mother. "I called him M. Lecomte all the time, and he never denied the name. If I were you, I would write to the Minister of War about it."

"I shall think it over," Rabotteau said. "It is a grave matter to have an officer court-martialed on account of a young man's escapade. Besides, he will not leave, I imagine, without coming to say good-bye, and then we shall see."

Surely enough, that afternoon the false Lecomte knocked at the gate. But—climax of impudence!—on his arm was a young and very pretty woman—doubtless the lady of the shoes.

"Justine!" cried Madame Rabotteau, "do not open the gate! Tell those persons we are not at home." Then, turning to her husband, she added: "Why are you not choking with indignation? Can you stand unmoved in the face of such insult? If I were a man, M. Rabotteau, matters would look very different."

"But, my dear, I am a magistrate, I am sixty-seven years of age, and the manipulation of arms is an unknown art to me."

At that moment Justine returned, carrying a card on which was inscribed:

Le Comte de Prebois,
Capitaine d'Artillerie.

Beneath was written in pencil:

A thousand regrets and a thousand excuses for having missed your company last evening. Madame de Prebois came down and took me by surprise, and did not wish to seem inconsiderate by increasing the trouble my presence has caused you. It would have afforded her great pleasure to make the acquaintance of your wife and daughter. Allow me to express my sincere gratitude for your excellent hospitality.

"I understand now," Madame Rabotteau declared at last, with a profoundly discouraged sigh, after she had read the card through, "why he did not object when we called him, Monsieur le Comte. Poor Elodie. She always was unlucky."

Le Vier.

Digitized by Google

THE TREASURES OF THE WHITE GOD.

THE STORY OF A SHAMEFUL CRIME.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

Retribution.

Richard Sheldon did not stop at a single victim in his mad resolve for flight. A second time he raised the knife.

It was swept from his grasp, however. In his free hand Detective Dean still retained the pair of handcuffs. He struck out wildly as the merchant bent over him, dealt his knuckles a rap that swept the knife from his grasp, and then struggled frantically to drag himself free from the encumbering form of the senseless Burgoyne and the box.

With a snarl of ferocity, Sheldon drew his revolver. He aimed it point-blank at the face of his prostrate foe, pulled the trigger, and then, not even waiting to note the effect, madly hurled the weapon at Dean, and sprang from the spot.

Clutching the handbag tightly, he ran down the line. The train was gaining speed. It would not stop for two hundred miles again. Dead or alive, he would trust to outwitting Dean by pursuing his journey on the express, at least as far as the next point of halting.

He saw at a glance that he must run and meet the train ere it gained a momentum it would scarcely be safe to defy. He poised himself as the engine dashed by. As soon as the engine and tender had passed him, he would grasp at the door rail of the next passenger carriage.

Thud! Just as the tender rushed by him, a heavy object left the hand of the man in charge of it—a letter bag. It was usual to throw it off here regularly.

It took the unwarned, unprepared Sheldon in the chest. Head over heels he went, the breath fairly knocked out of his body. He landed with a shock that stunned every sense. Then he staggered to his feet, limping, bruised, bleeding, and stared, with a wild malediction, down the smooth lines, to see the flickering red lights of the rear carriage of the express vanishing round a curve, half a mile away.

So vanished hope? No! He reflected eagerly. The Central ran a mile east. There was a train due at the nearest station in an hour; he remembered that. Why not catch it? Without a further thought of Dean or Burgoyne, the fugitive started, as fast as he could run, across an open field, at the extreme end of which he could even now make out the signals.

"What was that?"

He quivered, he glanced apprehensively behind him—half a mile accomplished. The sound of clattering feet on the hard, baked path he had been pursuing.

A great cry of mingled dismay and alarm swept his lips as he strained his eyes to make out a rapidly advancing figure.

"Mercy! it is Dean!"

Yes; the recognition was unmistakable. Even as he gazed, a sharp, peremptory challenge cut the air like a knife.

"Halt!"

The fugitive drew another revolver.

Bang—snap—snap—snap!—three chambers empty—bang—bang!

He threw away the useless weapon, with a cry like that of an environed tiger denuded of its claws. His pursuer must bear a charmed life! Relentless as fate, unscathed, he swept towards the pursued man.

Sheldon ran on. Here, in the open space, it was a question of superior speed. Well, he was no ordinary sprinter! Could he but reach the extensive yards just beyond a bridge spanning a little stream directly in his course, a score of secure hiding-places offered protection.

Half-way across the bridge he came to a dismayed halt. He could hear the breath of the pursuer, sharp, panting, but resolute. A firm hand grasped him.

Like a beast at bay, the fugitive glared at his captor.

"I am armed—no resistance, if you are wise!" sounded the stern voice of Dean. "Give me that bag!"

The bag? Ah! a malevolent and then a hopeful gleam shone in the eyes of the captive.

Liberty was everything. To be imprisoned now meant doom—the forgeries discovered, his own coward course certain to accord with the claims of this intrepid, relentless man-hunter.

"The bag?" he panted hoarsely. "Yes—take it!"

He gave it a sudden fling over the bridge rail, directly into the water beneath.

With an ejaculation of infinite dismay, taken completely off his guard, the detective relaxed his hold of Sheldon.

He saw the swift-rolling waters of the river; he saw that, by sheer accident, the precious handbag had landed on a frail heap of driftwood, that a minute later might float out of sight, or sink. He followed a quick impulse. Over the rail he sprang into the cold dark waters. He splashed, caught at the bag, clung to it, and struck out for the shore.

The temporary respite afforded the fugitive was seized with avidity. He ran on swiftly. It was liberty now—never mind the treasure! Had he not several thousand pounds in his pocket? Life, free, even with that niggardly portion, was better than a prison cell and nothing.

Ah! the yard at last!—network and wilderness of rails, ties, engines and carriages. A hundred safe places of concealment offered; numberless trains passed the vicinity nightly.

He looked back. Possession of the treasure and a cold bath had apparently dampened the ardour of Detective Dean, for he was nowhere in sight.

The fugitive was breathless, nearly exhausted from his violent run. A bitter smile crossed his pale face as he realised, pantingly, that he was no longer a young man. His prime had been reached through fast living; his keen craftiness had been blunted by recent blunders.

A sharp pain near the heart caused him to press his hand there. He winced, gasped a trifle harder, and then sat down upon a pile of iron.

"I've overtaxed myself," he muttered, with concern. "The run, the excitement, have been too much for me. Dr. Ridgely said I must be careful. Only a few paltry thousands, after all my scheming!"

Digitized by Google

A grim, sullen look came into his pain-stricken eyes as he drew forth a pocket-book and opened it, to be sure of its contents. The glare of a danger lamp turned a flood of a lurid hue across his face at that moment and made it look ghastly.

At that moment, too, a second spasm of pain gripped his heart. He sank back sideways on the heap to ease the contraction of the tense muscles, and then reached forth his hand to take up the pocket-book which had fallen from his grasp.

"Hello! I don't like this!"

His face, bloodless, and alarmed now, the fugitive plotter thrilled as his arm refused to do his bidding. It was becoming nerveless. A deadening numbness, too, had crept up one side, and the muscles of his mouth began to twitch.

"It's just the reaction from excitement! I must rouse myself!" he muttered.

A groan parted his lips. A strange, dull throbbing began to pervade his brain; little thrills of alternate chill and heat traversed his nerves, and then——

Foaming at the mouth, he tried to shout for help, but the utterance click-clacked down in his throat. His hands spread out in fan-shape rigidity as he essayed to rise. An awful shock, as of some mighty concussion, jarred every nerve; then, like a blight, like a breath, a fearful convulsion sent him huddled to a helpless heap.

Helpless in the hour of triumph—stricken down at the moment of safety! His money lay, of no avail, at his side.

What had happened? His brain became more active, as his frame grew more sodden, death-like, rigid.

The fixed, awful eyes told the story—the limp limbs revealed the truth. In the height of wicked victory and soulless flight from the wrongs he had done others, it had come——

The hand of Heaven—paralysis!

CHAPTER XXXV.

At Eventide—Light.

Adrian Burgoyne had been desperately wounded by the knife-thrust of the fugitive man.

The detective had managed to push his encumbering body aside and get free of the heavy box. Then he had to run to the station-master's office, utter a hurried injunction to him to care for the wounded man, and had started on the track of Sheldon.

But, amid the bustle of the arriving train, the station-master lost several minutes. When he reached the corner of the sanguinary encounter, Burgoyne had disappeared.

In later hours, Convict 407 could never trace his movements of that fateful evening, nor analyse the false strength that enabled him to wander for miles.

The flow of blood had ceased, but the shock had sent a fierce delirium to his brain. He must have staggered from the lines, reached a street near by, and, with one thought supreme in his mind, groped his way back towards the city.

Patrice! Her name alone haunted his fevered lips. Sheldon, the treasure, the detective, were all in the remote background now. Patrice—ever Patrice—only Patrice!

Men whom he met stared, startled at his dabbled attire, at his white face, his wild eyes. One pedestrian consented to examine the paper, bloodstained and outspread, which Burgoyne presented.

It was the order to release "the niece of Richard Sheldon." It bore the address of the institution.

The man directed him. Talking to himself, laughing, scowling, murmuring soft, sentimental nothings one moment, the next growing tragic over some more dramatic phase of his lightning-like thoughts, the wounded wayfarer reeled forward on his way.

Utter delirium was regnant now, save for that one coherent idea—Patrice. It was two hours after leaving the station that Burgoyne came to his journey's end. He had staggered down a narrow, tree-lined street. Only the pale moonlight, filtering through the leaves, illuminated the spot, showing a high brick wall, without a break, until he came to a stout oaken door set in the solid masonry.

Upon the step of this he sank. Not a soul was in sight. Only the distant hum of the city's turmoil haunted the still, evening air.

His senses were swaying, his wound had broken out afresh. The loss of new, hot blood cooled the fevered pulses for the moment. A flush of reality, a transient conception of his condition, flashed over Burgoyne's mind.

As he realised his situation, his peril, his weakness, he essayed to rise. He managed to gain his feet by crowding into the niche formed by the set-in gate. Upon it he knocked.

"Open—help!" he murmured faintly, with no idea of what the gate might lead to.

There was a click as he continued his knocking. He had loosened a little wicket in the centre of the gate. It slipped down.

A hundred sweet perfumes crossed his senses. Through the aperture his fever-driven eyes caught a glimpse of the swaying trees and bushes of a garden. What was the place? Was not that a form moving among the shrubbery?

To sustain himself, he thrust his arm through the wicket. There he clung, his arm bared by grazing the aperture, Richard Sheldon's bloodstained order still fluttering in his hand.

"Help! I am wounded—dying——"

"What is this? Sister Ursula, something has happened! Quick, this way!"

That voice! Was he dreaming, delirious again?

"It is a man. He has a bloodstained paper in his hand. Sister, what does it mean? Adrian! The tattooed arm! Oh! am I dreaming—mad?"

That voice! Her voice! Clinging to the wicket, limp, broken, dying, like a tempest-tossed mariner to a rock of safety, the stricken Adrian Burgoyne knew that a soft, anguished touch caressed his hand—knew that by accident, circumstance, fate, he had found his missing love—smiled once in joy delirious, and then mind and heart floated into the mysterious dreamland of insensibility.

* * * * *

One day! ten!—how much older was the world than the night he so nearly met his fate, he knew not, as he opened his eyes to life and light and love again.

He lay upon a soft couch in a pleasant room; balmy zephyrs swept through its open windows; at his side hovered an angel.

"Patrice!"

Down upon her knees beside him, sobbing, laughing, crying, sank the wrapt, anxious nurse.

"Oh! you are better; you will live! Adrian—you know me?"

"What does it mean—where am I?"

Soft as the whispering cadence of a summer zephyr came the words in reply. Her eyes riveted upon his face, Patrice Ringold told how fate had sent him to the reformatory, how he had been taken in and cared for by the kind-hearted sisters, how she had been his nurse.

"Dean—does he know? Is he still alive?" quivered Burgoyne anxiously.

"He has been here daily. Oh! there is so much to tell. Do not become excited dear! You shall know all in time, only—oh! my brave, loyal friend, he even has crowned your heroic endeavours with blessings. What most in the world would please you, encourage you, hasten your recovery?"

"Your love!" sighed the ardent patient.

"That is yours to the end of time," murmured the blushing Patrice. "But here is something more practical.

Digitized by Google

Shut your eyes, dear! Open your eyes, dear! and—look!"

Her own sparkled like diamonds as she fluttered a paper before his vision.

"What is it?" asked Adrian Burgoyne faintly.

"Read and see—a pardon!"

CHAPTER XXXVI.

The End of a Long Chase.

OFFICIAL REPORT.

DEPARTMENT OF POLICE.

1st District: 4th Precinct. Police Station: Central Headquarters.

Evidences of Crime.

Documents—Affidavits. Recovered Property.

Appended a medico-legal report.

In the case of Richard Sheldon, I have to report, in addition to previous disclosures, the death of the accused, and the final establishment of the innocence of Convict 407, Adrian Burgoyne.

Every detail of the plots of Sheldon have already been forwarded you. They form the story of the wrongs perpetrated against an innocent man—Adrian Burgoyne. They prove the deep villainy of the man Sheldon.

This man was found paralysed near the scene of his attempted murder. He was conveyed, helpless, to the city hospital, and died there yesterday, after reluctantly affixing his signature to the inclosed confession, which, with the certificate of the attending physician, I forward you.

It now only remains for justice to rehabilitate Adrian Burgoyne and establish Miss Patrice Ringold in her rights as owner of the treasure and moneys wrested from Sheldon. The private detective, Davenant, I find innocent of any conjunction in Sheldon's plots. He, furthermore, revealed to me the whereabouts of Miss Ringold, who is now nursing the man who imperilled his life to shield my own.

I have this day placed in her hands a full and complete pardon from the Governor of the State, for Adrian Burgoyne. This was secured upon the presentation to His Excellency of papers she had secretly abstracted from the desk of Colonel Lytle. They prove the plot to connect Burgoyne with the anarchist murder, they fully and completely verify my claims as to his entire innocence.

In closing the case, sir, I thank you for the expressions of confidence and commendation your last communication offers me.

(Signed) Berwyn L. Dean, Detective.

Upon reading this final and informal report of his subordinate, the chief of the service, Grey, sent for Dean.

"You have made a mistake in your report, Dean," he announced.

"Eh! how?" murmured the other, bewildered.

"There is a correction to be made in the signature. There. That reads better!"

The chief drew a pencil across the report as he spoke. Then he tossed it to his subordinate.

And the flushed and delighted officer, who had been true to his employers, and true to himself, read the gratifying chronicle of merit rewarded, of promotion and esteem—"Berwyn L. Dean, Inspector."

CHAPTER XXXVII.

The World's Fair Mystery.

The city of Chicago was mad with delight, riotous with excitement, aglow with bright faces, flags, banners and transparencies.

Four hundred years had woven the slow-filling warp and woof of progress with steady unfaltering fingers, and the wilderness Columbus had descried from the deck of his beleaguered ship, rang from ocean to ocean with commemorative cheers.

The great World's Fair was ready to spread its rare treasures of art, science and industry to the view of pilgrims from the four corners of the earth.

In a safe corner of one of its massive buildings had been stored a curio, around which romance and tragedy had woven a mystery that endowed it with more than ordinary interest in the eyes of the curious public.

It was the White God — Richard Sheldon's gift to the Columbian Exposition.

The story of that idol had filled the papers, had been discussed by every lip, had, as well, involved the romance of the pardoned convict and heiress orphan.

Thousands had begged for a sight of it; but in vain. It was announced that it would only be publicly seen when the Mexican exhibit was complete and in place.

That promise, however, was never fulfilled, and one morning the World's Fair officials awoke to confront a mighty surprise, a bewildering mystery.

The White God was gone!

The puzzled detectives who haunted the grounds after the discovery of this daring theft, looked wise, but said nothing, did nothing, for the abstraction of the idol had been the work of too deft a hand that a single clue to the bold depredator should be discovered.

The thief had evaded the guards on duty. He had climbed a ladder to the roof of the building in which the idol was housed.

With extraordinary patience, he had swung from girder to girder, had attached a rope to the idol, swung it aloft, laboriously dragged it four hundred feet across the net-work of iron beams, and, taking his life in his hands, had lowered it and himself over the sheer edge of the rotunda to the ground below.

Then the audacious marauder and the White God disappeared.

Mr. Inspector Dean looked grim when he heard of it. He thought of Medeiras and his vengeance, and said nothing.

Somewhat later, a friend from Mexico described to him a great Aztec festival he had witnessed at the cave of Bureldo.

The high priest in charge of the ceremonies he described. It was Medeiras. The festivities marked the return to its rifled shrine of the famous White God.

And in its gleaming brow there glittered and shone the yellow sun-jewel wrested from the possession of dead Colonel Lytle in the moment of the dread vengeance of the relentless devotee of the White God.

* * * * * * *

Moonlight on the water, one great glare of electric radiance on the land—a placid lake, a park of green; domes, spires and minarets—a picture of fairyland enchantment—the great World's Fair at Chicago!

From the deck of a stately steamer on the lake, their hands clasped, their eyes sentient with glowing thoughts, two congenial souls watched all this magnificence.

In silence! The scene was too vivid with memories of the past, too eloquent with suggestions of the future, to admit of commonplace discussion.

Here, these two, the Englishman, Adrian Burgoyne and Patrice, his wife, had been fated by destiny to find the starting-point in their career, that had led them, surely, inevitably, through deep waters, to the sure sunlight of later happiness.

Here the long chase had begun; here it ended. Thousands from every land would view the majestic scene, wonder-eyed, entranced by its material splendour, but, to that devoted two, the thought of the dash for liberty, of the hunted fugitive, of the wild flames of the burning barge, of the reckless spring into the bubbling billows, of Convict 407, another night like this in the long-ago, sanctified the spot with memories that would continue while life endured.

From that peril, darkness, gloom and wretchedness had been evolved security, light, joy and bliss.

Heaven was kind—Heaven was just! and the man who had never lost his faith, who had battled every dark demon of despair with trust and courage supreme, as he clasped the hand of Patrice, faithful, bonny Patrice, felt that the love he had won was as the shadow of a great rock in a weary land!

The End.

POSTAL RATES.

Short Stories will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. Arthur Pearson, at "Pearson's Weekly" Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

HAVE YOU A POST CARD?

If not, please obtain one, and send it to the

PEARSON POTTERY CO., HANLEY,

with your name and address on the back, and you will receive by next post full particulars of the most wonderful package of crockery the world has ever seen.

100 PIECES FOR £1 1s.

100 PIECES FOR £1 1s.

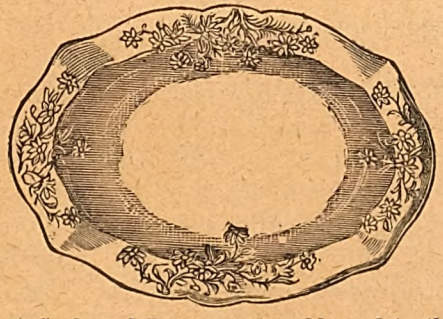
A Dinner Service of 50 pieces is included, which is guaranteed to be worth the guinea alone, and a China Tea Service of 28 pieces, finished in gold, together with a lot of useful kitchen crockery.

The Secret of the Success.—The Pearson Pottery Company are manufacturers, not middlemen, like many other advertisers. The Pearson Potteries have nearly 2,000ft. frontage to the town of Hanley.

Thousands Sold All Over the World. Everybody not only satisfied but amazed at the quantity and quality given.



Hundreds of these packages are applied for as WEDDING or BIRTHDAY PRESENTS. And what more useful present can be given? Every item is useful.

Post Cards and Letters to be addressed to the

PEARSON POTTERY CO., HANLEY, STAFFS.

HAIR DESTROYED

permanently and absolutely by an entirely new and harmless self-treatment, total destruction guaranteed. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope. Prof. F.T. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

BLUSHING

Permanently cured. A Pamphlet giving sound practical advice and particulars of a successful treatment for a rapid, simple, and inexpensive home-cure, forwarded free to all upon receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—Prof. B. L. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

TO THE DEAF.

A Gentleman who cured himself of Deafness and Noises in the Head after fourteen years' suffering, will gladly send full particulars of the remedy post free.—Address, H. CLIFTON, Amberley House, Norfolk Street, Strand, London, W.C.

DOUGLAS, HUNGERFORD, AND WILLIAMS.

PROFITS PAID DURING 1895.

Jan. 2, £8 per cent., Feb. 1, £6, Mar. 1, £5, April 1, £8, May 1, £7, June 2, £10, July 1, £9, Aug. 1, £9, Sept. 2, £8, Oct. 1, £8, Nov. 1, £7, Dec. 2, £7.

Total for 12 months £92 per cent., an average of nearly £8 PER CENT. PER MONTH.

PROFITS PAID DURING 1896.

Jan. 2 ... £6 per cent. | Feb. 1 ... £7 per cent.

OUR NEW ILLUSTRATED MANUAL mailed free upon request, showing how these profits may be made WITHOUT SPECULATION. Cheques for profits mailed promptly 1st of each month, and for withdrawals of capital on 2nd and 16th of each month. Trial investments of £5 and upwards may be made.

We have not a dissatisfied Client.

DOUGLAS, HUNGERFORD, & WILLIAMS, 5, Copthall Avenue, London, E.C., and 11, Place de la Bourse, Paris.

THIN BUSTS

Quickly transformed and a good figure permanently obtained by a perfectly harmless, simple, and inexpensive self-treatment. Success guaranteed. For particulars, free, send stamped envelope in confidence to "Madame B. J.," Oriental Toilet Co., 87, Strand, London.

RED NOSES

Permanently cured in a few days by a simple, inexpensive self-treatment. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope to Dr. A. M. CURTIS, York Chambers, Adelphi, London, W.C.

TOO STOUT

Dr. Grey's FAT REDUCING Pills.

A safe, rapid, and permanent reduction and improvement in health and breathing guaranteed. A special preparation kept for stubborn cases (either sex) which have resisted other treatment.

ABDOMINAL OBESITY A SPECIALTY.

2/9 and 4/6 per box, plain wrapper, post free to all parts. Dr. O. GREY, 57, Weymouth St., Portland Pl., London, W.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

WE MUST HAVE THE TOOLS.

Robinson Crusoe, you remember, made a big boat or canoe out of the trunk of a tree. It was a laborious and tedious job. And that wasn't the worst of it. When he got the boat done he couldn't launch it. It was too heavy for one man to handle. If he had only had an arrangement like the capstan of a ship he might have managed. He understood how to do it, but lacked the tools. How often we find ourselves at a dead stand for that same reason. Let me give you a fresh illustration, tied up for the moment in the following letter, which must first be read before we can rightly come at the point.

"In the spring of 1884," says our correspondent, "I got into a low, weak way, not being able to imagine what had happened to me. My strength kept ebbing away till I had scarcely the desire or ability to do anything. I felt as tired as if I had just arrived home from a long, hard journey, yet no tax more than usual of any kind had been laid upon me. My mind, too, was weary; so that I turned from things that obliged me to think, plan, or consider.

"Side by side, so to speak, with all this was the failure of my appetite. Of course I continued to eat, or make an effort to eat, but food no longer tempted me as it does a person in health. I picked and minced over my meals, and the little I took neither tasted good nor did me any good after I had eaten it. Instead of warming, comforting and stimulating me, as it used to do, it gave me distress at the stomach, pain at the chest, and a singular feeling of tightness around the waist, as though a belt were buckled too snug around me.

"After a time the condition of my stomach seemed to grow worse. There was that sense of gnawing, so often mentioned by others, and occasionally a feeling of faintness and sinking, almost like the ground giving way under one's feet."

[Remark: An eminent London physician, in one of his books, describes this sinking feeling as one of the most appalling and frightful that it is possible to experience. It is not the body but the mind that suffers. I, the present writer, have had two attacks of it, and pray to have no more. It is like unto the overshadowing of the Death Angel's wing, with the mind fully conscious of the situation. The cause is uric acid poison in the blood, one of the products of prolonged indigestion.]

"When this sinking feeling came on," continues the letter, "it weighed me down like a nightmare. Finally I got to be so weak I could only walk slowly and feebly. The doctor who prescribed for me said my complaint was dyspepsia, but his medicine had no perceptible effect.

"I continued like this for eight years; not always the same, but now better and then worse. Yet in all that long time there was not a day when I could say I was well. No medicine or treatment seemed right for me, and I almost began to think I never should recover my former health.

"In March, 1892, Mother Seigel's Syrup was recommended to me as having done wonders in cases like mine, even when they were of long standing and everything else had failed. No harm to try it, we thought, and got a bottle from Mr. Grime, the chemist, in Bolton Road; and after taking it I felt great relief. My appetite quickly improved and I could eat without pain. When I had taken two or three bottles more the bad symptoms had all gone, and I was as well as ever. My husband also took the medicine with the same good results. You may publish my letter and refer inquiries to me. (Signed) (Mrs.) Elizabeth Wilson, 5, Northcote Street, Bolton Road, Darwen, March 1st, 1895."

The lesson in this interesting narrative is too plain for us to miss it. Our old friend Crusoe was not able to launch his boat for the want of machinery. Similarly the doctor who attended Mrs. Wilson was not able to cure her because he did not possess the right remedy. His opinion as to her complaint was entirely correct. She was suffering from chronic dyspepsia, precisely as he told her. But alas! it is one thing to know what ought to be done and quite another to have the knowledge and means to do it.

Between these two things (over this wide gap) stands Mother Seigel's Syrup, just as between the two sides of the Thames stands London Bridge.

Digitized by Google

NEW SERIAL BEGINS THIS WEEK.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 376. FOR WEEK ENDING MARCH 14TH, 1896. [ONE PENNY.

1896 PROCLAMATION.

Grand Pioneer Reduction Sale

By Messrs. F. HODGSON & SON, The Well-known Carpet Manufacturers of the City of Leeds, will take effect on sight of this advertisement.

OUR NEW VENTURE! Yes, Two Different Pattern Hearthrugs or Carpets for the Price of One! (Copyright).

Whereas, in launching forth our New Production, THE "PRUDENTIAL" CARPETS AND HEARTHRUGS, we beg to state they will have a Rich Turkish and Persian Design on one side, and on the reverse the elegant and costly designs of Wilton make. The advantage thus gained is great, as they can be utilised in various rooms at one cost. This is a valuable step in economy.

PRODIGIOUS SALE OF THE

"PRUDENTIAL" Reversible CARPETS

(Registered.)

Reversible, with a different pattern on both sides, woven throughout with handsome border to correspond; richly blended in several colours to suit any furniture. Made in 10 sizes only. These carpets are the production of much care, labour, and forethought, and are made in handsome and elaborate patterns (which are protected by registration). They combine the rich blended colours of the Turkish and Persian with the elegant designs of the Wilton. These goods cannot be distinguished from real Brussels when laid down, and cannot be excelled in durability.

	Each.		Each.
6ft. by 9ft., Reduced Sale Price	4/9	9ft. by 15ft., Reduced Sale Price	12/6
7½ft. by 9ft. " " "	5/11	12ft. by 12ft., " " "	12/9
9ft. by 9ft. " " "	7/6	12ft. by 13½ft., " " "	14/6
9ft. by 10½ft., " " "	8/6	12ft. by 15ft., " " "	15/9
9ft. by 12ft., " " "	9/6	12ft. by 18ft., " " "	19/6
10½ft. by 12ft., " " "	11/6	12ft. by 21ft., " " "	22/6

When ordering please mention if for Bed, Dining, Drawing, or Sitting Room, and any particular colour preferred.

"Neal Lodge, Upper Norwood, S.E., January 18th., 1896.

The Dowr. Lady Abercromby is pleased with the 'Prudential' Carpet she ordered."

Blairquhan, Maybole, N.B., August 3rd.

Lady Hunter Blair writes: "Will Messrs. F. Hodgson & Son send her another 'Prudential' Carpet, same as before, crimson and gold, dimensions, 9ft. by 10½ft. Cheque inclosed."

A Reversible "Prudential" Hearthrug (Reg)., to match above Carpets, sent for 1s. 6d. extra, size 2 yards long, and 1 yard wide.

SPECIAL OFFER.—3 Hearthrugs for 4s. 3d.; or 6 for 8s.; or 12 for 15s. 6d.

EXTRAORDINARY REDUCTIONS.

100,000 "ALARM" CARPETS

(Registered). GUARANTEED GENUINE BARGAINS.

Sale Price 2/11 EACH.

This Gigantic Offer is a Special Contract, made with readers of Short Stories only. We will forward direct from the looms to any address on receipt of amount, A GENUINE WOVEN, SEAMLESS, REVERSIBLE CARPET, the largest ever sold at the Price.

Suitable for Sitting-room or Bedroom, Bordered and Woven in Art Colours, large enough to cover any ordinary-sized room, as an advertisement for our goods, thus saving any Middle Profits. Remember these are Woven, not printed, and are made of a material almost equal to Wool. Thousands of these Carpets and Rugs have already been sold at almost double above prices. A Rug sent with Carpet. 10d. extra.

SPECIAL OFFER. 2 Carpets and 2 Rugs ... ... 7s. 3d.

Value unequalled in the Annals of Advertising. As a favour, kindly Examine and Compare these Carpets.

"SHORT STORIES" CARPET COUPON, 14/3/96.

On receipt of this Coupon and P.O.O. or Stamps for amount, we guarantee to send goods as above to your address in any part of the United Kingdom. Cash returned in full if not satisfied.

(Signed) F. HODGSON & SON.

All orders dispatched same day in rotation as they arrive by post. Cheques and P.O.'s payable to

F. HODGSON AND SON, Manufacturers, Importers, and Merchants,

WOODSLEY ROAD, LEEDS.

Telegraphic Address—"Eclipse, Leeds." Telephone No. 948.

MASON'S EXTRACT OF HERBS

For the Immediate Production of

BOTANIC BEER.

A Nine-gallon Cask of Alcoholic Beer from a Brewery will cost you 10/6, but Eight Gallons of Beer made from

Mason's EXTRACT of HERBS

Can be obtained for 6d., plus a pound or two of Sugar and a little Yeast.

THE FINEST BEVERAGE IN THE WORLD.

Inventors and Manufacturers:

Newball & Mason,

HYSON GREEN WORKS,

Nottingham.

If unable to obtain it in your neighbourhood, send 9 stamps for sample bottle; or samples of both Wine Essence and Extract of Herbs, post free for 15 stamps.

PALATABLE SUBSTITUTE FOR COD LIVER OIL.

DEVONSHIRE CREAM.

(REALLY GENUINE.)

In Patent Air-tight Tins, ½lb., 1s. 4d.; 1lb., 2s. 4d.; 2lbs., 4s., including Tin and Postage.

MRS. CONYERS, KILKHAMPTON, STRATTON, N. DEVON.

Digitized by Google

THE JOHN NOBLE

HALF-GUINEA COSTUMES

Direct from the Largest Firm of Costume Manufacturers in the World, have secured beyond a doubt the ADMIRATION OF THE WORLD. Being Absolutely Without an Equal Anywhere for Stylish Appearance, Durability, and Actual Money Value.

10/6

TWO GOLD MEDALS AWARDED.

These Costumes have received the highest praise from the leading journals of the day, and are justly regarded by all purchasers as Even Better than Advertised.

Each Costume scientifically cut, tailor-made, and beautifully finished in an exceedingly smart mode, as illustration. The design consists of full wide Godet skirt with belt, also very neat bodice with full front and broad box-pleat down centre, trimmed bold silk cord and three large buttons. Collar and cuffs outlined silk cord; saddle and sleeves lined.

Price complete only 10/6, safely packed and sent carriage paid for 9d. extra.

Sizes in stock fit any figure up to 38ins. round bust under arms, skirts being 38, 40, and 42 ins. long in front; larger or special sizes made to measure, 1/6 extra.

THE JOHN NOBLE

COSTUMES FOR YOUNG MISSES

are made in the John Noble Cheviot Serge, and trimmed military braid as illustration. A large box-pleat down the centre of the lined bodice, and a fancy pocket at each side of the skirt, complete a charming design at these prices: FROM 8/6

Lengths	35	38	42	46	50 inches.
Prices	8/6	9/6	10/9	12/-	13/6 each.

Each costume safely packed and sent carriage paid for 9d. extra

KNOCKABOUT FROCKS FOR GIRLS are also supplied in the John Noble Cheviot Serge, with saddle top, long full sleeves, and pocket, at following prices: FROM 1/6

Lengths	21	24	27	30	33	36	39	42	45 ins.
Prices	1/6	2/-	2/6	3/-	3/6	4/-	4/6	5/-	5/6 ea.

Postage 4½d. extra. Lengths stated above are from top of neckband to bottom of skirt in front.

COLOURS: Any of the above garments can be supplied in Black, Navy, Brown, Myrtle, Bronze Green, Electric Blue, Ruby, Dark Cinnamon, Fawn, or Grey.

The JOHN NOBLE CHEVIOT SERGE in which the above garments are made is a fabric of world-wide fame and durability, measuring 56ins. wide. The full Dress Length of Six Yards can be supplied for 7/6, or any length at 1/3 the yard. Colours as above. 7/6

PATTERNS, also FASHION SHEETS of numerous other designs in Ladies' and Children's Costumes, etc., sent Post Free on application. Please mention "Short Stories" when ordering.

JOHN NOBLE LTD., Brook St. Mills, MANCHESTER.

MRS. JACKSON

An artist's wife, residing at Norton, near Malton, states: "I am deeply grateful to you for the good received through taking your Wind Pills. I suffered severely from

INDIGESTION, SPASMS,

and LIVER COMPLAINT. The doctors gave me up as incurable, nor did I think it possible for me to recover. I scarcely dared to eat any food, fearing suffocation. Seeing an advertisement of

Page Woodcock's Wind Pills,

I resolved to try them. After taking a few small boxes I lost all the painful symptoms, and now enjoy good health. Publish my statement as you please."

All sufferers from INDIGESTION, LIVER COMPLAINTS, WIND on the STOMACH, SICK HEADACHE, BILIOUSNESS, etc., should avail themselves of this most excellent medicine.

☛ The Wind Pills being purely Vegetable, Tasteless, and Mild, and Tonic in their action, may be taken with perfect safety by the most delicate of either sex.

Of all Medicine Vendors, at 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. Post Free for P.O. or Stamps from

PAGE WOODCOCK, LINCOLN.

DOUGLAS, HUNGERFORD, AND WILLIAMS.

PROFITS PAID DURING 1895.

Jan. 2, £8 per cent., Feb. 1, £6, Mar. 1, £5, April 1, £8, May 1, £7, June 2, £10, July 1, £9, Aug. 1, £9, Sept. 2, £8, Oct. 1, £8, Nov. 1, £7, Dec. 2, £7.

Total for 12 months £92 per cent., an average of nearly £8 PER CENT. PER MONTH.

PROFITS PAID DURING 1896.

Jan. 2 ... £6 per cent. | Feb. 1 ... £7 per cent.

OUR NEW ILLUSTRATED MANUAL

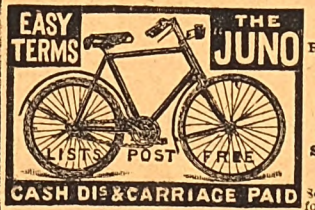
mailed free upon request, showing how these profits may be made WITHOUT SPECULATION. Cheques for profits mailed promptly 1st of each month, and for withdrawals of capital on 2nd and 16th of each month. Trial investments of £5 and upwards may be made.

We have not a dissatisfied Client.

DOUGLAS, HUNGERFORD, & WILLIAMS, 5, Copthall Avenue, London, E.C., and 11, Place de la Bourse, Paris.

"JUNO" CYCLES

Are the Very Best.



JUNO Safeties. Roadsters, 28lb.; Racers, 22lb. JUNO Lady's Safety a Specialite.

Send at once for JUNO Catalogue, sent post free to any part of the world, interesting and valuable to all. METROPOLITAN MACHINISTS' CO., LTD., 75 and 76, Bishopsgate Without, London, E.C.

N.B.—Every JUNO Guaranteed. MENTION PAPER.

EPPS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

COCOA

RED NOSES

Permanently cured in a few days by a simple, inexpensive self-treatment. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope to Dr. A. M. CURTIS, York Chambers, Adelphi, London, W.C.

S.S. S.S.

PEARSON'S

£100

COUPON.

No. II

Mar. 14, 1896.

S.S. S.S.

HAIR DESTROYED.

A doctor's widow knows of a simple, inexpensive remedy that permanently destroys the roots, and will forward particulars free to all those afflicted sending stamped envelope. Address Mrs. B. D. WOOD, 4, DUKE STREET, VILLIERS STREET, LONDON, W.

ARE YOU LITTLE?

If so, wear the "A 1" Invisible Elevators (Regd.). Will increase your height up to four inches; the only approved means; detection impossible; simple, inexpensive. Send stamped envelope for particulars to the ORIENTAL TOILET CO. (B 6 Dept.), 67, Strand, London.

WE GIVE AWAY

Free of all cost, Hosiery, Dress Skirts, Printed Blouses, and Complete Dress Lengths. Every woman should write for particulars and the most Marvellous Dress Guide, which are sent free on receipt of a Post Card. ADDRESS: Shakespeare Manufacturing Co. (Dept. 19), Milk St., Manchester.

TOOTH-ACHE

CURED INSTANTLY BY

BUNTER'S NERVINE

Prevents Decay. Saves Extraction. Sleepless Nights Prevented. Neuralgic Headache and all Nerve Pains Removed by BUNTER'S NERVINE. All Chemists, 1s. 1½d.

BLUSHING

Permanently cured. A Pamphlet giving sound practical advice and particulars of a successful treatment for a rapid, simple, and inexpensive home-cure, forwarded free to all upon receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—Prof. B. L. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

HAIR DESTROYED.

A lady who has permanently destroyed Superfluous Hairs on herself, will be happy to forward free, to all similarly afflicted, full particulars of a simple, inexpensive and harmless self-treatment. Send stamped addressed envelope in confidence to Mrs. "T. D." 67 Strand, London.

TO TOBACCONISTS COMMENCING.

£20

See Illus. Guide and Catalogue (250 pages), 3d. "How to Open a Cigar Stores, from £20 to £2,000." TOBACCONISTS' OUTFITTING CO., 186, Euston Road, London. (Over 50 years' reputation.) Manager, H. MYERS.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

LOVE ADVENTURE ROMANCE WAR HUMOUR PATHOS

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON.

No. 376.] For the Week ending March 14th, 1896. [ONE PENNY.

THE PRISONER OF WAR.

Translated from the Spanish.

"DON BASILIO, play us a tune on the cornet, and we will dance. It is cool here under the trees."

"Yes, yes, Don Basilio, play something."

"Bring him the cornet Joaquin is practising with."

"It is not a very good one, but you'll play for us, will you not, Don Basilio?"

"No."

"You won't?"

"No."

"But why?"

"Because I don't know how."

"He doesn't know how! Did you ever see such a hypocrite?"

"Come, come, Don Basilio. Why, we know you've been leader of a military band."

"And that nobody could play the cornet like yourself."

"And that you have a pension from the government."

"Well, yes, it's truth. I have been a musician in my time, and the cornet was the instrument I played; but it is also true that years ago I gave my cornet away to a poor player in need of one, and since that time have not so much as hummed a tune."

"What a pity!"

"Oh, but this afternoon you must play for us."

"Remember it is my birthday, grandpapa."

"And here is the cornet at last."

"Now let's have a pretty tune."

"A waltz?"

"No, a polka!"

"No, no; a fandango, a fandango—our national dance."

"Don't bother me, children. Have I not said that I cannot play?"

"But why can't you?"

All rights reserved.]

"Because I've forgotten the way, and because, moreover, I have vowed never to learn again."

"To whom did you make this vow, father?"

"To myself, to a dead friend, and to your poor mother, my daughter."

All the bright, childish faces grew sad upon hearing these words.

"Oh, if you only knew at what cost I learnt to play the cornet!" continued the old man.

"The story! the story!" exclaimed the children. "Tell us a story."

"Well, yes," said Don Basilio, "it is really a story worth telling. Listen, and you shall judge for yourselves whether I can or cannot play for you to-day."

And seating himself under a tree, surrounded by the wondering children, he told them the story of how he learnt to play the cornet. Let us listen to Don Basilio.

* * * * *

It is now seventeen years ago that our beloved Spain was shaken by civil war. Carlos and Isabel disputed the crown, and our countrymen, divided into two factions, shed their blood in fratricidal conflict.

I had in those days a friend named Ramon Gomez, cavalry lieutenant in the same battalion, one of the best hearted fellows I have ever known. We were educated together; together we left college; together had we passed many happy days, and together we were ready to die for liberty. Oh, I can truly say that he was more attached to the Liberal cause than any of us, and his loyalty was never questioned. Yet, even so, a certain injustice committed by our chief, one of those abuses of authority that wreck the most honourable career, made the cavalry lieutenant desert the ranks of his fellow soldiers, the friend leave his friend, the Liberal abandon his cause for that of a hated faction, the subordinate desire to kill his superior officer.

Digitized by Google

Neither my warnings nor my intreaties availed to dissuade him from this rash step. It was a thing decided. He would change the helmet for the cap, despising, as he did, the rebels and their cause.

At that time we found ourselves in the principality of L——, three miles from the enemy. It was the night in which Ramon was to desert—a cheerless evening, cold and wet, on the eve of a battle. At midnight Ramon entered my tent. I was asleep.

"Basilio," he whispered in my ear.

"Who's there?" I asked, waking with a start.

"It is I. Good-bye."

"You are going already?"

"Yes. Good-bye." And he grasped my hand. "Listen," he continued. "If to-morrow there is a great battle, as is the rumour, and we come face to face in it——"

"I know, I know," I interrupted. "We are friends."

"Good. We clasp hands, and fight afterwards. I shall die to-morrow surely, but not until I have fought my way to the side of the lieutenant-colonel. As for you, Basilio, do not expose yourself."

"Glory is but a vapour."

"And life?"

"Well said. Make yourself a commandant. The pay is not ethereal—that is, not till one has smoked it away. Ah, but all that has now ended for me."

"What melancholy thoughts!" I cried, not without a sinking at the heart. "To-morrow we shall survive the battle."

"Well, if this be so, let us now appoint a meeting place."

"Where?"

"In the hermitage of St. Nicholas at one o'clock to-morrow night. He who is not there by that time shall be given up for dead by the other. Is it agreed?"

"Agreed."

"Well, then, good-bye."

"Good-bye."

We embraced affectionately and parted, Ramon disappearing under shelter of the darkness.

* * * * *

As we had expected, the rebels attacked us the following day. The action was a bloody one, and lasted from three o'clock in the afternoon until nightfall. About five o'clock my battalion was roughly set upon by a party of Alaveses led by Ramon. He then wore the uniform and decorations of a commandant, and on his head was the white cap of the Carlists. I ordered my company to fire upon Ramon's forces. He retaliated, and soon our battalions were engaged in a hand-to-hand struggle. We were victorious, and Ramon was forced to retreat with the scattered remnants of his band, not, however, before he had slain with his own hand our lieutenant-colonel, who opposed a desperate but vain resistance to the fury of his antagonist.

Towards sunset the fortunes of war turned against us, and part of my unfortunate company was, with myself, cut off from the main body and forced to surrender. I was taken prisoner to the little village of——, which the Carlists occupied, and as the war was without quarter on their side I expected to be immediately put to death.

While confined, disheartened and weary, in the gaol I heard the hour of one ring out, the time for my meeting with Ramon. I asked for my friend, and was told: "He is a hero—killed a lieutenant-colonel with his own hand—but he must undoubtedly have perished in the last hours of battle."

"Why do you think so?" I asked.

"Because he has not yet come back to camp, and those he commanded can give no account of him."

Oh! what I suffered that night. But one hope remained to comfort me—that Ramon was still awaiting me at the hermitage, and for this reason had not returned. "How troubled he will be when he finds I do not come!" I said to myself. "He will believe me dead, and, indeed, am I very far from being so? My last hour cannot now be far distant." At daybreak a chaplain entered the prison. My companions in misery were sleeping.

"Death?" I exclaimed upon seeing the priest.

"Yes," he replied softly.

"Now?" I asked.

"No; within three hours."

A few minutes later my fellow prisoners had awakened. Sobs, cries, and blasphemies filled the prison.

Every man about to die usually has one idea that is ever present in his thoughts and to which he clings. So it was with me, and weakness, fever, or madness, I know not which, filled my mind with thoughts of my friend—of Ramon living, of Ramon dead, of Ramon waiting for me in the hermitage, of Ramon waiting for me in Heaven—and so powerfully had those ideas taken possession of my mind that I thought of nothing else during those hours of agony.

They took off my captain's uniform and wrapped me in an old soldier's cloak, placing upon my head the Carlist cap. Thus I marched to my death with my nineteen companions in misery. One only had been pardoned, and this because he was a musician. The Carlists at that time spared the lives of all musicians on account of there being a great scarcity of them in their battalions.

"And were you a musician, Don Basilio? Did you save yourself by that?" exclaimed his hearers with one breath.

"No, my children," responded the veteran. "I then knew nothing of music."

Well, the execution squad drew up in line, and we were placed facing it. I was No. 11 in the row—that is to say, I should be the eleventh to die. Then I thought of my wife and child—of you and your poor mother, my daughter.

The firing began. Those awful death volleys maddened me. As my eyes were bandaged, I could not see my companions fall one by one. I wished to count the discharges, so as to be able to prepare myself for the last moment, but at the third or fourth volley I lost count.

Oh, the echo of those shots will reverberate in my heart and brain for ever as they rang out that fatal day! At one moment they were a thousand leagues away; the next, their thunder seemed to peal within my very ear. And the volley continued.

"Now!" I thought. The sharp report followed, and I was still alive.

"This will be it," I said, and then I felt myself seized by the shoulder, and dragged out of the ranks, while voices sounded in my ears.

I fell unconscious to the ground, the last thought that passed through my mind being that I had been shot and was dying.

Afterwards it seemed to me that I was lying stretched on my prison cot. I half raised myself and looked around me, trying to pierce the darkness with my eyes. A shadow more obscure than the others appeared to detach itself and bend over me. It had the outline of a man.

Digitized by Google

My lips murmured mechanically the name of him who had been so much in my thoughts.

"Ramon!"

"What is it?" replied the shadow.

I shuddered. "My God!" I exclaimed. "Can I be in the other world?"

"No," replied the same voice.

"Ramon—you still live?"

"Yes."

"And I——"

"Also."

"Where am I? This is not the hermitage of St. Nicholas, and I still live a prisoner, or has it all been a dream?"

"No, Basilio, you have not been dreaming. Listen!

"As you know, yesterday I killed the lieutenant-colonel in fair fight. Afterwards, mad with the excitement of the battle, I went on fighting desperately until the close of the action. Then as the moon rose, I thought of you and of our appointment, and directed my steps to the old hermitage, with the intention of awaiting you there. It was about ten o'clock when I arrived, so, as the hour agreed upon was one, I lay down to sleep. At the stroke of one I awoke with a start to find myself alone. Two, three, four, the hours rang out, and still you did not come. Without doubt, I said to myself, he is dead, and with a heavy heart I set out at daybreak for the rebel camp. All had given me up for lost, so I was received with joy, and the General showered distinction upon me.

"Afterwards I learnt that some prisoners were to be executed that morning. A presentiment filled my mind. 'Can Basilio be among them?' I thought. I ran towards the place of execution. The soldiers of the firing squadron had already taken their position. I heard the report of the rifles as they rang out in volleys on the still morning air.

"At length I reach the scene, and look rapidly along the line of victims, but can see nothing. Anguish blinds me; fear unnerves me. Then I distinguish you but two places removed from that of death! What is to be done? I go mad, give a shout, break through the line of soldiers, and rush to your side, and flinging my arms around you, exclaimed hoarsely:

"'This one—no! This one—no, my general!'

"The general who was in charge of the execution, and who knew me so favourably by my behaviour in the previous day's battle, asked curiously:

"'Why? Is he a musician?'

"That word was for me what it would be for a man born blind to suddenly see the sun in all its splendour. The light of hope fell on my eyes and dazzled them.

"'Musician!' I cried. 'Yes, yes, my general. A musician—a great musician!'

"'What instrument does he play?' inquired the General.

"'The—the—er—that is—why, of course, the cornet! He plays the cornet.'

"'Are we in need of a cornet player?' said he, turning to the leader of the band. Five seconds—five eternities, before the answer came:

"'Yes, General; one is needed.'

"'Well, then,' continued the General, 'remove that man from the ranks, and let the executions proceed at once.'

"Then I caught you in my arms and brought you here."

Scarcely had Ramon ceased speaking when I arose, trembling, and between laughter and tears embraced him, saying:

"I owe my life to you."

"Hardly that," replied Ramon.

"What do you mean?" I exclaimed.

"Can you play the cornet?" he asked.

"No."

"Then you do not owe me your life; rather it is that I have compromised my own safety without securing yours."

I felt my heart grow cold within me.

"And music," he continued, "do you know anything of that?"

"Very little. You will remember what they taught us in college."

"Little, indeed, or, better said, nothing," replied Ramon; "you will die, without the slightest doubt, and I also as a traitor. Just think of that! In fifteen days the band to which you belong is to be organised."

"Fifteen days!"

"Neither more nor less. And as you will not be able to take your place in it (for God will not work a miracle) we shall both be shot."

"To put you to death!" I cried. "You, for my sake—for me, whom you have risked your life to save! Ah, heaven will not permit it! Within fifteen days I shall learn to play the cornet!"

Ramon burst into a laugh.

What more shall I say, my children? In fifteen days—oh, power of the human will—in fifteen days, with their fifteen nights—for I slept no more than nature compelled in half a month—in fifteen days I had learned to play the cornet.

What days those were! Ramon and I left camp early each morning and passed hours with a musician who came from a neighbouring village to teach me.

Escape! I can read this thought in your eyes. Ah, nothing more impossible. I was a prisoner. They never relaxed their vigilance, and Ramon did not wish to escape without me.

It seems to me now as if in all that time I could neither eat nor sleep nor think of aught save my cornet. I was insane, and music was my monomania.

I was resolved to learn, and I did. And if I had been dumb I should have spoken; and paralytic, I should have walked; and blind, should have seen—because I willed it.

Oh! the will answers for all. Resolution is power. Children, learn this great truth—to will is to achieve.

I saved thus my life and that of my friend. But I went mad, and my madness was the art I had learned. It might be said that in three years the cornet never left my hand. Do—re—mi—fa—sol—la—si—behold my world during that time.

But Ramon did not abandon me. Together we emigrated to France, and there I continued my playing. The cornet was myself—it seemed to ring in my mouth.

The people, the notabilities in the art, all gathered to hear me. It was a wonder, a marvel. The cornet seemed to yield to my fingers, it became elastic, it moaned, it wept, it cried aloud, it imitated the birds, the wild beasts, the human sob.

Thus passed two years more. At the end of that time Ramon died. Gazing upon my friend's dead body I recovered my reason, and when, then in my right mind, I one day took up the cornet and tried to play, I found to my astonishment that the power had left me.

Will you now ask me to play a tune for your dance?

Digitized by Google

THE TIN BOX.

Henry Dyson was alone in the little office at the back end of his shop.

Mr. Dyson was a pleasant-looking man of about thirty-five or forty, and his fellow townsmen frequently pointed to him with pride as a self-made business man.

But while everybody had a good word for Henry Dyson, very few people spoke well of his brother Tom.

On the night our story opens the merchant was waiting for his graceless brother, and as the hours rolled on the frown on his face grew deeper.

"I can do nothing with Tom," he said, as he paced the floor impatiently. "I have given him every possible chance, but he grows more idle and dissipated every day. Perhaps I ought not to wait for him, but he was so urgent in his request for an interview to-night that I could not refuse. Poor fellow! What new trouble can he be mixed up in?"

The front door opened and a young man entered quietly, and after a furtive glance round the shop proceeded to the office.

"Well, Tom?" said Henry Dyson.

"I am here, you see," replied Tom.

"I suppose," said Henry, "that it is useless to ask why you are so late, or where you have been during the last two days?"

Tom looked a little nervous, and his eyes fell.

"That is neither here nor there," he answered in a swaggering way. "I have had some business of my own to look after, and I knew that you were not short of help in the shop."

"Well, what is it?" asked Henry abruptly.

"Brother," Tom broke out hurriedly and in a faltering voice, "I must have some money, fifty pounds or so."

"I wonder where you will get it," Henry rejoined. "You will not get another penny from me—that is certain. Why should I toil here and economise in order to furnish you with funds to be lost at the gaming table?"

"If I do not get this money," said Tom, turning very pale, "I shall have to leave the country."

"A good thing for the country, then," snapped Henry. "Don't let me interfere with your travelling plans."

Tom seemed to fall all to pieces at this reply. He made one more effort.

"I hope you are not hard up yourself?" he said.

"I was never getting along better," responded the merchant, "but that has nothing to do with the case."

He pulled open the door of the iron safe and pointed to a little tin box.

"Do you see that?" he asked. "Well that box contains twenty crisp £100 bank-notes. I drew the money from the bank to-day for an investment. No, Tom, I am prospering, but I am tired of your endless drain upon my purse. It must stop, and now is the time."

Henry rose from his chair, and went into a little closet for his overcoat.

In an instant, before a man could count three seconds, Tom had drawn the flat tin box from the safe, and slipped it into the breast of his heavy overcoat.

His brother slowly emerged from the closet and put on his overcoat. Then he closed the door of the safe with a click.

"I am ready to go," he said. "You have no further business with me, I presume?"

"No, sir," Tom responded, with a pale, determined face. "Neither now nor later; good-bye."

"Good-bye, old fellow," said Henry with a yawn.

Tom walked out of the shop without another word, banging the door after him.

"I know him," soliloquised the merchant. "He will not leave here. He will be here to-morrow, with a new proposition. Perhaps, after all, I had better look into his affairs, and give him another chance."

He walked slowly out of the building and locked the door. A glance up and down the street showed him that Tom was not in sight, and he then quietly made his way to his home, and straightway went to bed.

After leaving the shop Tom hugged the tin box to his breast, and walked at a rapid pace.

"It was an awful thing to do," he muttered, "but I had to have money, and I worked to make some of it."

The young man sped onwards through the deserted streets until he reached the river. He crossed the bridge and started up the hill on the other side.

His plan was plain enough. He was going to a suburban railway station to take the train for Southampton.

Suddenly he pulled up with a jerk. He took the tin box from under his coat.

"Hang it!" he exclaimed. "I must have been mad. I am no thief, and I will cut my throat before I will become one. There is but one thing to do. I will take the box back to my brother, confess my folly, and then leave him."

Digitized by Google

He turned and retraced his steps. When he reached the bridge he paused a moment, and looked over into the dark waters below.

"I may find peace there," he said gloomily.

He leant over the railing, and listened to the swift rolling current.

"My God!" he cried. "The box—the box!"

It had slipped through his fingers, and already the rushing waters were carrying it to the sea.

Tom ran in the direction of his brother's house, and then wheeled about and ran back to the bridge. His first impulse was to throw himself into the river.

"I am a fool!" he cried. "Suicide will not restore the money. I must be a man now if there is any manhood in me!"

Across the river and over the hill into the thick darkness of the night the guilty fugitive fled. Mile after mile he walked like a madman. The lights of the city disappeared from view, and Tom found himself wandering in an unfamiliar locality.

Again the river came in sight, and the wretched man decided to follow its course. It was not far to the sea. He would go on to the nearest port and ship as a sailor. Anything to get beyond his brother's reach and the eyes of those who knew him.

Thus the light of day found him, but it was not likely that anyone along the river side would recognise him. There were few dwellings, and the people he met were farmers, who were not disposed to be unpleasantly inquisitive.

So the half-crazed man rushed on through the day, till at nightfall he limped wearily into a small seaport town.

* * * * * *

Henry Dyson made every effort to find his missing brother. When he thought of the pained look in Tom's eyes the night the poor fellow left, he reproached himself for allowing him to go away without a kind word of encouragement.

The detectives took the matter up, and the newspapers published an account of Tom's mysterious disappearance. But it was all of no avail. There was no trace, no clue, and after a year or two the merchant came to the conclusion that his brother was a dead man.

Henry Dyson continued to prosper. He married happily, and in the course of time little children came to make his home still brighter.

Twenty years had rolled away, when one night the merchant found himself alone in his office writing a letter.

As he leant back in his chair to take a moment's rest, he thought of the night a score of years before when Tom had visited him there to make a last appeal. Tears came into the rich man's eyes.

"He was my own brother," he sobbed, "and I acted like a brute. How easy it would have been for me to have paid his little debts. Then I could have watched over him, and in time my love would have touched his heart, and he would have turned out all right. But it is too late now to think of those days."

The door opened with hardly a creak, and the merchant would not have known it but for the rush of cool air. He rose from his chair just in time to greet a visitor who walked into the office without even a knock on the door to herald his approach.

Henry Dyson looked upon him in speechless astonishment. If he could trust his eyes this was Tom Dyson, but not the Tom of twenty years ago. He was an old man with a wrinkled face and white hair.

"Brother," said the visitor, holding out his hand, "are you glad to see me?"

With a joyous exclamation the other caught him in his embrace, and then seated him in a chair.

"This is a glad hour for me, Tom," he said. "I had given you up for dead, and I have all these years been reproaching myself for my harshness to you that night, you know."

"Hold on!" cried the other excitedly. "You must not overwhelm me with kindness until I have made restitution. Here in this package you will find the sum I took from the safe in the little tin box. It has taken me these twenty years to make it, but here it is at last."

"But I do not understand," interrupted Henry.

"Oh, but you must," replied his brother. "When you turned away to get your coat that night, I slipped the box out of the safe and concealed it. Then you closed the safe, unconscious of your loss, and I left you."

"But the box was empty!" shouted Henry.

"Impossible!" answered Tom, "for you told me that it contained £2,000. Well, I rushed off with the box, but repented, and was on my way to return it when I carelessly let it slip into the water when I crossed the river. Now you know why I ran away and concealed myself. I had but one object—to make enough money to pay you back, and then I would ask your forgiveness."

"Oh, how foolish!" said Henry. "Why, man, I found in the morning that my bookkeeper had taken the money from the box and carried it back to the bank that afternoon when he found that I was not going to use it until the next day. I missed the empty box, but I never connected that with your disappearance."

"Then this money——"

"Is yours," said Henry. "But even if you had lost my money, as you supposed, you should have come back to me. I sometimes talked roughly to you, but you ought to have known how I loved you, Tom."

The two white-haired men sat there till midnight, talking about old times and making their plans for the future.

"You must live with me, Tom," said Henry, as he took him home. "I can't trust you out of my sight again."

And Tom gave his promise. H. P. N.

Digitized by Google

THE GREAT MIDDLEWICK BANK ROBBERY

CHAPTER I.

Twenty Thousand Pounds.

With an expertness born of long practice, the cashier of the Middlewick Bank counted and shovelled towards the payee of the cheque the gold which looked so much to return for the narrow slip of paper he had received in exchange. Just a minute or two he waited to satisfy himself that everything was correct, and then turned to a gentleman who stood awaiting his leisure.

Instead, however, of stating his business, the caller asked in a low, business-like tone:

"Is the manager of the bank in?"

The stranger was a brisk, bright-eyed man, dressed in a smart business suit, and evidently his visit was not altogether unexpected, for the cashier promptly answered:

"Mr. Bryant is in his room. Will you walk in, please. He is disengaged. Mr. Rutherford will show you the way."

"Is the manager of the bank in?"

"Thank you," said the stranger, quickly following his appointed guide to the door of a room situated at the rear of the modest building.

"Come in," called out the bank manager, his attention still on the papers before him. "Well, Rutherford, what now?"

"A gentleman to see you, sir," and, ushering in the stranger, the young man retired, closing the door quietly behind him.

The two men were evidently unknown to each other, for there was not the slightest recognition in the look which each gave the other.

"Mr. Bryant, I believe?" remarked the visitor.

"Yes, sir."

The caller handed a card to the manager who, after studying it a moment, laid it down and extended his hand.

"Ah, Mr. Taylor, I was expecting someone from your place. Glad to see you; take a seat, won't you? Here, this one near my desk."

The cordial invitation was fully accepted, the two men quickly placing themselves so that there was not the slightest chance of their conversation being overheard.

Mr. Bryant again glanced at the card, on which was printed:

ALFRED TAYLOR

National Detective Agency,
Phillip Cairns, Manager.

"Of course you have come in answer to my note to Mr. Cairns," queried the banker.

"Yes, sir. You sent it by express delivery midday yesterday; it reached our office last night, and so I was able to be here before eleven this morning."

Perhaps it was a slight oversight on Mr. Taylor's part which led Mr. Bryant to believe that he had only that morning reached Middlewick. As a matter of fact he had spent a busy time in the little country town the night before, but the manager was evidently satisfied with the answer.

"Your firm has the reputation of being both prompt, and, I think I may say, successful in these matters."

"Thank you. We have generally given satisfaction, and I hope we shall do so in this case. Your letter did not give the particulars, Mr. Bryant, of the loss your bank has suffered."

"No. I only referred in a general way to the robbery; it didn't strike me it was worth while going into particulars in the letter, as there would be much which of necessity would have to be told over again."

"Quite right."

Mr. Bryant had wheeled his cushioned chair round so as to face his visitor, and as he talked freely, but confidentially, his fingers smoothed the cord to which his eyeglass was attached.

The man who employs a detective to do a delicate job for him must act like a patient with a doctor—keep nothing back—and seemingly the banker had not the slightest intention of attempting to do so. The occurrence which had brought the detective to Middlewick was the most startling in the whole history of the institution, and since, for obvious reasons, the story of the robbery had been carefully hushed up, the banker was only too glad to find someone in whom he might confide without fear of the news spreading.

Digitized by Google

Mr. Taylor's usual custom was to ask questions instead of allowing a patron to tell a voluminous and rambling story. By this means he learnt what he wanted to know, and no more. He separated the wheat from the chaff, finding grains which otherwise would have remained hidden.

"What is the extent of the bank's loss, Mr. Bryant?"

"Twenty thousand pounds."

"Is that the exact sum?"

"To a penny. The notes were done up in twenty packages, each containing a thousand pounds. Those alone were taken."

"But of course a considerable amount was left?"

"Yes, or our doors would not be open to-day. While it will cause us much loss, it cannot affect the solvency of the bank itself."

"When was the money taken?"

"The night before last."

"How was it done?"

"That, I hope you will be able to find out for us; it means a good fee for your agency," replied Mr. Bryant, with a smile, and still stroking his eyeglass cord.

"Excuse me expressing myself awkwardly. To be more direct. You tell me that the bank vault has the combination lock, the kind, I presume, which, although it is now rapidly going out of favour, was so popular a few years ago."

"Yes; it is secured by a combination of three letters. For some time past we have been thinking of employing a more modern apparatus, but unfortunately we have done nothing but think."

"How many possess the combination?"

"It looks as if hitherto unsuspected parties have it, for the vault was not injured in the least. Whoever opened it did so by using the combination regularly employed."

"How many were supposed to have it?"

"Only Herbert Stewart, the cashier, and myself."

"You changed it yesterday."

"Naturally. The horse being stolen we proceeded to lock the stable door."

His fingers smoothed the cord to which his eyeglasses were attached.

"How many watchmen have you?"

"Only one, an elderly man named John Warren."

"How long has he been in your employ?"

"The last twelve years, or more."

"Have you any suspicion of him?"

"Impossible; he is as honest as the day. I would as soon suspect myself."

"What account does he give of the robbery?"

"He knows nothing about it whatever."

"How's that?"

"He slept through it all."

"Are you sure of that?"

"Herbert and I questioned him closely; we could not help believing that he only told the truth when he declared he knew nothing at all about it. It is quite out of his power to counterfeit the consternation he showed."

"But how came he to fall asleep on that night?"

"Because, as he confessed, it has been his custom for years. He is stiff and rheumatic, and in his fright he owned that there hasn't been a night for a long time that he hasn't stretched himself on the settee in the waiting-room and slept till daylight. He kept up his invariable practice, because he knew of no reason for changing it."

"Well, then, how about the cashier?"

"I cannot suspect him. He is a married man, with two children, and one of the members of our local board."

"I wish, Mr. Bryant, that that could be accepted as a proof of his integrity. I will say, however, that I like his looks."

"When did you see him?"

"A few minutes ago. It was he who answered my inquiry as to whether or not you were here."

"He is above suspicion, I tell you," repeated the manager decisively. "It is impossible to suspect him."

"Very well, let him go, then," said the detective, whose "letting go" of the individuals named must be taken in a figurative sense. He had no intention of casting them out of his calculations until he had found out all about them for himself. "The only other employé that I observed behind the counter was the young man whom Mr. Stewart appointed to show me the way here."

"Oh, Rutherford. He is book-keeper here, and the only other employé, except on special occasions when we call in help, or an accountant; but we have not done that for the last fortnight or three weeks."

"Mr. Rutherford struck me as a bright young man."

"He is; and a thoroughly nice fellow apart from business. I always feel glad he gets on so well, as he is the sole support of his widowed mother."

"How long has he been with you?"

"About three years. Surely you don't suspect him! He has never been intrusted with the combination."

"Not openly; but having seen the vault or safe opened, and closed every six days out of seven may have given him the chance of finding it out unnoticed in that time."

Plainly this suggestion startled the banker. He had not thought of it before.

"It may be possible; but I sincerely hope not."

"So do I, for Mr. Rutherford's sake at least. Do you know whether he has any bad habits?"

"No——"

The intonation of the negative showed that the banker had interrupted himself, apparently for no cause.

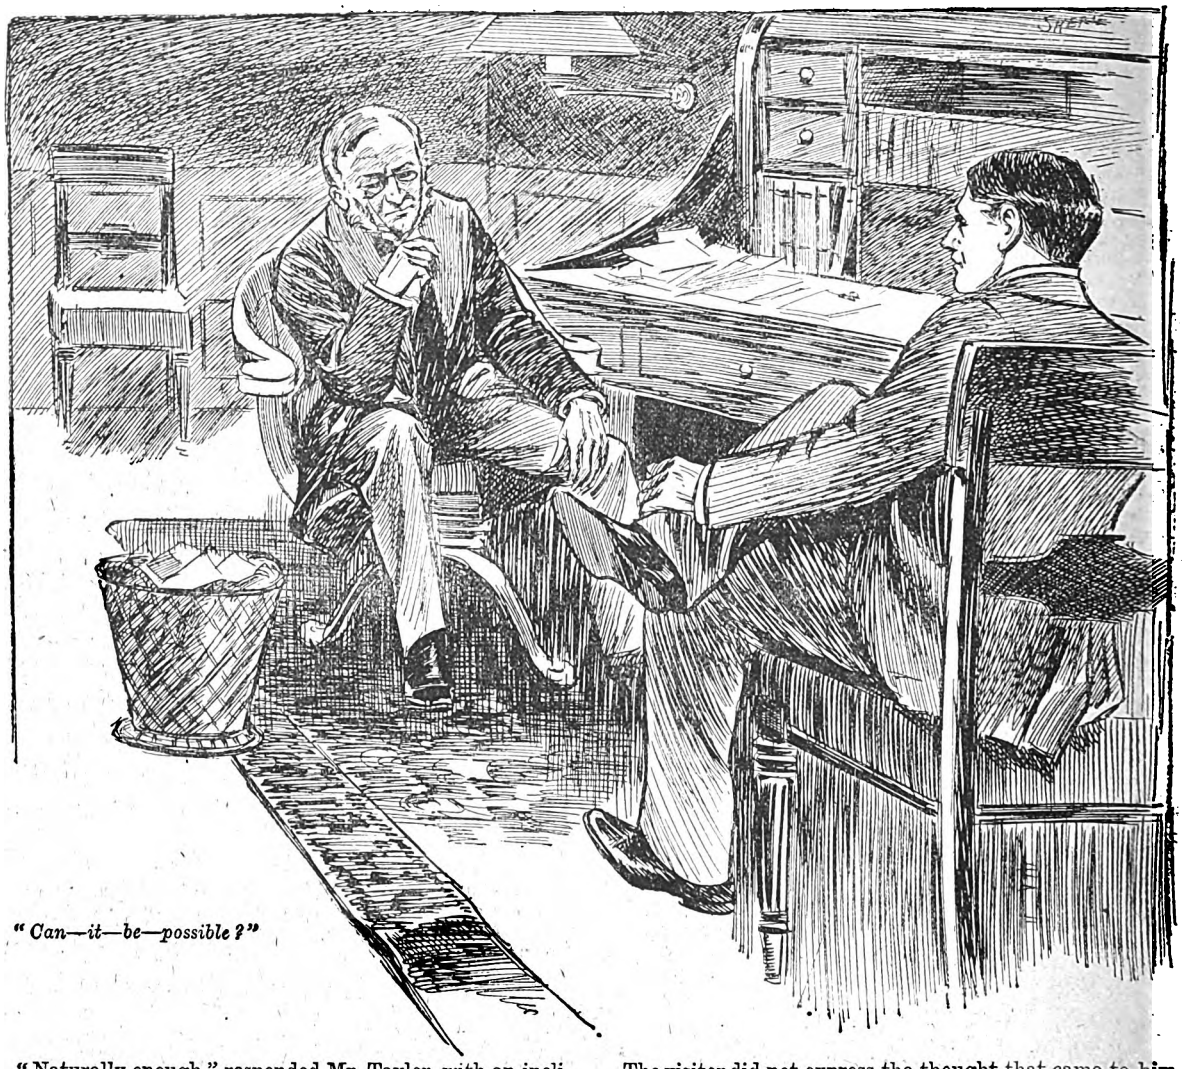
"Excuse me, you were about to say——"

"Only that Rutherford is a frequent visitor at my house, and all but engaged to my niece. That shows how much I think of him."

"And Mrs. Bryant of course thinks with you on this point?"

"There is no Mrs. Bryant—that is, so far as I am concerned. I am a widower without any children, but my niece, Miss Denton, is dearer to me than all the world."

Digitized by Google



"Can—it—be—possible?"

"Naturally enough," responded Mr. Taylor, with an inclination of his head and an instinctive feeling that some interesting complications were dimly opening out before him. "Then he, too, is out of the question."

But even as he thus seemingly established Mr. Rutherford's integrity the detective resolved that he would undertake several investigations of which no hint should be given to the banker.

To his surprise, however, Mr. Bryant did not seem disposed to give up the startling idea that had been suggested. He continued to smooth his eyeglass cord, and with his eyes fixed on the floor, murmured, as though communing with himself:

"Can—it—be—possible?"

Mr. Taylor's keen eyes rested on the handsome, pale face. He was studying it intently.

"Do you think," said the banker abruptly, looking up, "that it could have been Mr. Rutherford?"

"At this stage of the inquiry I do not accuse anyone; it is too soon for that."

"But your suggestion that he may have got the combination from the cashier or me—why, it opens a world of possibility. Heavens! what will May think when she learns it?"

The visitor did not express the thought that came to him, that probably she already knew it, for what sins will a woman not forgive the man she loves?

"This burglary is known to the directors, Mr. Bryant?"

"Yes; we had a board meeting yesterday afternoon, when I laid the matter before them."

"What was done?"

"Several things were suggested, but nothing practical, unless you consider the offer of a large reward on the restoration of the money and no question asked, comes under the heading. However, the majority of us thought, and I agreed, that that was too much like compounding a felony. Finally, it was decided that I should be authorised to employ the best detective that could be engaged."

"Excuse me, but your letter to our agency was written previous to that decision, I fancy."

"It was; I told the directors that I was so sure what their final decision would be that I had written you in the morning, as the sooner the matter was put in hand the better."

"How did that strike them?"

"At first they were inclined to withdraw their authorisation, but concluded to let it stand."

Digitized by Google

"You and Mr. Herbert are the only ones who know the old combination—or, at least, were believed to be. Who generally opened and locked the door of the vault?"

"The cashier. Except on special occasions, I rarely reach the bank before eleven, although, as a rule, I am here till after business hours, in which case I usually close the vault myself."

"You have never noticed anything peculiar in your bookkeeper's manner?"

The reply seemed prompt, but the detective observed an almost imperceptible hesitation on the part of the banker.

"I do not recall anything of the kind."

"And the directors have agreed to keep the robbery a strict secret?"

"Yes, not only for the sake of keeping the public faith in us unshaken, but also that the thieves might the more easily be traced. Our employés have been cautioned also, even to the watchmen, and I think no one has broken his promise."

"Has no reference to the matter been made by any of your clients?"

"Not so far as I know. Wait, I had forgotten. Half-an-hour before you came in—I was speaking to Mr. Herbert—someone asked me if I had heard anything, and, when I shook my head, said it was too bad."

"Who was he?"

"Well, truth to tell, I was so deep in the business that occupied me at the moment, that the question did not strike me as odd till after he had gone."

"It's a small matter, anyway," was the off-hand remark of the detective. "It is possible that he referred to something else. Anyway, it would be strange if some rumour did not get about considering who know the facts. Who is your new watchman?"

The abruptness of the question seemingly disturbed the manager, who replied with a faint smile:

"I fear you will think I have done a foolish thing. He is a man whom I never saw or heard of before yesterday, and an entire stranger to Middlewick. Yet I engaged him, and allowed him to commence his duties last night."

The detective indulged in a low whistle.

"That sounds odd, but what is your explanation?"

The subtle compliment was not lost on Mr. Bryant. He began to feel that he could like this man who on so short an acquaintance realised that however strange his action might seem, he had a reasonable explanation for it. More at ease, therefore, he continued:

"I was so disgusted at the result of employing home talent that I could think of no one in Middlewick to whom I would intrust the post. I telegraphed to my friend Cartwright, the manager of Trentern Bank, to send me a reliable watchman. By return wire, he told me that not only did he know of such a man but that he would reach Middlewick by the six o'clock train, and sure enough he did, bringing with him a letter from Mr. Cartwright."

"May I ask what the letter contained?"

"The highest recommendations possible. He said that the bearer, Jack Burton, had been their watchman for five years, during which time he had proved his courage more than once. Also that no bribe could tempt him to betray his trust, and that I might consider myself fortunate in securing his services. There was no discounting such a recommendation as that, and, after consulting with Mr. Stewart, the cashier, I engaged him, and, as I told you, allowed him to commence his duties at once."

"It seems to me," said the detective, "that if this—what did you say his name is?"

"Burton—Jack Burton."

"If this watchman, Jack Burton, is such a prize for you, he would be equally valuable at Trentern Bank, and I don't see why Mr. Cartwright was so willing to part with him."

"Naturally that thought occurred to me, and Mr. Cartwright did not forget to give a reasonable explanation. It seems that Burton's wife, to whom he was strongly attached, died last week, and that he asked Cartwright if he knew of anyone who would take him on for a time, as he would like to leave the town for a few months, if they would allow him, as he could not stand his old home and surroundings. This he thought would pull him together; but another situation was an absolute necessity, as he was too poor to live without earning anything. He resigned several days ago, and Cartwright said he would be only too pleased for him to come to me."

Without commenting on the story, the detective said:

"And Mr. Taylor's letter? Will you be kind enough to let me see it, if it is within your reach?"

Mr. Bryant selected the letter from among several lying in a clip on his desk, and handed it to his visitor, who scrutinised it closely for a few moments. Then he passed it back, without reading the contents.

"I only wanted to see the handwriting," he explained.

"Are you satisfied?"

"There can be no question as to that letter having been written by Alan Cartwright. Our firm keeps an account at Trentern Bank, and his handwriting is almost as familiar to me as my own."

"Then you think I have done quite right in employing Burton?"

"Quite. Mr. Cartwright is a man whose word carries weight, and you would have been most remiss had you passed his offer of Burton's services over. He is sure to have an easy time of it for a bit, for it is seldom two burglaries are attempted upon one place one after the other."

Mr. Bryant rose from his seat, as if nothing more could possibly be said upon the subject, but, at an inquiring glance from the detective, sat down again.

"One moment, Mr. Bryant; you said a few minutes ago that you occasionally called in an accountant to help your regular bookkeeper. About how often in the year does this take place?"

"Every three months, when we have our quarterly statements to make out."

"And do you always employ the same assistant?"

"Yes, it is only within the last two years we have needed such help, and on each occasion the same person has assisted."

His visitor . . . scrutinised it closely for a few moments.

Digitized by Google

"How long ago, did you tell me it was, since last these statements were rendered?"

The manager reflected for a moment.

"Between two and three weeks."

"Will you give me this assistant's name, and whatever is worth knowing about the gentleman?"

"I cannot do that," replied the banker, with an odd smile.

"You cannot? I do not understand you."

"The party about whom you inquire is not a regular bookkeeper, but calls here when needed, and whatever services are rendered are gratuitous."

"But his name—what is that?" demanded the detective with a touch of impatience. "I must know his name."

"It is not a he," said Mr. Bryant. "Our assistant bookkeeper is a woman."

CHAPTER II.

Why this Signalling?

It was not often that Mr. Taylor showed surprise, but he did in this instance.

The possibility of the bookkeeper's assistant being a woman had not occurred to him until the declaration came from Mr. Bryant. True, in town lady clerks and bookkeepers had long ceased to be a rarity, but that they should have penetrated to this little country town, and, most wonderful of all, into a bank, was a surprise indeed. And what could her object be in thus giving her services gratis?

But the banker had no wish to mystify matters. His temporary levity had passed, leaving him once more the grave business man who had first greeted his visitor. With a gravity befitting the occasion, he said:

"The assistant is Miss Denton, my niece. She charges nothing for her help, because she does the work from choice, being fond of that sort of thing and having plenty of spare time on hand. She is a skilful accountant, and her services are valuable."

"I do not doubt that, or you would not avail yourself of them."

"She is always pleased when the time comes round for her to take her place at the desk. When I spoke of paying her for her work she was quite offended. She told me, however, that she wouldn't object to a present from me," added the banker, with a smile, "and of course she always receives one."

While this aimless conversation was going on, Mr. Taylor was putting two and two together.

A superficial survey of matters directed suspicion towards young Rutherford. He might prove innocent, but, at this stage of proceedings, things certainly looked black against him, and the detective decided he would bear watching.

According to Mr. Bryant's voluntary information, Mr. Rutherford was something more than a friend to May Denton. She it was who spent a few days every three months in the bank as her admirer's assistant. Some young women are wonderfully keen. Their innocent stare hides an amount of knowledge seldom dreamed of by the opposite sex. Was it not possible that Miss Denton had managed to learn the bank combination from her uncle without his suspecting it, and that, too, without watching his movements? What was easier than for her to do this by a little cunning natural to her sex?

Having gained this important secret, how readily she could pass it over to her lover. But the labyrinth thus opened out before the detective was too speculative. He felt that he might go on for ever and in the end reach nowhere. It is easy enough for a detective to theorise, but all the theorising in the world can accomplish nothing; action is the only practical course.

Most important of all, Mr. Bryant must not be allowed to suspect his thoughts regarding the interesting niece of whom he had spoken. Certainly, if any investigations were to be made in that direction, it must be without the banker's knowledge.

"Mr. Bryant, I must ask that you will send for the watchman," said Taylor, with hardly a break in their conversation.

The request evidently surprised the manager.

"I think Burton is most probably asleep at this hour, since he was on duty last night, but I will do as you wish."

"I do not mean Mr. Burton, but the other one—the old watchman. I presume he is also asleep," added Taylor with a smile.

"He lives not five minutes' walk from here. I'll send Rutherford round to say I want him."

The visitor had not suspected that it would necessitate the taking of the book-keeper from his work in order to attend to such a slight errand. Middlewick had not yet reached the dignity of town ways.

"My presence may embarrass him," said Taylor; "so while he is here I will keep out of sight. With your permission, that cupboard will serve my purpose," he added, glancing at the place where the manager was accustomed to hang his hat and overcoat.

Without waiting for a reply the detective bounded up and drew back the door. The key was in the lock, but not turned.

"It will do nicely," remarked Taylor, coming back, but not sitting down.

"But what am I to do with Warren when he comes?" asked the astonished banker.

"Question him about the bank burglary; you are greatly interested; you are not sure you have all the particulars; you have thought of something else you want to ask him,

The detective bounded up and drew back the door.

Digitized by Google

and, therefore, you proceed to question him still more closely than before."

"But," questioned the banker, "I don't catch the meaning of all this. I have already repeated to you all the stupid fellow has told me; why bother with him further?"

"I want to study him, his words, his looks, and his manner while answering your questions. You know, Mr. Bryant, there is a good deal in that sometimes. It might embarrass him, as I have said, for me to join in the examination, or to be present while it is going on."

"Very well. Ah, there he is."

The knock on the door was timid. With one hasty stride Taylor reached the cupboard and drew the door to after him. Then, with hardly any perceptible hesitation, Mr. Bryant called out:

"Come in!"

It was the old watchman, rheumatic, partly bent, and very meek, who slouched into the room, with the air of a man obeying a summons to his own execution.

"Sit down, Warren," said the manager kindly, for despite the impatience he felt with his former employé he could not shut out a feeling of pity when he witnessed his distress.

Mr. Bryant motioned to the chair just vacated by the detective, and the watchman sank into it, in a state of collapse.

Taylor had shifted his position in the cupboard, so that he gained the precise view he wished. He could look straight into the old man's face, while the countenance of the banker was in profile. The blank darkness of the cupboard where the detective was concealed enabled him to do this without a possibility of being seen himself, especially by so unobservant a person as the watchman.

"Warren," said Mr. Bryant, "I have sent for you that I might ask a few questions about the unfortunate affair of the night before last."

"Yes, sir," was the meek response. "I would give the world, Mr. Bryant, if that had never happened; I would indeed, sir. If there's anything——"

"Never mind about that. Regrets are useless now. You admit that it has been your custom to go to sleep, say, about ten o'clock each evening, when you were on duty?"

"I think it—that it was between nine and ten—a little earlier than the time you say."

"It makes no difference; and on the night of the robbery you slept straight through until daylight?"

"Yes, sir."

"And you noticed nothing unusual during all that time?"

"No, sir."

"The outer door was locked, just as you locked it after taking charge of the building?"

'Yes, sir; them folks must have had keys that was oiled, so as not to disturb me."

"Then the first you knew of what had been done was when I sent for you yesterday midday and questioned you?"

"Yes, sir; and if you'd hit me I couldn't have been more surprised."

"Did you sleep more soundly than usual?"

"I must have done. I think the medicine——"

"You admit that you were in the habit of sleeping each night, and it isn't likely there was any difference in the depth of your slumbers. Have you told anyone about the robbery?"

"No one except my wife, and she promised to say nothing. You see, I had to give some reason for my leaving. I thought, at first, I would say it was because I was drunk, but she knows I never drink. Mr. Bryant—sir—do you think they'll—put me in prison?"

"It would serve you right if they did, but as it wouldn't do any good, you will go unpunished providing you keep the matter to yourself. Remember, not only are you to tell no one of the occurrence, but you must not allow anyone to talk to you about the matter."

The old watchman . . . slouched into the room.

Mr. Bryant could think of nothing more to ask the old man, and told him he could go. Repeating his expressions of remorse, and his promise to keep the matter a strict secret, the watchman shuffled through the door, leaning heavily upon his thick stick.

The next instant Alfred Taylor emerged from the cupboard and resumed his seat.

"Well, what do you think of him?" inquired the banker.

"Stupid, but honest; we may as well dismiss him from our calculations. No use in pumping that well."

All the same, however, the sharp-witted detective made the declaration with a mental reservation. Whether it was the manner or words of the old man, or both, cannot be said with certainty, but Taylor had caught something which started his ever busy thoughts in a new channel. Despite the manager's caution to Warren, and the old man's promise to keep his mouth shut, the detective resolved that he would try his hand at pumping the "dry well."

"No, it's not the least use bothering him," assented Mr. Bryant. "I asked him ten times as many questions yesterday as I did to-day, but the substance of all his replies is that he was asleep when he should have been awake, therefore he knows nothing. The best and only thing he can do is to keep quiet. Come in!"

The brisk knock at the door which had called for the manager's invitation to enter was so promptly obeyed that, even had Taylor wished to return to the cupboard, he could not have done so in time to avoid being seen by the new caller. Accordingly, the detective kept his seat, and looked at the man who, hat in hand, entered with the salutation:

"Good-morning, sir. I beg your pardon," with a glance at the detective, and half turning as though meaning to defer his interview till he could see Mr. Bryant alone.

"That's all right, Burton; come in."

The man seated himself awkwardly on the edge of one of the chairs near the door.

"Mr. Brown," said the banker, addressing Taylor, under the impression that he was doing a very clever thing by thus veiling his identity. "I think I can arrange it about the paper you offer, but, of course, I shall have to consult with my co-directors."

"Thank you," said the detective, rapidly taking the hint, "I trust you will find everything correct. I shall be only too pleased if you can manage the matter for me."

Digitized by Google

"You will excuse me a moment while I hear what Mr. Burton has to say; he is a new watchman I have engaged."

"Ah," remarked "Brown," with a smile and slight nod towards the figure near the door; "I am sure you have taken a wise step."

Common gratitude ought to have led the new guardian of the bank to acknowledge this compliment, but he sat mute, as though the sentiment was a little too finely drawn for his full comprehension.

"Well, Burton, what can I do for you?" asked Mr. Bryant kindly.

"I called, please, sir, to ask whether any one else has the key to the outer door."

"Why do you ask that?" inquired the banker, in some surprise. "Have you any cause for suspicion?"

"No, sir; but when you gave me the keys that Warren had been using, I ought to have asked you. I just want to know, so that there can be no mistake about it."

"Mr. Rutherford, the book-keeper, Mr. Stewart, and myself, each have a key to the outer door."

"That's what I thought, sir, but I wanted to be sure. And who else has a key?"

"No one that I'm aware of except—you understand."

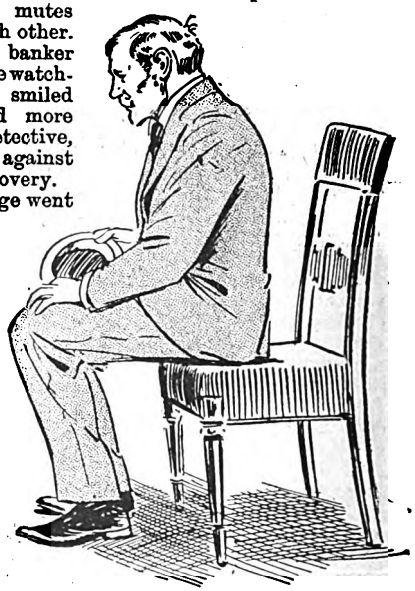
There was a world of significance in this remark. It was a clever reference to the parties who had entered not only the building itself, but had penetrated to its vaults. Mr. Bryant acted as though he did not wish "Mr. Brown" to suspect the meaning of his words. He therefore cast a knowing side-glance at "Mr. Brown," and gave the new watchman the benefit of a faint smile. Not to be behind his employer, Jack replied with a big wink of his left eye and a nod of his head; he was not to be caught napping. The face of the detective was as expressionless as the blank wall behind him.

Mr. Bryant turned partly towards his desk to search for some papers. Catching sight of the National Detective Agency's card he slipped it in his vest pocket; he did not wish that any outsider should see that, nor did he mean to disregard the detective's request that his presence in Middlewick should not be known to anyone else.

During the minute that the banker was thus occupied he, naturally, took no note of his visitors.

The detective and the watchman looked straight at each other, and both smiled. Then the former made a slight signal with one of his hands. The other replied at once. It suggested two mutes talking with each other. The back of the banker being towards the watchman, the latter smiled and gesticulated more freely than the detective, for he was secure against any possible discovery.

The interchange went on with great rapidity for a few seconds. Despite the blank stare which these two men gave each other when first they met in the directors' room, it was evident they were not strangers to each other. Indeed, from their mute intercourse it would almost seem that they were fairly intimate, and had, in fact, pre-arranged this meeting.



The man seated himself awkwardly on the edge of one of the chairs.

Suddenly Mr. Bryant turned again from his desk. As he did so the watchman rose to his feet, and after respectfully inquiring whether the manager had any further instructions for him, wished him good-morning, and once more left the manager and detective together.

(To be continued.)

A TEN-POUND PRIZE.

(See Next Page.)

On the next page is a puzzle picture composed of 88 squares. If these squares be rearranged in a certain order they will form a real picture.

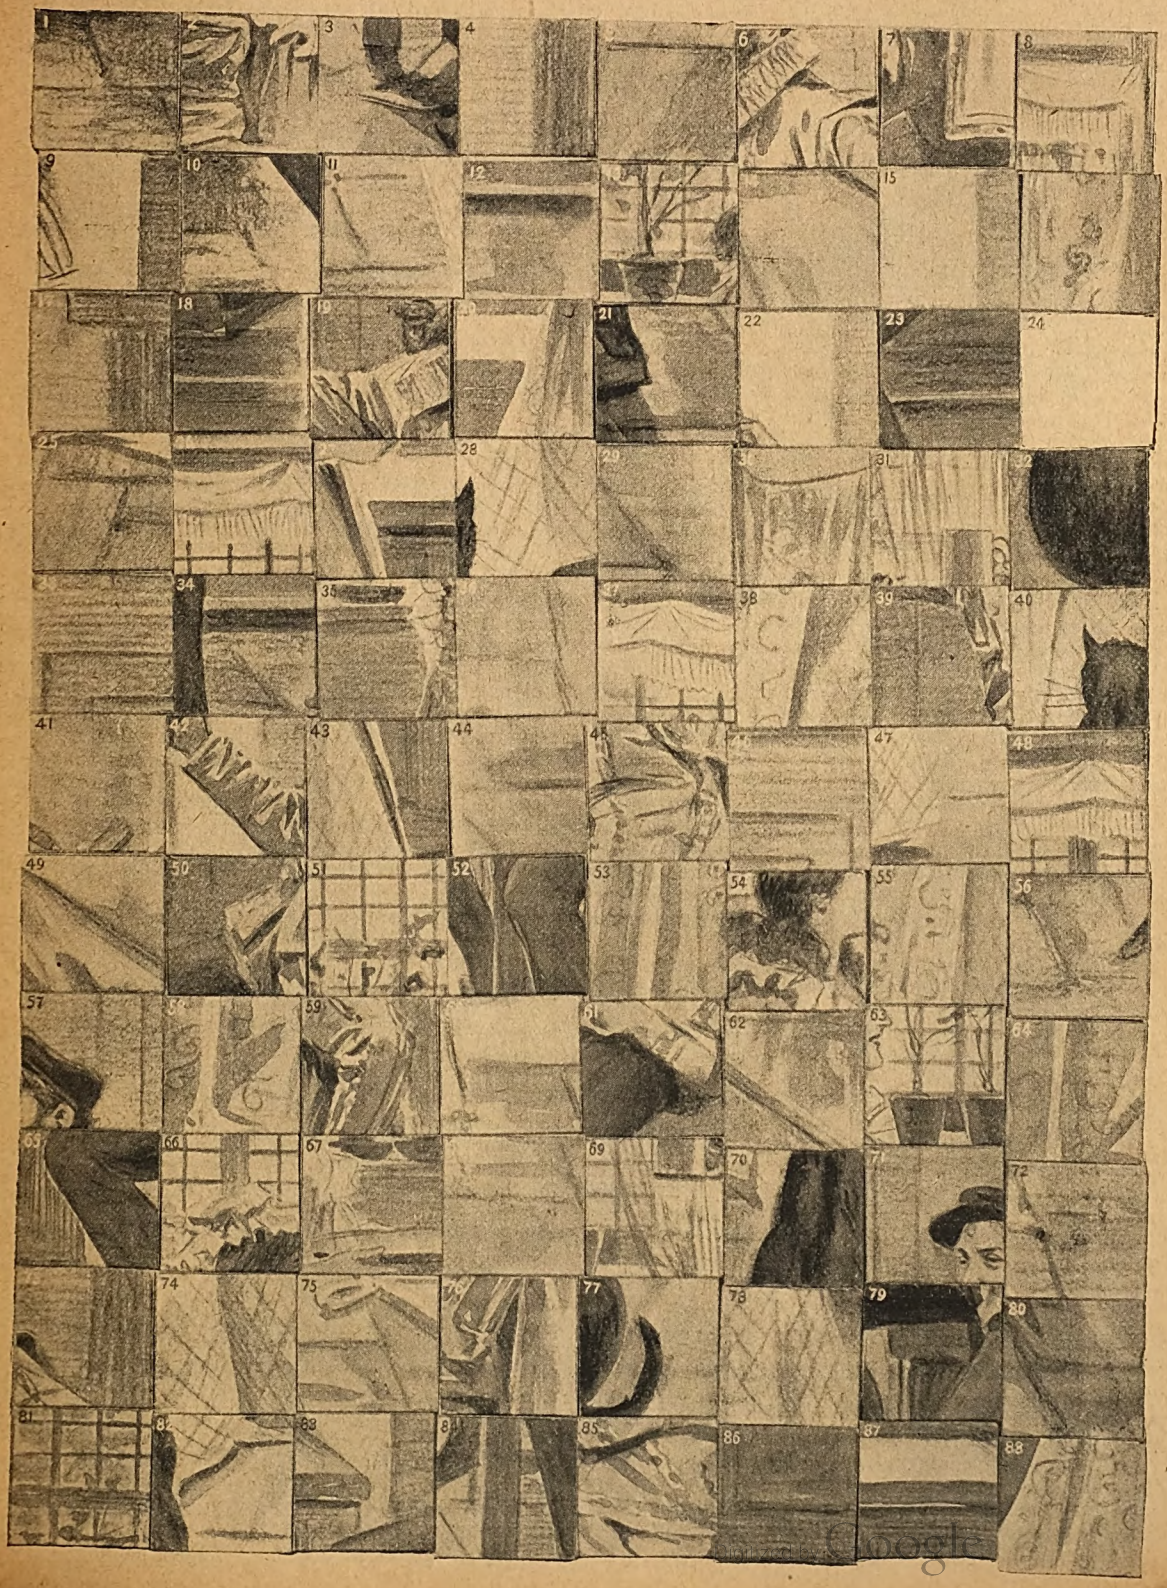
We offer a prize of £10 to the first person who sends the correct solution. In order to give readers in all parts of the United Kingdom as equal a chance as possible, none of the solutions received will be opened until Thursday, March 12th, when all those received will be considered together. In the very unlikely chance of two or more correct solutions being included in one day's post, the prize will be given to the sender of the neatest one. Consolation Prizes will be awarded at the discretion of the Editor.

If no correct solution be received on or before Tuesday, March 17th, 1896, the Ten-Pound Prize will be given to the sender of the solution then to hand which is most nearly correct.

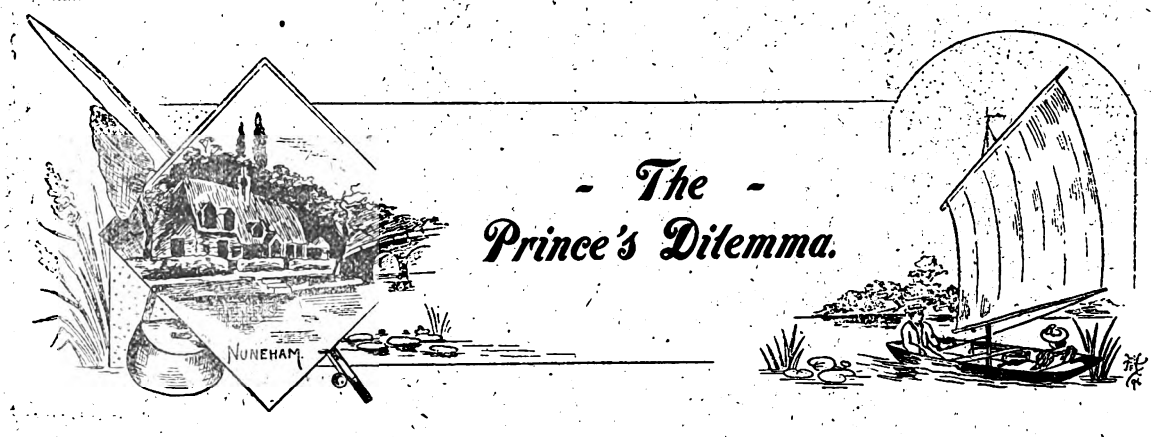
Pictures should be packed flat or folded, not rolled, and the outside wrapper must be marked "April."

N.B.—To make the puzzle more difficult some of the squares have been turned upside down, and one of them has been left out altogether.

Digitized by Google



1
3
4
6
7
8
9
10
11
12
15
18
19
21
22
23
24
25
28
29
31
32
34
35
38
39
40
41
42
43
44
45
47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
59
61
62
63
64
65
66
67
69
70
71
72
74
75
77
78
79
80
81
83
85
86
87
88



- The - Prince's Dilemma.

There once came to the palace of a semi-barbaric king a deputation of five strangers from a far country. They were men of venerable and dignified aspect and demeanour, and were received by a high officer of the court, to whom they made known their errand.

"Most noble officer," said the speaker of the deputation, "it so happened that one of our countrymen was present here, in your capital, on that momentous occasion when a young man, who had dared to aspire to the hand of your King's daughter, had been placed in the arena, in the midst of the assembled multitude, and ordered to open one of two doors, not knowing whether a ferocious tiger would spring out upon him, or a beauteous lady would advance, ready to become his bride. Our fellow citizen who was then present was a man of super-sensitive feelings, and at the moment when the youth was about to open the door he was so fearful lest he should behold a horrible spectacle that his nerves failed him, and he fled precipitately from the arena, and, mounting his camel, rode homewards as fast as he could go.

"We were all very much interested in the story which our countryman told us, and we were extremely sorry that he did not wait to see the end of the affair. We hoped, however, that in a few weeks some traveller from your city would come among us, and bring us further news, but up to the day when we left our country no such traveller had arrived. At last it was determined that the only thing to be done was to send a deputation to this country, and to ask the question: 'Which came out of the open door, the lady or the tiger?'"

When the high officer had heard the mission of this most worthy deputation he led the five strangers into an inner room, where they were seated upon soft cushions, and where he ordered coffee, pipes, sherbet, and other semi-barbaric refreshments to be served to them.

Then, taking his seat before them, he thus addressed the visitors:

"Most noble strangers, before answering the question you have come so far to ask, I will relate to you an incident which occurred not very long after that to which you have referred.

"Not very long ago there arrived here from a distant land a prince of distinguished appearance and undoubted rank. To such a one, of course, a royal audience was granted, and our King met him very graciously, and begged him to make known the object of his visit. Thereupon the Prince informed His Royal Highness that, having heard of the superior beauty of the ladies of his Court, he had come to ask permission to make one of them his wife.

"When our King heard this bold announcement his face reddened, he turned uneasily on his throne, and we were all afraid less some quick words of furious condemnation should leap from out his quivering lips. But by a mighty effort he controlled himself, and, after a moment's silence, he turned to the Prince, and said: 'Your request is granted. To-morrow at noon you shall wed one of the fairest damsels of our Court.' Then, turning to his officers, he said: 'Give orders that everything be prepared for a wedding in this palace at high noon to-morrow. Convey this royal Prince to suitable apartments. Send to him tailors, bootmakers, hatters, jewellers, armourers men of every craft, whose services he may need. Whatever he asks, provide; and let all be ready for the ceremony to-morrow.'

"'But your Majesty,' exclaimed the Prince, 'before we make these preparations I would like——'

"'Say no more!' roared the King. 'My royal orders have been given, and nothing more is needed to be said. You asked a boon; I granted it; and I will hear no more on the subject. Farewell, my Prince, until to-morrow noon!'

"At this the King arose, and left the audience chamber, while the Prince was hurried away to the apartments selected for him.

"And here came to him tailors, hatters, jewellers, and everyone who was needed to fit him out in grand attire for the wedding. But the mind of the Prince was much troubled and perplexed.

"'His Majesty's notions seem to be ver ypeculiar,' said the Prince, 'and, so far as I can see, they do not at all agree with mine.'

"At that moment an attendant, whom the Prince had not noticed before, came and stood beside him. This was a broad-shouldered man of cheery aspect, bearing an enormous scimitar, the upturned edge of which was keen and bright as any razor. Holding this formidable weapon as tenderly as if it had been a sleeping infant, this man drew closer to the Prince and bowed.

"'Who are you?' exclaimed his Highness, starting back at the sight of the frightful weapon.

"'I,' said the other, with a courteous smile, 'am the Discourager of Hesitancy. When our King makes known his wishes to anyone, a subject or visitor, whose disposition in some little points may be supposed not to wholly coincide with that of His Majesty, I am appointed to attend him closely, that should he think of pausing in the path of obedience to the Royal will he may look at me and proceed.'

Digitized by Google

"The Prince looked at him, and proceeded to be measured for a coat.

"The tailors and shoemakers and hatters worked all night; and the next morning, when everything was ready, and the hour of noon was drawing nigh, the Prince again anxiously inquired of his attendants when he might expect to be introduced to the ladies.

"'The King will attend to that,' they said. 'We know nothing of the matter.'

"Now came officers to conduct him to the grand hall of the palace, in which the ceremony was to be performed. Here the Prince found the King seated upon the throne, with his nobles, his courtiers, and his officers standing about him in magnificent array. The Prince was led in front of the King, and said:

"'Your Majesty, before I proceed further——'

"At that moment an attendant, who had approached with a long scarf of delicate silk, wound it about the lower part of the Prince's face so quickly and adroitly that he was obliged to cease speaking. Then, with wonderful dexterity, the rest of the scarf was wound round the Prince's head, so that he was completely blindfolded. Thereupon the attendant quickly made openings in the scarf over the mouth and ears, so that the Prince might breathe and hear, and fastening the ends of the scarf securely he retired.

"The first impulse of the Prince was to snatch the silken folds from his head and face, but as he raised his hands to do so, he heard the voice of the Discourager of Hesitancy, who gently whispered: 'I am here, Your Highness.' And, with a shudder, the arms of the Prince fell down by his side.

"Now before him he heard the voice of a priest, who had begun the marriage service in use in that semi-barbaric country. At his side he could hear a delicate rustle, which seemed to proceed from fabrics of soft silk. Gently putting forth his hand he felt folds of such silk close beside him. Then came the voice of the priest requesting him to take the hand of the lady by his side, and reaching forth his right hand the Prince received within it another hand, so small, so soft, so delicately fashioned, and so delightful to the touch, that a thrill went through his being. Then, as was the custom of the country, the priest first asked the lady: 'Would she have this man to be her husband?' to which the answer came, in the sweetest voice he ever heard: 'I will.'

"Then ran raptures rampant through the Prince's blood. The touch, the tone, enchanted him. All the ladies of the Court were beautiful; the Discourager was behind him, and through his parted scarf he boldly answered: 'Yes, I will,' whereupon the priest pronounced them man and wife.

"Now the Prince heard a little bustle about him; the long scarf was rapidly unrolled from his head, and he turned with a start to gaze upon his bride. To his utter amazement there was no one there. He stood alone. Unable on the instant to ask a question or say a word, he gazed blankly about him.

"Then the King rose from his throne and came down and took him by the hand.

"'Where is my wife?' gasped the Prince.

"'She is here,' said the King, leading him to a curtained doorway at the side of the hall.

"The curtains were drawn aside, and the Prince, entering, found himself in a long apartment, near the opposite wall of which stood a line of forty ladies, all dressed in rich attire, and each one apparently more beautiful than the rest.

"Waving his hand towards the line, the King said to the Prince: 'There is your bride! Approach and lead her forth? But remember this, that if you attempt to take away one of the unmarried damsels of our Court your execution shall be instantaneous. Now, delay no longer. Step up and take your bride.'

"The Prince, as in a dream, walked slowly along the line of ladies, and then walked slowly back again. Nothing could he see about any one of them to indicate that she was more of a bride than the others. Their dresses were all similar; they all blushed; they all looked up, and then looked down. They all had charming little hands. Not one spoke a word. Not one lifted a finger to make a sign. It was evident that the orders given them had been very strict.

"'Why this delay?' roared the King. 'If I had been married this day to one so fair as the lady who wedded you I should not wait one second to claim her.'

"The bewildered Prince walked again up and down the line. And this time there was a slight change in the countenance of two of the ladies. One of them among the fairest gently smiled as he passed her. Another, just as beautiful, slightly frowned.

"'Now,' said the Prince to himself, 'I am sure that it is one of those two ladies whom I have married. But which? One smiled; and would not any woman smile when she saw, in such a case, her husband coming towards her? But, then, were she not his bride, would she not smile with satisfaction to think he had not selected her, and that she had not led him to an untimely doom? But, then, on the other hand, would not any woman frown when she saw her husband come towards her and fail to claim her? Would she not knit her lovely brows? And would she not inwardly say: "It is I; don't you know it? Don't you feel it? Come!" But if this woman had not been married, would she not frown when she saw the man looking at her? Would she not say to herself: "Don't stop at me! It is the next but one. It is two ladies above. Go on!" And then again, the one who married me did not see my face. Would she not smile if she thought me comely? While if I wedded the one who frowned, could she restrain her disapprobation if she did not like me? Smiles invite the approach of true love. A frown is a reproach to a tardy advance. A smile——'

"'Now, hear me!' loudly cried the King. 'In ten seconds, if you do not take the lady given you, she who has been made your bride shall be your widow.'

"And as the last word was uttered the Discourager of Hesitancy stepped close behind the Prince and whispered: 'I am here.'

"Now the Prince could not hesitate an instant, and he took one of the ladies by the hand.

"Loud rang the bells, loud cheered the people and the King came forward to congratulate the Prince. He had taken his lawful bride.

"Now, then," said the high officer to the deputation of five strangers from a far country, "when you can decide among yourselves which lady the Prince chose, the one who smiled or the one who frowned, then will I tell you which came out of the open door, the lady or the tiger."

At the latest accounts the five strangers had not yet decided.

Percy Smith.

Digitized by Google

The Widow of the Late Smith.

THERE were five of us in the coach—a huge, solid affair, resembling an immense box. It rested on enormous leather straps that allowed it to swing with a motion that is best described by saying it was diagonal, though in fact it was not diagonal at all. One moment we found ourselves sliding towards the foremost corner on the left, as the wheel on that side dropped heavily into some almost bottomless hole; the next instant we would be flying with pleasant unanimity through the rear window on the right, and again, seeking to force an outlet through the roof or floor. But the resultant of these motions, put together, added, and divided, is most nearly described by the word diagonal, and so, diagonal it is.

All five of the passengers were riding inside, for it was a day in November—cold and cloudy, and a light snow was spasmodically falling, as if really uncertain whether to stop or go on, but, on the whole, rather in favour of going on, it being a characteristic of western habits never to give up anything for any cause whatever, once it is begun. So, while a seat outside just at that time was better than no seat at all, it was by no means so desirable as a seat inside.

The road we were to traverse led through the mountains of Colorado, from the mining camp of Greenwood (though why Greenwood none can say—it was far above timber line) to Leadville. It was fairly good wheeling, as that word is understood in the Rockies, but six stout mules had all they could do to manage the coach. One moment they were groaning and straining up some steep incline; the next fairly lifted from their feet as we dashed furiously down a hill, our speed only partially checked by the brake, which Tommy the driver would frantically apply.

An Englishman travelling in the West soon became aware that every one has a title of some sort, no matter whether he has a right to do it or not, and the five men in the coach were known as the Colonel, the Major, the Judge, the Doctor, and the Professor. It is surprising how soon one becomes acquainted with his companions in such a place. Whether this is due to the community of sensations that govern the passengers as the vehicle lurches to the right or left, or the sociability of the men themselves, I cannot say. The fact remains, however, and in less than half-an-hour after we had started I was on familiar terms with the past history, present occupation, size of pile, and name of each of my fellow-travellers.

On the coach was an express-box, said to contain thirty thousand dollars in bullion, the product of the Greenwood mines. In a rack near the driver's feet hung two Colt's revolvers and a Winchester rifle. The road was considered safe enough, for no robbery had occurred there since the camp had been in existence, still the stage company preferred to make reasonable precautions. Hence the weapons.

After we had exchanged our names and such parts of our personal history as we felt free to give we relapsed into silence. The Westerner, although a sociable, is not a talkative animal. He converses in heats. For a time our quiet was unbroken, save by the groaning and creaking of the coach, the cracking of the driver's whip, and his rapidly-uttered oaths.

Perhaps it is well that justice can never be done—in print—to the profanity of the Western mule-driver. It is as impossible to describe as the singing of some beautiful aria by some sweet-voiced singer! Not that the two can be compared in any way. I merely wished to illustrate the utter inadequacy of words in type to represent the sounds.

It was at the end of one of Tommy's flowery periods (which came to our rescue when the coach, stuck fast at the foot of a veritable hill of difficulty, had at last been dragged up by the mules, inspired by the out-pouring) that the gentleman occupying the middle seat (left) broke the silence. We knew him as Professor Blood, "the hull owner of the Blackeye mine of Greenwood and several others." It was at the close of Tommy's exhortation, I say, which began softly and slowly, then gradually increased in volume, speed, and power, until the flow was simply overwhelming, that the "Professor" remarked pleasantly:

Digitized by Google

"Tommy seems to rattle it off tol'aby easy, I'm thinkin'. It's a great gift. Wonderful what 'twill do sometimes. When I was a-teamin' it up to Leadville, I would bet willin' I could cuss a dead mule up a six-hundred-foot grade, with a load, and all by the parts o' speech. It's just like anythin' else, though, takes practice.

"Those was great days," he went on a retrospective sigh, "great days. We was gettin' twenty and thirty cents a pound fur stuff, an' makin' slathers o' money; an' losin' it, too," he added, with a laugh. "I 'member comin' down over the divide one night alone, with three thousan' dollars in my pocket, when a road agent held me up an' cleaned me out. I was pretty mad, but I had to pay cash."

"I'd like to know," said the Doctor, "how one or two men can stop and rob a dozen, all well-armed. It looks as if they had no nerve. I don't think I'd stand it."

The Judge whistled softly at this remark; the Major smiled and made a pretence of wiping the window with his coat-sleeve and looking out; the Colonel expectorated mournfully. The Professor alone was calm.

"Pardner," said he, looking the Doctor in the eye, and tapping him gently on the knee as he spoke, "was you ever held up?"

The Doctor shook his head.

"I thought likely," said the Professor significantly. "Just look here, when you are stopped, cask up quietly and perlitely. It's runnin' too much of a risk to object. If any man is looking for a chance to climb the golden stairs, though barin' of his buzzum for his fellow-creatures—without compensation—let him. It ain't in my line. I'm pretty sure, an' so I say, if ever you're held up, just fork out without any back talk—it's really the cheapest and a long way the safest."

These sentiments seemed to meet with universal approval from the other occupants of the coach, and the Doctor, quite crushed by the weight of opinion against him, relapsed into silence. I was the doctor.

After this conversation became desultory. Now and then a passenger would volunteer a remark, which sometimes elicited a reply and sometimes did not. Often, as the road led up some steep incline, we would get out and walk to restore, by exercise, the circulation in our benumbed limbs. Twice the coach stopped at relay stations, where fresh mules were harnessed in the place of the tired-out animals. The stations were nothing more than rough log stables, with accommodation for the men who fed and cared for the mules.

The snow had been falling all the afternoon in fine flakes, and had spread over the earth a thin white cover that partially hid the roughness of the mountains and whitened the light that came through the clouds into which we sometimes drove. The road was becoming very heavy and the progress slow, when, to our relief, the coach about four o'clock entered a small park of a few hundred acres and pulled up in front of Sampson's, twelve miles from Leadville. While fresh mules were being harnessed we alighted and stepped into a room that served as bar, office, parlour, and reading-room, for Sampson's was a hotel as well as a relay station.

The establishment was owned and managed by Mr. Sampson and his wife, Almiry, or to put it in another way, Sampson's and Sampson himself were controlled by Almiry. A modern Delilah she, who when she married Sampson, had, speaking figuratively, clipped his locks, and left him deprived of all ambition. There was a rumour current that Sampson drank, a rumour not altogether without foundation, since no one had ever seen him entirely sober. His sole duty was to tend bar, and when not occupied in ministering to the wants of others he was looking after himself.

There was but one beverage sold at Sampson's—whisky—though there hung upon the wall, behind the rough bar, an illuminated card, setting forth, in fly-specked characters, the superior merits of Hall's Jamaica Ginger. But as for the ginger, that was not to be had. Nor were there any indications, beyond dusty lithographs nailed askew to the wooden partitions, that soda water, seltzer, and Mumm's Extra Dry were procurable on demand. And so it was fortunate that the systems of those passengers who needed stimulation craved whisky only, for that was positively all that was there.

We had not noticed at first, in the dim light of the room, the figure of a woman, clad in deep mourning and wearing a heavy veil drawn over her face. She sat in a dark corner and seemed to shrink from observation. But when Tommy entered, after looking to his cattle, and had fortified his nerves with four fingers of the "regular thing," swallowed without a murmur, Almiry took him aside and engaged him in earnest conversation, and her gestures then, for the first time, directed our attention to the woman.

Our halt was necessarily short, and we were soon back in the coach; the mules had been changed, and we were ready to start. But Tommy lingered, and when at length he appeared at the door, seemed in no hurry. He stood there, slowly drawing on his gloves and surveying the scene with a carelessly critical eye, and an expression of countenance that seemed to indicate that as for him, if he were to be given the chance, he would make a good deal better world than this one—easy. In his mouth was a cigar, tipped up at such an angle that the glowing end nearly touched the wide brim of his sombrero. The Major, irreverently inspired, voiced the sentiments of the party when he remarked in a drawling tone:

"I reckon that after being the angel Gabriel, for pure glory an' so forth I'd ruther be a driver to a coach than most anythin'."

Just then there appeared in the doorway the lady in black, to whom Thomas gallantly offered his arm, and thus escorted to the coach. As they approached the Colonel gave a little groan.

"We're goin' to have lovely woman along with us," he said plaintively. Consternation was depicted on each face when the coach door was opened, and Tommy, looking in, remarked authoritatively: "Sorry, gentlemen, but I shall have to trouble you. Here's a lady goin' to Leadville, an' she's goin' inside. Jump in marm!" and in the young woman jumped with remarkable lightness, and took the vacant seat in the forward corner.

"Cunnell, you'll look after her," said Tommy at the door; "she's in my charge. Widder of Smith, she is; him as was killed down to the Walker mine last month, but she don't savy a word of English, bein' French. You know'd Smith, didn't ye, Cunnell?"

"Yes, I know'd him well enough, but I never know'd he had a widder. I'll look after her—in English," growled the Colonel, and the door slammed, and the stage rolled off.

As we pulled out the clouds parted for an instant, and a bright ray of sunlight lit up the coach, striking full upon the dark veil of our new companion. It made briefly visible the outlines of her face, and those of us who were fortunate enough to catch a glimpse of it were convinced that the lady had great beauty. Indeed, the judge, who had a happy facility of expression, acquired from a long, though not lucrative practice at the bar, leant over to the doctor and whispered in tones of fervent admiration:

Digitized by Google

"She's as pretty as Cle-op-e-try, by Jove!" to which the Doctor responded with an assenting nod of much vigour.

Nowhere in the world is a lady more certain of respectful consideration than in the wild West. She's invariably treated with a chivalrous gallantry that is really magnificent; men hasten to do her homage and are proud to be commanded by her. Still, the presence of Mrs. Smith in the coach acted on the party as a little restraint, which the Judge and the Colonel vainly endeavoured to dispel.

"Fond of travellin', ma'am?" said the latter, in his best off-hand style, as he leant towards her and smiled handsomely.

The lady made no reply, and the Judge knocked the Colonel's elbow.

"Sh, Colonel!" he said; "you don't s'pose she understands you, when it's as much as I can do to untangle your ideas from your words. She speaks French!"

The Colonel accepted the rebuke meekly, and made no further conversational effort. The road became more and more difficult as we advanced, and the fresh mules were unruly and drove very hard. Several times in bad places they had balked, and the coach had swung round in a way that would have upset a lighter vehicle, yet no exclamation of alarm escaped from the lady, who sat motionless in her corner.

"Turrible bad place to be held up 'long here," said the Major, after an unusually long silence, during which the coach had slowly pounded over a huge rock and then slid off with an unpleasant scrunch. "I should hate to be stopped here, for I have a little matter of twelve hundred dollars about me which I don't care to lose. Of course, we're all friends here?" he hastily asked.

We were, and then it came out that each man was carrying various sums of money ranging from five hundred to five thousand dollars, the last amount being the property of the Colonel, who described accurately how he had concealed it in a package sewed in his clothing next to his body, where it was quite inaccessible to dishonest persons.

"I reckon it'll take a pretty smart chap to find that," he remarked complacently, as he slapped his hand on the spot where the treasure was concealed. We could not deny this, and murmurs of admiration were heard at his shrewdness. All this time—in fact, since we left Sampson's—the mysterious Mrs. Smith had not moved or changed her position. She still kept her veil down, and in the slowly waning light her black dress seemed to emphasise the shadows in the coach.

"Judge," said the Major at length, "it must be lonesome for her. You're consid'able of a lingoist, couldn't you give her a little touch in the native, just to be perlite?"

The Judge looked embarrassed and scratched his head confusedly.

"Why, mebbe I might rack out some French," he said. "It ain't much to do, but er—what'll I say? You got to be mighty circumspec' in talkin' French to a lady. It's a terrible free langwidge."

Both the military men were impressed by this, the Colonel particularly so, and for a moment his face was expressive of painful perplexity.

"Well, just say somethin' civil," he said at length. "Ask her if she wants the winder up. 'Tain't likely she does; but you might ask her."

"Oh, no, Colonel," said the Judge, "not that. That particular word winder, in French," here the Judge lowered his voice to a whisper, "is cussin', an' you'll hev to excuse me. That's where I draw the line."

"Well, chin your own way then," said the Colonel testily; "though I reckon I can open a winder fur a lady—in French—without breakin' any of the commandments. Only say somethin' or we'll think you don't know how."

This was touching the Judge on a tender spot, and looking at the Colonel with an air of haughty dignity, he said slowly:

"If it'll amuse the boys, I reckon I'll take a little pasear, though I'm a trifle rusty in my langwidges just now. Had consider'ble practice, too, down in San Migell county."

Then, with a soft ahem and a flourish of his handkerchief, he leant forward, and casting a bewitching glance at the lady, murmured:

"Beunos dias, señora. Habeis vosotros—er—that is—como esta vey?"

The lady made no answer; in fact, seemed not to hear, but the Judge was in no wise disconcerted.

"Reckon she was thinkin' of the late lamented, and didn't wholly catch on to my idea," he remarked pleasantly. "I'll open another lead," and again he smiled as he murmured:

"These gen'lemen," indicating us with a graceful and comprehensive sweep—"bein' gen'lemen, and well acquainted with good sassiety, hev asked me to pass their compliments to you, ma'am, which I do now. Er—el tiempo es bein inconstanty, señora, and esta—er——" The Judge concluded the sentence with a gesture. "It's a little remark in the vernacular of the French," he explained, "an' I reckon it'll fetch her."

It certainly did seem to have some effect, for the lady uttered a sound strangely like a chuckle, but said nothing.

"Judge," said the Colonel, after waiting a reasonable time for an answer, "I'm afraid your langwidges have been—so to speak—tampered with. I've always allowed there was some difference between French and Spanish myself."

The Judge waxed indignant. "A joke's a joke, an' all right," he said; "but I didn't s'pose but there was a man here but knowed the roots of the two langwidges was the same, an' if you can only confine your talkin' to roots—an' you gen'rally can in genteel sassiety—it makes no odds whether it's French or Spanish."

"All right, Judge; all right," said the Colonel soothingly. "Of course, we knowed that well and good, but a man must have his little joke now an' then. But ask her—in your roots—if she's any objection to smoke."

The Judge, partly mollified, did not essay this in speech, but beginning even farther back than "roots," managed to ask the question by signs. The lady nodded her assent with vivacity, and drawing a silver case from her pocket, took therefrom a cigarette, which, after raising her veil a little, she placed between her lips.

At first we were amazed, but the Colonel, with that self-possession which had always distinguished him and made him so popular with the sex, quickly recovered himself and gallantly offered the lady a light, which she graciously accepted. Then murmurs of admiration were heard. The Major audibly compared her to "a butterfly and a whip-poor-will, by gad," the Colonel swore that "she took him, blamed if she didn't," while the Judge repeated his former opinion, and declared that "she was a reg'lar Cle-op-e-try from the word go." The Professor was silent, but I have reasons for believing that he endorsed all the others.

Digitized by Google

"What I admire in lovely wimmin," said the Colonel, as we sat there quietly smoking, "is the er—ability she possesses to adapt herself to circumstances, as illustrated in the above. We are all friends here, in course, so we can be comfortable; but I'm safe in sayin' I shall be glad to git to Leadville. That little matter of four thousand dollars I got sewn into my—Judge, sure the lady can't understand English—my—in fact, gentlemen, my shirt," said the Colonel frankly, again indicating the exact location of the treasure, "is a tax on my mind, an' I want to get it off."

Outside the snow had ceased falling, and the dusk of the winter's evening was slowly deepening into darkness. High on the slope that rose on our right stood a solitary pine-tree, that had pushed its way through the rocks, and now stood, lonesome and sad, by night and day, keeping a melancholy watch on the valley. The sun, long since hidden to us below, shot a ray as a good-night message, and for an instant the tree was ablaze; then the light died quickly out, and we were in semi-darkness again.

The road wound its way round the face of a high cliff; on one side towered a wall of rock sheer three hundred feet; on the other sank an unsoundable chasm. Tommy sat on the box, his two lamps lit, and his tongue playing a rapid accompaniment to his whip. Inside, the small reflector at the end of the coach only served to make the night without seem darker than ever.

Silently we sat there smoking, the ends of our cigars alternately glowing and dimming in the dingy air. An unusual volley of sound from the box, a cracking of whips, a shouting, and then the stopping of the coach with a lurch startled us out of our quiet. Then a shout from Tom as he spoke to his cattle, and a voice, ringing like a bugle, was heard from the rocks above:

"Come, none o' that! Make a straight haul for it! Throw off that box! Lively, now! Put up your hands an' git down! Every one of you, git down!"

Sorrowfully we obeyed. The description the Professor had given a few hours before of our probable sensations was exactly true. A pair of six-shooters held in the hands of a stalwart man, whose face was partly concealed by a black mask, hastened our descent, and in a moment we found ourselves ranged in line, with our hands above our heads, a meek, unhappy, cowed group.

At one end of the line stood Tommy; at the other stood the Colonel, cool, impassive, dignified, confident in the security of his treasure. The last to descend was the widow, but a widow no longer, for out of the coach there sprang an active young fellow, of slender but sinewy build, smooth-shaven, dressed in the conventional garb of the Western rider, and carrying in his hand a nickel-plated six-shooter. And this was Mrs. Smith—who did not speak English. Anyone standing near the Judge at that time, might have heard an exclamation, both forcible and profane. The "widow" heard it, for with a little laugh he (or she) touched his finger to his lips and said:

"Hush, Judge! that's cussin', an' you draw the line there you know."

And then he proceeded to search the pockets of his fellow-travellers as if it were a very commonplace affair, which it certainly was not, and relieve them of their valuables, his associate keeping guard meantime.

Down the line he went, doing his work quickly but carefully, but before he was done the other began to grow impatient.

"Hurry up, Jim!" he said; "ain't you most through? We're late."

"All done but this one," said Jim, the quondam widow, as he halted before the Colonel; "he's got four thousand dollars sewed plum to his shirt. I reckon I'll hev to rip the old coon open to git it." Saying which he drew his knife, and with a quick movement as if to disembowel the Colonel, slipped the point through his clothing, and with a wrench pulled out the package.

"Sorry to trouble you, gents," said the larger man bowing politely, "but I won't detain you much longer, fur I know you want to git to Leadville. I hope this old gen'leman," pointing to the rent in the Colonel's dress, "won't take cold. He must be careful—good men are scarce." The Colonel snorted. "You will kindly stand just where you are till I give the word. There is a few friends of mine a-lookin' at us from the rocks, and I really wouldn't move very much if I was you—I really wouldn't, fur their guns is all hair-triggers, an' dreadful liable to go off. You won't move, now, will you?"

We would not! Wild horses could not have dragged us from that spot, for up in the rocks we fancied we could see two shining barrels, aimed truly at us, and we were really anxious to remain quiet. Before we knew it we were alone; our new acquaintances had vanished in the dusk, and an instant later we heard the same voice, ringing out above us:

"Git into the coach now and git!"

And we got.

ARNOLD WEEVIL.

PEARSON'S MAGAZINE

NO. 3 NOW ON SALE.

Amongst the contributors are: Stanley Weyman, Robert Barr, Lady Henry Somerset, Frankfort Moore, Sir Walter Besant, and George Griffith.

Every Article is most Luxuriously Illustrated.

Price Sixpence.

MELODY.

The first number of MELODY, the new Musical Magazine, is now on sale.

MELODY will be published Monthly, price Sixpence. All the best and most popular composers will contribute.

MELODY contains fifty-six pages full sheet-music size.

Digitized by Google

THE PREY OF THE WOLVES.

Two men on a tree. A tree stunted, standing solitary in a clearing. A tree with only one branch, and that near the top of the trunk.

Upon that branch the two men—two hunters—are sitting astride, and holding on with the grim desperation of men who know that a relaxing of the fingers, the overbalancing of a limb, a careless jerk, may mean death.

Around the clearing the dark woods bristle blackly on the mantle of white that covers the earth. Above, the morning sun shines coldly in the clear blue sky of France.

The men are both young, of good, broad build and fine stature, and ruddy faces that tell of fresh air and abundant exercise, and though in deadly peril, seem not in hopeless fear. Yet their position is dangerous enough to make the bravest shudder.

For the snow in the woods is pitted all over with rough footprints, going this way and that in apparent confusion, but converging into the clearing nevertheless, and centring round the solitary tree. And for every four feet that have trodden those prints into the snow there is a shaggy body and a cruel head with fierce-fanged jaws and lolling tongue and horrid eyes. Round the tree—some leaping up in vain effort to reach the two men, some sitting and glaring at the prey beyond their reach—snarl and snap and quarrel a pack of hungry wolves.

One of the men—the younger and darker-haired—moves cautiously on the bending branch, and looking at the other with a curious gleam in his brown eyes, says:

"It is a pity, Leon."

"What is a pity—in particular?" asks his companion in danger.

"That we were in such haste that we dropped our guns—and our cigarettes!"

"You are incorrigible, Pierrot! You would jest in the face of death."

"What would you have?" says Pierrot, laughing lightly. "Surely death is gruesome enough in itself to need no added gloom. But, Leon, we need have no fear of these howling brutes, if this branch holds; for are not the gentlemen from the château coming this way at noon?"

"True, Pierrot. But why 'If this branch holds?' It is firm enough."

"Do you think so, Leon? Did you hear that?"

That was a short, sharp crack of the wood near the joining of the branch to the jagged trunk top.

"Yet I think it will bear us till the gentlemen arrive," says Leon, a paleness passing across his face nevertheless. "If it does not——"

"If it does not, Leon?"

"Then one or both of us will have seen the last of France—and of Babette—before many hours."

"You speak more truly than your custom, Leon," says the younger man, with a scarcely perceptible sneer in his tone. "As you say, we shall have seen the last of France—and you might have added, the first of a wolf's internal economy. We shall also have seen the last of Babette. But that will matter little to us, Leon, for she loves neither you nor me."

He pauses as the branch dips lower and the tree creaks and cracks with ominous sound, and shakes a clenched hand vindictively at the snarling brutes below before he goes on.

"If Babette loved either you or me, Leon, it would be the other's duty to slip off this arm of salvation into the jaws of these hungry fiends, if by so doing the chosen one would have a chance to live to gladden her dear heart."

"It would be a duty," acquiesces Leon, his face blanching at the thought, and his shifty eyes avoiding the other's steady gaze.

"Failing that distinction," pursues Pierrot, imperturbably, even with a smile, "we live or die together: for though I have lived a wild life, Leon, and have no hope of woman's love now Babette will not look at me, I prefer my body intact so much that only for her sake would I have it dissected and digested by these ravenous wretches until there is no help for it. And I fear there is little help now—after all. And they are eyeing us very hungrily!"

Leon is silent, as a sudden light leaps into his eyes and a flush reddens his brow, and in his silence the branch bends lower and creaks and cracks again and again and yet again, while the wolves, seemingly gifted with human intelligence, crowd closer and fight with each other for the best places under the breaking bough.

The men look into each other's eyes with mute terror as they cling to that swaying arm, which threatens to come crashing down with every tremour of their limbs. Pierrot is callous to the end.

"To-day's tragedy will be a great relief to Mademoiselle Babette, friend Leon!"

"The branch would hold one of us, Pierrot?" gasps the other.

"It would, Leon?"

"You are sure?"

"I am certain, Leon."

Then there is silence again, save for the dread crack, cracking of the parting trunk top, the downward swaying of the fatal branch, and the impatiently, expectant sniffing of the lolling-tongued wolves.

Digitized by Google

Then Leon speaks, averting his glance from his comrade.

"Pierrot!"

"Yes, Leon."

"I spoke to Babette last night on the church steps—you knew that?"

"Yes."

"I asked her to be my wife."

No response; only the piercing gaze of the steady brown eyes.

"And she consented, Pierrot."

There is a note of defiance in the man's voice as he utters the lie.

"Is this true, Leon?"

"I swear it, by St. Marie!" cries the other. "Our wedding-day is fixed for the end of Lent."

The branch bends again, creaking and snapping, until the leaping wolves can almost reach the men's feet. On the trunk itself—now splitting downwards—there is no safety. Pierrot looks at his friend, his rival, with a smile, and asks once more:

"You will swear that this is true, Leon? You will swear it by the Holy Cross of our Blessed Lord?"

"I will swear it, Pierrot, by the Holy Cross of our Blessed Lord! Babette has promised to be my wife," shrieks Leon in a spasm of fear, as the branch sways lower still and the wolves leap howling up with cruelly-snapping jaws.

"It is well, Leon. Do not pain her dear heart more than you can help with this tragedy! The branch will hold now, never fear!"

And he slipped off the tree.

George C. Wallis.

My Lady of the Glistening Tresses.

Seated in front of a long looking-glass in her boudoir was Miss Ethel Kennedy, late one night towards the end of the London season. She was an actress, the principal star of the New Theatre, who had been "discovered" by the energetic manager only a short time since. For the first time in three seasons he was making the theatre pay.

She had scarcely been able to realise yet what an important person she was; the old lady who was attending her at the time, the faithful Martha, did, however. She was engaged in brushing out her young mistress's hair, and she had been doing so for three-quarters of an hour. Night after night she had to comb it, and brush it with the utmost pains; yet it was so beautiful, so luxuriant, so soft and long and silky, that she always forgave it the trouble it caused her. "My hair is my fortune," Miss Kennedy had often quoted to her.

"Do you know," she said presently to Martha, who, as a privileged person received all her confidences, "there's a man who sits in the front row of the stalls who's deeply in love with me. He takes the same seat night after night, and looks at me ever so sweetly."

"And no wonder," answered her maid, "when he sees you coming on in your beautiful white dress, and your hair all shining and a glimmering in the light."

She caressed the silky locks in her hand.

"There are lots of them I expect, too."

"Nonsense," said Miss Kennedy. Nevertheless, she thought this not improbable as she gazed at her image in the glass. For there were other things about her besides her beautiful hair to make men love her.

A humourous thought struck old Martha. "If it wasn't for the play-acting, Missie, you could soon make your fortune."

"How?" inquired Miss Kennedy, but she was thinking of the man in the stalls.

"If you were to show off your hair in a shop window, you'd soon be rich," chuckled Martha.

But Miss Kennedy put an end to flattery and nonsense and prepared for a long night's rest. Nevertheless her thoughts went back to the man in the stalls.

A few nights later Miss Kennedy brought to a successful termination her engagement at the New Theatre. She had made a name for herself, and had already received a handsome offer for the next season.

The following morning she was enjoying the luxury of a late breakfast. She glanced carelessly through her letters until she came to one from a lady friend. This she quickly opened, eagerly devoured the contents. It was from a Mrs. Summers, asking "her darling Ethel" to spend a few days with her.

At three o'clock in the afternoon she was ringing at her friend's door. The polite butler informed her that Mrs. Summers was expecting her in the garden. Would she step out and find her? As she crossed the terrace, and tripped down the broad steps leading to the lawn, she saw her friend running towards her with a smile of expectation on her face. I will spare you the commonplaces and the platitudes of small talk that resulted, and simply mention that presently Mrs. Summers' eyes fell on her son, to whom she beckoned, and who came forward immediately.

As he saw more clearly his mother's latest guest his heart gave a great throb of joy. Before him stood the girl for the sake of whom he had gone night after night to the New Theatre, in order that he might be near her.

After tea and chatter, they sat together in the drawing-room, Miss Kennedy and young Summers.

"Do you know," said the young man, after they had been chatting together for a little while, "I feel as if I had known you all my life."

Miss Kennedy waited a moment before she replied.

"You certainly were a most devoted admirer," she whispered.

Young Summers started. So she had discovered him.

He thought he had never met a more charming companion in his life. He already fancied himself deeply in love with her. "My lady of the glistening tresses," he had long ago named her to himself.

Mrs. Summers was going to take her party that night to a fancy dress ball. Miss Kennedy came down as one of Shakespeare's heroines; she was dressed in a soft white dress and had plaited her beautiful hair, which fell in long braids down her shoulders, to show it off to the best advantage. If ever a man was in love with a pretty woman's face, it was young Summers that night.

Digitized by Google

It was an early dance, and the Summers were the first to leave, for Miss Kennedy was tired with her exertions of the last week, and the journey from the town in the morning. It was a short drive home, and by two o'clock there was not a soul moving in Mrs. Summers' house. All was quiet and wrapped in slumber.

Suddenly, as the first ray of the early summer sun was creeping up the sky, a cry rang out from the servants' part of the building, a cry so loud and so full of agony that there was not a person near who did not start up in terror.

In a moment all was bustle and confusion. A fire had broken out; it had caught a light muslin curtain; it had licked up the paper on the walls, and before the terrified girl in whose room it had originated had time to do more than shriek for help, it was raging fiercely.

"I feel as if I had known you all my life."

The last person to become aware of the danger was young Summers himself. He woke up with a strange unaccountable feeling of terror at his heart; with a choking sensation in his throat. He rushed to the door and saw his mother, pale and trembling, standing before him.

"Thank God you are safe!" she murmured.

"Where's Ethel?" he asked, "is she safe? Tell me quickly."

The terrified woman pointed to the far end of the house towards the west wing. "She's there," she said, "they're trying to get her out. I came for you."

Young Summers stayed to hear no more. He sped along the passage, down a long corridor, at the end of which ran a flight of stairs. It was choked with smoke and flame. He covered his face with his hands and rushed blindly forward. Presently he came out into the garden. A group of men were standing round a window against which a ladder had been placed. The men were hesitating for a moment, each waiting for the other to volunteer the ascent. Young Summers rushed madly into their midst, scattering them on all sides. He sprang on to the ladder, bounded up, and in a moment was at the window. It was securely fastened. With one blow he broke it open. Scrambling through the glass, with lacerated hands and feet he reached the floor. A flame shot up beneath him, lighting up the room. He glanced at the bed—it was empty. He staggered to the door, and stumbled against a white object lying on the ground. Picking it up in his arms, he once more scrambled through the window, and slid nimbly down the ladder. Willing hands were stretched out to meet him, and to relieve him of his burden.

They carried it along the terrace, Young Summers following behind, until they reached the extreme eastern wing of the building. Hesitating a moment to enter, they looked round to where the fire was burning. Already the flames were subdued. One wing had been entirely destroyed, but they were checked for the moment by the solid masonry of the main building which confronted them. A fire-engine had rattled up, and was now at work; the little stream at the bottom of the garden gave a plentiful supply of water.

Seeing this, the men entered the house, and laid their burden on a couch in a little room close by. Young Summers crept forward, and gazed at the face of the girl to whom he was whispering such sweet words of love only a short time since. He started back with an exclamation of horror. Surely there was some mistake? This was not Miss Kennedy; this thing that lay before him, with hideous drawn face, white and seared, and shorn of the adorning crown of hair. Could he believe his eyes? He called for someone to bring a lamp, but at that moment a bright gleam of sunlight crept through a chink in the shutters, and shone full on the face of the girl before him. With a low moan of agony, Summers sank senseless on the floor.

* * *

Six days later Summers was closeted with his friend Johnson. He had told him all the story from beginning to end; how he had first fallen in love with the girl's pretty face when she was acting her famous tragedy at the New Theatre; how he had met her again at his mother's house; how he had spent one delightful afternoon and evening in her company; and then how cruel Fate had stretched out her relentless hands and torn her from him; and, lastly, how he had turned with horror from the mangled thing his eyes had gazed on.

He ended up pitifully enough: "The doctors say she will never look the same again. Her face will bear the scars to the grave. Her beautiful hair will never grow again." He covered his face with his hands and groaned aloud: "My lady of the glistening tresses!"

"But your love," said Johnson, trying to speak firmly, "your love is still as constant——"

The figure before him shuddered as if with ague.

"I think," said Summers, "that I must go abroad for a year or two. Perhaps then it will come back to me."

J. Marcus.

Digitized by Google

My Adventure with a Tiger.

"We were travelling along the north branch of the Gadavey River—sometimes upon its banks and again a couple of miles from the water, sometimes travelling five or six miles a day, and again halting for a couple of days to fish or shoot—when a most singular incident befel me individually.

"I had left camp at an early hour in the morning for the purpose of fishing. While I carried my rifle with me, I had no intention of going out of my way to find game. On the previous afternoon I had observed what seemed to be a capital spot in the bend of the river, and it was to this place I hastened as I left camp. Some of the native servants were astir and saw me set out, but I did not want their services. It was pretty thick jungle between the camp and the bend, but at the bend there was a clear spot of an acre in extent with a heavy forest growth and a ledge of rocks for a background.

"As I took a look round before sitting down on the bank to my sport, I remarked that it was a good spot for wild beasts, but as there was nothing moving, I went right to work with my fishing tackle. Catching a frog for bait, I flung in the hook, and it wasn't five minutes before I was meeting with such luck, that all thoughts of tigers, snakes, jackals, and hyenas, were driven out of my mind.

"I had landed half-a-dozen good-sized fish, and was just then playing a larger one, when a slight noise startled me, and I looked round to see such a sight as has seldom come to the eyes of a sportsman. A full-grown tiger was within five feet of me, playing with one of the fish. It was the last one pulled out, and in its dying agonies it was jumping about on the grass. Every time it moved the tiger would reach out a paw in a playful way, and once or twice he struck hard enough to move the fish three or four feet.

"I tell you I was a badly-frightened man, and all I could do was to sit there with mouth and eyes open. The tiger had crept down from the bluffs, and why he hadn't attacked me was a mystery. He went from fish to fish, turning them over with his paw, and time and again brushing me with his tail as he moved about. My rifle was ten feet away, leaning against a bush, and I might have been idiot enough to try and reach it but for a warning.

"My personal servant had followed me to see what luck I had. He came into the neighbourhood while the tiger was playing with the fish, and softly climbing a tree, he uttered the call of a bird to attract my attention, and then sang out: 'Do nothing to provoke the tiger, master. He is a hiloweele, and if you do not cross him he will go away.' He meant that the spirit of a good nature had been transformed, and it was clearly the common sense way to follow his advice.

"As the beast gave me no attention I turned to the fish tugging at the end of my line, and landed him. He was of good size and full of vitality, and the tiger waited in a playful way until I removed the hook and threw the fish on the grass. Then he sprang for it as a kitten would for a ball of yarn, and he played with it in the same way. It was laughable, in spite of the circumstances, to witness his actions.

"He would run round in circles, as you have seen a young dog do, sometimes almost leaping over me, and then again he would become the cat, and creep softly forward to pounce upon one of the fish. Each one as caught was flung to him, and it was a full half-hour before he grew tired of the sport. I expected he would turn to me sooner or later, but the native saw the change of demeanour first, and called: 'Master, the hiloweele is going to play with you. Be as clay in his power.'

"The tiger suddenly left the last fish landed and came stalking over to me, purring like a cat, and acting very playfully. His first move was to worm his head under my left arm, and I'm telling you the solemn truth when I say that I smoothed down his fur as if he had been a favourite dog. I had on a big straw hat, and this he got hold of in his teeth, and played with it for ten minutes, or, until he had torn it all to pieces. I had no more bait to fish with, and sat there waiting for the tiger's next move.

"When he had finished the hat he came over an rubbed his head against me, and purred in a pleased way, and I rubbed him with my hand from nose to tail. I gradually got over my scare, but was yet very anxious to know how the affair would end. The sun was getting well up and very hot, and the beast would soon be seeking his lair. In about thirty minutes from the time he appeared the tiger began to show a change of demeanour. He became nervous and uneasy, and the hair on his back stood up at intervals. I judged that he had got the scent of my servant, and such proved to be the case.

"I dared not rise to my feet, but I made up my mind that if the tiger attacked me I should make a spring off the bank into the river. It was infested with crocodiles, but there was not much choice between being eaten by beast or saurian.

"Once the tiger glared at me and growled, but the next moment whined as if afraid, and edged up towards me as if for protection. The servant had been keeping a watchful eye on my strange playmate, and he now believed the time had come for decisive action. He therefore fired his pistol, and shouted at the top of his voice. The effect was immediate. The beast dropped his tail, uttered a long-drawn whine, and with a sort of farewell glance at me he bolted for the forest and disappeared. I had looked him over pretty well, and had noticed, among other things, that he had a broken claw on the right paw. We did not break camp that day.

"Just before sunset, as we sat in groups smoking our pipes, a tiger charged boldly in among the servants and seized one and attempted to make off. We rallied to prevent, and the beast knocked two other men over before he was dispatched. When we came to examine the body I had not the slightest difficulty in identifying it as that of my playmate of the morning."

H. P. Leggett.

Digitized by Google

The First Night.

"I wonder if there is any truth in an 'evil genius.' Perhaps after all it's merely coincidence, that whenever you meet a certain member of your acquaintance some fatality invariably occurs."

Mrs. Alleyn sipped her wine a trifle nervously.

"You have not eaten a mouthful of lunch," said Lady Susannah. "Have you seen him to-day?"

"Who?" asked Mrs. Alleyn, a trifle sharply.

"Why, the evil genius, of course."

"Oh! no!"

"I suppose it's that man Scourloudi?"

"Y—es," speaking hesitatingly.

"A woman would not be interesting enough to come under that category. I expect you are feeling thoroughly excited and highly strung to-day. I ought not to have come."

"Your quiet influence, my dear Susannah, has done me a world of good. You are so optimistic. When you arrived my nerves were simply on wires, but they have gradually calmed. I don't know why I suddenly thought of my evil genius. I've not seen him for more than a year, though everything has been going badly with us. If he appeared to-night," with a little shudder, "I think I should scream!"

"Please don't, for it is not at all unlikely. I suppose a man about town may drop into the theatre, without necessarily bringing ruin in his train."

"Not Scourloudi!" muttered Mrs. Alleyn.

"But do you honestly, with or without Scourloudi, imagine poor dear Arthur will be a success?" Lady Susannah asked the question abruptly and deliberately.

Mrs. Alleyn opened her questioning grey eyes a trifle wider, and gave a slight gasp of surprise.

"Why, yes. It will be the most terrible thing for us if he has a frost. But I do not see how the play can fail under Arthur's management, and with Arthur in the leading part. Don't you remember how splendid he was in those theatricals Captain Stammers got up at Norton Hall?"

"We certainly had great fun over them."

"Yes, how jolly we were then, before grim poverty laid us low!"

Mrs. Alleyn took up a macaroon and bit it leisurely. "You see, Susannah, we are dreadfully poor—quite at our last ebb. But I still had some money to invest, which Aunt Gertrude left me. Arthur said that nothing is certain now, and to speculate in these troubled times is simply madness. So I decided to take a theatre and let Arthur run a Society play. Of course, it costs a lot, but then think of the profits. He has such heaps of friends, and is so well known, that the house is sure to be crowded. I can't tell you what a lot of people have written for tickets on the first night. But it's silly to brag, you wait till this evening, and see for yourself."

Lady Susannah smiled.

"What does his father think of it?"

"Oh! he is simply mad, declares it is lowering the family name, dragging it through the mire. He even had the cruelty to say Arthur was bound to make a fool of himself."

"I can just picture Lord Alleyn holding forth on the subject—what a joke!"

"I don't see that it is the least funny."

"I suppose Arthur is very busy to-day?"

"Oh! yes, I've not seen him since the morning. He promised to be back before six. But if anything prevents him, I shall go to the theatre alone. Mind you are there in good time to support me, Susannah. You know the number of the box?"

"Yes. Try not to fuss, or think too much about it, but lie down and rest till tea. You look as white as a sheet."

"There is no repose for the wicked," laughed Mrs. Alleyn, pushing back the fair curls from her forehead, and fanning herself with a lace pocket-handkerchief. "It is my 'At Home' day, unfortunately."

"You poor thing!" said Lady Susannah sympathetically as they went upstairs. "Forgive me running away directly, but I only popped in to wish you good luck."

"I say—Susannah—do you think—it's—low?"

"Not at all. Lady Stobart's daughter is at a tailor's maison, parading about in black satin, and taking orders. I would rather have a husband on the stage than a daughter in a shop. It is quite fashionable 'to do something.' If the craze lasts, I shall have to think myself out a profession. Ta-ta!"

An hour later Mrs Alleyn was doing her best to converse with a dozen or more vivacious females at the same time. She looked prettily pale in her soft green chiffon fichu and elegant silk gown.

They came and went, a succession of gaily-attired butterflies, while a sense of hopeless fatigue crept over Mrs. Alleyn. All her thoughts were with Arthur.

She was just hoping that the last batch of callers had arrived, when the door again opened, and a name fell on her ears that froze her blood and stopped the breath she was about to draw.

"Mr. Scourloudi!"

For the moment she dared not turn, but steadied herself with one trembling hand against the mantelpiece. Then, slowly raising her eyes, she stepped forward and felt the magnetic touch of a man's hand.

Scourloudi was tall, and dark as the night. His thick black eyebrows made her think of bands of crape. He smiled cynically, and glanced round the room.

Whether Mrs. Alleyn's agitation was visible or not she couldn't tell, but the few remaining visitors simultaneously took their leave. She said good-bye mechanically, and motioned the newcomer to a chair.

It was with an effort that she addressed him in ordinary society tones.

"I have not seen you for over a year, Mr. Scourloudi. This is quite a surprise."

Digitized by Google

"No, I have been abroad, studying science, chiefly in Paris."

"Testing the powers of 'brain versus brain?'"

"Yes. I wanted to see you alone, and I made these people go. It is a useful gift to cultivate."

He showed his white teeth as he spoke.

"It was really very kind of you," replied Mrs. Alleyn lightly, forcing a smile; "they bored me to death."

"Not quite. Let me feel your pulse; you are still alive!"

Mrs. Alleyn drew her hand away sharply.

"Don't!" she said.

His presence affected her strangely, partly from a mild form of superstition, but more especially because he had such a powerful influence over her.

"Is it true," he asked suddenly, "that your husband has taken the —— Theatre, and is going to appear himself to-night?"

"Yes."

"What strange fads you rich people adopt in search of diversion!"

"This is a money, not a pleasure scheme," vouchsafed Mrs. Alleyn.

"And you have every confidence in it?"

As he looked at her, the hopes with which she had buoyed herself up, the confidence inspired by Arthur's assurances that all would go well, and that the piece was "rippin'," faded like the fabric of a dream. She could never act to Scourloudi, his eyes made that impossible.

"I—I am frightened," she murmured, clasping her hands. "It means so much to us. We must have money, but I would sooner relinquish that than see Arthur an object of ridicule. Yet what can we say? He courts criticism; it is the penalty of publicity. The suspense is terrible," passing her hands over her brow. "I wish," leaning back against the sofa cushions and sighing deeply, "that I could go to sleep until it is all over."

"There was a princess in an old fairy tale that had only to 'wish,' and her desires were all fulfilled." He was staring her straight in the eyes, watching the nervous twitching of her lips.

"How delightful! If only I were that princess!"

Ten minutes later the bell rang, and as the servant mounted the stairs, Scourloudi appeared on the landing. "I know my way," turning back to speak to Mrs. Alleyn. "Good-bye, and good luck for to-night." Then the servant turned and preceded him to the hall.

* * * * *

Mrs. Alleyn sat back behind the box curtain, and surveyed the crowded house through her opera glasses.

Lady Susannah smiled significantly. Something in her face irritated the Hon. Arthur Alleyn's excitable little wife.

A tall, imposing figure entered the stalls and sat quite near the stage box. It was Scourloudi.

Susannah pointed to him with her fan.

"Your evil genius," she whispered, "come to use his influence against you."

"I mastered it this afternoon," replied Mrs. Alleyn. "I can defy him now. You will see that even the presence of Scourloudi cannot mar my husband's triumph."

She spoke proudly, though the eyes of the man below were riveted upon her firmly. She returned the glance with a low laugh.

Her lips were still smiling as the curtain rose.

She watched the progress of the play in ecstatic delight, following Arthur's every movement entranced.

Rounds of applause greeted him at every turn; not one of his points failed to tell on an enthusiastic and appreciative audience.

After the final scene her cup of happiness was full; her heart swelled as she heard the shouts for her husband: "Alleyn! Alleyn!"

He advanced before the footlights, bowed, smiled, and appeared about to speak. He opened his lips, but no voice came; he struggled to utter, yet only a few incoherent sounds escaped him. It was a moment of direst suffering for his wife. She gazed from her box amazed and horrified, then covered her face with her hands, and sprang to her feet. As she did so a sharp cry broke from her lips, and she awoke.

Mrs. Alleyn sat up on the sofa and stared round the empty drawing-room. She was in exactly the same place as when she had last spoken to Scourloudi, but she could not remember falling asleep, nor the fact of his leaving her. The dream still held the uppermost place in her mind. Then gradually the words she had heedlessly spoken returned: "I wish I could sleep until it is all over!"

Was it possible Scourloudi had taken them seriously, and put her off into a mesmeric slumber? If so, what was the hour, and where was Arthur? She turned on the electric light, and stared at the clock. Half-past nine!

Why, the piece would have begun over an hour ago.

Still dazed and bewildered she pealed the bell.

A trim maid with very wide opened eyes, and astonished brows answered the summons.

"When did Mr. Alleyn come in?" asked his wife anxiously.

"He has not been back at all, ma'am. I came to wake you for dinner, but you were sleeping so soundly I couldn't."

Arthur had been detained then. What would he think of her non-appearance? How could she tell him she had over-slept herself? It was utterly incomprehensible!

"When did Mr. Scourloudi leave?" she asked vaguely, feeling more foolish than she had ever done in her life.

"About five o'clock, ma'am. You rang for me to show him out."

"He did that for himself," thought Mrs. Alleyn.

"Will you dine now?"

The question seemed to bring her suddenly to her senses.

"Dine!" She scoffed at the idea.

"Bring me a cloak, and whistle for a hansom at once," she cried. "I must go to the theatre just as I am."

She seized the evening wrap the maid brought her, flung it about her shoulders, rushed down the stairs, and into a passing hansom.

"Drive with all your might to the —— Theatre," she said.

The evening air blew on her forehead, now burning with suspense. To think that Arthur was at that very moment making his first appearance on the London boards, without her being present. How dare Scourloudi! Was it, perhaps, that he knew Arthur would fail, and wished to spare her the pain of witnessing his humiliation, and hearing the mocking jeers? Her heart beat faster. How rapidly the horse sped over the wood pavement, yet it seemed slow—slow!

Ah, now they were turning the corner, and the flaring lights of the "house" would meet her fevered vision.

Digitized by Google

She gazed up the street, but the theatre was shrouded in darkness, yet she saw by the roadside lamps the placards with her husband's name outside.

"P'r'aps we've come to the wrong theatre," the cabby suggested.

"Can't you read? It is written up in plain English—the date—the name—everything!"

She sprang back into the hansom. "Drive me to the stage door—quick!"

A moment later, and she was out again, only to find that entrance closed also.

She rapped furiously in a frenzy of apprehension.

Eventually it was opened by a man in evening dress.

He seemed to be in a hurry, and was shrugging his body in to a long overcoat.

There was an expression of intense annoyance on his face; his lips were compressed and cigarless, though he carried a smouldering end of a "Bock" between his fingers.

"What has happened?" asked Mrs. Alleyn, catching her breath.

He glanced at her suspiciously, then recognising the manager's wife, took off his hat, and muttered: "Good-evening."

She repeated her question.

"You haven't heard?"

His words were incredulous. Mrs. Alleyn shook her head. She was too overcome to speak.

"It's all up, for to-night at least!" he muttered hopelessly, "yet we are in the dark still."

"Where is my husband?"

"Don't you know?" he cried wonderingly.

Mrs. Alleyn trembled. "Tell me," she said hoarsely.

"About an hour before the doors should have opened, we had a telegram from Mr. Alleyn, saying: 'Close the house, return the public their money, there must be no play to-night.' He has not been near the place yet. We have seen nothing of him!"

Mrs. Alleyn made no sign. She stood as one petrified, till she noticed two or three small urchins gaping at her under the shadow of the wall. The sight of their pinched yet curious faces reminded her that she was hatless in a London side-street, staring into a comparative stranger's eyes.

"When was he last seen?"

"Here, late in the afternoon. Everything was satisfactorily prepared. Green, the call-boy, declares he saw him at Waterloo station about six, with a lady. But he is not very reliable in his statements."

These words were enough for Mrs. Alleyn. She asked no more, but turned away dizzily. She stepped back into the cab, seeing nothing, and drove home through the busy night, utter perplexity, numbness and despair creeping over her shocked senses. She did not know what to think. Ruin, infidelity, all things terrible and disgraceful, presented themselves in turn to her mind.

"Has Mr. Alleyn returned?" she asked, as she staggered, weak and white, into the dimly-lighted hall.

"No, ma'am."

She walked slowly into the dining-room. Their supper was spread, supper for two!

"Bring me the 'Bradshaw,'" she said faintly.

If Arthur did not return before the morning, she would take an early train to Beveree, and ask Lord Alleyn's advice. He was angry with his son she knew, but his heart was in the right place, and he always had a soft spot for Arthur's little wife. He was besides a man of strong common sense and much activity. In an emergency she felt she could rely on Lord Alleyn.

There was a train that left at seven a.m.

All through the long weary hours of darkness Alice Alleyn waited downstairs, listening to every passing footstep, and watching each conveyance that rumbled through the square. But no sign came.

The long drawn out suspense grew more unendurable. She paced the room, or sat in mute agony, with her face pressed against the window. At half-past five she went to her room and changed her silk dress to one of sombre cloth. She found some slight relief in activity, and by seven o'clock was weeping silently in the corner of a first-class carriage, with a ticket to Beveree tucked in her black suède glove. It comforted her to cry, for all night her eyes had been dry and burning, her cheeks tearless.

What would her aristocratic old father-in-law, in his ancient home on Beveree Hill, think of her sudden arrival and melancholy tale?

She tried to picture how he would take it, but her imagination failed to paint a convincing scene. By the time the train stopped at the country station, she had worked herself into a fever of apprehension. No sort of conveyance awaited her, and the morning being bright and sunny, she determined to walk. How ironically the hedge sparrows twittered. With what mockery the early sunbeams glistened through the trees! At last she reached the end of the long avenue and rang the clanging bell.

The door opened simultaneously. She rushed forward with a cry:

"Arthur!"

"You are too late," he said, putting his arms round her gently. Then she noticed his pale face, and haggard sleepless eyes, still laughing aloud with pure joy, and a sudden reaction from bitterest fear.

"Why did you do it? What does it all mean?" she asked, clinging to him like a child.

"Didn't you get the message I sent you?" leading her to a seat in the hall. She sank upon it gladly.

"No!"

"I have been up with our poor father all night. Florence and I came down together. He had a fatal accident, riding, and died about half-an-hour ago."

Alice gazed at him in horror. She could hardly believe the words.

Arthur seemed to be struggling with his emotion. He answered the questioning look in his wife's eyes.

"Oh! yes, dear, we made it up. He was conscious to the last. I swore never to disregard his dying request, and my dream of the drama has vanished. He talked of it last night when I arrived, with a certain grim humour through his pain.

"'The bay fiend has smashed me up in time to stop that, eh, my boy?' he gasped feebly. And then, with a choke in his voice, he sent for the will, out of which, in a moment of anger, he cut the 'play actor,' and added a codicil, after receiving my word to renounce the stage."

"Oh! Arthur, why did we ever think of it?" sobbed his wife.

* * * * *

So the Alleyns lived on in independence, and the world was deprived of the privilege of criticising a peer's son.

Among Alice's letters of condolence came one from Scourloudi, in which he trusted she might sleep peacefully through all the evils of life, and only wake to Fortune's smile.

"I am going away" he concluded. "for a long season. Adieu, et puis bon soir!" W. G.

Digitized by Google

When The Birds Begin To Sing.

By Winifred Graham. Author of "Through the Valley," "Six First-Class Passengers," etc.

SUMMARY.

Philip Roche marries Eleanor Grebby, daughter of a farmer, and they spend their honeymoon on the Continent. On their return to Richmond, Eleanor becomes friendly with a frivolous widow, Mrs. Mounteagle, against her husband's wishes. She is introduced to Carol Quinton, who fascinates her. Her husband is heart-broken, and consults his cousin, Erminie Henderson, who comes to stay with them. Eleanor's parents come to spend a day or two with her, and disgust Mrs. Mounteagle with their homeliness. Nelson Lane and Erminie are engaged. Each is led to think the other rich, but the deceit is mutual. In order to right themselves in one another's eyes, they each, unknown to the other, speculate in mining shares. Eleanor is induced to lunch at the Savoy with Carol Quinton. They there meet Mrs. Mounteagle and her fiancé, Herbert Dallison. Philip appears on the scene, and Eleanor and Herbert change tables. Philip afterwards discovers that the meeting between his wife and Carol was not accidental, and, on the recommendation of Erminie, suggests that Eleanor should return to her parents at Copthorne for a time.

CHAPTER XIII.

To-morrow, and to-morrow, and to-morrow.—Shakespeare.

Eleanor is superintending her packing, when Giddy Mounteagle enters her room.

"I called and ran straight up, dear," she says, "knowing you were busy. What! are you only taking so small a trunk into the country?"

"Yes, no finery, only two stuff dresses and a felt hat. I want to forget there is such a thing as society or 'toilettes.' I am going to have a good time with all the farm people, and the school children, and be just as I was before I married. There are some of my clothes still hanging up in my old room, I shall put them on, and grub in the garden, rake, weed, and mow. Our poor machine was dreadfully cranky before I left, I should think it has fallen to pieces by now, but I mean to have a try. Mother's bit of front lawn is the pride of her heart. Black Bess will meet me at the station, and Rover—dear affectionate dog. I shall swing on the gate and whistle, and——"

But Eleanor's prattle breaks off shortly, for her throat feels strangled, and the misery that Giddy clearly sees beneath her smiles, overmasters her.

"I think I have got a cold," she falters; "my eyes water so, and I have a little husk here when I speak."

But Giddy knows it is the coldness of desolation that brings the raindrops to shine on Eleanor's lashes.

"Do put in a few dainty gowns, dearest," she implores. "It would be such fun to show them off and astonish the natives. Say that hat from 'Louise,' in case you tea with the vicar's spouse, of whom I have often heard."

Eleanor is too weary to object, and lets Giddy order Sarah hither and thither till the room is in a litter and her head in a whirl.

"Go and fetch me Mrs. Roche's Roumanian jacket, the one from Liberty," says Giddy to Sarah. "I want to borrow it as a pattern. I am sure that nice little dressmaker at Twickenham could make me one exactly like it," turning to Eleanor, as Sarah quits the room. "You don't mind, dear?"

"Oh, no."

"Did I tell you I met Lady MacDonald yesterday, and she actually asked after you? I was quite surprised. She is in great trouble, poor thing, having lost her favourite maid—a regular right hand in the household. The woman had a very good figure, and has gone to the Empire, and gets £4 a week for standing in the front row of a ballet or chorus or something. Lady MacDonald feels sure she must have been in the trade before she entered her service. She gets that excellent pay because she just matches another girl, like a horse you know. It must be vastly more entertaining than fastening Lady MacDonald's back hooks. The worst of it is she will tell all the other servants about it, and make them envious. The scullery maid, who is short and broad, and stout, is fired to go, and dreams of nothing else."

"I wonder the beautiful Lady MacDonald has time to trouble about the dreams of a menial," says Eleanor, with the touch of sarcasm that always accompanies any mention of Giddy's friend.

Sarah returns, and the subject drops.

"Is it not a pity Philip is dreadfully busy this week, or he was to have come with me to-day," continues Eleanor. "I doubt now if he will be able to get to Copthorne at all."

"How like a husband to be busy when you want him. I am sure you are much too young and pretty to travel alone."

"Shall we leave Sarah to finish the packing, and come down? I must have an early lunch."

Giddy follows her to the dining-room.

"I saw Carol Quinton yesterday," she says. "I told him you were going away, but was true to my word, and did not divulge the address."

"I wish you had said nothing about my movements," replies Eleanor uneasily, starting at the sound of Carol's name.

"I could not help it, he asked me all about you directly; he never talks of anything else, which seems rather absurd to another woman."

"Yes, you must grow horribly tired of the subject."

"You remember that dance at the 'Star and Garter' that

Eleanor's prattle breaks off shortly.

Digitized by Google

you didn't go to? Well, I only heard the other day from those 'Bennett-Jones' girls that he asked them if you would be there, and they said 'yes,' just because they wanted him to make their party complete; they took three men and three girls. They knew really that you had a previous engagement, but kept buoying him up all the evening by expecting your momentary appearance. Later on, Addie, the eldest, broke it to him that you had never intended going. He was so offended he went straight home, aud has not called on them since. It was rather mean you know to lure him there under false pretences."

"When did they tell you that?"

"Oh! the next day Addie called about ten in the morning, before I was down. She was really quite funny about it."

Eleanor bites her lips.

"It seems that my name is coupled with Mr. Quinton's," she mutters.

"Well, people will talk, whatever you do. Little Mrs. Hope saw you walking with him in the park one day, and she told Addie, and Addie told——"

"Oh! don't," cries Eleanor impatiently, putting her hands to her racking head, and stamping her foot impatiently. "I would rather not hear. It is all so petty, so stupid, so mean. What have I or Carol Quinton to do with them?"

"You have flirted with him, my dear, so openly at the Richmond parties, you can scarcely expect to escape observation."

"I hate the people here—I hate everybody!" declares Eleanor passionately. "I shall be thankful to get away. There are no gossiping fools to drive me crazy at Copthorne."

"How delightful! Fancy wandering about with a cow for your chaperon and the birds for critics, a rural pasture for your ballroom, a buttercup meadow for your lounge! How long shall you stay in 'Happy Arcadia'?"

"As long as I can," replies Eleanor. "I should like never to come back, and when I do I will take good care I am not seen with Mr. Quinton. It is all this silly girls' talk that eventually reaches Philip's ears, and makes our home unbearable."

"Yes, Eleanor. The breath of scandal permeates through the stolidest walls, or perhaps it comes in by the keyhole. It is a germ that is spread by chattering tongues, like some deadly disease. It nearly ruined my life when I was young."

"What a pity it cannot be taxed," sighs Eleanor. "By the way, the last thing I heard was that you had broken your engagement with Bertie. Of course I did not believe it."

"Which was distinctly wrong of you under the circumstances. I am disappointed in him. We have decided to go our separate paths—apart."

"Oh! Giddy I am so sorry. But why?"

"When I marry (which I shall do some day again), I want a rising man, clever, pushing, ambitious, like Lord MacDonald, in fact. Someone who will improve my position, lift me, instead of being a burden. Bertie's intellect was very weak, and I do hate a fool!"

"I should have thought that would be rather an advantage in a husband," remarks Eleanor.

"Really Bertie was too expensive, he wanted so much pocket money, I could not afford the luxury of a fiancé on his terms. Of course he is broken-hearted, dear boy, and naturally I wept a few poetical tears, and said I should always think of him as a friend."

"Poor Bertie! I am sorry for him," says Eleanor. "I cannot bear to hear of anyone loving in vain, it is such horrible suffering."

She is thinking of herself and Carol Quinton.

"Human hearts are regulated in a very unsatisfactory manner. Are you sure you have had enough lunch?" as Eleanor pushes her untasted food away, and sips her sherry.

"The carriage is at the door," she replies, "they are getting the luggage down."

Eleanor and Giddy go into the hall together.

As Sarah carries the dressing bag out, it flies open, and something falls at Mrs. Mounteagle's feet.

She picks it up.

It is a photograph of Carol Quinton.

"You must have that lock secured," she says laughing, "or buy a strap."

Eleanor colours, and hides the photograph in her muff.

"Good-bye, Giddy."

"Take care of yourself, my sweet," returning Eleanor's caress. "I have no doubt it will be very merry and jolly in the country," with a little grimace that means it won't.

But Mrs. Roche cares not to what corner of the globe she is travelling as the train bears her to Copthorne. She is too utterly miserable to notice places or seasons. She just sits by the window, and stares at the picture she has drawn from her muff, from which the eyes of Carol Quinton look pleadingly in hers.

"I wish I could bury myself," she thinks, her mind turning to Africa—America—Asia—any of the far off worlds she has read of in geography books and fiction. "I wish I were someone else, or even the old Eleanor that Philip stole from Copthorne Farm. Why did he not leave me there? It would have been far better for us both!"

An elderly woman seated opposite glances at Eleanor over her paper, struck by the strange pallor of the young face, the nervous twitching of the mouth, and tear-dimmed eyes.

The stranger leans forward suddenly with an abrupt question.

"May I see that photograph?"

Eleanor starts in trepidation; her thoughts have been so far away that they are brought back to the present with an effort.

She sees before her a face lined more deeply with sorrow than time, a woman who might still have considerable beauty had she not dyed her hair in her youth and ruined her complexion with cosmetics.

The request does not offend Eleanor, for Mrs. Roche is easily won by a kind look or a smile.

She hands the photograph across, watching the stranger's expression.

"What a handsome face!" she exclaims, with a little gasp of admiration.

"Yes," sighs Eleanor.

"I never saw such mesmeric eyes, and yet they are soft, though powerful. I should say that man must have broken many a heart with those eyes."

She looks shrewdly at Mrs. Roche as she speaks.

"If he loves you," she continues, "he will be true."

Eleanor's head droops.

"You love him," said the stranger, reading the tell-tale blush. "Are you going to marry him, my dear?"

"No," falters Eleanor, "I wish I could."

"Ah! I thought so. Forgive me for my curiosity, but your face interested me, and I am not conventional. I always speak if I wish, though it offends some people. To me the fashion of introducing seems absurd. Here we are all jumbled up together in the same little world, yet everyone is a mass of reserve, a mind in armour, they never say what they mean, seldom speak from the heart. One is in the dust, and another on the throne, and they all die in like manner, to be buried most probably by a man they would not have dared address without an introduction, measured by an undertaker they could not have been seen walking with in the street, and to mix with thousands of spirits whose ancestors and pedigree are unknown."

Eleanor listens in surprise.

"Are you uncertain about your future?" the stranger asks.

"A little," falters Eleanor nervously.

"Then let me look at your hand, I may be able to help you. No, the left hand please," as Mrs. Roche tremblingly unbuttons her right glove. "Ah!" as the gold wedding ring is revealed, "I was afraid so. I see it all now, this, (pointing to the photograph), is not your husband."

Digitized by Google

"This is not your husband."

Eleanor tries to speak, but her throat is parched, and dry. She only bends her head and gazes at the lines in her pink palm.

"You are going on a journey very soon," vouchsafes the stranger. "I wish it could be prevented, for it brings more pain than pleasure—misery, desolation."

Eleanor snatches away her hand.

"I don't want to know any more," she says, almost fiercely, pulling on her glove.

"I did not mean to frighten you," replies the women penitently. "But I want to warn you. Whatever you do wrong in this world, my friend, is always repaid. There may be a heaven and a hell in the hereafter, I know not, I am not in a position to say, but of one thing I am certain, there is the hell here on earth, which measures out the allotted punishment to its victims."

"I don't understand you," exclaims Eleanor. "You talk to me as if I were a criminal."

"No," shaking her head sadly; "only as to a young and beautiful wife, who dreams and cries over another man's picture. You have the fatal, dangerous gift of fascination, Mrs. Roche."

"How did you know my name?"

"It is by me on the label of your bag."

Eleanor is silent. She waits for the stranger to continue.

